Spake to the Azteca. The King look'd up;
The hour, the horrors round him, had impress'd
Feelings and fears well fitted to receive
All superstition; and the voice which cried,
Depart! depart! seem'd like the voice of fate.
He thought, perhaps Coanocotzin's soul,
Descending from his blissful halls in the hour
Of evil, thus to comfort and advise,
Hover'd above him.

Lo! toward the rock,
Oaring with feeble arms his difficult way,
A warrior struggles: he hath reach'd the rock,
Hath grasp'd it, but his strength, exhausted, fails
To lift him from the depth. The King descends
Timely in aid; he holds the feeble one
By his long locks, and on the safety-place
Lands him. He, panting, from his clotted hair
Shook the thick waters, from his forehead wiped
The blinding drops; on his preserver's face
Then look'd, and knew the King. Then Thalala
Fell on his neck, and groan'd. They laid them down
In silence, for their hearts were full of woe.

The sun came forth; it shone upon the rock;
They felt the kindly beams; their strength's

blood
Flow'd with a fierer action. They arose,
And look'd around, if aught of hope might meet
Their prospect. On the lake the galleys pled
Their toil successfully, ever to the shore
Bearing their rescued charge: the eastern heights,
Rightward and leftward of the fiery mount,
Were throng'd with fugitives, whose growing crowds
Speckled the ascent. Then Thalala took hope,
And his young heart, reviving, reassumed
Its wonted vigor. Let us to the heights,
He cried;— all is not lost, Yuhidhiton!
When they beheld thy countenance, the sight
Will cheer them in their woe, and they will bless
The Gods of Aztlan.

To the heights they went;
And when the remnant of the people saw
Yuhidhiton preserved, such comfort then
They felt, as utter wretchedness can feel,
That only gives grief utterance, only speaks
In groans and recollections of the past.
He look'd around; a multitude was there,—
But where the strength of Aztlan? where her hosts?
Her marshall'd myrids where, whom yester Sun
Had seen in arms array'd, in spirit high,
Mighty in youth and courage?— What were these,
This remnant of the people? Women most,
Who from Patamba, when the shock began.

Inclined to peace, and how reluctantly,
Obedient to the Pabas and their Gods,
Had he to this unhappy war been driven.
All now was ended: it remain'd to yield,
To obey the inevitable will of Heaven,
From Aztlan to depart. As thus he ceased,
A Bird, upon a bough which overhung
The rock, as though in echo to his thought,
Cried out,— Depart! depart!— for so the note,
Articulately in his native tongue,
Spake to the Azteca. The King look'd up;
The hour, the horrors round him, had impress'd
Feelings and fears well fitted to receive
All superstition; and the voice which cried,
Depart! depart! seem'd like the voice of fate.

Mighty in youth and courage?— What were these,
This remnant of the people? Women most,
Who from Patamba, when the shock began.
Then spake the King, and called a messenger,
And bade him speed to Aztlán.—Seek the Lord
Of Ocean; tell him that Yuhidhiton
Yields to the will of Heaven, and leaves the land
His fathers won in war. Only one boon,
In memory of our former friendship, ask —
The Ashes of my Fathers,—if indeed
The conquerors have not cast them to the winds.

The herald went his way circuitous,
Along the mountains,—for the flooded vale
Barr'd the near passage; but before his feet
Could traverse half their track, the fugitives
Beheld canoes from Aztlán, to the foot
Of that protecting eminence, wherein
They had their stand, draw nigh. The doubtful sight
Disturb'd them, lest perchance with hostile strength
They came upon their weakness. Wrongful fear,—
For now Cadwallon, from his bare urn'd,
Set foot ashore, and for Yuhidhiton
Inquired, if yet he lived. The King receives
His former friend.—From Madoc come I here,
The Briton said: Raincoat and food he sends,
And peace; so shall this visitation prove
A blessing, if it knit the bonds of peace,
And make us as one people!

'Tlahlah!
Hearest thou him? Yuhidhiton exclaim'd.
Do thou thy pleasure, King! the Tiger cried:
My path is plain.—Theretof Ye
Answering, replied, Thus humbled, as thou seest,
Beneath the visitation of the Gods,
We bow before their will! To them we yield;
To you, their favorites, we resign the land
Our fathers conquer'd. Never more may Fate
In your days or your children's, to the end
Of time, afflict it thus!

He said, and call'd
The Heralds of his pleasure.—Go ye forth
Throughout the land: north, south, and cast, and west,
Proclaim the ruin. Say to all who hear
The name of Azteca, Heaven hath destroy'd
Our nation: say, the voice of Heaven was heard, —
Heard ye it not?—bidding us leave the land,
Who shakes us from her bosom. Ye will find
Women, old men, and babes; the many, weak
Of body, and of spirit ill prepared,
With painful toil, through long and dangerous ways
To seek another country. Say to them,
The White Men will not lift the arm of power
Against the feeble; here they may remain
In peace, and to the grave in peace go down.
But they who would not have their children lose
The name their fathers bore, will join our march.
Ere ye set forth, behold the destined way.

He bade a pile be raised upon the top
Of that high eminence, to all the winds
Exposed. They raised the pile, and left it tree
To all the winds of Heaven; Yuhidhiton
Alone approach'd it, and applied the torch.
The day was calm, and o'er the flaming pile
The wavy smoke hung lingering, like a mist
That in the morning tracks the valley-stream.
Swell over swell it rose, erect above,
On all sides spreading like a stately palm.
So moveless were the winds. Upward it roll'd,
Still upward, when a stream of upper air
Cross'd it, and bent its top, and drove it on,
Straight over Aztlán. An acclamation shout
Welcome'd the will of Heaven; for lo, the smoke
Fast travelling on, while not a breath of air
Is felt below. Ye see the appointed course,
Exclaim'd the King. Proclaim it where ye go!
On the third morning we begin our march.

Soon o'er the lake a winged galley sped,
Waiting the Ocean Prince. He bore, preserved
When Aztlán's bloody temples were cast down,
The Ashes of the Dead. The King received
The relics, and his heart was full; his eye
Dwelt on his father's urn. At length he said,
One more request, O Madoc!—If the lake
Should ever to its ancient bounds return,
Shrined in the highest of Patamba's towers
Coanocotzin rests. —But wherefore this?
Thou wilt respect the ashes of the King.

Then Madoc said, Abide not here, O King,
Thus open to the changeful elements;
But till the day of your departure come,
Sojourn with me. —Madoc, that must not be!
Yuhidhiton replied. Shall I behold
A stranger dwelling in my father's house?
Shall I become a guest, where I was wont
To give the guest his welcome? —He pursued,
After short pause of speech,—For our old men,
And helpless babes, and women; for all those Whom wisely fear and feebleness deter
To tempt strange paths, through swamp, and wildness,
And hostile tribes, for these Yuhidhiton
Entreats thy favor. Underneath thy sway,
They may remember me without regret,
Yet not without affection. —They shall be
My people, Madoc answer'd. —And the rising
Of holiness transmitted from their sires, —
Pursued the King, will these be suffered them?
Blood must not flow, the Christian Prince replied;
No Priest must dwell among us; that hath been
The cause of all this misery!—Enough,
Yuhidhiton replied: I ask no more.
It is not for the conquered to impose
Their law upon the conqueror.

Then he turn'd,
And lifted up his voice, and call'd upon
The people:—All whom fear or feebleness
Withhold from following my adventurous path,
Prince Madoc will receive. No blood must flow,
No Paba dwell among them. Take upon ye,
Ye who are weak of body or of heart,
The Strangers' easy yoke: beneath their sway
Ye may remember me without regret.
Soon take your choice, and speedily depart,
Lest ye impede the adventurers. —As he spake,
Tears flow'd, and groans were heard. The line was drawn,
Which whose would accept the Strangers' yoke
Should pass. A multitude o'erpast the line;
But all the youth of Aztlan crowded round
Yuhidhiton, their own beloved King.

So two days long, with unremitting toil,
The barks of Britain to the adventurers
Bore due supply; and to new habitants
The city of the Cymry spread her gates;
And in the vale around, and on the heights,
Their numerous tents were pitch'd. Meantime
The tale
Of ruin went abroad, and how the Gods
Had driven her sons from Aztlan. To the King,
Companions of his venturous enterprise,
The bold repair'd; the timid and the weak,
All whom, averse from perilous wanderings,
A gentler nature had disposed to peace,
Beneath the Strangers' easy rule remain'd.
Now the third morning came. At break of day
The mountain echoes to the busy sound
Of multitudes. Before the moving tribe
The Pabas bear, enclosed from public sight,
Mexiti; and the ashes of the Kings
Follow the Chair of God. Yuhidhiton
Then leads the marshall'd ranks, and by his side,
Slient and thoughtfully, went Tlalala.

At the north gate of Aztlan, Malinal,
Borne in a litter, waited their approach;
And now alighting, as the train drew nigh,
Propp'd by a friendly arm, with feeble step
Advanced to meet the King. Yuhidhiton,
With eye severe and darkening countenance,
Met his advance. I did not think, quoth he,
Thou wouldst have ventured this! and lieber far
Should I have borne away with me the thought
That Malinal had shunn'd his brother's sight,
Because their common blood yet raised in him
A sense of his own shame! — Comest thou to show
Those wounds, the marks of thine unnatural war
Against thy country? Or to boast the need
Of thy dishonor, that thou hastest here,
Sharing the bounty of the Conqueror,
While, with the remnant of his countrymen,
Saving the Gods of Aztlan and the name,
Thy brother and thy King goest forth to seek
His fortune!

Calm and low the youth replied,
Ill dost thou judge of me, Yuhidhiton!
And rashly doth my brother wrong the heart
He better should have known! Howbeit, I come
Prepared for grief. These honorable wounds
Were gain'd when, singly, at Caermadoe, I
Opposed the ruffian Hoamen; and even now,
Thus feeble as thou seest me, come I thence,
For this farewell. Brother, — Yuhidhiton, —
By the true love which thou didst bear my youth,
Which ever, with a live as true my heart
Hath answer'd, — by the memory of that hour
When at our mother's funeral pile we stood,
Go not away in wrath, but call to mind
What thou hast ever known me! Side by side
We fought against the Strangers, side by side
We fell; together in the council-hall
We counsel'd peace, together in the field
Of the assembly pledged the word of peace.
When plots of secret slaughter were devised,
I raised my voice alone; alone I kept
My plighted faith; alone I prophesied
The judgment of just Heaven: for this I bore
Reproach, and shame, and wrongful banishment,
In the action self-approved, and justified
By this unhappy issue.

As he spake,
Did natural feeling strive within the King,
And thoughts of other days, and brotherly love,
And inward consciousness that had he too
Stood forth, obedient to his better mind,
Nor weakly yielded to the wily priests,
Wilfully blind, perchance even now in peace
The kingdom of his fathers had preserved
Her name and empire. — Malinal, he cried,
Thy brother's heart is sore; in better times
I may with kindlier thoughts remember thee,
And honor thy true virtue. Now farewell!

So saying, to his heart he held the youth,
Then turn'd away. But then cried Tlalala,
Farewell, Yuhidhiton! the Tiger cried;
For I too will not leave my native land,—
Thou who wert King of Aztlan! Go thy way;
And be it prosperous! Through the gate thou seest
Yon tree that overhangs thy father's house;
My father lies beneath it. Call to mind
Sometimes that tree; for at its foot in peace
Shall Tlalala be laid, who will not live
Survivor of his country.

Thus he said,
And through the gate, regardless of the King,
Turn'd to his native door. Yuhidhiton
Follow'd, and Madoc; but in vain their words
Essay'd to move the Tiger's steady heart;
When from the door a tottering boy came forth,
And clung around his knees with joyful cries,
And called him father. At the joyful sound
Out ran Hanquel; and the astonish'd man
Beheld his wife and boy, whom sure he deem'd
Whelm'd in the flood; but them the British barks,
Returning homeward from their merciful quest,
Found floating on the waters. — For a while,
Abandoned by all desperate thoughts, he stood.
Soon he collected, and to Madoc turn'd,
And said, O Prince, this woman and her boy
I leave to thee. As thou hast ever found
In me a fearless, unrelenting foe,
Fighting with ceaseless zeal his country's cause,
Respect them! — Nay, Hanquel! hast thou yet
To learn with what unshakable resolve
My soul maintains its purposes? I leave thee
To a brave foe's protection. — Lay me, Madoc,
Here in my father's grave.

With that he took
His mantle off, and veil'd Hanquet's face; —
Woman, thou mayst not look upon the Sun,
Whose sets to rise no more! — That done, he placed
His javelin-hilt against the ground; the point
He fitted to his heart; and, holding firm
The shaft, fell forward, still with steady hand
Guiding the death-blow on.
NOTES TO MADOC IN AZTLAN.

We neighbor nearer to the Sun!—I. p. 375, col. 2.

Columbus inferred this from the elevation of the Pole at Paris. "How it cometh to pass," says Pietro Martyre, "that at the beginning of the evening twilight it is elevated in that region only five degrees in the month of June, and in the morning twilight to be elevated fifteen degrees by the same quadrant, I do not understand, nor yet do the reasons which he bringeth in any point satisfy me. For he saith that he hereby conjectured that the Earth is not perfectly round, but that, when that it was created, there was a certain heap raised thereon, much higher than the other parts of the same. So that, as he saith, it is not round after the form of an apple or a ball, as others think, but rather like a pear as it hangeth on the tree, and that Paris is the region which possesseth the supereminent or highest part thereof, nearest unto heaven. In so much, that he earnestly counteneth the earthly Paradise to be situate in the tops of those three hills which the Watchmen saw out of the top castle of the ship; and that the outrageous streams of the fresh waters which so violently issue out of the said gulfs, and strive so with the salt water, fall headlong from the tops of the said mountains."—Pietro Martyre, Dec. 1, Book 6.

A devout worshipper of this Deity once set out to see if he could find him; he reached the sea-coast, and there the God appeared to him, and made him call the Whale, and the Mermaid, and the Tortoise, to make a bridge for him, over which he might pass to the house of the Sun, and look back from thence instruments of music and singers to celebrate his festivals. The Whale, the Mermaid, and the Tortoise accordingly made the bridge, and the man went over it, singing, as he went, a song which the God taught him. As soon as the Sun heard him, he cautioned all his servants and people not to answer to the song, for they who answered would be obliged to abandon his House and follow the Singer. Some there were, however, who could not resist the voice of the charmer, and these he brought back with him to earth, together with the drum called Huckashack and the Tepumul.—Toquima, N. Y., 6, c. 43.

The particular sacrifice related in the poem is described by this author, l. 10, c. 14. It is sufficient merely to refer to my authorities in such instances as these, where no other liberty has been taken than that of omission.

She gathered herbs, which, like our poppy, bear
The seed of sleep.—II. p. 377, col. 1.

The expression is Gower's:

Poppys, which beareth the sole of sleep.

The Spanish name for the poppy is adormidera.

The Field of the Spirit.—III. p. 378, col. 2.

Every Spring the Aztecs go in a body to some retired place, and there turn up a large space of land, which they do with the drums beating all the while. After this they take care to call the Devil, or the Field of the Spirit. And thither they go in good earnest when they are not in any hussiess-stits, and there wait for inspiration from their pretended Deity. In the mean while, as they do this every year, it proves of no small advantage to them, for by these means they turn up all their small land insensibly, and it becomes abacatas y de buen mortal.

"The manner in which, he says, he obtained the spirit of divination was this: He was admitted into the presence of a Great Man, who informed him that he loved, pitied, and desired to do him good. It was not in this world that he saw the Great Man, but in a world above, at a vast distance from this. The Great Man, he says, was clothed with the Day, yea with the brightest Day; he ever saw; in Day of many years, yea of everlasting continuance! This whole world, he says, was drawn upon him, so that in him the Earth and all things in it might be seen. I asked him if rocks, mountains, and seas were drawn upon or appeared to him? he replied, that every thing that was beautiful and lovely in the earth was upon him, and might be seen by looking on him, as well as if one was on the earth to take a view of them there. By the side of the Great Man, he says, stood his Shadow or Spirit, for he used chakung, the word they commonly make use of to express that of the man which is the image of the body, which we commonly signify by shadow. This shadow, he says, was as lovely as the Man himself, and filled all places, and was most agreeable as well as wonderful to him. Here, he says, he tarried some time, and was unexceptionably entertained and delighted with a view of the Great Man, of his Shadow, and of all things in him. And what is most of all astonishing, he imagines this all to have passed before he was born; he never had been, he says, in this world at that time, and what confirms him in the belief of this, is, that the Great Man told him, that he must come down to earth, he be born of such a woman, meet with such and such things, and in particular that he should once in his life be guilty of murder; at this he was displeased, and told the Great Man he would never murder. But the Great Man replied, I have said it, and it shall be so; which has accordingly happened. At this time, he says, the Great Man asked him what he would choose in life; he replied, first to be a Hunter, and afterwards to be a Poet, or Divine; whereupon the Great Man told him, he should have what he desired, and that his Shadow should go along with him down to earth, and be with him for ever. There was, he says, all this time no word spoken between them, but all that was said was given him by some invisible spirit, by any human language, but they had a kind of mental intelligence of each other's thoughts, dispositions, and proposals. After this, he says, he saw the Great Man no more, but supposes he now came down to earth to be born; but the Shadow of the Great Man, with all that was told him, was with him forever, and continued to appear to him in dreams and other ways. This Shadow used sometimes to direct him in dreams to go to such a place and hunt, assuring him he should there meet with success, which accordingly proved so; and when he had been there some time, the Spirit would order him to another place, so that he had success in hunting, according to the Great Man's promise, made to him at the time of his choosing this employment.

These were some times when this Spirit came upon him as a spiritual body, and he was full of what he saw in the Great Man, and then, he says, he was all light, and not only light himself, but it was light all around him, so that he could see through men, and knew the thoughts of their hearts. These deeps of Satan I leave to others to fathom or to dive into as they please, and do not pretend, for my own part, to know what ideas to ascribe to such terms, and cannot well guess what conceptions of things these creatures have at these times when they call themselves all light.*—David Brainerd's Journal.

Had Brainerd been a Jesuit, his superiors would certainly have thought him a fit candidate for the crown of martyrdom, and worthy to be made a Saint. He found one of the Indian conjurers who seemed to have something like grace in him, only he would not believe in the Devil. "Of all the sights," says he, "I ever saw among them, or indeed any where else, none appeared so frightful, or so near skin to what is usually imagined of infernal powers! none ever excited such images of terror in my mind as the appearance of one, who was a devout and zealous reformer, or rather re- storer, of what he supposed was the ancient religion of the Indians. He ende his appearance in his mortificd crank which was a coat of bear-skin, dressed with the hair on, and hanging down to his toes, a pair of bear-skin stockings, and a great wooden face, painted the one half black, and the other tawny, about the color of an Indian's skin, with an extra- vagant moustach, and with much too little of the other skin-cap, which was drawn over his head. He advanced towards me with the instrument in his hand that he used for music in his idolatrous worship, which was a dry tortoise- shell, with some corn in it, and the neck of it drawn on to a piece of wood, which made a very convenient handle. As he came forward, he beat his tune with the rattle, and danced with all his might, but did not suffer any part of his body, not so much as his fingers, to be seen; and no man would have guessed, by his appearance and actions, that he could have been a human creature, if they had not had some intimation of it otherwise. When he came near me, I could not but shrink away from him, although it was then noon-day, and I knew who it was, his appearance and gestures were so prodigiously frightful. He had a house consecrated to religious uses, with divers images cut out upon the several parts of it. In the doors, and forsooth, what a stone stands as hard as a rock, with their frequent dancing on it. I disagreed with him about Christianity, and some of my discourse he seemed to like, but some of it he disliked entirely. He told me that God had taught him his religion, and that he never would turn from it, but wanted to find some that would join heartily with him in it; for the Indians, he said, were grown very degenerate and corrupt. He had thought, he said, of leaving all his friends, and travelling abroad, in order to find some that would join with him; for he believed God had some good people somewhere, that felt as he did. He had not always, he said, felt as he now did, but had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or five years before that time; then, he said, his heart was very much distressed, so that he could not live among the Indians, but got away into the woods, and lived alone for some months. At length, he said, God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God, and tried to serve him; and loved all men, be they who they would, so as he never did before. He treated me with uncommon courtesy, and seemed to be hearty in it; and I was told by the Indians that he opposed their drinking strong liquor with all his power; and if, at any time, he could not dissuade them from it by all he could say, he would leave them, and go crying into the woods. It was manifest he had a set of religious notions that he had looked into for himself, and not taken for granted from his own distance. It is quite true, that whatever was spoken of a religious nature, according to as it either agreed or disagreed with his standard. And while I was discoursing, he would sometimes say, "Now, I like so God has taught me;" and some of his sentiments seemed very just. Yet he utterly denied the being of a Devil, and declared there was no such creature known among the Indians of old times, whose religion, he supposes, he was attempting to revive. He likewise told me, that departed souls all went southward, and that the difference between the good and bad was this, that the former were admitted into a beautiful town with spiritual walls, or walls agreeable to the nature of souls; and that the latter would for ever hover round those walls, and in vain attempt to get in. He seemed to be sincere, honest, and conscientious in his own way, and according to his own religious notions, which was more than I ever saw in any other Pagan; and I perceived he was looked upon and desired by most of the Indians as a precise zealot, who made a needless noise about religious matters. But I must say, there was something in his temper and disposition, that looked more like religious than anything I ever observed amongst other heathens."—Brainerd.

Why should we forsake
The worship of our fathers?—III. p. 379, col. 1.

Olearius mentions a very disinterested instance of that hated of innovation which is to be found in all ignorant persons, and in some wise ones.

"An old country fellow in Livonia being condemned, for faults enormous enough, to lie along upon the ground to receive his punishment, and Madam de la Barre, pitying his almost decrepit age, having so far interested for him, as that his corporeal punishment should be changed into a penitential martial of about fifteen or sixteen pence! he thanked her for her kindness, and said, that, for his part, being an old man, he would not introduce any novelty, nor suffer the customs of the country to be changed; and that much as he beheld it, as a bear-skin cap, which was drawn over his head. He advanced towards me with the instrument in his hand that he used for music in his idolatrous worship, which was a dry tortoise-shell, with some corn in it, and the neck of it drawn on to a piece of wood, which made a very convenient handle. As he came forward, he beat his tune with the rattle, and danced with all his might, but did not suffer any part of his body, not so much as his fingers, to be seen; and no man would have guessed, by his appearance and actions, that he could have been a human creature, if they had not had some intimation of it otherwise. He had thought, he said, of leaving all his friends, and travelling abroad, in order to find some that would join with him; for he believed God had some good people somewhere, that felt as he did. He had not always, he said, felt as he now did, but had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or five years before that time; then, he said, his heart was very much distressed, so that he could not live among the Indians, but got away into the woods, and lived alone for some months. At length, he said, God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God, and tried to serve him; and loved all men, be they who they would, so as he never did before. He treated me with uncommon courtesy, and seemed to be hearty in it; and I was told by the Indians that he opposed their drinking strong liquor with all his power; and if, at any time, he could not dissuade them from it by all he could say, he would leave them, and go crying into the woods. It was manifest he had a set of religious notions that he had looked into for himself, and not taken for granted from his own distance. It is quite true, that whatever was spoken of a religious nature, according to as it either agreed or disagreed with his standard. And while I was discoursing, he would sometimes say, "Now, I like so God has taught me;" and some of his sentiments seemed very just. Yet he utterly denied the being of a Devil, and declared there was no such creature known among the Indians of old times, whose religion, he supposes, he was attempting to revive. He likewise told me, that departed souls all went southward, and that the difference between the good and bad was this, that the former were admitted into a beautiful town with spiritual walls, or walls agreeable to the nature of souls; and that the latter would for ever hover round those walls, and in vain attempt to get in. He seemed to be sincere, honest, and conscientious in his own way, and according to his own religious notions, which was more than I ever saw in any other Pagan; and I perceived he was looked upon and desired by most of the Indians as a precise zealot, who made a needless noise about religious matters. But I must say, there was something in his temper and disposition, that looked more like religious than anything I ever observed amongst other heathens."—Brainerd.

Within, it has the appearance of an ancient amphitheatre, the seats being raised one above another, leaving an area in the middle, in the centre of which stands the fire; the seats of the head warriors are nearest it."—Memoirs of Lieutenant Henry Timberlake, who accompanied the Cherokee Indians to England, in 1762.

The word by which they express the funeral wailing in one of the Indian languages is very characteristic: Meshe: which bewailing, says Roger Williams, is very solemn amongst them morning and evening, and sometimes in the night, they bewail their lost husbands, wives, children, &c.; sometimes a quarter, half, yea, a whole year and longer, if it be for a great Prince.

This opinion of the American Indians may be illustrated by a very beautiful story from Carver's Travels:

"Whilst I remained among them, a couple, whose tent was adjacent to mine, lost a son of about four years of age. The parents were so much affected at the death of their favorite child, that they pursued the usual testimonies of grief with such uncommon rigor, as through the weight of sorrow and loss of blood to occasion the death of the father. The woman, who had hitherto been inconsolable, no sooner saw her husband expire than she dried up her tears and appeared cheerful and resigned. As I know not how to account for so extraordinary a transition, I took an opportunity to ask her the reason of it; telling her, at the same time, that I should have imagined the loss of her husband would rather have occasioned an increase of grief than such a sudden diminution of it.

"She informed me, that as the child was so young when it died, and unable to support itself in the country of spirits, both she and her husband had been apprehensive that its situation would be far from being happy; but no sooner did she behold its father depart for the same place, where not only loved the child with the tenderest affection, but was a good hunter, and would be able to provide plentifully for its support, than she ceased to mourn. She added, that she now saw no reason to continue her grief, as the child, on whom she doted, was under the care and protection of a fond father, and she had only one wish that remained ungratified, which was that of being herself with them."

"Expression so replete with unaffected tenderness, and sentiments that would have done honor to a Roman matron, made an impression on my mind greatly in favor of the people to whom she belonged, and tended not a little to counteract the prejudices I had hitherto entertained, in common with every other traveller, of Indian insensibility and want of parental tenderness. Her subsequent conduct confirmed the favorable opinion I had just imbued, and convinced me that, notwithstanding the apparent suspension of her grief, some particles of that reluctance to be separated from a beloved relation, which is implanted by nature or custom in every human heart, still lurked in hers. I observed that she went almost every evening to the site of the tree, on a branch of which the bodies of her husband and child were laid, and after cutting off a lock of her hair, and throwing it on the ground, in a piteous melancholy song bemoaned its fate. A recapitulation of the actions he might have performed, had his life been spared, appeared to be her favorite theme; and whilst she recited the time that would have attended an im-

Among the last comers, one Avila, a cacique, had great authority, who understanding that Vahilius affirmed the God of the Christians was the only Creator of all things, in a great rage cried out, he would never allow Pilhan, the God of the Chileniens, to be denied the power of creating. Vahilius inquired of him concerning this imaginary deity. Avila told him that his God did, after death, translate the chief men of the nation and soldiers of known bravery to places where there was dancing and drinking, there to live happy forever; that the blood of noble men slain in battle was placed about the Sun, and changed into red clouds, which sometimes adorn his rising. — Hist. de Paraguy, &c. by F. Snake-worship was common in America. Bernall Diaz, p. 3, 7, 125. The idol described VIII. p. 266, somewhat resembles what the Spaniards found at Campeche, which is thus described by the oldest historian of the Discoveries. "Our men were conducted to a bronce cross-way, standing on the side of the town. Here they show them a square stage or pulpit four steps high, partly of clumsy bitumen, and partly of small stones, where on the image of a man cut in marble was joyned two four-footed unknown beasts fastening upon him, which, like maddie dogges, seemed they would tear the marble man's guts out of his belly. And by the Image stood a Serpent, heemseared all with gore blood, devorung a marble man, which Serpent, composed of bitumen and small stones incorpore together, was seven and forty feet in length, and as thick as a great oxe. Next unto it were three rafters or stakes fastened to the grounde, which three others crossed undercropped with stones; in which place they punish malific.

Some passages in Mr. Mackenzie's Travels suggested this to me.

"Our guide called aloud to the fugitives, and entreated them to stay, but without effect; the old man, however, did not hesitate to approach us, and represented himself as too far advanced in years to understand the short time he had to remain in the world, to be very anxious about escaping from any danger that threatened him; at the same time he pulled the grey hairs from his head by handfuls to distribute among us, and implored our favor for himself and his relations.

"As we were ready to embark, our new recruit was desired to prepare himself for his departure, which he would have declined; but as none of his friends would take his place, we may be sure, after the delay of an hour, to have compelled him to embark. Previous to his departure, a ceremony took place, of which I could not learn the meaning; he cut off a lock of his hair, and having divided it into three parts, he fastened one of them to the hair on the upper parts of his wife's head, hanging on it three times with all the violence in his power, and uttering certain words. The other two he fastened with the same formalities on the heads of his two children."—MACKENZIE.

Of the wonderful docility of the Snake one instance may suffice.

"An Indian belonging to the Mesocomi, having taken a rattlesnake, found means to tame it; a series of entanglements done this, treated it as a Deity; calling it his great Father, and taking care to carry it with him in a box wherever he went. He had done for several summers, when Monsieur Pinnancin accidentally met with him at this carrying-place, just as he was setting off for a winter's hunt. The French gentleman was surprised one day to see the Indian place the box which contained his God on the ground, and opening the door, give him his liberty; telling him, whilst he did it, to be sure and return by the time he himself should come back, which was to be in the month of May following. As this was but October, Monsieur told the Indian, whose simplicity astonished him, that he fancied he might wait long enough, when May arrived, for the arrival of his great Father. The Indian was so confident of his creature's obedience, that he offered to try the Frenchman a wager of two gallons of rum, that at the time appointed he would come and crawl into his box. This was agreed on, and the second week in May following fixed for the determination of the wager. At that period they both met there again; when the Indian set down his box, and called for his great Father. The Snake heard him not; and the time being now expired, he acknowledged that he had lost. However, without seeming to be discouraged, he offered to double the bet if his father came not within two days more. This was further agreed on; when, behold, on the second day, about one o'clock, the snake arrived, and of his own accord crawled into the box, which was placed ready for him. The French gentleman vouched for the truth of this story, and, from the accounts I have often received of the docility of those creatures, I see no reason to doubt its veracity."—CARTER'S TRAVELS.

... that huge King

Of Basan, huge he the Aslan. — VII. p. 386, col. 2.

Og, the King of Basan, was the largest man that ever lived: all Giants, Titans, and Ogers are but dwarfs to him; Garagantius himself is no more compared to Og, than Tom Thumb is to Garagantius. For thus say the Rabbits; Moses chose out twelve Chiefs, and advanced with them till they approached the land of Canaan, where Jericho was, and there he sent those chiefs to see that they might see what manner of land it was. One of the Giants met them; he was called Og the son of Anak, and the height of his stature was twenty-three thousand and thirty-three cubits. Now Og used to catch the clouds and draw them towards him and drink their water; and he used to take the fishes out of the depths of the sea, and toast them against the orb of the Sun and eat them. It is related of him by tradition, that in the time of the deluge he went to Noah and said to him, Take me with thee in the Ark; but Noah made answer, Depart from me, O thou enemy of God! And when the water covered the highest mountains of the earth, it did not go to Og's knees. Og lived three thousand years, and then God destroyed him by the hand of Moses. For when the army of Moses covered a space of nine miles, Og came and looked at it, and reached out his hand to a mountain, and cut from it a stone as wide that it could have covered the whole army, and he put it upon his head, and he might throw it upon them. But God sent a haying, who made a hole through the stone with his bill so that it slip over his head, and hung round his neck like a necklace, and he was borne down to the ground by its weight. Then Moses ran to him and they made it himself but which he, and he took a bear ten cubits long, and threw it up ten cubits high, and yet it only reached the heel of Og, who was lying prostrate, and thus he slew him. And then came a great multitude with scythes, and cut off his head, and when he was dead his body was not taken away for one year, remaining as far as the river Nile in Egypt. His mother's name was Eune, one of the daughters of Adam, and she was the first harlot; her fingers were two cubits long, and upon every finger she had two sharp nails, like two sickles. But because she was a harlot, God sent against her none as big as elephants, and wolves as big as camels, and eagles as big as arrows, and they killed her and eat her.

When Og met the spies who were sent by Moses, he took them all twelve in his hand and put them in his wallet; and carried them to his wife and said to her, Look, I will give you, at these men who want to fight with us! and he emptied them out before her, and asked her if he should trust upon them; but she said, Let them go and tell their people what they have seen. When they were got out they said to each other, If we should tell these things to the children of Israel, they would forsake Moses; let us therefore relate what we have seen only to Moses and Aaron. And they took with them one grape stone from the grapes of that country, and it was as much as a camel could carry. And they began to advise the people that they should not go to war, saying what they had seen; but two of them, namely, Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun, concealed it.—MAACCI.

Even if the grapes had not been proportioned to Og's capacious mouth, the Rabbits would not have let him starve. There were Bercomotis for him to rest whole; and Bar-CEA.
The Thracians believed that the souls of Chiefs and Princes became clouds, or beautiful birds, or precious stones whereas those of the common people would pass into beetles, rats, mice, weasels, and all vile and stinking animals. — Torquemada, L. 6, c. 47.

The two first of these Saints with Madog Morwog, are called the three holy bachelors of the Isle of Britain. Cadog the Wise was a Bard who flourished in the sixth century. He is one of the three protectors of innocence; his protection was through the church law: Blas’s by the common law; and Pelagoyll’s by the law of arms; these three were also called the just Knights of the Court of Arthur. Cadog was the first of whom there is any account, who collected the British Proverbs. There is a church dedicated to him in Cemmarthshire, and two in Monmouthshire. Deiniol has churches dedicated to him in Monmouth, Cardigan, and Pembroke-shires. In the year 525 he founded a college at Bangor, where he was Abbot, and when it was raised to the dignity of Bishopric he was the first Bishop. Padarn and Teilo rank with Dewi or David, as the three blessed Visitors, for they went about preaching the faith to all degrees of people, not only without themselves but also they persuaded their eloquent discourses of the poor as far as their means extended. Padarn found a congregation at a place called from him Llandudno Yst, where he had the title of Archbishop. Teilo established the college at Llandaff; the many places called Llanddeo were so named in honour of him. He and Cadog and David were the three canonical Saints of Britain. — Cambria Riaygographia.

Teilo, or Tolkien, as he is called by David Williams, took an active part against the heresy of Pelagius, the great Welshman. "Such was the lustre of his zeal, that by something like a pan on his name, he was compared to the sun and called Iasus; and when he, like the sun, did not depart from the altar, devotees contended with so much virulence for the reputation of possessing his body, that the Priests, to avoid scandalous divisions, found three miraculous bodies of the Saint, as similar, according to the phrase used on the occasion, as one egg to another; and miracles were equally performed at the tombs of all the three." D. Williams’s Hist. of Monmouthshire.

This miracle is claimed by some Asiologists for St. Bal- dred, Confessor; "whose memory in ancient times hath been very famous in the kingdom of Scotland. For that he having by the virtu of one of his miracles delivered two villages were adjoining one to the other in Scotland, called Ablharn, Tinningham, and Preston, was so holy a man of life, that when he was dead, the people of each village contended one with another which of them should have his body; in so much, that at last, they sold themselves and their properties, and divided the body into two parts, each of them bought by force to enjoy the same. And when the matter came to issue, the said sacred body was found all whole in three distinct places of the house where he died; so as the people of each village coming thither, and carrying the same away, placed it in their churches, and kept it with great honor and veneration for the miracles that at such place it pleased God to work." — English Martyrology.

The story may be no true of the one Saint as of the other, a solution in which Romanists and Protestants will agree. Gahan in Cotal. (L. Lan-d.) says that the Churches which were contended for the Welsh Saint, were Penalmum, the burial-place of his family, Llandeilo Ysawr, where he died, and Llandaff, where he had been Bishop; and he adds, in honor of his own church, that by frequent miracles at his tomb it was certain Llandaff possessed the true body. Yet in such a case as this the fact simile might have been not unreasonably deemed more curious than the original.

The poulpa’s power of producing as many heads, legs, and arms as were wanted, has been possessed by all the great Saints. St. Teilo left his own country for a time because it was infested by an infectious disorder, called the Yellow Plague, which attacked both men and beasts. — Congregate, quoted in Crespey’s Church History of Brittany.

'Mongst Hatterlill's lofty hills, that with the clouds are crow'd,
The valley Esias lies, immer'd so deep and round,
As they before saw the mountains rise so high,
Might the struggling heeds were grazing in the sky:
Which in it such a shape of solitude doth bear,
As Nature at the first appointed it for prayer.
Where in an aged cell, with moss and ivy grown,
In which not to this day the Sun hath ever shone,
That reverend British Saint, in zonabes ages past,
To contemplation liv'd; and did so truly fast,
As he did only drink what crystal Hoodley yields,
And fed upon the leeks he gathered in the fields;
In memory of whom, in each revolving year,
The Welshmen on his day that sacred hero do wear.

Of all the holy men whose fame so fresh remains,
To whom the Britons built so many sumptuous seats,
This saint before the rest whose patron still they hold,
Whose birth their ancient bard to Cambria long foretold;
And seated here a see, his bishopric of yore,
Upon the farthest point of this unfruitful shore,
Selected by himself, that far from all resort
With contemplation seemed most fitly to comport,
That void of all delight, cold, barren, bleak, and dry,
No pleasure might allure, nor steal the wandering eye.

Drayton.

"A.D. 462. It happened on a day, as Gibbons was in a sermon, (Reader, whether smiling or frowning, forgive the digression,) a Numae big with child came into the congregation, whereat the preacher presently was struck dumb, (would not a maid's child amaze any man?) and could proceed no further. Afterwards he gave this reason for his silence, because that Virgin bore in her body an infant of such signal sanctity as far transcended him. Thus, as lesser load stones are reported to lose their virtue in the presence of those that are bigger, so Gibbons was silenced at the approach of the Welsh St. David, (being then but Haos in Kehele,) though afterwards, like Zachary, he recovered his speech again." — FULLER's Church History of Great Britain.

"David one day was preaching in an open field to the multitude, and could not be well seen because of the concourse, (though they make him four cubits high, a man and a half in stature,) when he told the Earth whereon he stood, officiously heaving itself up, mounted him up to a competent visibility above all his audience. Whereas our Savior himself, when he taught the people, was pleased to choose a mountain, making use of the advantage of Nature without improving his miraculous power;" — FULLER.

David is indebted to the Romancers for his fame as a Champion of Christendom; how he came by his leek is a question which the Antiquarians have not determined. I am bound to make grateful mention of St. David, having in my younger days been benefited by his merits at Westminster, where the first of March is an early play.

Tezcalipoca was believed to arrive first, because he was the youngest of the Gods, and never waxed old; Telpueti, the Youth, was one of his titles. On the night of his arrival a general census took place, in which it was the custom, particularly for old people, men and women alike, to drink immoderately; for they said the liquor which they drank would go to wash the feet of the God, after his journey. And I say, the Franciscan provincial, who, if he had been a philosopher, would perhaps have not written a book at all, or certainly not so interesting a one, — I say, that this is a great mistake, and the truth is, that they washed their own stripes and filled them with liquor, which made them merry, and the fumes got up into their heads and overset them; with which fall it is not to be wondered at that they fell into such errors and foolishness.

In the reign of Rajah Chundrwardun, a Brahmin woman came to sue for justice, against the unknown murderer of her husband. The Rajah demurred, whether she had reason to expect any one of the deed. She replied, that her husband was a man of a very fair reputation, and that he had never known any one so near him ill-will, excepting one man, with whom he was continually disputing upon points of philosophy. This person being brought before the Rajah, denied the charge; and the wife was not satisfied with the cause being determined by the oral trial, from the dread that he might escape by means of witchcraft. The Rajah set out with the apprehension how to decide upon the case, that he could neither eat nor sleep. At length he saw in a dream a sage, who taught him an incantation, which he should utter over a heap of rice flour, and then scatter the meal upon the ground, and direct the suspected person to walk over it; if there appeared upon the meal the impression of the feet of two persons, then the accused was certainly the murderer. When the Rajah awoke, he did as the vision had commanded him, and the Brahmin was proved guilty. — Agren-Akber.

It was thought that the Persia often visited the Mexicans, but except on this occasion, he always came incognito. A stone seat was placed at every crossing, or division, of a street, called Jussehli or Ichalaca, where he is expected; and this was continually hung with fresh garlands and green bouquets, that he might rest there. — Torquemada, l. 6, c. 21.

The history of Mexico is briefly related in the Pass. Part II. Poet. XXI. Though the Mexicans took their name from him, he is more usually called Huiztilpochtli, or correctly Huitzilopochtli. In consequence of the reverence, which he excelled as soon as born, he was styled Tetzahuitl Terror, and Tetzahuitzo, the Terrible God. — Clavigero. Torquemada, d. 1, l. 6, c. 21.
NOTES TO MADOC IN AZTLAN.

God of the Winds: his temple was circular, "for even as the nyo goth round about the heavens, even for that consideration they made his temple round. The entrance of that temple had a door made lyke unto the mouth of a serpent, and was painted with foule and devillish gestures, with great teeth and garments wrought, which was a thing to frighte those that should enter therein, and especially the Christians, unto whom it represented very Hell with that ougly face and monstrous teeth." — GOMARA.

Some history is blended with fable in the legend of Quetzalcóatl, for such is the geography of his name. He was chief of a people who lived in Quate, coming from the North: their dress was black, long, and loose, like the Turkish dress, or the Cassack, says Torquemada, open before, without hood or cape, the sleeves full, but not reaching quite to the elbow; such dresses were, even in his time, used by the natives in some of their dances, in memory of this event. Their leader was a white man, florid, and having a large beard. At first he settled in Tula, but left that province in consequence of the vices of its Lords Huomec and Tezcalipoca, and removed to Cholulcan. He taught the natives to cut the pumice-stones, called chacs, even, which were so highly valued, and to work silver and gold. Every thing flourished in his reign; the head of maize was a man's load, and the cotton grew of all colors; he had one palace of emeralds, another of silver, another of shells, one of all kinds of wood, one of turquoise-stones, and one of feathers; his commands were proclaimed by a cryer from the Sierra de Tlatlepex, near the city of Tula, and were heard as far as the sea coast, and for more than a hundred leagues round. Fr. Bernardino de Sahagun heard such a voice once in the dead of the night, far exceeding the power of any human voice: he was told that it was to summon the laborer to the maize fields; but both he and Torquemada believed it was the Devil's doing. Notwithstanding his power, Quetzalcóatl was driven out by Tezcalipoca and Huomec: before he departed he burnt or buried all his treasures, converted the cocoa-trees into others of less worth, and declared to all his people who had labored abounded, to go before him to Tlapalain, the land of the Sun, whither he himself had been summoned. The Indians always thought he would return, and when first they saw the Spanish ships, thought he was come in these moving temples. They worshipped him, for the useful arts which he had taught, for the tranquility they had enjoyed under his government, and because he never suffered blood to be shed in sacrifice, but ordered bread and flowers, and incense to be offered up instead. — TORQUEMADA, 1. 3, c. 7; 1. 6, c. 24.

Some authors have supposed that these strangers came from Ireland, because they scoured their faces and cut human flesh: this is no compliment to the Irish, and certainly does not accord with the legend. Others that they were Carthaginians, because New Spain was called Aznauco, and the Thoricians were children of Anah. That the Carthaginians people America, is the more likely, say they, because they bored their ears, and did so the Incas of Peru. One of these princes, in process of time, says Garcia Lasso, being willing to enlarge the privileges of his people, gave them permission to bore their ears also, — but not so wide as the Incas. This much may legitimately be deduced from the legend, that New Spain, as well as Peru, was civilized by a foreign adventurer, who, it seems, attempted to destroy the sanguinary superstition of the country, but was himself driven out by the priests.

God of the Waters: he is mentioned more particularly in Section XII. Tlalocacahcatli, the Lord of Paradise, as he is also called, was the oldest of the country Gods. His Image was that of a man standing on a square seat, with a vessel before him, in which a specimen of all the different grains and fruit seeds in the country was to be offered; it was a sort of pumice stone, and, according to tradition, had been found upon the mountains. One of the Kings of Teperico ordered a better idol to be made, which was destroyed by lightning, and the original one in consequence replaced with fear and trembling. As one of the arms had been broken in removing, it was fastened with three large golden nails; but in the time of the first Bishop Zumarraga, the golden nails were taken away and the idol destroyed.

Tlaloc dwelt among the mountains, where he collected the vapors and dispensed them in rain and dew. A number of inferior Deities were under his command.

Some of my readers will stumble at this name; but to those who would accuse me of designing to heterodoxify the language by introducing one of the humbler cheeks, I must reply, that the sound is Greek. The writers who have supposed that America was peopled from Plato's Island, observe that the ti, a combination so remarkably frequent in the Mexican tongue, has probably a reference to Atlantis and the Atlantic, All being the Mexican word for water, and Tibalo the God of the waters — an argument quite worthy of the hypothesis. — FR. GREGORIO GARCIA. ORIGEN DE LOS INDIOS, Lib. 4, c. 8, § 2.

The quaintest opinion ever started upon this obscure subject is that of Fr. Pedro Simon, who argued that the Indians were the progeny of the tribe of Cain, that they were driven into a pleasant land, who bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute. If the Hebrew word, which is rendered tribute, may mean taxes as well, I humbly submit it to consideration, whether Issachar doth not typify John Bull.

Tiger of the War. — IX. p. 388, col. 2.

This was one of the four most honorable titles among the Mexicans; the others were Shooler of Blood, Destroyer of Men, and Lord of the Dark House. Great Shyer of Men was also a title among the Natches; but to obtain this it was necessary that the warrior should have made ten prisoners, or brought home twenty scalps.

The Gods of the conquered nations were kept fastened and caged in the Mexican temples. They who argued for the African origin of the Indians, might have compared this with the treatment of the Philistines over the Ark, when they placed it in the temple of Dagon.

The most painful penance to which any of these Priests were subjected, was that which the Cholulaque performed every four years, in honor of Quetzalcóatl. All the Priests sat round the walls in the temple, holding a censer in their hands:
from this posture they were not permitted to move, except when they went out for the necessary calls of nature; two hours they slept at the beginning of the night, and one after sunrise; at midnight, they bathed, smeared themselves with a black unguent, and pricked their ears to offer the blood: the twenty-one remaining hours they spent in the same posture under the broading sky. After the little sleep permitted them; this continued sixty days; if any one slept out of his time, his companions pricked him: the ceremony continued twenty days longer, but they were then permitted more rest. — Torquemada, l. 10, c. 52.

Mr. Jefferson informs us, that a late governor of Virginia, having asked some delegates of the Delawares what they knew or had heard respecting this animal, the chief speaker immediately put himself into an oratorical attitude, and, with a pomp suited to the elevation of his subject, informed him, that it was a tradition handed down from their fathers, that in ancient times, a herd of them came to the Big-bone-licks, and began a universal destruction of the bears, deer, elk, buffaloes, and other animals which had been created for the use of the Indians; that the Great Man above, looking down, and seeing this, was so enraged, that he seized his lightning, descended to the earth, and seated himself upon a neighboring mountain on a rock, on which his seat and the print of his feet are still to be seen, and hurled his bolts among them, till the whole were slaughtered, except the big bull, who, presenting his forehead to the shafts, shook them off as they fell; but at length missing one, it wounded him on the side, whereon, springing round, he bounded over the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois, and, finally, over the great lakes, where he is living at this day.

Colonel G. Morgan, in a note to Mr. Morse, says, "These bones are found only at the Salt Licks, on the Ohio; some few scattered grinders have, indeed, been found in other places: but it has been supposed these have been brought from the above-mentioned deposit by Indian warriors and others, who have observed it, as we know many have been spread in this manner. When I first visited the Salt Licks," says the Colonel, "in 1760, I met here a large party of the Iroquois and Wyandot Indians, who were then on a war expedition against the Chienas tribe. The head chief was a very old man to be engaged in war; he told me he was eighty-four years old; he was probably as much as eighty. I fixed on this venerable chief, as a person from whom some knowledge might be obtained. After making him some acceptable presents of tobacco, paint, ammunition, &c., and complimenting him with the wisdom of his nation, their prowess in war, and rudeness in peace, I intimated my ignorance respecting the great bones before us, which nothing but his superior knowledge could remove, and accordingly requested him to inform me what he knew concerning them. Agreeably to the customs of his nation, he informed me in substance as follows:

"Whilst I was yet a boy, I passed this road several times to war against the Catawbas; and the wise old chief, among whom was my grandfather, then gave me the tradition, handed down to us, respecting these bones, the like to which are found in no other part of the country; it is as follows: After the Great Spirit first formed the world, he made the various birds and beasts which now inhabit it. He also made man; but having formed him white, and very imperfect and ill-tempered, he placed him on one side of it where he now inhabits, and from whence he has lately found a passage across the great water, to be a plague to us. As the Great Spirit was not pleased with this he wrought, he took of black clay, and made what you call a negro, with a woolly head. This black man was much better than the white man: but still he did not answer the wish of the Great Spirit; that is, he was imperfect. At last the Great Spirit, having procured a piece of pure, fine red clay, formed from it the red man, perfectly to his mind; and he was so well satisfied with him, that he placed him on this great island, separato from the white and black men, and gave him rules for his conduct, promising happiness in proportion as they should be observed. He increased exceedingly, and was perfectly happy for ages; but the foolish young people, at length forgetting his rules, became exceedingly ill-tempered and wicked. In consequence of this the Great Spirit created the Great Buffalo, the bones of which you now see before us; these made war upon the human species alone, and destroyed all but a few, who repeated and promised the Great Spirit to live according to his laws, if he would restrain the devouring enemy: whereupon he sent lightning and thunder, and destroyed the whole race, in this spot, two excepted, a male and a female, which he shut up in yonder mountain, ready to let loose again, should occasion require."

The following tradition, existing among the natives, we give in the very terms of a Shawanee Indian, to show that the impression made on their minds by it must have been forcible.

"Ten thousand moons ago, when nought but glossy forests covered this land of the sleeping sun, long before the pale men, with thunder and lightning and their command, rushed with the wings of the wind to ruin this garden of nature; when nought but the untamed wanderers of the woods, and men as unrestrained as they were the lords of the soil: a race of animals were in being, huge, as the frowning precipice, cruel as the bloody parrakeet, swift as the descending eagle, and terrible as the ugnes of night. The pines crashed beneath their feet, and the bale struck when they slaked their thirst; the forcible javelin in vain was hurled, and the barbed arrow fell harmless from their side. Forests were laid waste at a meal; the black grouse of expiring animals were everywhere found; and whole villages inhabited by men were destroyed in a moment. The cry of universal distress extended even to the region of peace in the west, and the Great Spirit interposed to save the unhappy. The forked lightnings gleamed all round, and lowest thunder roared the globe. The bolts of heaven were hurled upon the cruel destroyers alone, and the mountains echoed with the howlings of death. All were killed except one male, the ficiest of the race, and him even the artillery of the skies assailed in vain. He ascended the bluest summit which shades the center of the Montagnas of living and burning, hid defiance to every vengeance. The red lightning scorchd the lofty firs, and rived the knotty oaks, but only glanced upon the enraged monster. At length, maddened with fury, he leaped over the waves of the west at a bound, and this moment reigns the uncontrolled monarch of the wilderness, in despite of even Omniscience itself." — Wisenheimer.

The tradition probably is Indian, but certainly not the bombast.

There is a remarkable tale of kindness sacrified in Irish history. The royal family had been all cut off except one girl, and the wise men of the country fed her upon children's flesh to make her the sooner marriagable. I have not the book to refer to, and cannot therefore give the names; but the story is in Kcnting's history.

This device is described by Clavigero; from whom also the account of their musical instruments is taken.

"I was awakened in the morning early, by the cheering converse of the wild turkey-cock (Meiopterus occidentalis) saluting each other, and singing the songs of the lovely Corylus cornuta and Magnolia grandiflora. They begin at early dawn, and continue till sunrise, from March to the last of April. The highest trees ring with the noise, like the crowing of the domestic cock, from these social sentiments, the watch-word being caught and repeated, from one to another, for hundreds of miles around; insomuch, that the whole country is, for an hour or more, in an universal slumber. A little after sunrise, their crowing gradually ceases, they quit their high lodging places, and alight on the earth, where, expanding their silver-bordered train, they strut and dance round about the coy female, while the deep forests seem to tremble with their shrill noise."— BARTHAM.

The Paradise of Tlahoc.

"They distinguished three places for the souls when separated from the body: Those of soldiers who died in battle or in captivity among their enemies, and those of women who died in labor, went to the Host of the Sun, whom they considered as the Prince of Glory, where they led a life of endless delight; where, every day, at the first appearance of the sun's rays, they hailed his birth with rejoicing; and with dancing, and the music of instruments and of voices, attended him to his meridian; there they met the souls of the women, and with the same festivity accompanied him to his setting;
they next supposed, that these spirits, after four years of that glorious life, went to animate clouds, and birds of beautiful feathers and of sweet song, but always at liberty to rise again to heaven, or to descend upon the earth, to warn and suck
the flowerers.— The souls of those that were drowned or struck by lightning, of those who died of dropsy, tumours, worms, and other sicknesses, went along with the souls of children, at least of those which were sacrificed to Tlahoc, the God of Water, to a cool and delightful place called Tlahocan, where that God resided, and where they were to enjoy the most delicious repasts, with every other kind of pleasure.— Lastly, the third place allotted to the souls of those who suffered any other kind of death was Mictlan, or Hell, which they conceived to be a place of utter darkness, in which reigned a God, called Mictlantecuhtli, Lord of Hell, and a Goddess, named Micmochcitl; I am of opinion that they believed Hell to be a place in the centre of the earth, but they did not imagine that the souls underwent any other punishment there than what they suffered by the darkness of their abode. Sagiuwuz thought the Mexicans placed Hell in the northern part of the earth, as the word Mictlampa signified towards north."— CLAVIGERIO.

When any person whose manner of death entitled him to a

therefore, to plant their onions on rafts of bamboo, well interwoven with reeds and long grass, and covered with earth; and

Which closed its entrance, never was removed,
Since when the yearly festival returned,

The living victim.— XII. p. 394, col. 1.

There were three yearly sacrifices to Tlahoc. At the first, two children were drowned in the Lake of Mexico; but in all the provinces they were sacrificed on the mountains; they were a boy and girl, from three to four years old: in this last case the bodies were preserved in a stone chest, as relics, I suppose, says Torquemada, of persons whose hands were free from actual sin; though their souls were foul with the original stain, of which they were neither cleansed nor purified, and therefore they went to the place appointed for all like them who perish unrepentent.— At the second, four children from six to seven years of age, who were brought for the purpose, the price being contributed by the children, were shot up in a cavern, and left to die with hunger: the cavern was not opened again till the next year's sacrifice.— The third continued during the three rainy months, during all which time children were offered up on the mountains; those also who were bought; the heart and blood were given in sacrifice, the bodies were feasted upon by the chiefs and priests.— TORQUEMS,
A, i. 7, c. 91.

"In the country of the Mixtecan was a cave sacred to the Water God. Its entrance was concealed, for though this Idol was generally reverenced, this his temple was known to few; it was necessary to crawl the length of a musket-shot, and then the way, sometimes open and sometimes narrow,
extended for a mile, before it reached the great dome, a place 70 feet long, and 80 wide, where were the idol and the altar;
the Idol was a rude column of stalactites, or incrustations, formed by a spring of petrifying water, and other fantastic figures had thus grown around it. The ways of the cave were so intricate, that sometimes those who had unwarily bowled themselves there perished. The Friar who discovered this Idol destroyed it, and filled up the entrance."— Padilla,

The Temple Serpents.— XIV. p. 395, col. 2.

"The head of a sacrificed person was struck up; the limbs eaten at the feast; the body given to the wild beasts which were kept within the temple circuits; moreover, in that ac-coloured house they kept vipers and venemous snakes, who had somewhere at their tails which sounded like moris-hells, and they are the worst of all vipers; these were kept in cupolas, and barrels, and earthen vessels, upon feathers, and there they laid their eggs, and nursed up their snakekings, and they were fed with the bodies of the sacrificed and with dog's flesh. We learned for certain, that, after they had driven us from Mexico, and slain axes and rivers and of the men of Narves, these beasts and snakes, who had been offered to the cruel idol that we discovered, were supported upon their flesh for many days. When these lions and tigers roared, and the jackals and foxes howled, and the snakes hissed, it was a terrible thing to hear them, and it seemed like hell."— DIAZ.

This weapon, s rich is described by Suidas, Fastiatis, and Agathias, was called Aegus, and was a barbed trident; if it entered the body, it could not be extracted without certain doints, and if it only pierced the shield, the shield became unmanageable, and the enemy was left exposed.

The Catena, which Virgil mentions as a Teutonic weapon, was also retractile. This was a club of about a yard long, with a heavy end worked into four sharp points; to the thin end, or handle, a cord was fixed, which enabled a person, well trained, to throw it with great force and exactness, and then by a jerk to bring it back to his hand, either to renew his throw, or to use it in close combat. This weapon was called Cat and Catula. — Cambrians Register.

An old priest of the Tlaltetucas, when they were at war with the Mexicans, advised them to drink the holy beverage before they went to battle; this was made by washing the Sassafras, the king drunk first, and then all his chiefs and soldiers in order; it made them eager and impatient for the fight. — TURQUEMADA, l. 2, c. 58.

To physic soldiers before a campaign seems an odd way of raising their courage, yet this was done by one of the fiercest American tribes.

"When the warriors among the Natchez had assembled in sufficient numbers for their expedition, the Medecine of War was prepared in the chief's cabin. This was an enetic, composed of a root boiled in water. The warriors, sometimes to the number of three hundred, seated themselves round the kettles or caldrons; about a gallon was served to each; the ceremony was to swallow it at once, and then charge it again with such loud eruptions and efforts as might be heard at a great distance." — HERIOT'S History of Canada.

Odd as this method of administering medicine may appear, some tribes have a still more extraordinary mode of dispensing it.

"As I was informed there was to be a physic dance at night, curiosity led me to the town-house to see the preparation. A vessel of their own make, that might contain twenty gallons, (there being a great many to take the medicine,) was set on the fire, round which stood several groups filled with river water, which was poured into the pot. This done, there arose one of the beloved women, who, opening a deer-skin filled with various roots and herbs, took out a small handful of something like fine salt, part of which she threw on the head man's seat, and part on the fire close to the pot; then she took out the wing of a swan, and, after-flooring it over the pot, stood fixed for near a minute, muttering something to herself; then taking a shrub like laurel, which I supposed was the physic, she threw it into the pot, and returned to her seat. As no more ceremony seemed to be going on, I took a walk till the Indians assembled to take it. At my return I found the house quite full; they danced near an hour round the pot, till one of them, with a small gourd that might hold about a gill, took some of the physic, and drank it, after which the rest took in turn. One of their head men presented me with some, and in a manner compelled me to drink, though I would willingly have declined. It was, however, much more palatable than I expected, having a strong taste of sassafras; the Indian who presented it told me it was taken to wash away their sins, so that this is a spiritual medicine, and might be ranked among their religious ceremonies. They are very solicitous about its success; the conjurer, for several mornings before it is drank, makes a dreadful howling, yelling, and howling from the top of the town-house, to frighten away apparitions and evil spirits." — TIMBERLAKE.

It is well known that Madame Merian painted one of these insects by its own light.

"In Hispaniola and the rest of the Ocean Islands, these are pleshy and marshy places, very fit for the feeding of headless cattle. Gnats of divers kinds, ingendiary of that mostyhe beast, grievously afflict the inhabitants seated on the brine thereof, and that not only in the isle, but in other countries; therefore the inhabitants build low houses, and make little doores therein, scarce able to receive the master, and without holes, that the gnats may have no entrance. And for that cause also, they forebear to light torches or candels, for that the gnats by natural instinct follow the light; yet nevertheless they often find a way in. Nature hath given that pestilent mischief, and hath also given a remedy; as she hath given us cuttes to destroy the filthy progeny of mice, so hath she given them pretty and commodious hunters, which they call Pythas. These be hand-drawn, and do at least somewhat less than batten or recce mouse, I should rather call them a kind of beetles, because they have other wings after the same order under their hard-winged sheath, which they close within the sheath when they leave flying. To this little creature (as we see Ryes shine by night, and certaine sing-glish worms lying in thick hedges) provident nature hath given some very cleere looking-glasses; two in the seate of the eyes, and two lying hid in the flank, under the sheath, which he then sheweth, when, after the manner of the beetle, he endeavoureth to draw his wings, he taketh his flight into the air; whereupon every Cucuia\r\n\r brings forth four light or candels with him. But how are they a remedy for so great a mischief, as is the stinging of these gnats, which in some places are little less than bees, it is a pleasant thing to hear. Hee who understandeth this troublesome insect, understands, that when hee is in his home, or feareth lest they may get in, diligently buntereth the Cucuij, which he deceived by this means and industry, which necessity (effecting wonders) hath sought out: whose wanteth Cucuij, goeth out of the house in the first twilight of the night, crying and making a bramble on his hand, and ascendeth the next hilllock, that the Cucuij may see it, and hee swingeth the fire bramble about calling Cucuij aloud, and beseth the ayre withall, often calling and crying out, Cucui, Cucui. Many simple people suppose that the Cucuij, delighted with that noise, come flying and flocking together to see the bewailing sound of him that calleth them, for they come with a speedy and headlong course: but I rather think the Cucuij make haste to the brightness of the fire-brande, because swarmeres of gnats fly unto every light, which the Cucuij cate in the very ayre, as the marilies and swallowes doe. Behold the desired number of Cucuij, at what time the hunter casteth the fire-brande out of his hand. Some Cucuij sometimes followeth the fire-brande, and lighteth on the ground; then is he easily taken, as travellers may take a beetle if they have need thereof, walking with his wings short. Others desire that the Cucuij not be taken away, but let it be left, they say, that the hunters especially have bought full of leaves ready prepared, or broad linnen cloths, wherewith they smite the Cucuij flying about on high, and strike him to the ground, where he lyeth as it were astonished, and suffereth himself to bee taken; as they say, full of gnats, when they take the prey, by casting the same bushie bough or linen cloath upon him: howsoever it bee, the hunter havinge the hunting Cucuij, returneth home, and shutting the doore of the house, letteth the prey goe. The Cucuij housed, swiftly flyeth about the whole house seeking gnats, under their hanging cloaths, and about the faces of them that sleep, whicke the gnats used to assaile: they seem to execute the office of watchmen, that such as are shut in may quietly rest. Another pleasant and profitable commodity proceedeth from the Cucuij. As many eyes as every Cucuius openeth, the beast enjoyeth in both his light of so many corner; but the inhabitants spinne, sewe, sawe, and dance by the light of the flying Cucuij. The inhabitants thinkke that the Cucuius is delighted with the harmony and melody of their singing, and that hee also exerciseth his motion in the ayre according to the action of the other wings, but hee, by reason of the last circle of the gnats, of necessity swiftly flyeth about divers ways to seek his food. Our men also rende and write by that light, which always continueth until he have gotten enough whereby he may be well fed. The gnats being chased, or driven out of doors for terms, begin to famish the light beginneth to faile: therefore when they see his light to waxe dim, opening the little doore, they set him at liberty, that he may seake his foods.

God as the first cause of all good things, and the King as the second.

Let the guilty tremble! it shall flow
A draught of agon and death to him,

I have no other authority for attributing this artifice to Tezozomoc, than that it has been practised very often and very successfully.

A Chief of Dejedah," says Niebuhr, "informed me that two hundred duents had been stolen from him, and wanted me to discover the thief. I excused myself, saying, that I left that sublime science to the Muhammadan sages; and very soon afterwards a celebrated Scheleh showed, indeed, that he knew more than I did. He placed all the servants in a row, made a long prayer, then put into the mouth of each a bit of paper, and ordered them all to swallow it, after having assured them that it would not harm the innocent, but that the punishment of Heaven would fall on the guilty; after which he examined the mouth of every one, and of one, who had not swallowed the paper, confessed that he had stolen the money." A similar anecdote occurs in the old Legend of Pierre Faufin.

NOTES TO MADOC IN AZTLAN.

There was a young man in despair for the death of his sister, whom he loved with extreme affection. The idea of the departed recurred to him incessantly. He resolved to seek her in the Land of Souls, and flattered himself with the hope of bringing her back with him. His voyage was long and laborious, but he surmounted all the obstacles, and overcame every difficulty. At length he found a solitary old man, or rather genius, who, having questioned him concerning his enterprise, encouraged him to pursue it, and taught him the means of success. He gave him a little empty calabash to contain the soul of his sister, and promised on his return to give him the brain, which he had in his possession, being placed there, by virtue of his office, to keep the brains of the dead. The young man profited by his instructions, finished his course successfully, and arrived in the Land of Souls, the inhabitants of which were much astonished to see him, and fed at his presence. Tharonhiaogan received him well, and protected him by his counsel from the old woman his grandmother, who, under the appearance of a feigned regard, wished to destroy him by making him eat the flesh of serpents and vipers, which were to her delicacies. The souls being assembled as dance, as was their custom, he recognized that of his sister; Tharonhiaogan assisted him to take it by surprise, without which he never would have succeeded, for when he advanced to seize it, it vanished like a dream of the night, and left him as confounded as was Alcines when he attempted to embrace the soul of his father Anchises. Nevertheless, he took it, confined it, and in spite of the attempts and stratagems of this captive soul, which sought but to deliver itself from its prison, he brought it back the same road by which he came to his own village. I know not if he recollected to take the brain, or judged the requisite; but the sooner he returned, before whose coming he came to life again. In this time he says he went to the place where the sun rises, (imagining the earth to be a sphere,) and directly over that place, at a great height in the air, he was admitted, he says, into a great house, which he supposed was several miles in length, and saw many wondrous things, too tedious as well as ridiculous to mention. Another person, a woman, whom I have not seen, but been credibly informed of by the Indians, declares she was dead several days; that her soul went southward, and feasted and danced with the happy spirits; and that she found all things exactly agreeable to the Indian notions of a future state." — Brainerd.

One, I remember, affirmed to me that himself had been dead four days; that most of his friends in that time were gathered together to his funeral; and that he should have been buried, but that some of his relations at a great distance, who were sent for on that occasion, were not arrived, before whose coming he came to life again. In this time he says he went to the place where the sun rises, (imagining the earth to be a sphere,) and directly over that place, at a great height in the air, he was admitted, he says, into a great house, which he supposed was several miles in length, and saw many wondrous things, too tedious as well as ridiculous to mention. Another person, a woman, whom I have not seen, but been credibly informed of by the Indians, declares she was dead several days; that her soul went southward, and feasted and danced with the happy spirits; and that she found all things exactly agreeable to the Indian notions of a future state." — Brainerd.

The Mocking Bird is often mentioned, and with much feeling, in Mr. Davis's Travels in America, a very singular and interesting volume. He describes himself in one place as listening by moonlight to one that usually perched within a few yards of his log hut. A negress was sitting on the threshold of the next door, smoking the stump of an old pipe. "Please God Almighty, exclaimed the old woman, how sweet that Mocking Bird sings! he never tires. By day and by night it sings alike; when weary of mocking others, the bird takes up its own natural strain, and so joyous a creature is it, that it will jump and dance to its own music. The bird is perfectly domestic, for the Americans hold it sacred. Would that we had more of these humane prejudices in England!" — If that word may be applied to a feeling so good in itself and in its tendency.

A good old Protestant missionary mentions another of the American singing birds very technically.

"Of black birds there be millions, which are great devourers of the Indian corn as soon as it appears out of the ground: unto this sort of birds, especially, may the mystical fowls, the Divells, be well resembled, (and so it pleaseth the Lord Jesus himself to observe, Matt. 13,) which mystical fowl follow the sowing of the word, pick it up from loose and careless hearers, as these black birds follow the material seed: against these they are very careful, both to set their corn deep enough, that it may have a strong root, not so apt to be plucked up, as those that put up little water-houses in the middle of their fields, in which they or their biggest children lodge."

GALISSINE'S GOOD MOWW.

But of all the songsters in America who warble their wood-notes wild, the frogs are the most extraordinary.

"Prepared as I was," says a traveller, "to hear something extraordinary from these animals, I confess the first frog concert I heard in America was so much beyond any thing I could conceive from the sounders of these musical animals, that I was truly astonished. This performance was at froes, and took place on the 18th, (April instant,) in a large swamp, where there were at least ten thousand performers, and, I really believe, not two exactly in the same pitch, if the octave can possibly admit of so many divisions, or slacks of semitones. An Hibernian musician, who, like myself, was present for the first time at this concert of antumine, exclaimed, 'By Jove, but they stop out of tune to a nicety.'"

"I have been since informed by an amanuensis who resided many years in this country, and made this species of music his peculiar study, that on these occasions the tune is performed by the Tree Frogs, the smallest and most beautiful species; they are always of the same color as the bark of the tree they inhabit, and their note is not unlike the chirp of a cricket: the next in size are our counter-tenors; they have a note resembling the setting of a snake. A still larger species sings tenor, and the under part is supported by the Bull Frogs, which are as large as a man's foot, and hallow out the bass in a tone as loud and somberous as that of the animal from which they take their name." — Travels in America by W. PRIET, Mexican.

"I have often thought," says this lively traveller, "if an enthusiastic cockney of weak nerves, who had never been out of the sound of Bow-bell, could suddenly be conveyed from his bed in the middle of the night, and laid fast asleep in an American swamp, he would, on waking, fancy himself in the infernal regions: his first sensations would be from the stings of a myriad of musquitoes; waking with the smart, his ears would be assailed with the horrid noises of the frogs: on lifting up his eyes, he would have a faint view of the night-hawks, flapping their ominous wings over his devoted head, visible only from the glimmering of the fire-flies, which he would naturally conclude were sparks from the bottomless pit. Nothing would be wanting at this moment to complete the illusion, but one of those dreadful explosions of thunder and lightning, so extravagantly described by Lee in Olimus."

"Call you these peals of thunder but the yawns of hallowing clouds? By Jove, they seem to me the world's last groans, and those large sheets of flame its last blaze!"

"And when the builders laid the foundation of the Temple of the Lord, they set the Priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the Lord, after the ordinance of David, King of Israel."

"And they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord, because he is good, for his mercy endureth forever toward Israel. And all the people shouted with a great shout when they praised the Lord, because of the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid."

"But many of the Priests and Levites and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept, with a loud voice; and many shouted aloud with joy:

'Because that the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people; for the people shouted with a loud shout, and the noise was heard afar off.' — Ezra, iii. 10-13.

My excuse for this insignificant agency, as I fear it will be thought, must be, that the fact itself is historically true; by means of this omen the Aztecs were induced to quit their country, after a series of calamities. The leader who had address enough to influence them was Huiztiloztli, a name which I have altered to Yuhiditlan for the sake of euphony; the note of this image is expressed in Spanish and Italian thus, tiwu; the cry of the periste cannot be better expressed.

The hideous figures of their idols are easily accounted for by the Historian of the Dominicans in Mexico.

"As often as the Devil appeared to the Mexicans, they made immediately an idol of the figure in which they had seen him; sometimes as a lion, other times as a dog, other times as a serpent; and as the ambitious Devil took advantage of this weakness, he assumed a new form every time to gain a new image in which he might be worshipped. The natural timidity of the Indians aided the design of the Devil, and he appeared to them in horrible and affrighting figures, that he might have them the more submissive to his will; for this reason it is that the idols which we still see in Mexico, placed in the corners of the streets as spoils of the Gospel, are so deformed and ugly. — Fr. AUGUSTIN DAVILA PADILLA.

To spread in other lands Mexitli's name. — XXVII. p. 420, col. 1.

It will scarcely be believed that the resemblance between Mexico and Messiah should have been adduced as a proof that America was peopled by the ten tribes. Fr. ESTEVAN de SALAS discovered this wise argument, which is noticed in Gregorio Garcia's very curiosel and very learned work on the Origin of the Indians, l, 3, c. 7, 5-9.
Ballads and Metrical Tales.

PREFACE.

Most of the pieces in this volume were written in early life, a few are comparatively of recent date, and there are some of them which lay unfinished for nearly thirty years.

Upon reading, on their first appearance, certain of these Ballads, and of the lighter pieces now comprised in the third volume of this collective edition, Mr. Edgeworth said to me, "Take my word for it, Sir, the bent of your genius is for comedy." I was as little displeased with the intended compliment as one of the most distinguished poets of this age was with Mr. Sheridan, who, upon returning a play which he had offered for acceptance at Drury Lane, told him it was a comical tragedy.

My late friend, Mr. William Taylor of Norwich, whom none who knew him intimately can ever call to mind without affection and regret, has this passage in his Life of Dr. Sayers:—"Not long after this, (the year 1780,) Mr. Robert Southey visited Norwich, was introduced to Dr. Sayers, and partook those feelings of complacent admiration which his presence was adapted to inspire.—Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation, as adapted for the theme of a ballad, a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch, whose coffin was confined by three chains, sprinkled with holy water; but who was, nevertheless, carried off by demons. Already, I believe, Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject; so did I, and so did Mr. Southey; but after seeing the Old Woman of Berkeley, we agreed in awarding to it the preference. Still, the very different manner in which each had employed the same basis of narration might render welcome the opportunity of comparison; but I have not found among the papers of Dr. Sayers a copy of his poem."

There is a mistake here as to the date. This, my first visit to Norwich, was in the spring of 1798; and I had so much to interest me there in the society of my kind host and friend Mr. William Taylor, that the mention at Dr. Sayers's table of the story in Olaus Magnus made no impression on me at the time, and was presently forgotten. Indeed, if I had known that either he or his friend had written or intended to write a ballad upon the subject, that knowledge, however much the story might have pleased me, would have withheld me from all thought of versifying it. In the autumn of the same year, I passed some days at Hereford with Mr. William Bowyer Thomas, one of the friends with whom, in 1796, I had visited the Arrabida Convent near Setubal. By his means I obtained permission to make use of the books in the Cathedral Library; and accordingly I was locked up for several mornings in that part of the Cathedral where the books were kept in chains. So little were these books used at that time, that, in placing them upon the shelves, no regard had been had to the length of the chains; and when the volume which I wished to consult was fastened to one of the upper shelves by a short chain, the only means by which it was possible to make use of it was, by piling upon the reading desk as many volumes with longer chains as would reach up to the length of its tether; then, by standing on a chair, I was able to effect my purpose. There, and thus, I first read the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley, in Matthew of Westminster, and transcribed it into a pocket-book. I had no recollection of what had passed at Dr. Sayers's; but the circumstantial details in the monkish Chronicle impressed me so strongly, that I began to versify them that very evening. It was the last day of our pleasant visit at Hereford; and on the following morning the remainder of the Ballad was pencilled in a post-chaise on our way to Abberley.

Mr. Whale, a singular and obliging person, who afterwards made a voyage to the East Indies, and published an account of what he saw there, traced for me a fine sample of a wooden cut in the Nuremburg Chronicle, (which was among the prisoners in the Cathedral.) It represents the Old Woman's forcible abduction from her intended place of burial. This was put into the hands of a Bristol artist; and the engraving in wood which he made from it was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, in the second volume of my poems, 1799. The Devil alludes to it in his Walk, when he complains of a certain poet as having "put him in ugly ballads, with libellous pictures, for sale."

The passage from Matthew of Westminster was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, and it has continued to be so in every subsequent edition of my minor poems from that time to the present; for whenever I have founded either a poem, or part of one, upon any legend, or portion of history, I have either extracted the passage to which I was indebted, if its length allowed, or have referred to it. Mr. Payne Collier, however, after the Ballad, with its parentage affixed, had been twenty years before the public, discovered that I had copied the story from Heywood's Nine Books of various History concerning Women, and that I had not thought proper to acknowledge the obligation.

MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

The discovery is thus stated in that gentleman's Poetical Decameron, (vol. i. p. 323.) Speaking of the book, one of his Interlocutors says, "It is not of such rarity or singularity as to deserve particular notice now; only, if you refer to p. 438, you will find the story on which Mr. Southey founded his mock-ballad of the Old Woman of Berkeley. You will see, too, that the mode in which it is told is extremely similar.

"Morton. Had Mr. Southey seen Heywood's book?

"Bourne. It is not improbable; or some quotation from it, the resemblance is so exact; you may judge from the few following sentences.

Part of Heywood's narration is then given; upon which one of the speakers observes, "The resemblance is exact, and it is not unlikely that Heywood and Southey copied from the same original."

"Bourne. Perhaps so; Heywood quotes Guilleminus in Special Histor. lib. xxvi. c. 26. He afterwards relates, as Southey, that the Devil placed the Old Woman of Berkeley before him on a black horse, and that her screams were heard four miles off."

It cannot, however, be disputed, that Mr. Payne Collier has made one discovery relating to this subject; for he has discovered that the Old Woman of Berkeley is a mock-ballad. Certainly this was never suspected by the Author or any of his friends. It obtained a very different character in Russia, where, having been translated and published, it was prohibited for this singular reason, that children were said to be frightened by it. This I was told by a Russian traveller who called upon me at Keswick.

KESWICK, 8th March, 1838.

MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

The circumstances related in the following Ballad were told me, when a school-boy, as having happened in the north of England. Either Furness or Kirkstall Abbey (I forget which) was named as the scene. The original story, however, is in Dr. Plot's History of Staffordshire.

"Amongst the unusual accidents," says this amusing author, "that have attended the female sex in the course of their lives, I think I may also reckon the narrow escapes they have made from death. Whereof I met with one mentioned with admiration by every body at Leek, that happened not far off at the Black Moor of Morridge, which, though famous for nothing for which it is commonly reputed so, (as that it is bottomless, no cattle will drink of it, or birds fly over or settle upon it, all which I found false,) yet is so, for the signal deliverance of a poor woman enticed thither in a dismal, stormy night, by a bloody ruffian, who had first gotten her with child, and intended, in this remote ininhabitable place, to have despatched her by drownings. The same night (Providence so ordering it) there were several persons of inferior rank drinking in an ale-house at Leek, whereas one having been out, and observing the darkness and other ill circumstances of the weather, coming in again, said to the rest of his companions, that he were a stout man indeed that would venture to go to the Black Moor of Morridge in such a night as that; to which one of them replying, that, for a crown, or some such sum, he would undertake it, the rest, joining their purses, said he should have his demand. The bargain being struck away, he went on his journey with a stick in his hand, which he was to leave there as a testimony of his performance. At length, coming near the Moor, he heard the lamentable cries of this distressed woman, begging for mercy, which at first put him to a stand; but being a man of great resolution and some policy, he went boldly on, however, counterfeiting the presence of divers other persons, calling Jack, Dick, and Tom, and crying, Here are the rogues we look'd for, &c.; which being heard by the murderer, he left the woman and fled; whom the other man found by the Moor side, almost stripped of her clothes, and brought her with him to Leek as an ample testimony of his having been at the Moor, and of God's providence too."—P. 291.

The metre is Mr. Lewis's invention; and metre is one of the few things concerning which popularity may be admitted as a proof of merit. The ballad has become popular owing to the metre and the story; and it has been made the subject of a fine picture by Mr. Barker.

Who is yonder poor Maniac, whose wildly-fix'd eyes
Scorn a heart overcharged to express?
She weeps not, yet often and deeply she sighs;
She never complaints, but her silence implies
The composure of settled distress.

No pity she looks for, no alms doth she seek;
Nor for rainment nor food doth she care;
Through the tatters the winds of the winter blow bleak
On that wither'd breast, and her weather-worn cheek
Hath the line of a mortal despair.

Yet cheerful and happy, nor distant the day,
Poor Mary the Maniac hath been;
The Traveller remembers who journey'd this way
No damsel so lovely, no damsel so gay,
As Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

Her cheerful address fill'd the guests with delight
As she welcomed them in with a smile;
Her heart was a stranger to childish affect
And Mary would walk by the Abbey at night
When the wind whistled down the dark aisle.

5.
She loved, and young Richard had settled the day,
And she hoped to be happy for life;
But Richard was idle and worthless, and they
Who knew him would pity poor Mary, and say
That she was too good for his wife.

'Twas in autumn, and stormy and dark was the night,
And fast were the windows and door;
Two guests sat enjoying the fire that burnt bright,
And smoking, in silence, with tranquil delight,
They listen'd to hear the wind roar.
MARY, THE MAID OF THE INN.

7.
"'Tis pleasant," cried one, "seated by the fireside,
To hear the wind whittle without.
"What a night for the Abbey!
"his comrade replied;
"Methinks a man's courage would now be well tried
Who should wander the ruins about.

"I myself, like a school-boy, should tremble to hear
The hoarse ivy shake over my head;
And could fancy I saw, half persuaded by fear,
Some ugly old Abbot's grim spirit appear;
For this wind might awaken the dead!"

9.
"I'll wager a dinner," the other one cried,
"That Mary would venture there now."
"Then wager and lose! with a sneer he replied;
"I'll warrant she'd fancy a ghost by her side,
And faint if she saw a white cow."

10.
"Will Mary this charge on her courage allow?"
His companion exclaim'd, with a smile;
"I shall win,— for I know she will venture there now,
And earn a new bonnet by bringing a bough
From the elder that grows in the aisle."

11.
With fearless good-humor did Mary comply,
And her way to the Abbey she bent;
The night was dark, and the wind was high,
And as hollowly howling it swept through the sky,
She shiver'd with cold as she went.

12.
O'er the path so well known still proceeded the Maid
Where the Abbey rose dim on the sight;
Through the gateway she enter'd; she felt not afraid,
Yet the ruins were lonely and wild, and their shade
Seem'd to deepen the gloom of the night.

All around her was silent, save when the rude blast
Howl'd dismally round the old pile;
Over weed-cover'd fragments she fearlessly pass'd,
And arrived at the innermost ruin at last,
Where the elder-tree grew in the aisle.

14.
Well pleased did she reach it, and quickly drew near,
And hastily gather'd the bough;
When the sound of a voice seem'd to rise on her ear,
She paused, and she listen'd intently, in fear,
And her heart pant'd painfully now.

The wind blew; the hoarse ivy shook over her head;
She listen'd — nought else could she hear;
The wind fell; her heart sunk in her bosom with dread,
For she heard in the ruins distinctly the tread
Of footsteps approaching her near.

Behind a wide column, half breathless with fear,
She crept to conceal herself there:
That instant the moon o'er a dark cloud shone clear,
And she saw in the moonlight two ruffians appear,
And between them a corpse did they bear.

Then Mary could feel her heart's churlie cold;
Again the rough wind hurried by;
It blew off the hat of the one, and, behold,
Even close to the feet of poor Mary it roll'd;
She felt, and expected to die.

"Curse the hat!" he exclaims. "Nay, come on till we hide
The dead body," his comrade replies.
She beholds them in safety pass on by her side;
She seizes the hat,— fear her courage supplied,—
And fast through the Abbey she flies.

She ran with wild speed; she rush'd in at the door;
She gaz'd in her terror around;
Then her limbs could support their faint burden no more,
And exhausted and breathless she sank on the
Unable to utter a sound.

Ere yet her pale lips could the story impart,
For a moment the hat met her view;—
Her eyes from that object convulsively start,
For — what a cold horror then thrilled through her heart
When the name of her Richard she knew!

Where the old Abbey stands, on the common hard by,
His gibbet is now to be seen;
His irons you still from the road may esp'y;
The traveller beholds them, and thinks with a sigh
Of poor Mary, the Maid of the Inn.

DONICA.

"In Finland there is a Castle which is called the New Rock, moated about with a river of unmoved depth, the water black, and the fish therein very distasteful to the palate. In this are spectres often seen, which forebode either the death of the Governor, or of some prime officer belonging to the place; and most commonly it appeareth in the shape of a harper, sweetly singing and dallying and playing under the water."

"It is reported of one Donica, that after she was dead, the Devil walked in her body for the space of two years, so that none suspected but she was still alive; for she did both speak and eat, though very sparingly; only she had a deep paleness on her countenance, which was the only sign of death. At length, a Magician coming by where she was then in the company of many other virgins, as soon as he beheld her, he said, 'Fair Maids, why keep you company with this dead Virgin, whom you suppose to be alive?'
when, taking away the magic charm which was tied under her arm, the body fell down lifeless and without motion."
The following Ballad is founded on these stories. They are to be found in the notes to the Hierarchies of the Blessed Angels; a Poem by Thomas Heywood, printed in folio by Adam Islip, 1635.

Hie on a rock whose castled shade
Darken'd the lake below,
In ancient strength majestic stood
The towers of Arlinkow.

The fisher in the lake below
Durst never cast his net,
Nor ever swallow in its waves
Her passing wing would wet.

The cattle from its ominous banks
In wild alarm would run,
Though parch'd with thirst, and faint beneath
The summer's scorching sun; —

For sometimes, when no passing breeze
The long, lank sedges waved,
All white with foam, and heaving high,
Its deepening billows raved; —

And when the tempest from its base
The rooted pine would shake,
The powerless storm unruffling swept Across the calm dead lake; —

And ever, then, when death drew near
The house of Arlinkow,
Its dark, unfathom'd waters sent Strange music from below.

The Lord of Arlinkow was old;
One only child had he;
Donica was the Maiden's name,
As fair as air might be.

A bloom as bright as opening morn
Suffused her clear, white cheek;
The music of her voice was mild;
Her full, dark eyes were meek.

Far was her beauty known, for none
So fair could Finland boast;
Her parents loved the Maiden much,
Young Eberhard loved her most.

Together did they hope to tread
The pleasant path of life;
For now the day drew near to make Donica Eberhard's wife.

The eve was fair, and mild the air;
Along the lake they stray;
The eastern hill reflected bright
The tints of fading day.

And brightly o'er the water stream'd
The liquid radiance wide;
Donica's little dog ran on,
And gambol'd at her side.

Youth, health, and love bloom'd on her cheek,
Her full, dark eyes express,
In many a glance, to Eberhard
Her soul's meek tenderness.

Nor sound was heard, nor passing gale
Sigh'd through the long, lank sedge;
The air was hush'd; no little wave
Dimples the water's edge; —

When suddenly the lake sent forth
Its music from beneath,
And slowly o'er the waters sail'd
The solemn sounds of death.

As those deep sounds of death arose,
Donica's cheek grew pale,
And in the arms of Eberhard
The lifeless Maiden fell.

Loudly the Youth in terror shriek'd,
And loud he call'd for aid,
And with a wild and eager look
Gazed on the lifeless Maid.

But soon again did better thoughts
In Eberhard arise;
And he with trembling hope beheld
The Maiden raise her eyes.

And, on his arm reclined, she moved
With feeble pace and slow,
And soon, with strength recover'd, reach'd
The towers of Arlinkow.

Yet never to Donica's cheeks
Return'd their lively hue;
Her cheeks were deathly white and wan,
Her lips a livid blue.

Her eyes, so bright and black of yore,
Were now more black and bright,
And beam'd strange lustre in her face,
So deadly wan and white.

The dog that gambol'd by her side,
And loved with her to stray,
Now at his alter'd mistress howl'd,
And fled in fear away.

Yet did the faithful Eberhard
Not love the Maid the less;
He gazed with sorrow, but he gazed
With deeper tenderness.
And when he found her health unharm'd,
He would not brook delay,
But press'd the not unwilling Maid
To fix the bridal day.

And when at length it came, with joy
He hail'd the bridal day,
And onward to the house of God
They went their willing way.

But when they at the altar stood,
And heard the sacred rite,
The hallow'd tapers dimly stream'd
A pale, sulphureous light.

And when the Youth, with holy warmth,
Her hand in his did hold,
Sudden he felt Donica's hand
Grow deadly clam and cold.

But loudly then he shriek'd, for lo!
A spirit met his view,
And Eberhard in the angel form
His own Donica knew.

That instant from her earthly frame
A Demon howling fled,
And at the side of Eberhard
The livid corpse fell dead.

RUDIGER.

"Divers Princes and Noblemen being assembled in a beautiful and fair Palace, which was situate upon the river Rhine, they beheld a boat or smallarge make toward the shore, drawn by a Swan in a silver chain, the one end fastened about her neck, the other to the vessel; and in it an unknown soldier, a man of a comely personage and graceful presence, who stepped upon the shore; which done, the boat guided by the Swan, left him, and floated down the river. This man fell afterward in league with a fair gentle-woman, married her, and by her had many children. After some years, the same Swan came with the same barge unto the same place; the soldier, entering into it, was carried thence the way he came, left wife, children, and family, and was never seen amongst them after."

"Now who can judge this to be other than one of those spirits that are named lecubi?" says Thomas Heywood. I have adopted his story, but not his solution, making the unknown soldier not an evil spirit, but one who had purchased prosperity from a malevolent being, by the promised sacrifice of his first-born child.

BRIGHT on the mountain's heathy slope
The day's last splendors shine,
And rich, with many a radiant hue,
Gleam gayly on the Rhine.

And many a one from Waldhur's walls
Along the river stroll'd,
As ruffling o'er the pleasant stream
The evening gales came cold.
But silently did Rudiger
   The little infant see;
And darkly on the babe he gazed,—
   A gloomy man was he.

And when to bless the little babe
   The holy Father came,
To cleanse the stains of sin away
   In Christ's redeeming name,—

Then did the check of Rudiger
   Assume a death-pale hue,
And on his clammy forehead stood
   The cold, convulsive dew;—

And faltering in his speech, he bade
   The Priest the rites delay,
Till he could, to right health restored,
   Enjoy the festive day.

When o'er the many-tinted sky
   He saw the day decline,
He called upon his Margaret
   To walk beside the Rhine;—

"And we will take the little babe;
   For soft the breeze that blows,
And the mild murmurs of the stream
   Will lull him to repose."

And so together forth they went;
   The evening breeze was mild;
And Rudiger upon his arm
   Pillow'd the little child.

Many gay companies that eve
   Along the river roam;
But when the mist began to rise,
   They all betook them home.

Yet Rudiger continued still
   Along the banks to roam;
Nor aught could Margaret prevail
   To turn his footsteps home.

"Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger;
   The rising mists behold;
The evening wind is damp and chill;
   The little babe is cold!"

"Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret,
   The mists will do no harm;
And from the wind the little babe
   Is shelter'd on my arm."

"Oh, turn thee, turn thee, Rudiger;
   Why onward wilt thou roam?
The moon is up; the night is cold;
   And we are far from home."

He answer'd not; for now he saw
   A Swan come sailing strong;
And by a silver chain he drew
   A little boat along.

To shore they came, and to the boat
   Fast leapt he with the child;
And in leap'd Margaret, breathless now,
   And pale with fear, and wild.

With arching crest and swelling breast
   On sail'd the stately Swan,
And lightly down the rapid tide
   The little boat went on.

The full-orb'd moon, that beam'd around
   Pale splendor through the night,
Cast through the crimson canopy
   A dim, discolor'd light.

And swiftly down the hurrying stream
   In silence still they sail,
And the long streamer, fluttering fast,
   Flapp'd to the heavy gale.

And he was mute in sullen thought,
   And she was mute with fear;
Nor sound but of the parting tide
   Broke on the listening ear.

The little babe began to cry;
   Then Margaret raised her head,
And with a quick and hollow voice,
   "Give me the child!" she said.

"Now hush thee, hush thee, Margaret,
   Nor my poor heart distress;
I do but pay perforce the price
   Of former happiness.

"And hush thee too, my little babe,
   Thy cries so feeble cease;
Lie still, lie still; —a little while,
   And thou shalt be at peace."

So, as he spake, to land they drew,
   And swift he stepp'd on shore;
And him behind did Margaret
   Close follow evermore.

It was a place all desolate;
   Nor house nor tree was there,
But there a rocky mountain rose,
   Barren, and bleak, and bare;—

And at its base a cavern yawn'd;
   No eye its depth might view;
For in the moonbeam shining round
   That darkness darker grew.

Cold horror crept through Margaret's blood;
   Her heart it paused with fear.
When Rudiger approach'd the cave,
   And cried, "Lo, I am here!"

A deep, sepulchral sound the cave
Return'd — "Lo, I am here!" And black from out the cavern gloom
   Two giant arms appear.
And Rudiger approach’d, and held
The little infant nigh;
Then Margaret shriek’d, and gather’d then
New powers from agony.

And round the baby fast and close
Her trembling arms she folds,
And with a strong, convulsive grasp
The little infant holds.

"Now help me, Jesus!" loud she cries,
And loud on God she calls;
Then from the grasp of Rudiger
The little infant falls.

The mother holds her precious babe;
But the black arms clasped him round,
And dragg’d the wretched Rudiger
Adown the dark profound.

JASPAR.

JASPAR was poor, and vice and want
Had made his heart like stone;
And JASPAR look’d with envious eyes
On riches not his own.

On plunder bent, abroad he went
Toward the close of day,
And loiter’d on the lonely road
Impatient for his prey.

No traveller came — he loiter’d long,
And often look’d around,
And paused and listen’d eagerly
To catch some coming sound.

He sat him down beside the stream
That cross’d the lonely way;
So fair a scene might well have charm’d
All evil thoughts away.

He sat beneath a willow-tree,
Which cast a trembling shade;
The gentle river, full in front,
A little island made,—

Where pleasantly the moonbeam shone
Upon the poplar-trees,
Whose shadow on the stream below
Play’d slowly to the breeze.

He listen’d—and he heard the wind
That waved the willow-tree;
He heard the waters flow along,
And murmur quietly.

He listen’d for the traveller’s tread;
The nightingale sung sweet;—

He started up, for now he heard
The sound of coming feet;—
He started up, and grasp’d a stake,
And waited for his prey;
There came a lonely traveller,
And JASPAR cross’d his way.

But JASPAR’s threats and curses fail’d
The traveller to appall;
He would not lightly yield the purse
Which held his little all.

Awhile he struggled; but he strove
With JASPAR’s strength in vain;
Beneath his blows he fell, and groan’d,
And never spake again.

JASPAR raised up the murder’d man,
And plunged him in the flood,
And in the running water then
He cleansed his hands from blood.

The waters closed around the corpse,
And cleansed his hands from gore;
The willow waved, the stream flow’d on,
And murmured as before.

There was no human eye had seen
The blood the murderer spilt,
And JASPAR’s conscience never felt
The avenging goad of guilt.

And soon the ruffian had consumed
The gold he gain’d so ill;
And years of secret guilt pass’d on,
And he was needy still.

One eve, beside the alehouse fire
He sat, as it befell,
When in there came a laboring man
Whom JASPAR knew full well.

He sat him down by JASPAR’s side,
A melancholy man;
For, spite of honest toil, the world
Went hard with Jonathan.

His toil a little earn’d, and he
With little was content;
But sickness on his wife had fallen,
And all was wellnigh spent.

Long with his wife and little ones
He shared the scanty meal,
And saw their looks of wretchedness,
And felt what wretches feel.

Their Landlord, a hard man, that day
Had seized the little left;
And now the sufferer found himself
Of every thing bereft.

He lean’d his head upon his hand,
His elbow on his knee;
And so by Jaspar's side he sat,
And not a word said he.

"Nay, — why so downcast?" Jaspar cried,
"Come — cheer up, Jonathan!
Drink, neighbor, drink! 'twill warm thy heart;
Come! come! take courage, man!"

He took the cup that Jaspar gave,
And down he drain'd it quick;
"I have a wife," said Jonathan,
"And she is deadly sick.

"She has no bed to lie upon;
I saw them take her bed —
And I have children — would to God
That they and I were dead!

"Our Landlord he goes home to-night,
And he will sleep in peace —
I would that I were in my grave,
For there all troubles cease.

"In vain I pray'd him to forbear,
Though wealth enough has he!
God be to him as merciless
As he has been to me!"

When Jaspar saw the poor man's soul
On all his ills intent,
He plied him with the heartening cup,
And with him forth he went.

"This Landlord on his homeward road
'Twere easy now to meet.
The road is lonesome, Jonathan! —
And vengeance, man! is sweet."

He listen'd to the tempter's voice;
The thought it made him start; —
His head was hot, and wretchedness
Had harden'd now his heart.

Along the lonely road they went,
And waited for their prey;
They sat them down beside the stream
That cross'd the lonely way.

They sat them down beside the stream,
And never a word they said;
They sat and listen'd silently
To hear the traveller's tread.

The night was calm; the night was dark;
No star was in the sky;
The wind it wave'd the willow boughs;
The stream flow'd quietly.

The night was calm; the air was still;
Sweet sung the nightingale;
The soul of Jonathan was soothed;
His heart began to fail.

"'Tis weary waiting here," he cried,
"And now the hour is late;
Methinks he will not come to-night;
No longer let us wait."

"Have patience, man!" the ruffian said;
"A little we may wait;
But longer shall his wife expect
Her husband at the gate."

Then Jonathan grew sick at heart;
"My conscience yet is clear;
Jaspar — it is not yet too late —
I will not linger here."

"How now!" cried Jaspar; "why, I thought
Thy conscience was asleep;
No more such qualms; the night is dark;
The river here is deep."

"What matters that," said Jonathan,
Whose blood began to freeze,
"When there is One above, whose eye
The deeds of darkness sees?"

"We are safe enough," said Jaspar then,
"If that be all thy fear;
Nor eye above, nor eye below,
Can pierce the darkness here."

That instant, as the murderer spake,
There came a sudden light;
Strong as the mid-day sun it shone,
Though all around was night.

It hung upon the willow-tree;
It hung upon the flood;
It gave to view the poplar isle,
And all the scene of blood.

The traveller who journeys there,
He surely hath espied
A madman who has made his home
Upon the river's side.

His cheek is pale; his eye is wild;
His looks bespeak despair;
For Jaspar, since that hour, has made
His home, unshelter'd, there.

And fearful are his dreams at night,
And dread to him the day;
He thinks upon his untold crime,
And never dares to pray.

The summer suns, the winter storms,
O'er him unheeded roll;
For heavy is the weight of blood
Upon the maniac's soul.

Bath, 1798.
No eye beheld when William plunged
Young Edmund in the stream;
No human ear but William's heard
Young Edmund's drowning scream.

Submissive all the vassals own'd
The murderer for their Lord;
And he as rightful heir possess'd
The house of Erlingford.

The ancient house of Erlingford
Stood in a fair domain,
And Severn's ample waters near
Roll'd through the fertile plain.

And oft 'n the wayfaring man
Would love to linger there,
Forgetful of his onward road,
To gaze on scenes so fair.

But never could Lord William dare
To gaze on Severn's stream;
In every wind that swept its waves
He heard young Edmund's scream.

In vain, at midnight's silent hour,
Sleep closed the murderer's eyes;
In every dream the murderer saw
Young Edmund's form arise.

In vain, by restless conscience driven,
Lord William left his home,
Far from the scenes that saw his guilt,
In pilgrimage to roam; —

To other climes the pilgrim fled,
But could not fly despair;
He sought his home again, but peace
Was still a stranger there.

Slow were the passing hours, yet swift
The months appeared to roll;
And now the day return'd that shook
With terror William's soul; —

A day that William never felt
Return without dismay;
For well had conscience calendar'd
Young Edmund's dying day.

A fearful day was that; the rains
Fell fast, with tempest roar,
And the swollen tide of Severn spread
Far on the level shore.

In vain Lord William sought the feast;
In vain he quaff'd the bowl,
And strove with noisy nirth to drown
The anguish of his soul.

The tempest, as its sudden swell
In gusty howlings came,
With cold and deathlike feeling seem'd
To thrill his shuddering frame.

Reluctant now, as night came on,
His lonely couch he press'd;
And, wearied out, he sunk to sleep,—
To sleep,—but not to rest.

Beside that couch his brother's form,
Lord Edmund, seem'd to stand,
Such and so pale as when in death
He grasp'd his brother's hand;

Such and so pale his face as when,
With faint and faltering tongue,
To William's care, a dying charge,
He left his orphan son.

"I bade thee with a father's love
My orphan Edmund guard; —
Well, William, hast thou kept thy charge?
Take now thy due reward."

He started up, each limb convuls'd
With agonizing fear;
He only heard the storm of night,—
'Twas music to his ear.

When lo! the voice of loud alarm
His inmost soul appalls;
"What ho! Lord William, rise in haste!
The water saps thy walls!"

He rose in haste; beneath the walls
He saw the flood appear;
It hemm'd him round; 'twas midnight now;
No human aid was near.

He heard a shout of joy; for now
A boat approach'd the wall;
And eager to the welcome aid
They crowd for safety all.

"My boat is small," the boatman cried;
"'Twill bear but one away;
Come in, Lord William, and do ye
In God's protection stay."

Strange feeling fill'd them at his voice,
Even in that hour of woe,
That, save their Lord, there was not one
Who wish'd with him to go.

But William leap'd into the boat,
His terror was so sore;
"Thou shalt have half my gold," he cried;
Haste — haste to yonder shore."
The boatman pld the oar; the boat Went light along the stream; Sudden Lord William heard a cry Like Edmund’s drowning scream.

The boatman paused—"Methought I heard A child’s distressful cry!"
" ’Twas but the howling wind of night," Lord William made reply.

"Haste—haste—ply swift and strong the oar; Haste—haste across the stream!"
Again Lord William heard a cry Like Edmund’s drowning scream.

"I heard a child’s distressful voice,"
The boatman cried again.
"Nay, hasten on—the night is dark— And we should search in vain."

"O God! Lord William, dost thou know How dreadful ’tis to die? And canst thou without pity hear A child’s expiring cry?"

"How horrible it is to sink Beneath the closing stream, To stretch the powerless arms in vain, In vain for help to scream!"

The shriek again was heard; it came More deep, more piercing loud; That instant o’er the flood the moon Shone through a broken cloud;—

And near them they beheld a child, Upon a crag he stood, A little crag, and all around Was spread the rising flood.

The boatman pld the oar; the boat Approach’d his resting-place; The moonbeam shone upon the child, And showed how pale his face.

"Now reach thine hand!" the boatman cried, "Lord William, reach and save!"
The child stretch’d forth his little hands To grasp the hand he gave.

Then William shriek’d; the hands he felt Were cold, and damp, and dead! He held young Edmund in his arms, A heavier weight than lead.

The boat sunk down; the murderer sunk Beneath the avenging stream: He rose; he shriek’d; no human ear Heard William’s drowning scream.

Westbury, 1793.

ST. PATRICK’S PURGATORY.

This Ballad was published (1801) in the Tales of Wonder, by Mr. Lewis, who found it among the works and strayings of the Press. He never knew that it was mine; but after his death, I bestowed some pains in recomposing it, because he had thought it worth preserving.

It is founded upon the abridged extract which M. Le Grand has given in his Fabliau de a Metrical legend, by Marie de France.

1. "Enter, Sir Knight," the Warden cried, "And trust in Heaven, what’er betide, Since you have reach’d this bourn; But first receive refreshment due; ’Twill then be time to welcome you If ever you return."

2. Three sops were brought of bread and wine; Well might Sir Owen then divine The mystic warning given, That he against our ghostly Foe Must soon to mortal combat go, And put his trust in Heaven.

3. Sir Owen pass’d the convent gate; The warden him conducted straight To where a coffin lay; The Monks around in silence stand, Each with a funeral torch in hand, Whose light bedim’d the day.

4. "Few Pilgrims ever reach this bourn," They said, "but fewer still return; Yet, let what will ensue, Our duties are prescribed and clear; Put off all mortal weakness here; This coffin is for you.

5. "Lie there, while we, with pious breath, Raise over you the dirge of death; This comfort we can give; Belike no living hands may pay This office to your lifeless clay; Receive it while you live!"

6. Sir Owen in a shroud was dress’d, They placed a cross upon his breast, And down he laid his head; Around him stood the funeral train, And sung, with slow and solemn strain, The Service of the Dead.

7. Then to the entrance of the Cave They led the Christian warrior brave;
Some fear he well might feel,
For none of all the Monks could tell
The terrors of that mystic cell,
Its secrets none reveal.

8.
"Now enter here," the Warden cried,
"And God, Sir Owen, be your guide!
Your name shall live in story:
For of the few who reach this shore,
Still fewer venture to explore

9.
Adown the Cavern's long descent,
Feeling his way, Sir Owen went,
With cautious feet and slow;
Unarm'd, for neither sword nor spear,
Nor shield of proof, avail'd him here
Against our ghostly Foe.

10.
The ground was moist beneath his tread;
Large drops fell heavy on his head;
The air was damp and chill;
And sudden shudderings o'er him came,
And he could feel through all his frame
An icy sharpness thrill.

11.
Now steeper grew the dark descent;
In fervent prayer the Pilgrim went;
'Twas silence all around,
Save his own echo from the cell,
And the large drops that frequent fell
With dull and heavy sound.

12.
But colder now he felt the cell;
Those heavy drops no longer fell;
Thin grew the piercing air;
And now upon his aching sight
There dawn'd, far off, a feeble light;
In hope he hasten'd there.

13.
Emerging now once more to day,
A frozen waste before him lay,
A desert wild and wide,
Where ice-rocks, in a sunless sky,
On ice-rocks piled, and mountains high,
Were heap'd on every side.

14.
Impending as about to fall
They seem'd; and, had that sight been all,
Enough that sight had been
To make the stoutest courage quail;
For what could courage there avail
Against what then was seen?

15.
He saw, as on in faith he past,
Where many a frozen wretch was fast
Within the ice-clefts pent,
Yet living still, and doom'd to bear,
In absolute and dumb despair,
Their endless punishment.

16.
A voice then spake within his ear,
And fill'd his inmost soul with fear,—
"O mortal Man," it said,
"Adventurers like thyself were these!
He seem'd to feel his life-blood freeze,
And yet subdued his dread.

17.
"O mortal Man," the Voice pursued,
"Be wise in time! for thine own good
Alone I counsel thee;
Take pity on thyself; retrace
Thy steps, and fly this dolorous place,
While yet thy feet are free.

18.
"I warn thee once! I warn thee twice
Behold! that mass of mountain-ice
Is trembling o'er thy head!
One warning is allow'd thee more;
O mortal Man, that warning o'er,
And thou art worse than dead!"

19.
Not without fear, Sir Owen still Held on with strength of righteous will,
In faith and fervent prayer;
When at the word, "I warn thee thrice!"
Down came the mass of mountain ice,
And overwhelm'd him there.

20.
Crush'd though, it seem'd, in every bone,
And sense for suffering left alone,
A living hope remain'd;
In whom he had believed he knew,
And thence the holy courage grew
That still his soul sustain'd.

21.
For he, as he beheld it fall,
'Fail'd not in faith on Christ to call—
"Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried;
O' heavenly help vouchsafed in need,
When perfect faith is found indeed!
The rocks of ice divide.

22.
Like dust before the storm-wind's sway
The shivered fragments roll'd away,
And left the passage free;
New strength he feels; all pain is gone;
New life Sir Owen breathes; and on
He goes rejoicingly.

23.
Yet other trials he must meet;
For soon a close and piercing heat
24.
Along the wide and wasted land
A stream of fire, through banks of sand,
Its molten billows spread;
Thin vapors, tremulously light,
Hung quivering o'er the glowing white;
The air he breathed was red.

25.
A Paradise beyond was seen,
Of shady groves and gardens green,
Fair flowers and fruitful trees,
And flowing fountains cool and clear,
Whose gurgling music reach'd his ear,
Borne on the burning breeze.

26.
How should he pass that molten flood
While gazing wistfully he stood,
A Fiend, as in a dream,
"Thus!" answer'd the unutter'd thought,
Stretch'd forth a mighty arm, and caught
And cast him in the stream.

27.
Sir Owen groan'd; for then he felt
His eyeballs burn, his marrow melt,
His brain like liquid lead;
And from his heart the boiling blood
Its agonizing course pursued
Through limbs like iron red.

28.
Yet, giving way to no despair,
But mindful of the aid of prayer,
"Lord, Thou canst save!" he said;
And then a breath from Eden came
With life and healing through his frame
The blissful influence spread.

29.
No Fiends may now his way oppose;
The gates of Paradise unclose;
Free entrance there is given;
And songs of triumph meet his ear,
Enrapt, Sir Owen seems to hear
The harmonies of Heaven.

30.
"Come, Pilgrim! take thy foretaste meet,
Thou who hast trod with fearless feet
St. Patrick's Purgatory;
For after death these seats divine,
Reward eternal, shall be thine,
And thine eternal glory."

31.
Inebriate with the deep delight,
Dim grew the Pilgrim's swimming sight;
His senses died away;
And when to life he woke, before
The Cavern-mouth he saw once more
The light of earthly day.

THE CROSS ROADS.

The tragedy related in this Ballad happened about the year 1760, in the parish of Bedminster, near Bristol. One who was present at the funeral told me the story and the circumstances of the interment, as I have versified them.

There was an old man breaking stones
To mend the turnpike way;
He sat him down beside a brook,
And out his bread and cheese he took;
For now it was mid-day.

2.
He lean'd his back against a post;
His feet the brook ran by;
And there were water-cresses growing,
And pleasant was the water's flowing,
For he was hot and dry.

3.
A soldier, with his knapsack on,
Came travelling o'er the down;
The sun was strong, and he was tired;
And he of the old man inquired
"How far to Bristol town?"

4.
"Half an hour's walk for a young man,
By lanes, and fields, and stiles;
But you the foot-path do not know;
And if along the road you go,
Why, then 'tis three good miles."

5.
The soldier took his knapsack off,
For he was hot and dry;
And out his bread and cheese he took,
And he sat down beside the brook
To dine in company.

6.
"Old friend! in faith," the soldier says,
"I envy you, almost;
My shoulders have been sorely press'd,
And I should like to sit, and rest
My back against that post.

7.
"In such a sultry day as this,
A knapsack is the devil;
And if on't other side I sat,
It would not only spoil our chat,
But make me seem uncivil."
8. The old man laugh'd and moved. — "I wish it were a great-arm'd chair!
But this may help a man at need; —
And yet it was a cursed deed
That ever brought it there.

9. "There's a poor girl lies buried here,
Beneath this very place;
The earth upon her corpse is press'd,
This post was driven into her breast,
And a stone is on her face."

10. The soldier had but just lean'd back,
And now he half rose up.
"There's sure no harm in dining here,
My friend? and yet, to be sincere,
I should not like to sup."

11. "God rest her! she is still enough
Who sleeps beneath my feet!"
The old man cried. "No harm I trow,
She ever did herself, though now
She lies where four roads meet.

12. "I have past by about that hour
When men are not most brave;
It did not make my courage fail,
And I have heard the nightingale
Sing sweetly on her grave.

13. "I have past by about that hour
When ghosts their freedom have:
But here I saw no ghasty sight;
And quietly the glow-worm's light
Was shining on her grave.

14. "There's one who, like a Christian, lies
Beneath the church-tree's shade;
I'd rather go a long mile round,
Than pass at evening through the ground
Wherein that man is laid.

15. "A decent burial that man had,
The bell was heard to toll,
When he was laid in holy ground;
But for all the wealth in Bristol town
I would not be with his soul!

16. "Dost see a house below the hill
Which the winds and the rains destroy?
In that farm-house did that man dwell,
And I remember it full well
When a was a growing boy.

17. "But she was a poor parish girl,
Who came up from the west:
From service hard she ran away,
And at that house, in evil day,
Was taken into rest.

18. "A man of a bad name was he;
An evil life he led;
Passion made his dark face turn white,
And his gray eyes were large and light,
And in anger they grew red.

19. "The man was bad, the mother worse,
Bad fruit of evil stem;
'Twould make your hair to stand on end
If I should tell to you, my friend,
The things that were told of them!

20. "Didst see an out-house standing by?
The walls alone remain;
It was a stable then, but now
Its mossy roof has fallen through,
All rotted by the rain.

21. "This poor girl she had served with them
Some half-a-year or more,
When she was found hung up one day,
Stiff as a corpse, and cold as clay,
Behind that stable door.

22. "It is a wild and lonesome place;
No hut or house is near;
Should one meet a murderer there alone,
'Twere vain to scream, and the dying groan
Would never reach mortal ear.

23. "And there were strange reports about;
But still the coroner found
That she by her own hand had died,
And should buried be by the way-side,
And not in Christian ground.

24. "This was the very place he chose,
Just where these four roads meet,
And I was one among the throng
That hither follow'd them along;
I shall never the sight forget!

25. "They carried her upon a board
In the clothes in which she died,
I saw the cap blown off her head;
Her face was of a dark, dark red;
Her eyes were starting wide:
26. "I think they could not have been closed, So widely did they strain. O Lord, it was a ghastly sight, And it often made me wake at night, When I saw it in dreams again.

27. "They laid her where these four roads meet, Here in this very place. The earth upon her corpse was press'd, This post was driven into her breast, And a stone is on her face.'

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON A WICKED BISHOP.

Here followeth the History of HATTO, Archbishop of Mentz.

It hapned in the year 214, that there was an exceeding great famine in Germany; at what time Otto surnamed the Great was Emperor, and one Hatto, once Abbot of Fulda, was Archbishop of Mentz, of the Bishops after Crescens and Crescensius the two and thirtieth, of the Archbishops after St. Boniface the thirteenth. This Hatto in the time of this great famine afore-mentioned, when he saw the poor people of the country exceedingly oppressed with famine, assembled a great company of them together into a Barne, and, like a most accursed and merciless caltifi, burnt up those poor innocent souls, that were so far from doubting any such matter, that they rather hoped to receive some comfort and relief at his hands. The reason that moved the Prelate to commit that execrable impity was, because he thought the famine would the sooner cease, if those unprofitable beggars that consumed more bread than they were worthy to eat, were displaced out of the world. For he said that those poor folk were more like to Mice, that were good for nothing but to devour coree. But God Almighty, the just avenger of the poor folks' quarrel, did not long suffer this licencious tyranny, this most detestable fact, unpunished. For he mustered up an army of Mice against the Archbishop, and sent them to persecute him as his furious Attakors, so that they afflictèd him both day and night, and would not suffer him to take his rest in any place. Whereupon the Prelate, thinking that he should be secure from the injury of Mice if he were in a certain tower, that standeth in the Rhine near to the town, betook himself unto the said tower as to a safe refuge and sanctuary from his enemies, and locked himself in. But the innumerable omnipotence of Mice chased him continually very eagerly, and swarmed unto him upon the top of the water to execute the just judgment of God, and so at last he was most miserably devoured by these sifting creatures; who pursued him with such bitter hostility, that it is recorded they scraped and knewed out his very name from the walls and tapistry wherein it was written, after they had so cruelly devoured his body. Wherefore the tower wherein he was eaten up by the Mice is shewn to this day, for a perpetual monument to all succeeding ages of the barbarous and inhuman tyranny of this impious Prelate, being situate in a little green island in the mid-l of the Rhine near to the town of Bingen, and is commonly called in the German Tongue the MONE-TOXEN.

COWPER'S CRADLES, pp. 571, 572.

Other authors who recite this tale say that the Bishop was eaten by Rats.

The summer and autumn had been so wet, That in winter the corn was growing yet; "Twas a piteous sight, to see, all around, The grain lie rotting on the ground.

Every day the starving poor Crowded around Bishop Hatto's door, For he had a plentiful last-year's store, And all the neighborhood could tell His granaries were furnish'd well.

At last Bishop Hatto appointed a day To quiet the poor without delay; He bade them to his great Barn repair, And they should have food for the winter there Rejoiced such tidings good to hear, The poor folk flock'd from far and near; The great Barn was full as it could hold Of women and children, and young and old.

Then when he saw it could hold no more, Bishop Hatto he made fast the door, And while for mercy on Christ they call, He set fire to the Barn and burnt them all.

"I' faith, 'tis an excellent bonfire!" quoth he, And the country is greatly obliged to me, For ridding it in these times forlorn Of Rats that only consume the corn."

So then to his palace returned he, And he sat down to supper merrily, And he slept that night like an innocent man; But Bishop Hatto never slept again.

In the morning, as he enter'd the hall Where his picture hung against the wall, A sweat like death all over him came, For the Rats had eaten it out of the frame.

As he look'd, there came a man from his farm; He had a countenance white with alarm; "My Lord, I open'd your granaries this morn, And the Rats had eaten all your corn."

Another came running presently, And he was pale as pale could be, — "Fly! my Lord Bishop, fly," quoth he, "Ten thousand Rats are coming this way, — The Lord forgive you for yesterday!"

"I'll go to my tower on the Rhine," replied he, "'Tis the safest place in Germany; The walls are high, and the shores are steep, And the stream is strong, and the water deep."

Bishop Hatto fearfully hasten'd away, And he cross'd the Rhine without delay, And reach'd his tower, and bar'd with care All the windows, doors, and loop-holes there.

He laid him down and closed his eyes; — But soon a scream made him arise; He started, and saw two eyes of flame On li's pillow, from whence the screaming came.
The Pious Painter.

He listen'd and look'd;—it was only the Cat; But the Bishop he grew more fearful for that; For she sat screaming, made with fear At the Army of Rats that were drawing near.

For they have swam over the river so deep, And they have climb'd the shores so steep, And up the Tower their way is bent, To do the work for which they were sent.

They are not to be told by the dozen or score; By thousands they come, and by myriads and more. Such numbers had never been heard of before; Such a judgment had never been witness'd of yore.

Down on his knees the Bishop fell, And faster and faster his head did he tell, As louder and louder drawing near The gnawing of their teeth he could hear.

And in at the windows, and in at the door, And through the walls, helter-skelter they pour, And down from the ceiling, and up through the floor, From the right and the left, from behind and before, From within and without, from above and below, And all at once to the Bishop they go.

They have whetted their teeth against the stones; And now they pick the Bishop's bones; They gnaw'd the flesh from every limb, For they were sent to do judgment on him!

Westbury, 1799.

THE PIOUS PAINTER.

The legend of the Pious Painter is related in the Pia Hilaria of Gazzeus; but the Pious Poet has omitted the second part of the story, though it rests upon quite as good authority as the first. It is to be found in the Fabliau de La Grant.

THE FIRST PART.

1. There once was a painter, in Catholic days, Like Joe, who eschewed all evil; Still on his Madonnas the curious may gaze With applause and with pleasure; but chiefly his praise And delight was in painting the Devil.

2. They were Angels, compared to the Devils he drew, Who besieg'd poor St. Anthony's cell; Such burning hot eyes, such a furnace-like hue! And round them a sulphurous coloring he threw, That their breath seem'd of brimstone to smell.

3. And now had the artist a picture begun; 'Twas over the Virgin's church-door; She stood on the Dragon, embracing her Son; Many Devils already the artist had done, But this must outdo all before.

4. The Old Dragon's imps, as they fled through the air, At seeing it, paused on the wing; For he had the likeness so just to a hair, That they came as Apollon himself had been there, To pay their respects to their King.

5. Every child, at beholding it, trembled with dread, And scream'd as he turn'd away quick. Not an old woman saw it, but, raising her head, Dropp'd a head, made a cross on her wrinkles, and said, Lord, keep me from ugly Old Nick!

6. What the Painter so earnestly thought on by day, He sometimes would dream of by night; But once he was startled as sleeping he lay; 'Twas no fancy, no dream; he could plainly survey That the Devil himself was in sight.

7. "You rascally dauber!" old Beelzebub cries, "Take heed how you wrong me again! Though your caricatures for myself I despise, Make me handsomer now in the multitude's eyes, Or see if I threaten in vain!"

8. Now the Painter was bold, and religious beside, And on faith he had certain reliance; So carefully he the grim countenance eyed, And thank'd him for sitting, with Catholic pride, And sturdily bade him defiance.

9. Betimes in the morning the Painter arose; He is ready as soon as 'tis light. Every look, every line, every feature he knows; 'Tis fresh in his eye; to his labor he goes, And he has the old Wicked One quite.

10. Happy man! he is sure the resemblance can't fail; The tip of the nose is like fire; [mail, There's his grin and his fangs, and his dragon-like And the very identical curl of his tail,— So that nothing is left to desire.

11. He looks and retouches again with delight, 'Tis a portrait complete to his mind; And exulting again and again at the sight, He looks round for applause, and he sees with affright. The Original standing behind.

12. "Fool! Idiot!" old Beelzebub grinn'd as he spoke, And stamp'd on the scaffold in ire;
THE PIOUS PAINTER.

The Painter grew pale, for he knew it no joke
'Twas a terrible height, and the scaffolding broke,
The Devil could wish it no higher.

13.
"'He'l—help! Blessed Mary!" he cried in alarm,
As the scaffold sunk under his feet.
From the canvass the Virgin extended her arm;
She caught the good Painter; she saved him from harm;
There were hundreds who saw in the street.

14.
The Old Dragon fled when the wonder he spied,
And cursed his own fruitless endeavor;
While the Painter call'd after his rage to deride,
Shook his pallet and brushes in triumph, and cried,
"I'll paint thee more ugly than ever!"

THE SECOND PART.

1.
The Painter so pious all praise had acquired
For denying the malice of Hell;
The Monks the unerring resemblance admired;
Not a Lady lived near but her portrait desired
From a hand that succeeded so well.

2.
One there was to be painted the number among
Of features most fair to behold;
The country around of fair Marguerite rung;
Marguerite she was lovely, and lively, and young;
Her husband was ugly and old.

3.
O Painter, avoid her! O Painter, take care,
For Satan is watchful for you!
Take heed lest you fall in the Wicked One's snare;
The net is made ready; O Painter, beware
Of Satan and Marguerite too.

4.
She seats herself now; now she lifts up her head;
On the artist she fixes her eyes;
The colors are ready, the canvass is spread;
He lays on the white, and he lays on the red,
And the features of beauty arise.

He is come to her eyes, eyes so bright and so blue!
There's a look which he cannot express;—
His colors are dull to their quick-sparkling hue;
More and more on the lady he fixes his view;
On the canvass he looks less and less.

In vain he retouches; her eyes sparkle more,
And that look which fair Marguerite gave!

Many Devils the Artist had painted of yore,
But he never had tried a live Angel before,—
St. Anthony, help him and save!

7.
He yielded, alas! — for the truth must be told,—
To the Woman, the Tempter, and Fate.
It was settled the Lady, so fair to behold,
Should elope from her Husband, so ugly and old,
With the Painter, so pious of late.

Now Satan exults in his vengeance complete;
To the Husband he makes the scheme known;
Night comes, and the lovers impatiently meet;
Together they fly; they are seized in the street,
And in prison the Painter is thrown.

With Repentance, his only companion, he lies,
And a dismal companion is she!
On a sudden, he saw the Old Enemy rise,
"Now, you villainous dauber!" Sir Beelzebub cries,
"You are paid for your insults to me!"

10.
"But my tender heart you may easily move
If to what I propose you agree;
That picture, — be just! the resemblance improve;
Make a handsomer portrait; your chains I'll remove,
And you shall this instant be free."

11.
Overjoy'd, the conditions so easy he hears;
"I'll make you quite handsome!" he said.
He said, and his chain on the Devil appears;
Released from his prison, released from his fears,
The Painter is snug in his bed.

12.
At morn he arises, composes his look,
And proceeds to his work as before;
The people beheld him, the culprit they took;
They thought that the Painter his prison had broke,
And to prison they led him once more.

13.
They open the dungeon; — behold, in his place
In the corner old Beelzebub lay;
He smirks, and he smiles, and he leers with a grace,
That the Painter might catch all the charms of his face,
Then vanish'd in lightning away.

14.
Quoth the Painter, "I trust you'll suspect me no more,
Since you find my assertions were true.
But I'll alter the picture above the Church-door,
For he never vouchsafed me a sitting before,
And I must give the Devil his due."

Westbury, 1798.
ST. MICHAEL’S CHAIR.

"Know all men that the most Holy Father Gregory, in the year from the incarnation of our Lord 709, bearing an affection of extraordinary devoutness to the Church of St. Michael’s Mount, has piously granted to all the faithful who shall reach or visit it, with their obligations and alms, a remission of a third part of their penances." — At the beginning of the 15th century, "Because, it was said, this privilege is still unknown to many, therefore we the servants of God, and the ministers of this church in Christ, do require and request of all of you who possess the care of souls, for the sake of mutual accommodation, to publish these words in your respective churches; that your parishioners and subjects may be more carefully animated to a greater exhortation of devoutness, and may more gloriously in pilgrinages frequent this place, for the gracious attainment of the gifts and indulgencies aforesaid." From this publication of the privilege it undoubtedly commences that numerous resort of pilgrims to the church which Carew intimates; and of which Norden gives a general idea. It conforms to the more copious description of Carew, yet is not the enlarger of him, says, "The Mount hath been much resorted unto by pilgrims in devotion to St. Michael." Then too was framed assuredly that seat on the tower, which is so ridiculously described by Carew, as "little without the castle, somewhat in a craggy place — somewhat dangerous for access;" when it is a chair composed of stones projecting from the two sides of the tower battlements, and uniting into a kind of basin for a seat just at the south-western angle, but elevated above the battlements on each side, leaving its back just within, and hanging high over the rocky precipice below. It thus "appears somewhat dangerous," indeed, but not merely "for access," though the climber to it must actually turn his whole body at that altitude to take his seat in it, but from the altitude itself, and from its projection over the precipice. It also appears an evident addition to the building. And it was assuredly made at this period, not for the ridiculous purpose to which alone it professedly ministers at present; — that of enabling women who sit in it to govern their husbands afterwards; but for such of the pilgrims as had stronger heads, and bolder spirits, to complete their devotions at the Mount, by sitting in this St. Michael’s Chair, as denominated, and these showing themselves as pilgrims, to the country round. Hence, in an author who lends us information without knowing it, as he alludes to customs without feeling the force of them, we read this transient information:

Who knows not Michael’s Mount and Chair,
The pilgrim’s holy mount?

Norden also reëchoes Carew, in saying, "St. Michael’s chair is failed to be in the Mount." We thus find a reason for the construction of the chair, that comports with all the uses of the church on which it is constructed, and that ministered equally with this to the purposes of religion then predominant; a religion, dealing more in exteriors than our own, operating more than our own, through the body, upon the soul; and so leaving, perhaps, a more sensible impression upon the spirits. To sit in the chair then, was not merely, as Carew represents the act, "somewhat dangerous in the attempt, and therefore holy in the adventure," but also holy in itself, as on the church tower; more holy in its purposes, as the seat of the pilgrims; and most holy as the seat of a few in accomplishment of all their vows; as the chair of a few, in invitation of all the country. — Whitaker’s Supplement to the First and Second Book of Polwhele’s History of Cornwall, pp. 6, 7.

Merrily, merrily rung the bells,
The bells of St. Michael’s tower,
When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife
Arrived at St. Michael’s door.

Richard Penlake was a cheerful man,
Cheerful, and frank, and free;
But he led a sad life with Rebecca his wife,
For a terrible shrew was she.

Richard Penlake a scolding would take,
Till patience avail’d no longer;
Then Richard Penlake his crab-stick would take,
And show her that he was the stronger.

Rebecca his wife had often wish’d
To sit in St. Michael’s chair;
For she should be the mistress then,
If she had once sat there.

It chanced that Richard Penlake fell sick;
They thought he would have died;
Rebecca his wife made a vow for his life,
As she knelt by his bed-side.

"Now hear my prayer, St. Michael! and spare
My husband’s life," quoth she;
"And to thine altar we will go
Six marks to give to thee."

Richard Penlake repeated the vow,
For wondrously sick was he;
"Save me, St. Michael, and we will go
Six marks to give to thee."

When Richard grew well, Rebecca his wife
Teased him by night and by day:
"O mine own dear! for you I fear,
If we the vow delay."

Merrily, merrily rung the bells,
The bells of St. Michael’s tower,
When Richard Penlake and Rebecca his wife
Arrived at St. Michael’s door.

Six marks they on the altar laid,
And Richard knelt in prayer:
She left him to pray, and stole away
To sit in St. Michael’s chair.

Up the tower Rebecca ran,
Round, and round, and round;
"Twas a giddy sight to stand a-top,
And look upon the ground.

"A curse on the ringers for rocking
The tower!" Rebecca cried,
As over the church battlements
She strode with a long stride.

"A blessing on St. Michael’s chair!"
She said, as she sat down:
Merrily, merrily rung the bells,
And out Rebecca was thrown.

Tidings to Richard Penlake were brought
That his good wife was dead:
"Now shall we toll for her poor soul
The great church bell?" they said.
"Toll at her burying," quoth Richard Penlake,
"Toll at her burying," quoth he;
"But don't disturb the ringers now
In compliment to me."

KING HENRY V. AND THE HERMIT OF DREUX.

While Henry V. lay at the siege of Dreux, an honest Hermit, unknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought on Christendom by his unjust ambition, who usurped the kingdom of France, against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God; wherefore, in his holy name, he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment if he desisted not from his enterprise. Henry took this exhortation either as an idle whipping, or a suggestion of the dauphin's, and was but the more confirmed in his design. But the blow soon followed the threatening; for, within some few months after, he was smitten with a strange and incurable disease. — MESSY.

He pass'd unquestion'd through the camp;
Their heads the soldiers bent
In silent reverence, or begg'd
A blessing as he went;
And so the Hermit pass'd along,
And reached the royal tent.

King Henry sat in his tent alone;
The map before him lay;
Fresh conquests he was planning there
To grace the future day.

King Henry lifted up his eyes
The intruder to behold;
With reverence he the hermit saw;
For the holy man was old;
His look was gentle as a Saint's,
And yet his eye was bold.

"Repent thee, Henry, of the wrongs
Which thou hast done this land!
O King, repent in time, for know
The judgment is at hand.

"I have pass'd forty years of peace
Beside the river Blaise;
But what a weight of woe hast thou
Laid on my latter days!

"I used to see along the stream
The white sail gliding down,
That wafted food, in better times,
To yonder peaceful town.

"Henry! I never now behold
The white sail gliding down;
Famine, Disease, and Death, and Thou
Destroy that wretched town.

"I used to hear the traveller's voice
As here he pass'd along,
Or maiden, as she by her'd home
Singing her even-song.

"No traveller's voice may now be heard;
In fear he hastens by;
But I have heard the village maid
In vain for succor cry.

"I used to see the youths row down,
And watch the dripping oar,
As pleasantly their viol's tones
Came soft'en'd to the shore.

"King Henry, many a blacken'd corpse
I now see floating down!
Thou man of blood! repent in time,
And leave this leaguer'd town."

"I shall go on," King Henry cried,
"And conquer this good land;
Seest thou not, Hermit, that the Lord
Hath given it to my hand?"

The Hermit heard King Henry speak,
And angrily look'd down;—
His face was gentle, and for that
More solemn was his frown.

"What if no miracle from Heaven
The murderer's arm control;
Think you for that the weight of blood
Lies lighter on his soul?"

"Thou conqueror King, repent in time,
Or dread the coming woe!
For, Henry, thou hast heard the threat,
And soon shall feel the blow!"

King Henry forced a careless smile,
As the hermit went his way;
But Henry soon remember'd him
Upon his dying day.

OLD CHRISTOVAL'S ADVICE,
AND THE REASON WHY HE GAVE IT.

...
Old Christoval's Advice.

If thy debtor be poor," old Christoval said,
"Exact not too hardly thy due;
For he who preserves a poor man from want
May preserve him from wickedness too.

"If thy neighbor should sin," old Christoval said,
"O never unmerciful be;
But remember it is through the mercy of God
That thou art not as sinfull as he.

"At sixty-and-seven, the hope of Heaven
Is my comfort, through God's good grace;
My summons, in truth, had I perished in youth,
Must have been to a different place."

"You shall have the farm, young Christoval,"
My master Henrique said;
"But a surety provide, in whom I can confide,
That duly the rent shall be paid."

I was poor, and I had not a friend upon earth,
And I knew not what to say;
We stood in the porch of St. Andrew's Church,
And it was St. Isidro's day.

"Take St. Isidro for my pledge,"
I ventured to make reply;
"The Saint in Heaven may be my friend,
But friendless on earth am I."

We enter'd the Church, and went to his shrine,
And I fell on my bended knee —
I am friendless, holy Isidro,
And therefore I call upon thee!

"I call upon thee my surety to be;
My purpose is honest and true;
And if ever I break my plighted word,
O Saint, mayst thou make me rue!"

I was idle, and quarter-day came on,
And I had not the rent in store;
I fear'd St. Isidro's anger,
But I dreaded my landlord more.

So, on a dark night, I took my flight,
And stole like a thief away;
It happen'd that by St. Andrew's Church
The road I had chosen lay.

As I past the Church door, I thought how I swore Upon St. Isidro's day;
That the Saint was so near increased my fear,
And faster I hasten'd away.

So all night long I hurried on,
Pacing full many a mile,
And knew not his avenging hand
Was on me all the while.

Weary I was, yet safe, I thought;
But when it was day-light,
I had, I found, been running round
And round the Church all night.

I shook like a palsy, and fell on my knees,
And for pardon devoutly I pray'd;
When my master came up — "What, Christoval!
You are here betimes!" he said.

"I have been idle, good Master," said I,
"Good Master, and I have done wrong;
And I have been running round the Church
In penance all night long."

"If thou hast been idle," Henrique replied,
"Henceforth thy fault amend!
I will not oppress thee, Christoval,
And the Saint may thy labor befriend."

Homeward I went a penitent,
And from that day I idled no more;
St. Isidro bless'd my industry,
As he punish'd my sloth before.

"When my debtor was poor," old Christoval said,
"I have never exacted my due;
But remembering my master was good to me,
I copied his goodness too.

"When my neighbor hath sinn'd," old Christoval said,
"I judged not too hardly his sin,
But thought of the night by St. Andrew's Church,
And consider'd what I might have been."

CorNELIUS AGrippa;
A BALLaD,
OF A YOUNG MAN THAT WOULD READ UNLAWLful BOOKS, AND HOW HE WAS PUNISHED.

Very pithy and profitable.

CorNELIUS Agrippa went out one day;
His Study he lock'd ere he went away,
And he gave the key of the door to his wife,
And charged her to keep it lock'd on her life.

"And if any one ask my Study to see,
I charge you to trust them not with the key;
Whoever may beg, and entreat, and implore,
on your life let nobody enter that door."

There lived a young man in the house, who in vain
Access to that Study had sought to obtain;
And he begg'd and pray'd the books to see,
Till the foolish woman gave him the key.

On the Study-table a book there lay,
Which Agrippa himself had been reading that day;
The letters were written with blood therein,
And the leaves were made of dead men's skin:—
And these horrible leaves of magic between
Were the ugliest pictures that ever were seen,
The likeness of things so foul to behold,
That what they were is not fit to be told.

The young man he began to read
He knew not what; but he would proceed,
When there was heard a sound at the door
Which, as he read on, grew more and more.
And more and more the knocking grew;
The young man knew not what to do;
But, trembling, in fear he sat within,
Till the door was broke, and the Devil came in.

Two hideous horns on his head he had got,
Like iron heated nine times red-hot;
The breath of his nostrils was brimstone blue,
And his tail like a fiery serpent grew.

"What wouldst thou with me?" the Wicked One cried,
But not a word the young man replied;
Every hair on his head was standing upright,
And his limbs like a palsy shook with affright.

"What wouldst thou with me?" cried the Author of ill;
But the wretched young man was silent still;
Not a word had his lips the power to say,
And his narrow seem'd to be melting away.

"What wouldst thou with me?" the third time he cries,
And a flash of lightning came from his eyes,
And he lifted his griffin claw in the air,
And the young man had not strength for a prayer.

His eyes red fire and fury dart
As out he tore the young man's heart;
He gninn'd a horrible grin at his prey;
And in a clap of thunder vanish'd away.

THE MORAL
Henceforth let all young men take heed
How in a Conjurer's books they read.

Wealbury, 1728.

KING CHARLEMAIN.

François Petrarch, fort renommé entre les Poëtes Italiens, discouvrant en un epître son voyage de France et de l'Alsace, ne nous rassure que passant par la ville d'Air, il apprit de quelques Pretsres une histoire prodigieuse qu'ils tenoient de main en main pour tre veritable. Qui estoit que Charles le Grand, apres avoir avoic besoigné plusieurs pays, s'apprêtait de telle façon en l'amour d'une simple femme, que mettant tout honneur et reputation en seurice, il abolit non seulement les affaires de sa royance, mais aussi le song of sa propre personne, au grand desavantage de chacun: cetait seulement extraordi d'courttuer cette dame; laquelle por bonheur commençoit a s'alterer d'une grave maladie, qui lui apparti la mort. Donc les Princes royal et grands Siecours furent fort rejueus, esperans que par cette mort, Charles reprendroit sainne devant et ses espais et les affaires du royance en main; toutsains se furent tellement infatué de cette amon, qu'eucoirs cherissant-il ce caualier, de l'embrassant, basain, acceulant de la mesure façon que devant, et au lieu de preter l'oreille aux legations qui luy servoient, il estretenant de mille hayer, comme selle enco état pleine de vie.
Ce corps commença do je no seulement à mal sentir, mais aussi tournoyant en paterfutation, et avancaino n'ayant aucou de ses
favoris qui fuyoit en coust parler; dont admis que l'Archeveche Torpyn miso aduot que les autres, poursoins que telle chose ne pouvoit cue devenir sans quelque secrélle. Au moyen depuis envoyant un jour l'huerre que le Roy s'etoit absenti de la chambre, commençoit de fouillier le corps de toutes parts, finalement trouva dans au boucher des desvins un cancre que luy estoit.
Le jour mesnme Charlemain retournoit sur ses premiers affaires, se trouva fort incommode de voir une course aussi puissante. Pourquo, comme dill se fust recueilli d'un profond souffic, commando que l'Ennencellest prestamente.
Ce qui fut fait; mais en contre exchague de cette foile, il tourno
tous ses penseans vers l'Archeveche pourtre de cet ennu, ne pouvant entre de là en avant sans la, et le voirent tous en tous les endroits. Quoy coyant ce sige Prélato, et criantque dest l'ennui ne tembroit en mains de quelque autre, le jetto dans un lac prochaine de la ville. Depuis lequel temps on dit de ce Roy se trouvoit si lepens de l'amour du lieu, qu'il ne se desvigno du de la ville d'Air, où il instalo un Palace, et un Mo nasteiro, en luy despelloit il porfit le reste de ses jours, et en l'autre couval estre envoyé, ordonna que sur testament que tous les Empereurs de Rome euvanto se faire arcer premiers ment en ce lieu. — PASQUIER. Recherches de la France.
L. 6, C. 33.

This very learned author has strangely mistaken Aix in Savoy, the real scene of the legend, for Aix-la-Chapelle. The rules of a buliding said to have been Charlemain's palace are still to be seen on the Lake of Bouget.

Ir was strange that he loved her, for youth was gone
And the bloom of her beauty was fled: by,
'Twas the glance of the harlot that gleam'd in her eye,
And all but the Monarch could plainly desery
From whence came her white and her red.

Yet he thought with Agatha none might compare,
And he gladdened in hearing her chun;
The court was a desert if she were not there;
To him she alone among women seem'd fair,
Such dotage possess'd Charlemain.

3.
The soldier, the statesman, the curier, the maid,
Alike the proud leman detest;
And the good old Archbishop, who ceased to up-
braid,
Shook his gray head in sorrow, and silently pray'd
That he soon might consign her to rest.

A joy ill-dissembled soon gladdens them all,
For Agatha sickens and dies.
And now they are ready with bier and with pall;
The tapers gleam gloomy amid the high hall,
And the strains of the requiem arise.

But Charlemain sent them in anger away,
For she should not be buried, he said;
And despite of all counsel, for many a day,
Where array'd in her costly apparel she lay,
The Monarch would sit by the dead.

6.
The cares of the kingdom demand him in vain,
And the array cry out for their lord;
The Lombards, the fierce misbelievers of Spain,
Now ravage the realms of the proud Charlemain,
And still he unsheaths not the sword.

7.
The soldiers they clamor, the Monks bend in prayer
In the quiet retreats of the cell;
The physicians to counsel together repair,
And with common consent, one and all they declare
That his senses are bound by a spell.

Then, with relics protected, and confident grown,
And telling devoutly his beads,
The good old Archbishop, when this was made known,
Steals in when he hears that the corpse is alone,
And to look for the spell he proceeds.

9.
He searches with care, though with tremulous haste,
For the spell that bewitches the king;
And under her tongue, for security placed,
Its margin with mystical characters traced,
At length he discovers a ring.

10.
Rejoicing he seized it, and hasten'd away;
The Monarch reenter'd the room;
The enchantment was ended, and, suddenly gay,
He bade the attendants no longer delay,
But bear her with speed to the tomb.

11.
Now merriment, joyance, and feasting again
Enliven'd the palace of Aix;
And now by his heralds did King Charlemain
Invite to his palace the courtier train
To hold a high festival day.

12.
And anxiously now for the festival day
The highly-born Maidens prepare;
And now, all apparel'd in costly array,
Exulting they come to the palace of Aix,
Young and aged, the brave and the fair.

13.
Oh! happy the Damsel who, 'mid her compeers,
For a moment engaged the King's eye!

Now glowing with hopes, and now fever'd with fears,
Each maid or triumphant or jealous appears,
As noticed by him, or pass'd by.

14.
And now, as the evening approach'd, to the ball
In anxious suspense they advance,
Hoping each on herself that the King's choice
might fall,
When, lo! to the utter confusion of all,
He ask'd the Archbishop to dance.

15.
The damsels they laugh, and the barons they stare;
'Twas mirth and astonishment all;
And the Archbishop started, and mutter'd a prayer,
And, wroth at receiving such mockery there,
In haste he withdrew from the hall.

16.
The moon dimpled over the water with light
As he wander'd along the lake side;
But the King had pursued, and, o'erjoyed at his sight,
"Oh turn thee, Archbishop, my joy and delight,
Oh turn thee, my charmer," he cried.

17.
"Oh come where the feast, and the dance, and the song,
Invite thee to mirth and to love;
Or at this happy moment, away from the throng,
To the shade of yon wood let us hasten along,—
The moon never pierces that grove."

18.
As thus by new madness the King seem'd possess'd,
In new wonder the Archbishop heard;
Then Charlemain warmly and eagerly press'd
The good old man's poor, wither'd hand to his breast,
And kiss'd his long, gray, grizzle beard.

19.
"Let us well, then, these fortunate moments employ!"
Cried the Monarch with passionate tone;
"Come away then, dear charmer,— my angel,— my joy,—
Nay, struggle not now,— tis in vain to be coy,—
And remember that we are alone."

20.
"Blessed Mary, protect me!" the Archbishop cried;
"What madness has come to the King!"
In vain to escape from the monarch he tried,
When luckily he on his finger copied
The glitter of Agatha's ring.

21.
Overjoy'd, the good prelate remember'd the spell,
And far in the lake flung the ring;
The waters closed round it, and wondrous to tell, Released from the cursed enchantment of hell, His reason return'd to the King.

22.
But he built him a palace there close by the bay, And there did he love to remain; And the traveller who will, may behold at this day A monument still in the ruins at Aix Of the spell that possesse'd Charlemain.

ST. ROMUALD.

Les Catalans ayant appris que S. Romuald vouloit quitter leurs pages, en firent très-affligés; ils délibérèrent sur les moyens de l'en empêcher, et le seul qu'ils imaginèrent comme le plus sûr, fut de le tuer, afin de prévenir le mal de ses relèves et des guerriers et autres malheurs qu'elles opprêtaient après sa mort.
La détermination que les Catalans arrêtèrent, ne fut point du tout à S. Romuald: il usou de stratagèmes et leur répondit.—
St. Forx, Essais Historiques sur Paris.—T. 5, p. 163.

St. Fox, who is often more amusing than trustworthy, has fathered this story upon the Spaniards, though it belongs to his own countrymen, the circumstances having happened when Romuald was a monk of the Convent of St. Michael's, in Aquitaine. It is thus related by Yepes. En esta ocasión medió una cosa bien extraordinaria, porque los naturales de la tierra donde estaba el monasterio de San Miguel, estuvieron en tanto a San Romuald, que fallando las peticiones de que sequiesen ya, dijeron en un terrible despotismo, a quiere llama mayor que San Pedro Domínguez. Pues si, piedad cruel:
porque queriéndolo se San Romuald, determinaron de matarlo, porque no que el dios en su tierra viera, almenas posesión de sus religiosos y cuerpo santo. Según San Romuald la determinación burló y inducto de aquella gente; y tomó una prudente resolución, porque imitando a David, que fagio que estuviera, por no mor en manos de sus enemigos, así San Romuald se hizo nacer la cabeza, y con algunas adivinanzas, y palabras muy atentadas que decía, le tuvieron por hombre que tenía en falso el falso, con que se aseguraron los naturales de la tierra que ya perpetuamente se traducían en ella: y con semejante estratagema y trago el suyo lugar San Romuald de husturar, y a conciencia topados (como dicen) luego de aquella tierra, y llegar a Italia a la ciudad de Rávena.

Coronary General de la Orden de San Bento.—T. 5, ff. 374.

Villejas in his Elia Sanctorum, (February 7th,) records some of St. Romuald's achievements against the Devil and his imps. He records also the other virtues of the Saint, as specified in the poem. They are more fully stated by Yepes.
Teina tres civilías, les avance madera de tronco en tronco días; los labore, sino pimientos al agrav, y á la que llaman, con que se sostuvieron algunos inaudacios, que se criaron en ellos.—ff. 395. Quando algunos ves era tentado de la guía, y decía cosa de algun manjar, tomarle en las manos, mui

There is a free translation of this poem, by Biddlebirk, in the second volume of his Kurztragen, p. 115.

One day, it matters not to know How many hundred years ago, A Frenchman stopp'd at an inn door: The Landlord came to welcome him, and chat Of this and that, For he had seen the Traveller there before.

"Doth holy Romuald dwell Still in his cell?"
The Traveller ask'd, "or is the old man dead?"
"No; he has left his loving flock, and we
So great a Christian never more shall see,"
The Landlord answer'd, and he shook his head.

"Ah, sir, we knew his worth! If ever there did live a Saint on earth!—
Why, Sir, he always used to wear a shirt For thirty days, all seasons, day and night; Good man, he knew it was not right For Dust and Ashes to fall out with Dirt;
And then he only hung it out in the rain, And put it on again.

"There has been perilous work With him and the Devil there in yonder cell;
For Satan used to mail him like a Turk.
There they would sometimes fight All through a winter's night,
He with a cross, the Devil with his horn;
The Devil spitting fire, with might and main, Enough to make St. Michael half afraid;
He splashing holy water till he made
His red hide hiss again,
And the hot vapor fill'd the smoking cell.
This was so common that his face became
All black and yellow with the brimstone flame,
And then he smelt,—O Lord! how he did smell!

"Then, Sir! to see how he would mortify
The flesh! If any one had dainty fare,
Good man, he would come there,
And look at all the delicate things, and cry
'O Belly, Belly,
You would be gormandizing now, I know;
But it shall not be so!—
Home to your bread and water—home, I tell ye!'

"But," quoth the Traveller, "wherefore did he leave
A flock that knew his saintly worth so well?"
"Why," said the Landlord, "Sir, it so befall
He heard unluckily of our intent
To do him a great honor; and, you know,
He was not covetous of fame below,
And so stealthily one night away he went."

"What might this honor be?" the Traveller cried.
"Why, Sir," the host replied,
"We thought perhaps that he might one day leave us;
And then should strangers have
The good man's grave,
A loss like that would naturally grieve us;
For he'll be made a Saint of, to be sure.
Therefore we thought it prudent to secure
His relics while we might;
And so we meant to strangle him one night"—

Westbury. 1798.
THE KING OF THE CROCODILES.

The people at Isna, in Upper Egypt, have a superstition concerning Crocodiles similar to that entertained in the West Indies; they say there is a King of them who resides near Isna, and who has ears, but no tail; and he possesses an uncommon regal quality, that of doing no harm. Some are bold enough to assert that they have seen him.—Brown's Travels.

If the Crocodile Dynasty in Egypt had been described as distinguished by a long neck, as well as the want of a tail, it might be supposed that some tradition of the Ichthyosaurus, or other variety of the Plesiosaurus, was preserved in those countries.

No one who has perused Mr. Waterton's Wanderings will think there is anything more extraordinary in the woman's attack upon her intended devourer, than in what that enterprising and most observant naturalist has himself performed. He has ridden a Crocodile, twisting the huge reptile's fore legs on his back by main force, and using them as a bridge.

"Should it be asked," he says, "how I managed to keep my seat, I would answer, I hunted some years with Lord Darlington's fox-hounds."

There is a translation of this ballad by Bilderdijk, published in his Krefbataengen, 1825, vol. ii. p. 109, before the second part was written.

PART I.

"Now, Woman, why without your veil? And wherefore do you look so pale? And, Woman, why do you groan so sadly, And wherefore beat your bosom madly?"

"Oh! I have lost my darling boy, In whom my soul had all its joy; And I for sorrow have torn my veil, And sorrow hath made my very heart pale.

"Oh, I have lost my darling child, And that's the loss that makes me wild; He stoop'd to the river down to drink, And there was a Crocodile by the brink.

"He did not venture in to swim; He only stoop'd to drink at the brim; But under the reeds the Crocodile lay, And struck with his tail, and swept him away.

"Now take me in your boat, I pray, For down the river lies my way, And me to the Reed Island bring, For I will go to the Crocodile King.

"He reigns not now in Crocodilople, Proud as the Turk at Constantinople; No ruins of his great City remain, The Island of Reeds is his whole domain.

"Like a Dervise there he passes his days, Turns up his eyes, and fasts and prays; And being grown pious, and meek, and mild, He now never eats man, woman, or child.

"The King of the Crocodiles never does wrong: He has no tail, so stiff and strong; He has no tail to strike and slay, But he has ears to hear what I say.

"And to the King I will complain How my poor child was wickedly slain; The King of the Crocodiles he is good, And I shall have the murderer's blood."

The man replied, "No, Woman, no, To the Island of Reeds I will not go; I would not for any worldly thing See the face of the Crocodile King."

"Then lend me now your little boat, And I will down the river float. I tell thee that no worldly thing Shall keep me from the Crocodile King.

"The King of the Crocodiles he is good, And therefore will give me blood for food; Being so mighty and so just, He can revenge me; he will, and he must."

The Woman she leap'd into the boat, And down the river alone did she float; And fast with the stream the boat proceeds; And now she is come to the Island of Reeds.

The King of the Crocodiles there was seen; He sat upon the eggs of the Queen; And all around, a numerous rout, The young Prince Crocodiles crawl'd about.

The Woman shook every limb with fear, As she to the Crocodile King came near; For never man without fear and awe The face of his Crocodile Majesty saw.

She fell upon her bended knee, And said, "O King, have pity on me, For I have lost my darling child, And that's the loss that makes me wild.

"A Crocodile ate him for his food; Now let me have the murderer's blood; Let me have vengeance for my boy, The only thing that can give me joy.

"I know that you, Sire! never do wrong; You have no tail, so stiff and strong, You have no tail to strike and slay, But you have ears to hear what I say."

"You have done well," the King replies, And fixed on her his little eyes; "Good Woman, yes, you have done right, But you have not described me quite.

"I have no tail to strike and slay, And I have ears to hear what you say; I have teeth, moreover, as you may see, And I will make a meal of thee."

Bristol, 1799.
PART II.

Wicked the word, and bootless the boast,
As cruel King Crocodile found to his cost;
And proper reward of tyrannical might,
He show’d his teeth, but he mis’d his bite.

"A meal of me!" the Woman cried,
Taking wit in her anger, and courage beside;
She took him his forelegs and hind between,
And trundled him off the eggs of the Queen.

To revenge herself then she did not fail;
He was slow in his motions for want of a tail;
But well for the Woman was it, the while,
That the Queen was gadding abroad in the Nile.

Two Crocodile Princes, as they play’d on the sand,
She caught, and grasping them one in each hand,
Thrust the head of one into the throat of the other,
And made each Prince Crocodile choke his brother.

And when she had truss’d three couple this way,
She carried them off, and hasten’d away,
And plying her ears with might and main,
Cross’d the river, and got to the shore again.

When the Crocodile Queen came home, she found
That her eggs were broken and scattered around,
And that six young Princes, darlings all,
Were missing, for none of them answer’d her call.

Then many a not very pleasant thing
Pass’d between her and the Crocodile King:
"Is this your care of the nest?" cried she.
"It comes of your gadding abroad," said he.

The Queen had the better in this dispute,
And the Crocodile King found it best to be mute,
While a terrible peal in his ears she rung,
For the Queen had a tail as well as a tongue.

In woful patience he let her rail,
Standing less in fear of her tongue than her tail,
And knowing that all the words which were spoken
Could not mend one of the eggs that were broken.

The Woman, meantime, was very well pleased;
She had saved her life, and her heart was ease;
The justice she ask’d in vain for her son,
She had taken herself, and six for one.

"Mash-Allah!" her neighbors exclaim’d in delight.
She gave them a funeral supper that night,
Where they all agreed that revenge was sweet,
And young Prince Crocodiles delicate meat.

THE ROSE.

Betwixt the Cypess and the Chiche of Bethlem, is the felds Floridus, that is to sayne, the felds Borsched. For as mooche as a fye Mayden was blamed with wrong and scheul’d, that scho hold don furnacions, for whiche cause scho was dened to the strike, and to be bent in that place, to the whiche she was ladd. And as the fye began to brenne about hire, she made her prayere to oure Lord, that a she wisely as sche was not gyftly of that syne, that he wold help hire, and make it to be known to alle men of his mercyeful grace: and whomme sche had thus seyd, she entered into the fayer, and aton was the fayer quenched and out, and the brodenes that weren brongynge became white Roseres, fulle of roses, and theire weren the first Roseres and rosees, both white and rede, that every one man sauge.
And thus was this Maiden saved by the grace of God.—
The Voiage and Travaille of Sir John Maunderell.

Nay, Edith! spare the Rose;—perhaps it lives,
And feels the noontide sun, and drinks refresh’d
The dews of night; let not thy gentle hand
Tear its life-strings asunder, and destroy
The sense of being!—Why that infidel smile?
Come, I will brie thee to be merciful;
And thou shalt have a tale of other days,—
For I am skill’d in legendary lore,—
So thou wilt let it live. There was a time
Ere this, the freshest, sweetest flower that blooms,
Bedeck’d the bowers of earth. Thou hast not heard
How first by miracle its fragrant leaves
Spread to the sun their blushing loveliness.

There dwelt in Bethlehem a Jewish maid,
And Zillah was her name, so passing fair
That all Judea spake the virgin’s praise.
He who had seen her eye’s dark radiance
How it reveal’d her soul, and what a soul
Beam’d in the mild effulgence, woe to him!
For not in solitude, for not in crowds,
Might he escape remembrance, nor avoid
Her imaged form, which followed every where,
And filled the heart, and fix’d the absent eye.
Alas for him! her bosom own’d no love
Save the strong arduous of religious zeal,
For Zillah on her God had centred all
Her spirit’s deep affections. So for her
Her tribes-men sigh’d in vain, yet reverenced
The obdurate virtue that destroy’d their hopes.

One man there was, a vain and wretched man,
Who saw, desired, despair’d, and hated her.
His sensual eye had glowed on her cheek
Even till the flush of angry modesty
Gave it new charms, and made him gloat the more.
She loathed the man; for Hamuel’s eye was bold,
And the strong workings of brute selfishness
Had moulded his broad features; and she fear’d
The bitterness of wounded vanity
That with a fiendish hue would overcast
His faint and lying smile. Nor vain her fear;
For Hamuel vow’d revenge, and laid a plot
Against her virgin fame. He spread abroad
Whispers that travel fast, and ill reports
That soon obtain belief; how Zillah’s eye,
When in the temple heaven-ward it was raised,
Did swim with rapturous zeal, but there were those
Who had beheld the enthusiast’s melting glance
With other feelings fill’d;—that’t was a task
Of easy sort to play the saint by day
Before the public eye, but that all eyes
Were closed at night;—that Zillah's life was foul,
Yea, forfeit to the law.

Shame,—shame to man,
That he should trust so easily the tongue
Which stabs another's fame! The ill report
Was heard, repeated, and believed, and soon,—
For Hamuel, by his well-schooled villany,
Produced such semblances of guilt,—the Maid
Was to the fire condemn'd.

Without the walls,
There was a barren field; a place abhor'd,
For it was there where wrecked criminals
Receiv'd their death; and there they fix'd the stake,
And piled the fuel round, which should consume
The injured Maid, abandon'd, as it seem'd,
By God and Man. The assembled Bethlehmites
Beheld the scene, and when they saw the Maid
Bound to the stake, with what calm holiness
She lift up her patient looks to Heaven,
They doubted of her guilt. With other thoughts
Stood Hamuel near the pile; him savage joy
Led thitherward, but now within his heart
Unwonted feelings stirr'd, and the first pangs
Of wakening guilt, anticipant of Hell.
The eye of Zillah, as it glanced around,
Fell on the slanderer once, and rested there
A moment; like a dagger that did pierce,
And struck into his soul a cureless wound.

Conscience! thou God within us! not in the hour
Of triumph dost thou spare the guilty wretch;
Not in the hour of infancy and death
For sake the virtuous! They draw near the stake,—
They bring the torch!—hold, hold your erring hands!

Yet quench the rising flames!—they rise! they spread!
They reach the suffering Maid! oh God protect
The innocent one!

They rose, they spread, they raged;—
The breath of God went forth; the ascending fire
Beneath its influence bent, and all its flames
In one long lightning-flash concentrating,
Darted and blasted Hamuel,—him alone.

Hark!—what a fearful scream the multitude
Poured forth!—and yet more miracles! the stake
Branches and buds, and, spreading, its green leaves,
Emborders and canopies the innocent Maid,
Who there stands glorified; and Roses, then
First seen on earth since Paradise was lost,
Profusely blossom round her, white and red,
In all their rich variety of hues;
And fragrance such as our first parents breathed
In Eden she inhales, vouchsafed to her
A presage sure of Paradise regain'd.

THE LOVER'S ROCK.

De la Peña de los Enamorados.

Un moço Christiana estuvo cansado en Granada, sus partes y diligencia eran tales, en buen termino y cortesia, que su amo havia mucha confianza del dentro y fuera de su casa. Una hija suya al tanto se le ofreció y puso en el apos. Pero como quería que ella fuera casadera, y el moço encerro, no podía persuadir adelante como deseaban; en el amor mal se puede cubrir, y tienen si el padre dílo, y uno dílo, la suya, pagan-ían con las cabezas. Acordaron de huir a tierra de Christianos, resolución que al moço veía mejor, por haberle a las suyas, que a ella por desvanecerse de su patria: si ya no la movía el deseo de huirse Christians, la que ya no creo. Tuvieron su camino con ardor secreto, hasta llegar al peñasco ya dicho, en que la moço causada se puso a reposar. En esto vieron asomar a su padre con gema de avaricia, que veían su seguimiento.

¿Qué podían hacer, a qué quería bañarse? lo cual empezaron a manifestar las esperanzas de los hombres y miserables sus inten-
tos. Acordaron a lo que ellos querían de encubrir aquel peligro, trependo por aquellas risas, que era reaparecer aquello falso. El padre con un semblante sinuado los buscaba; amen-azar los sin obedecerlos de escoger en ellos una muerte muy cruel. Los que acompañaban al padre las mostraron lo mismo, pues solo las restaba aquella esperanza de alcanzar perdas de la misericordia de su padre, con hacer lo que les mandaba, y rebarbarlos a los peines. No quisieron venir en esta. Los Moros puestos a pie acompañaron a su padre: pero el moço les defendió la suya con galgos, piedras y palos, y toda la dema que le venía a la mano, y sello de armas en aquella desepe-ación. El padre visto esto, hizo erizar de un pueble alto cerca vallerreros para que de los los sollechasen. Ellos vistos su perdición, acordaron con su muerte hermano de los desnudos
y tormentados mayores que tenían. Los palabras que en este trance se disieron, no ay poco que relatrías. Finalmente abrazados entre sí, se hizieron después de el padre absos, por aquella parte en que los miraba su crudo y asimismo padre. Desde esta parte esperaron antes de llegar a lo barco, con lastima de los presentes, y aun con lágrimas de algunos que se morían con aquel trieste
expectancia de aquella mazga desgraciada, y a pesar del padre, cuando eran, los estuvieron en aquel mismo lugar; constancia que se empleara mejor en otra hechiza, y los fuera bien contada la muerte, si la protejiero por su virtud y en defensa de la verdadera religión, y no por satisfacer a sus apetitos desenfrenados

MARINA

The Maiden, through the favoring night,
From Granada took her flight;
She bade her Father's house farewell,
And fled away with Manuel.

No Moorish maid might hope to vie
With Laila's cheek or Laila's eye;
No maiden loved with purer truth,
Or ever loved a lovelier youth.

In fear they fled, across the plain,
The father's wrath, the captive's chain;
In hope to Seville on they flee,
To peace, and love, and liberty.

Beneath a precipice's brow,
Where Guadalhorce winds its way,
There in the shade awhile they lay;—

For now the sun was near its height,
And she was weary with her flight;
She laid her head on Mannel's breast,
And pleasant was the maiden's rest.

While thus the lovely Laila slept,
A fearful watch young Manuel kept.
Alas! her Father and his train
He sees come speeding o'er the plain.
The Maiden started from her sleep;
They sought for refuge up the steep;
To scale the precipice’s brow
Their only hope of safety now.

But them the angry Father sees;
With voice and arm he menaces;
And now the Moors approach the steep;
Loud are his curses, loud and deep.

Then Manuel’s heart grew wild with woe;
He loosen’d stones and roll’d below;
He loosen’d crags; for Manuel strove
For life, and liberty, and love.

The ascent was perilous and high;
The Moors they durst not venture nigh;
The fugitives stood safely there;
They stood in safety and despair.

The Moorish chief unmoved could see
His daughter bend her suppliant knee;
He heard his child for pardon plead,
And swore the offenders both should bleed.

He bade the archers bend the bow,
And make the Christian fall below;
He bade the archers aim the dart,
And pierce the Maid’s apostate heart.

The archers aim’d their arrows there;
She clasp’d young Manuel in despair;
“Death, Manuel, shall set us free!
Then leap below, and die with me.”

He clasp’d her close, and cried, Farewell!
In one another’s arms they fell;
And falling o’er the rock’s steep side,
In one another’s arms they died.

And side by side they there are laid,
The Christian youth and Moorish maid;
But never Cross was planted there,
Because they perish’d for despair.

Yet every Moorish maid can tell
Where Laila lies, who loved so well;
And every youth, who passes there,
Says for Manuel’s soul a prayer.

GARCI FERRANDEZ.

This story, which later historians have taken some pains to disprove, may be found in the Cronica General de España.

PART I.

Is an evil day and an hour of woe
Did Garci Ferrandez wed?

He wedded the Lady Argentine,
As ancient stories tell;
He loved the Lady Argentine,
Ahs! for what beliel!
The Lady Argentine hath fled;
In an evil day and an hour of woe
She hath left the husband who loved her well,
To go to Count Aymeric’s bed.

2.
Garci Ferrandez was brave and young,
The comeliest of the land;
There was never a knight of Leon in fight
Who could meet the force of his matchless might;
There was never a foe in the infidel band
Who against his dreadful sword could stand;
And yet Count Garci’s strong right hand
Was shapely, and soft, and white;
As white and as soft as a lady’s hand
Was the hand of the beautiful knight.

3.
In an evil day and an hour of woe
To Garci’s Hall did Count Aymeric go;
In an evil hour and a luckless night
From Garci’s Hall did he take his flight,
And bear with him that lady bright,
That lady false, his bale and bane.

There was feasting and joy in Count Aymeric’s bower,
When he, with triumph, and pomp, and pride,
Brought home the adulteress like a bride:
His daughter only sat in her tower;
She sat in her lonely tower alone,
And for her dead mother she made her moan;
“Methinks,” said she, “my father for me
Might have brought a bridegroom home.
A stepmother he brings hither instead;
Count Aymeric will not his daughter should wed,
But he brings home a leman for his own bed.”

So thoughts of good and thoughts of ill
Were working thus in Abba’s will;
And Argentine, with evil intent,
Ever to work her woe was bent;
That still she sat in her tower alone,
And in that melancholy gloom,
When for her mother she made her moan,
She wish’d her father too in the tomb.

4.
She watches the pilgrims and poor who wait
For daily food at her father’s gate.
“I would some Knight were there,” thought she,
“Disguised in pilgrim-weeds for me!
For Aymeric’s blessing I would not stay,
Nor he nor his leman should say me nay,
But I with him would wend away.”

5.
She watches her handmaid the pittance deal;
They took their dole and went away;
But yonder is one who lingers still;
As though he had something in his will,
Some secret which he fain would say;
And close to the portal she sees him go;
He talks with her handmaid in accents low;
Oh then she thought that time went slow,
And long were the minutes that she must wait
Till her handmaid came from the castle-gate.

From the castle-gate her handmaid came,
And told her that a Knight was there,
Who sought to speak with Abba the fair,
Count Aymerique's beautiful daughter and heir.
She bade the stranger to her bower;
His stature was tall, his features bold;
A goodlier form might never maid
At tilt or tourney hope to see;
And though in pilgrim-weeds arrayed,
Yet noble in his weeds was he,
And did his arms in them enfold
As they were robes of royalty.

He told his name to the high-born fair;
He said that vengeance led him there.
"Now aid me, lady dear," quoth he,  "To smite the adulteress in her pride;
Your wrongs and mine avenged shall be,
And I will take you for my bride."
He pledged the word of a true Knight;
From out the weeds his hand he drew;
She took the hand that Garci gave,
And then she knew his tale was true,
For she saw the warrior's hand so white,
And she knew the fame of the beautiful Knight.

1.
'Tis the hour of noon;
The bell of the convent hath done,
And the Sexts are begun;
The Count and his leman are gone to their meat.
They look to their pages, and lo they see
Where Abba, a stranger so long before,
The ewer, and basin, and napkin bore;
She came and knelt on her bended knee,
And first to her father minister'd she:
Count Aymerique look'd on his daughter down;
He look'd on her then without a frown.

2.
And next to the Lady Argentine
Humbly she went and knelt;
The Lady Argentine the while
A haughty wonder felt;
Her face put on an evil smile;
"I little thought that I should see
The Lady Abba kneel to me
In service of love and courtesy!
Count Aymerique," the leman cried,  "Is she weary of her solitude,
Or hath she quell'd her pride?"
Abba no angry word replied;
She only raised her eyes, and cried,
"Let not the Lady Argentine
Be wroth at ministry of mine!"
She look'd at Aymerique, and sigh'd;
"My father will not frown, I ween,
That Abba again at his board should be seen!"
Then Aymerique raised her from her knee,
And kiss'd her eyes, and bade her be
The daughter she was wont to be.

3.
The wine hath warm'd Count Aymerique;
That mood his crafty daughter knew;
She came and kiss'd her father's cheek,
And stroked his beard with gentle hand,
And winning eye and action bland,
As she in childhood used to do.
"A boon! Count Aymerique," quoth she;
"If I have found favor in thy sight,
Let me sleep at my father's feet to-night.
Grant this," quoth she, "so I shall see
That you will let your Abba be
The daughter she was wont to be."
With asking eye did Abba speak;
Her voice was soft and sweet;
The wine had warm'd Count Aymerique,
And when the hour of rest was come,
She lay at her father's feet.

4.
In Aymerique's arms the adulteress lay;
Their talk was of the distant day,
How they from Garci fled away
In the silent hour of night;
And then amid their wanton play
They mock'd the beautiful Knight
Far, far away his castle lay,
The weary road of many a day;
"And travel long," they said, "to him,
It seem'd, was small delight;
And he belike was loath with blood
To stain his hands so white."
They little thought that Garci then
Heard every scornful word!
They little thought the avenging hand
Was on the avenging sword!
Fearless, unpenitent, unblest,
Without a prayer they sunk to rest,
The adulterer on the leman's breast.

5.
Then Abba, listening still in fear,
To hear the breathing long and slow,
At length the appointed signal gave,
And Garci rose and struck the blow.
One blow sufficed for Aymerique,—
He made no moan, he utter'd no groan;
But his death-start waken'd Argentine,
And by the chamber lamp she saw
The bloody falchion shine!
She raised for help her in-drawn breath;
But her shriek of fear was her shriek of death.

In an evil day and an hour of woe
Did Garci Fernandez wed!
El Rey D. Ramiro o segundo de Leon, ouve falar da ferusurra e bondade do huma Moura; e como era de elle o mesmo irmão de Alboazar, Albozadum, filhão de D. Zanedo Zaia, donzeto do Rey Albaill; o que conquesso a terra no tempo do Rey Rodrigo. Este Alboazar era Sehor de toda a terra desde Gaya até Santarem; e ouve suxtes batalhas com Christianos, extremamente com este Rey Ramiro; e o Rey Ramiro ficam com elle grandes amizades por cober aquelle Moura, que ela muito amava; e faz entoda que o amame magos; e mandoule dizer que o perna ver, por se querer de conhecer com elle por elas amizades serem mais firmes; e Alboazar mandoule dizer que lhe prezava muito; e que o Fazia a Gaya, e hid se xuera com el. E o Rey Ramiro fuge lá entre seus galeões com julgad, e pediu que aquelle Moura que lhes desse, e julgou Christianos. O que cober com elles e Alboazar lhes responde, tua mãe, e filhos dela, e vassalos; e como teu dou do coronel. Este Rey D. Ramiro trazia huma grande Astroglo que era nome Idou; e por suas artes tirava huma nova do dito, e levava do galeão que o Faziam prezar, e estou Rey Ramiro com a Moura em huma galha está. E como fizeram o Alboazar, e alli foy contempor- tendo grande entre elles; e despertam lhes dos de Rey Ramiro vinté do os bons que lhe lera, e da outra companhia suxte; e o levou do Moura a Minho; e estou deo a Leon, e bastou, e posse nome Ortiga, que queria tanto teresse em aquele tempo, como castigavel e enxameada, e comprou de todos os bens. Alboazar fez por elles vivido dentro, para aquele poderia virgâr tanbalel, e muitas felizes como o Castello de Gaya, que era em o quelle tempo de grandes edificios e nobres pósaps. E o Rey Ramiro contornam este feito, e Foy ou cavam todos tres teases que foy lueu visto desse que; e como fobam seu estendendo mandam por seu filho D. Infante D. Ordonho, e por alguns seus vasallos que estavam que erão para agradar por, e metesem com elles em cinco galeões, e nom pode mais leer, e que seix levar galeotes se nom aquelles que entenderam que poderiam reger as galeães, e mandou as falsilhão que ressecasse em lugar de galeã- e; e neste ficam elle porque as galeães erão poucas, e por tem mais falsilhão, e as galeães eram mais apuradas para aquell poder para que to; e o cubrino das galeões por povo verde, e entrava com ellas por San João de Paredo, que agora chamão San Jonte de Foz. Aquel lugar de burra parte e outra era a ribeira culpa- beria de arbustas, e as galeões sustavam as suas armas dellas; e porque erão cobertas de pano avermelh, nom prece. E o levar de noite a terra com todos os seus, e foi ao Infante, que se deitavão as so arbores o mais encatado que fizer possedere, e por nenhumu guio nem se abalças, até que ouviam a voz de sue corno, e acontecendo que lhes assassinó o galeo pres. E como o fizeram, e destruíram e quebraram a taverna sobre o corno so; e foi degrer a huma fonte que estava so o castel- lo de Gaya. E este fazia Rey Ramiro por ver a Alboazar, para ater conselhão com elles, como poderiam mais cuidadadamente avenir de direito de Alboazar, e de todos seus filhos, e de todos os companhões; e que tinha pello conselho da soberania toda, e coa rechente se foi em outro mesmo tempo, que poderia esca- par Alboazar e seus filhos; e porque er o de gora coraço, punha em questa suas feito em grao vesttra; mas as cousas que sao ordenado de Deus, vem a aquello que a elle aprês, e nom assim como ne havia pensado.

Anote-se aqui, que o Alboazar havia mencionado fora a correr mante conse- tro Alboazar, e huma sergente que avia nome Ferrante, natural do Pragão, que avia livado com a Rainha servia ante ella: elle levantouse pela manhã, como avia de costume de lhe ir por aquella para as mao a aquella fonte, e achou hia jazer Rey Ramiro, e non o conhecia. Elle prohibiu na Aravisa da agua por Deus, ca se non lhe dera d' elle terrenitor, e elle achou a que lhe era acer; e o meteo hum camacho na boa, e aquel camacho avia partido com sua mulher a Rainha por a metade; e elle a ter, e degrava o camacho no acer. E a sergente foy, e dito ao Rio, e elle vai o camacho, e respondeu logo, e a Rainha perguntou, quem achava no camacho? E elles respondo, que non achava ninguém; e elle lhe de dire que mentes, e que non negasse, e que lhe faria bem e merece; e a sergente hic deles, que achava hia huma Moura doutez e lazado, e elle pedira agua que bebesse por Deus, e que hia dera; e elle Rainha dize que lhe fosse por elle, e de tirou dera d' elle. E o sergente ficou lá, e dizelle, homem pobre, a Rainha minha sunhara voa mandar chamarr, e este he por voss, ben, ella mandara pensar de tos. E o Rey Ramiro respondeu so si, assim o mande Deus. Foy com elles, e entraram pello porto da camara, e conhece a Rainha, e dixe que, e elle lhe respondeu, e o sergente ficou lá. E a camara era de abobad, e como Rey Ramiro foy dentro, fechou ella a porta com grande cadado. E elle jactado na camara, chegou Alboazar, e foyse para sua camara; e a Rainha lhe dize, se ta aqui tichees Rey Ramiro, que lhe farios? O Moura respondelo, e o que faria a mim; eu tinha com grandes tornudos. E o Rey Ramiro de Albaçar. E nomeio, e fez dire. Pei serhor, aprestes os teus; e aqui esta fechado em triste marra, ca era a te pos ditas viajar a tua vontade.
KING RAMIRO.

From the castle of Gaya the Warden sees The water and the Alder-trees; And only these the Warden sees; No danger near doth Gaya fear; No danger nigh doth the Warden spy; He sees not where the gallows lie Under the Alders silently; For the gallows with green cover d’o’er, They have crept by night along the shore; And they lie at anchor, now it is morn, Awaiting the sound of Ramiro’s horn.

2. In traveller’s weeds Ramiro sate By the fountain at the castle-gate; But under the weeds was his breastplate, And the sword he had tried in so many fights, And the horn whose sound would ring around, And be known so well by his knights.

3. From the gate Alondza’s dismal came To fill her pitcher at the spring, And she saw, but she knew not, her master the King.

In the Moorish tongue Ramiro spake, And begged a draught for mercy’s sake, That he his burning thirst might slake; For, worn by a long madly, Not strong enough, he said, had he To lift it from the spring.

4. She gave her pitcher to the King, And from his mouth he dropp’d a ring Which he had with Alondza broken; So in the water from the spring Queen Alondza found the token.

With that she bade her damsel bring Secretly the stranger in.

5. “What brings thee hither, Ramiro?” she cried; “The love of you,” the King replied. “Nay! nay! it is not so!” quoth she; “Ramiro, say not this to me!” I know your Moorish concubine Hath now the love which once was mine. If you had loved me as you say, You would never have stolen Ortiga away; If you had never loved another, I had not been here in Gaya to-day The wife of Ortiga’s brother! But hide thee here,—a step I hear, King Alboazar draweth near.”

6. In her aloof she bade him hide: “King Alboazar, my lord,” she cried, “What wouldst thou do, if at this hour King Ramiro were in thy power?” “This I would do,” the Moor replied; “I would hew him limb from limb; As he, I know, would deal by me, So I would deal by him.”
"Alboazar!" Queen Aldonza said,
"Lo! here I give him to thy will;
If you above thou hast thy foe.
Now thy vengeance then fulfil!"

With that up spake the Christian king:
"O Alboazar, deal by me
As I would surely deal with thee,
If I were you, and you were me!
Like a friend you gusted me many a day;
Like a foe I stole your sister away;
The sin was great, and I felt its weight,
All joy by day the thought oppressed;
And all night long it troubled my rest;
Till I could not bear the burden of care,
But told my Confessor in despair.
And he, my sinful soul to save,
This penance for atonement gave:
That I before you should appear,
And yield myself your prisoner here,
If my repentance was sincere,
That I might by a public death
Breathe shamefully out my latest breath.

"King Alboazar, this I would do,
If you were I, and I were you;
That no one should say you were meanly fed,
I would give you a roasted capon first,
And a good ring leaf of wheaten bread,
And a skinful of wine to quench your thirst;
And after that I would grant you the thing
Which you came to me petitioning.
Now this, O King, is what I crave,
That I my sinful soul may save:
Let me be led to your bull-ring,
And call your sons and daughters all,
And assemble the people, both great and small,
And let me be set upon a stone,
That by all the multitude I may be known,
And bid me then this horn to blow,
And I will blow a blast so strong,
And wind the horn so loud and long,
That the breath in my body at last shall be gone,
And I shall drop dead in sight of the throng.
Thus your revenge, O King, will be brave,
Granting the boon which I come to crave,
And the people a holyday will have,
And I my precious soul shall save;
For this is the penance my Confessor gave.
King Alboazar, this I would do,
If you were I, and I were you."

"This man repents his sin, be sure!"
To Queen Aldonza said the Moor;
"He hath stolen my sister away from me;
I have taken from him his wife;
Shame then would it be, when he comes to me,
And I my true repentance see,
If I for vengeance should take his life."

"O Alboazar!" then quoth she,
"Weak of heart as weak can be!
Full of revenge and wiles is he.
Look at those eyes beneath that brow;
I know Ramiro better than thou!
Kill him, for thou hast him now;
He must die, he sure, or thou.
Hast thou not heard the history
How, to the throne that he might rise,
He pluck'd out his brother Ordoño's eyes?
And dost not remember his prowess in fight,
How often he met thee and put thee to flight,
And plunder'd thy country for many a day?
And how many Moors he has slain in the strife,
And how many more carried captives away?
How he came to show friendship—and thou didst believe him?
How he ravish'd thy sister—and wouldst thou forgive him?
And hast thou forgotten that I am his wife,
And that now by thy side I he like a bride,
The worst shame that can ever a Christian betide?
And cruel it were, when you see his despair,
If vainly thou thought in compassion to spare,
And refused him the boon he comes hither to crave,
For no other way his poor soul can he save,
Than by doing the penance his Confessor gave."
14.
Then his good sword Ramiro drew,
Upon the Moorish King he flew,
And he gave him one blow, for there needed not two;
They killed his sons and his daughters too;
Every Moorish soul they slew;
Not one escaped of the infidel crew;
Neither old nor young, nor babe nor mother;
And they left not one stone upon another.

15.
They carried the wicked Queen aboard,
And they took counsel what to do to her;
They tied a millstone round her neck,
And overboard in the sea they threw her.
But a heavier weight than that millstone lay
On Ramiro's soul at his dying day.

Bristol, 1802.

THE INCHCAPE ROCK.

An old writer mentions a curious tradition which may be worth quoting. "By east the Isle of May," says he, "twelve miles from all land in the German seas, lies a great hidden rock, called Inchcape, very dangerous for navigators, because it is overflowed over tide. It is reported, in old times, upon the side rock there was a bell, fixed upon a tree or timber, which rang continually, being moved by the sea, giving notice to the sailors of the danger. This bell or clocke was put there and maintained by the Abbot of Aberbrothok, and being taken down by a sea pirate, a year or thereafter he perished upon the same rocks, with ship and goodes, in the righteous judgement of God." — Stoddard's Remarks on Scotland.

No stir in the air, no stir in the sea,
The ship was still as she could be;
Her sails from heaven received no motion;
Her keel was steady in the ocean.

Without either sign or sound of their shock,
The waves flow'd over the Inchcape Rock;
So little they rose, so little they fell,
They did not move the Inchcape Bell.

The Abbot of Aberbrothok
Had placed that Bell on the Inchcape Rock;
On a buoy in the storm it floated and swung,
And over the waves its warning rang.

When the Rock was hid by the surge's swell,
The mariners heard the warning Bell;
And then they knew the perilous Rock,
And blest the Abbot of Aberbrothok.

The Sun in heaven was shining gay;
All things were joyful on that day;

The sea-birds scream'd as they wheel'd round,
And there was joyance in their sound.

The buoy of the Inchcape Bell was seen
A darker speck on the ocean green;
Sir Ralph the Rover walk'd his deck,
And he fix'd his eye on the darker speck.

He felt the cheering power of spring;
It made him whistle, it made him sing;
His heart was mirthful to excess,
But the Rover's mirth was wickedness.

His eye was on the Inchcape float;
Quoth he, "My men, put out the boat,
And row me to the Inchcape Rock,
And I'll plague the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

The boat is lower'd, the boatsmen row;
And to the Inchcape Rock they go;
Sir Ralph bent over from the boat,
And he cut the Bell from the Inchcape float.

Down sunk the Bell with a gurgling sound;
The bubbles rose and burst around;
Quoth Sir Ralph, "The next who comes to the Rock
Won't bless the Abbot of Aberbrothok."

Sir Ralph the Rover sail'd away;
He scour'd the seas for many a day;
And now, grown rich with plunder'd store,
He steers his course for Scotland's shore.

So thick a haze overspreads the sky,
They cannot see the Sun on high;
The wind hath blown a gale all day;
At evening it hath died away.

On the deck the Rover takes his stand;
So dark it is they see no land.
Quoth Sir Ralph, "It will be lighter soon,
For there is the dawn of the rising Moon."

"Canst hear," said one, "the breakers roar?
For methinks we should be near the shore."
"Now where are we I cannot tell,
But I wish I could hear the Inchcape Bell."

They hear no sound; the swell is strong;
Though the wind hath fallen, they drift along,
Till the vessel strikes with a shivering shock, —
"Oh Christ! it is the Inchcape Rock!"

Sir Ralph the Rover tore his hair;
He curs'd himself in his despair;
The waves rush in on every side;
The ship is sinking beneath the tide.

But, even in his dying fear,
One dreadful sound could the Rover hear —
A sound as if, with the Inchcape Bell,
The Devil below was ringing his knell.

THE WELL OF ST. KEYNE.

"I know not whether it be worth the reporting, that there is in Cornwall, near the parish of St. Keyne, a Well, called over with the rocks of four kinds of trees, withy, oak, elm, and ash, dedicated to St. Keyne. The reported virtue of the water is this, that, whether husband or wife come first to drink thereof, they get the mastery thereby." — Fuller.

This passage in one of the folios of the Worthly old Father, who, as he says, knew not whether it were worth the reporting, suggested the following Ballad; and the Ballad had produced so many imitations, that it may be prudent here thus to assert its originality, lest I should be accused hereafter of having committed the plagiarism which has been practised upon it.

"Next," says Carew, in his Survey of Cornwall, p. 150, "I will relate you another of the Cornish natural wonders, viz., St. Keyne's Well; but lest you make a wonder first at the Saint, before you take notice of the Well, you must understand, that this was not Keyne the nunimpeller, but one of a gentler spirit and milder sex, to wit, a woman. He caused the spring to be pictured, added this rhym for an exposition:—

'In name, in shape, in quality,
This Well is veryquent;
The name that of Keyne befell,
No other holy saint.
The shape, four trees of divers kinds,
Withy, Oak, Elm, and Ash,
Make with their roots an arched roof.
Whose door this spring doth wash.
The quality, that man or wife,
Whose chance or choice attains
First of this sacred stream to drink,
Thereby the mastery gains."

Carew's Survey of Cornwall, p. 130.

Of St. Keyne, whose death is placed in the year 490, and whose Festival used to be celebrated in Brecknockshire, on October 5, there is a brief allusion in the English Martyrology. Father Cressy, the Benedictine, gives her history more fully. "Illustrious," says he, "she was for her birth, being the daughter of Braganus, prince of that province in Wales, which, from him, was afterwards called Brecknockshire; but more illustrious for her zeal to preserve her chastity, for which reason she was called in the British language Kenewyarn, that is, Keyne the Virgin."

2. This Prince Braganus, or Brachanus, the father of St. Keyne, is said to have had twelve and twelve daughters by his holy body, called Marcella, daughter of Theodoric son of Tethphalt, Prince of Garthmatriin, the same region called afterward Brecknock. Their first born son was St. Canoe: and their eldest daughter was Gudlas, who was mother of Cadocus by St. Gunily, a holy king of the southern Britons. The second daughter was Medearis, the mother of the holy Archbishop St. David. Thus writes Carew, and I cannot mention any other of their children besides St. Keyna.

3. But in Gildas Cambrensis another daughter is commemorated, called St. Almoda. And David Powel makes mention of a fifth named Tyvrael, who was the wife of Congen the son of Cadfel, Prince of Powishaw; and mother of Brechnel, surnamed Scithrose, who slew Ethelred King of the Northumbers.

4. Concerning the Holy Virgin St. Keyna, we find this narration in the author of her life, extant in Capgrave; § "She was of royal blood, being no other than the daughter of a prince of Brecknockshire. When she came to ripe years many noble persons sought her in marriage; but she utterly refused that state, having consecrated her virginity to our Lord by a perpetual vow. For which cause she was afterward by the Britons called in the following manner in the name of Keyna the Virgin."

5. At length she determined to forsake her custody and find out some desert place, where she might attend to contemplation. Therein directing her soul to a holy place beyond Severn, and there meeting with certain woody places, she made her request to the prince of that country that she might be permitted to serve God in that solitude. His answer was, that he was very willing to grant her request, but that that place did harbor with serpents that neither man nor beast could inhabit it. But she constantly supplicated him, that her firm trust was in the name and assistance of Almighty God, to drive all that poisonous brood out of that region.

6. Hereupon the place was granted to the Holy Virgin; who presently purifying herself in fervent prayer to God, obtained of him to expel all the serpents and vipers there into stores. And to this day the stones in that region do resemble the windings of serpents through all the fields and villages, as if they had been framed so by the hand of the engraver.

7. Our learned Camden, in his diligent search after antiquities, seems to have visited this country, being a part of Somersetshire, though he is willing to dispassionate the miracle. His words are, "On the western bank of Avon is seen the town of Cainsburn. Some are of opinion that it was named so from Keyna, a most holy British Virgin, who, according to the credulous persuasion of former ages, is believed to have turned serpents into stones; because such like miracles of sporting nature are there sometimes found in the quarries. I myself saw a stone brought from thence representing a serpent uncoiled in a spire; the head of it stuck out in the outward surface, and the end of the tail terminated in the centre."

8. But let us prosecute the life of this holy Virgin. Many years being spent by her in this solitary place, and the fame of her sanctity every where divulged, and many oratories built by her, her nephew St. Cadoc performing a pilgrimage to the Mount of St. Michael, met there with his blessed aunt, St. Keyna, at whose sight he was replenished with great joy. And being desirous to bring her back to her own country, the inhabitants of that region would not permit him. But afterward, by the dispensation of an angel, the holy Maid returned to the place of her nativity, where, on the top of a hillock seated at the foot of a high mountain, she made a little habitation for herself; and by her prayers to God obtained a spring there to flow out of the earth, which, by the merits of the Holy Virgin, afforded health to divers infirmities.

9. But when the time of her consummation approached, one night she, by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, saw in a vision, as it were, a fiery pillar, the base whereof was fixed on her bed; and the angel of her father was the messenger以其 to her with a message of a spring to flow over with a few branches of trees. And in this vision two angels appeared to her; one of which approaching respectfully to her, seemed to take off the sackcloth with which she was covered, and instead thereof to put on her a smock of fine linen, and over that a mantle of purple, and about all a mantle all woven with gold. Which having done, he thus said to her, "Prepare yourself to come with us, that we may lead you into your heavenly Father's kingdom."

Hereupon she wept with excess of joy, and endeavoring to follow the angel she awakened, and found her body inflamed with a fever, so that she perceived her end was near.

10. Therefore, sending for her nephew Cadocus, she said to him, "This is the place above all others beloved by me; here my memory shall be perpetuated. This place I will often visit in spirit if it may be permitted me. And I am assured it shall be permitted me, because our Lord has granted me this place as a certain inheritance. The time will come when this place shall be inhabited by a sinful people, which notwithstanding I will violently root out of this spot. My tomb shall be a long while unknown, till the coming of other people, who shall so reverence your St. Keyna, I shall bring them; they will protect and defend; and in this place shall the name of our Lord be blessed for ever."
was all of a rowy color; and so sweet a fragrance proceeded from her sacred virgin body, that those who were present thought themselves in the joy of Paradise. St. Cadocus bore her in her own oratory, where for many years she had led a most holy, mortified life, very acceptable to God.

Church History of Brittany, Book X., Ch. 14.

Such is the history of St. Keyne, as related by P. Serennus
Creasy, permisiu superiurum, et approbatione Doctorum.

There was evidently a scheme of setting up a shrine con-ected with the legend. In one part it was well conceived, for the Cornu Ammonis is no where so frequently found as near Keynsham; five specimens are to be seen over the doors of many of the houses there, and I have often observed fragments among the stones which were broken up to mend the road. The Welsh seem nearly to have forgotten this saint. Mr. Owen, in his Cambrian Biography, enumerates two daughters of Drychau, Ceindrach, and Ceinwen, both ranked among saints, and the latter having two dedications dedicated to her in Mona. One of these is probably St. Keyne.

A WELL there is in the west country,
And a clearer one never was seen;
There is not a wife in the west country
But has heard of the Well of St. Keyne.

An oak and an elm-tree stand beside,
And behind doth an ash-tree grow,
And a willow from the bank above
Droops to the water below.

A traveller came to the Well of St. Keyne;
Joyfully he drew nigh,
For from cock-crow he had been travelling,
And there was not a cloud in the sky.

He drank of the water so cool and clear,
For thirsty and hot was he;
And he sat down upon the bank
Under the willow-tree.

There came a man from the house hard by,
At the Well to fill his pail;
On the Well-side he rested it,
And he bade the Stranger hail.

"Now art thou a bachelor, Stranger?" quoth he;
"For an if thou hast a wife,
The happiest draught thou hast drank this day
That ever thou didst in thy life.

"Or hath thy good woman, if one thou hast,
Ever here in Cornwall been?
For an if she have, I'll venture my life,
She has drank of the Well of St. Keyne."

"I have left a good woman who never was here,"
The Stranger he made reply;
"But that my draught should be the better for that,
I pray you answer me why."

"St. Keyne," quoth the Cornish-man, "many a
Drank of this crystal Well;
And before the Angel summon'd her,
She laid on the water a spell.

"If the Husband of this gifted Well
Shall drink before his Wife,
A happy man thenceforth is he,
For he shall be Master for life.

"But if the Wife should drink of it first,— God help the Husband then!"
The Stranger stoop'd to the Well of St. Keyne,
And drank of the water again.

"You drank of the Well, I warrant, betimes?"
He to the Cornish-man said:
But the Cornish-man smiled as the Stranger spake,
And sheepishly shook his head.

"I hasten'd as soon as the wedding was done,
And left my Wife in the porch;
But I suppos'd she had been wiser than me,
For she took a bottle to church."

BISHOP BRUNO.

"Bruno, the Bishop of Herdipolitanum, sailing in the river of Danubius, with Henry the Thiel, then Emperor, being not far from a place which the Germans call Ben Strudel, or the devouring guife, which is neere unto Grinen, a castle
in Austria, a spirit was heard calling aloud, 'Ho, ho, Bishop Bruno, whither art thou travelling? but dispose of thyself how thou pleuest, thou shalt be my prey and spoil.'
At the hearing of these words they were all stupefied, and the Bishop with the rest crossed and blessed themselves.
The issue was, that within a short time after, the Bishop, feasting with the Emperor in a castle belonging to the Countesse of Eschiro, a rafter fell from the roof of the chamber wherein they sat, and strucke him dead at the table." — Heywood's Hierarchie of the Blessed Angels.

Bishop Bruno awaked in the dead midnight,
And he heard his heart beat loud with affright:
He dreamt he had rung the palace bell,
And the sound it gave was his passing knell.

Bishop Bruno smiled at his fears so vain;
He turned to sleep, and he dreamt again;
He rang at the palace gate once more,
And Death was the Porter that open'd the door.

He start'd up at the fearful dream, [scream;
And he heard at his window the screech-owl
Bishop Bruno slept no more that night,—
Oh! glad was he when he saw the day-light!

Now he goes forth in proud array,
For he with the Emperor dines to-day;
There was not a Baron in Germany
That went with a nobler train than he.

Before and behind his soldiers ride;
The people throng'd to see their pride,
They bow'd the head, and the knee they bent,
But nobody bless'd him as he went.

So he went on stately and proud,
When he heard a voice that cried aloud,
The bell of Materna

Hasten to see her relatives who

Will meet her. Then she

Had both the church and

Hastening at once.
THE BATTLE OF BLENHEIM.

1.
It was a summer evening;
Old Kaspar's work was done,
And he before his cottage door
Was sitting in the sun;
And by him sported on the green
His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

2.
She saw her brother Peterkin
Roll something large and round,
Which he beside the rivulet,
In playing there, had found;
He came to ask what he had found,
That was so large, and smooth, and round.

3.
Old Kaspar took it from the boy,
Who stood expectant by;
And then the old man shook his head,
And with a natural sigh,
"Tis some poor fellow's skull," said he,
"Who fell in the great victory."

4.
"I find them in the garden,
For there's many here about;
And often, when I go to plough,
The ploughshare turns them out;
For many thousand men," said he,
"Were slain in that great victory."

5.
"Now tell us what 'twas all about,"
Young Peterkin he cries;
And little Wilhelmine looks up
With wonder-waiting eyes;
"Now tell us all about the war,
And what they fought each other for."

6.
"It was the English," Kaspar cried,
"Who put the French to rout;
But what they fought each other for,
I could not well make out;
But every body said," quoth he,
"That 'twas a famous victory."

7.
"My father lived at Blenheim then,
Yon little stream hard by;
They burnt his dwelling to the ground,
And he was forced to fly;
So with his wife and child he fled,
Nor had he where to rest his head.

8.
"With fire and sword the country round
Was wasted far and wide,
And many a childing mother then,
And new-born baby died;
But things like that, you know, must be
At every famous victory.

9.
"They say it was a shocking sight
After the field was won;
For many thousand bodies here

1.
"Ho! ho! Bishop Bruno! you travel with glee;
But I would have you know, you travel to me!"

Behind, and before, and on either side,
He look'd, but nobody he espied;
And the Bishop at that grew cold with fear,
For he heard the words distinct and clear.

And when he rang at the palace bell,
He almost expected to hear his knell;
And when the Porter turn'd the key,
He almost expected Death to see.

But soon the Bishop recover'd his glee,
For the Emperor welcomed him royally;
And now the tables were spread, and there
Were choicest wines and dainty fare.

And now the Bishop had bless'd the meat,
When a voice was heard as he sat in his seat,—
"With the Emperor now you are dining with glee,
But know, Bishop Bruno, you sup with me!"

The Bishop then grew pale with affright,
And suddenly lost his appetite;
All the wine and dainty cheer
Could not comfort his heart, that was sick with fear.

But by little and little recovered he,
For the wine went flowing merrily,
 Till at length he forgot his former dread,
And his cheeks again grew rosy red.

When he sat down to the royal fare,
Bishop Bruno was the saddest man there;
But when the masquers enter'd the hall,
He was the merriest man of all.

Then from amid the masquers' crowd
There went a voice hollow and loud,—
"You have past the day, Bishop Bruno, in glee;
But you must pass the night with me!"

His cheek grows pale, and his eyeballs glare,
And stiff round his tunsire bristled his hair;
With that there came one from the masquers' band,
And took the Bishop by the hand.

The bony hand suspended his breath;
His marrow grew cold at the touch of Death;
On saints in vain he attempted to call;
Bishop Bruno fell dead in the palace hall.
Lay rotting in the sun;
But things like that, you know, must be
After a famous victory.

10. "Great praise the Duke of Marlbro' won,
And our good Prince Eugene."

"Why, 'twas a very wicked thing!"

Said little Williclimie.

"Nay—nay—my little girl," quoth he;

"It was a famous victory.

11. "And every body praised the Duke,
Who this great fight did win."

"But what good came of it at last?"

Quoth little Peterkin.

"Why, that I cannot tell," said he;

"But 'twas a famous victory."

A TRUE BALLAD
ST. ANTIUS, THE POPE, AND THE DEVIL.

Desta Atendio cuentan las estorias que le avia, que el martes despen de Roma, pasaro por la parte de un rio que ha nombre Durias; y en un campo gran compayia de diablos que este tenien contenedo sus principios los malos que fisieron por las tier-ras; y entre todos los otros estava un negro a menorca de Espa-
nia: y sabian que un siete año que andaba ludicando con el Papa por le fazer pecao; y nunca muriera y non entonces que le fisieron fazer ya que pecado muy grande: y esto prevenio lo por la mendicid de aquel apatogue que troya. E Sant Atendio que visto aquellos como aquel diablo, e conguio por la virtud de Dios e por la Santa Cruz que lo llevase a Roma; e cavigio en el; e llevo a Roma, el jueves de la cena a hora de misas, el Papa que quererse recuyere para fazer misas; decia sant Atendio el diablo a la puerta e dixo aquel que lo atreudese: e el entrado dentro a uno el Papa aparee, e dixo que fisiero preu-tencia de aquel pecado; e el quiso no morar, mas grato el sobre-gar el santo obispo con saudanias que le dixo. E fico el Papa: peruitencia; e dixo sant Atendio la misas en su lugar, e con-grego en crimina; e toma una partida de la para ay; e descodoas es el Papa, e anto fuera, e caybligo en el diablo, e llevo lo a su argobonidad el sobelio de pascua a hora de misas. — Cordulica de Espana.

This Saint Atendio, according to the Chronicle General, was Bishop of Valencia in Gaul, and martyred by the Vandals in the year 411. The Spaniards have a tradition that he was Bishop of Jaen: they say, "that the Devil was crossing the sea with this unwelcome load upon his back, he artifully endeavored to make Atendio pronounce the name of Jesus, which, to us breaks all spells, would have enabled him to throw him off into the water; but that the Bishop, understanding his intent, calmly replied, Aver Diabolo, 'Get-up Devil!' and they add, "that when he arrived at Rome, his last was still covered with the snow which had fallen upon it while he was passing the Alps, and that the hat is still shown at Rome in confirmation of the story and the miracle." Feyjoo lays two letters upon this whimsical legend among his Cartas Eruditas. In the first (T. 1, Carta 21) he replies to a correspondent who had gravely inquired his opinion upon the story, "De bona honor," says he, "esecsa massa, quando le uenerbo inquiiri mi distinzione, sobre

In Historia de el Obispo de Jaen, de quien se cuenta, que fue a Roma en una noche, entubando sobre la espalda de un Diablo a alijador: Trato de un asunto curioso e hechos con-tagiosos, y digo muchos en el ejemplo de V. yu, consultandome sobre cosas de mis vasenos." Nevertheless, though he thus treats the story of an old wife's tale, he shows some reasoning upon it. "As he heard it," he says, "it did not appear whether the use which the Bishop made of the Devil were lie or fictitious; that is, whether he made use of him as a wizard, by virtue of a compact, or by virtue of authority, having the power of the Most Holy Soul. In either case there is a great incongruity. In the first, inasmuch as it is not credible that the Devil should voluntarily serve the Bishop for the purpose of preventing a great evil in the church: — I say voluntarily, because the notion that a compact is so humbug is that the Devil that he has in no ways resist the pleasure of the person with whom he has contrat ed es cosa de Theologos de Vida la cinta. In the second, because the journey being designed for a holy purpose, it is more conformable to reason that it should have been executed by the ministry of a good angel than of a bad one; as, for instance, Habakkuk was transported by the ministry of a good angel from Judea to Babylon, that he might carry food to the imprisoned Daniel. If you should oppose to me the example of Christ, who was carried by the Devil to the pinnacle of the temple, I reply, that there are two manifest discrepancies. The first, that Christ conducted himself in this case passively and permissively; the second, that the Devil placed him upon the pinnacle of the temple, not for any good end, but with a most wicked intention. 10 But," pursues the good Benedictin, "why should I fatigue myself with arguing? I hold the story unworthy of being critically examined till it be shown me written in some history, either ecclesiastical or profane, which is enti-tided to some credit."

Soon after this letter was published, another correspondent informed Feyjoo, that the story in question was written in the General Chronicle of King D. Alphonso the Wise. This incited him to further inquiry. He found the same legend in the Speculum Historiale of Vincentius Belocavensis, and there discovered that the saint was called Antius, not Athedius, and that the scene lay upon the river Dniusians instead of the river Diviusians. Here too he found a reference to Sisbertus Gemblacensis; and in that author, the account which the Chronicler had followed and the explanation of his errors in the topography: his Vespianum prov-ring to be Besancon, and the river the Doubs, which the Romans called Dniusians, Dubis, and Aquisabu. But he found also to his comfort, that though Jean Jacques Chloet, a physician of Besancon, had endeavored to prove the truth of the story for the honor of his nation or city, in a book entitled Vosamia Civitas Sapientia Liberum Sequarum, and had cited certain Acts and Books of the Old Testament, to support it, the veracious Bullandists had decided that these Acts were apocryphal, the Breviaries not to be believed in this point, and the whole story a fable which had been equally related of St. Maximus Taurinensis and Pope Leo the Great. These Bullandists strain at a gnat, and swallow an Aaslby with equal gravity. Fortified by their authority, Feyjoo, who was worthy to have belonged to a more enlightened church, triumphantly dismissed the legend, and, observed, "that the contriver was a clumsy Fidele to make the Devil speak upon the journey by the Bishop, say that," he says, "is slow travelling for an infernal position." (Cartas Eruditas, T. 9, C. 21.) The discussion, however, reminded him of a curious story, which he thus relates: — "There is in this city of Oviedo a poor Porter, called by name Pedro Moreno, of whom it is told kindly in the chronicles of the Bishop of Jaen. The circumstance is related in this manner. Some letters had been delivered to him which he was to carry to Madrid with more than ordinary diligence, because expedition was of importance. At a little distance from his city, he met with a friar, who was walking with a friar, who was walking with a friar, who was walking with a friar. They began to travel together, and that so well, that Valladolid being forty leagues (150 miles) from Oviedo, they got beyond that city on the first day to dinner. The rest of the journey was performed with the same celerity. This story spread through the whole place, and was believed by all the vulgar (and by some also who were not of the vulgar) when it came to my ears: the authority referred to was the man himself, who had related it to an infinite number of persons. I sent for him to my cell to examine him. He affirmed that the story was true, but by questioning and cross-questioning him concerning the particulars, I made him fall into many contradictions. Moreover, I found that he had told the story with many variations to different persons. What I clearly ascertained was, that he had heard the legend of the Bishop of Jaen, and thought to become a famous man, by making a like fable believed of himself. I believe that many persons were undeceived when my inquiry was known. But before this examination was made, to how many places had the report of this miraculous journey extended, where the exposure of the falsehood will never reach? Perhaps, if this writing should not prevent it, the journey of Pedro Moreno, the Porter, will one day be little less famous in Spain than that of the Bishop of Jaen?—Cartes Erudites, T. 1, C. 24.

According to Marullus, as quoted by Zaiser in his great Theatrum Humanae Vitae, i. 417, Antidius was Bishop of Tours, and Josimius was the Pope whom he served so essentially by riding post to his aid.

A very incorrect copy of this Ballad was printed and sold by J. Bailey, 116 Chancery Lane, price 6d., with a print from a juvenile design by G. Cruickshank. I think my--If fortunate in having accidentally obtained this broadside, which, for its rarity, will one day be deemed valuable in a collection of the works of a truly original and inimitable artist.

It is Antidius the Bishop, Who now at even tide, Taking the air and saying a prayer, Walks by the river side.

The Devil had business that evening, And he upon earth would go; For it was in the month of August, And the weather was close below.

He had his books to settle; And up to earth he hied, To do it there in the evening air, All by the river side.

His imps came flying around him, Of his affairs to tell; From the north, and the south, and the cast, and the west, They brought him the news that he liked best, Of things they had done, And the souls they had won, And how they sped well In the service of Hell.

There came a devil posting in, Return'd from his employ; Seven years had he been gone from Hell; And now he came grinning for joy.

"Seven years," quoth he, "of trouble and toil Have I labor'd the Pope to win; And I to-day have caught him; He hath done a deadly sin!"

And then he took the Devil's book, And wrote the deed therein.

Oh, then King Belzebub, for joy, He drew his mouth so wide You might have seen his iron teeth, Four and forty from side to side.

He wagg'd his ears, he twisted his tail, He knew not for joy what to do; In his hoofs and his horns, in his heels and his corns, It tickled him all through.

The Bishop, who beheld all this, Straight how to act bethought him; He leap'd upon the Devil's back, And by the horns he caught him.

And he said a Pater-noster As fast as he could say, And made a cross on the Devil's head, And bade him to Rome away.

Away, away, the Devil flew All through the clear moonlight; I warrant who saw them on their way He did not sleep that night.

Without bridle, or saddle, or whip, or spur, Away they go like the wind; The beads of the Bishop are hanging before, And the tail of the Devil behind.

They met a Witch, and she hail'd them, As soon as she came within call; "Ave Maria!" the Bishop exclaim'd; It frightened her broomstick, and she got a fall.

He ran against a shooting star, So fast for fear did he sail, And he singed the beard of the Bishop Against a comet's tail; And he pass'd between the horns of the moon, With Antidius on his back; And there was an eclipse that night Which was not in the almanac.

The Bishop, just as they set out, To tell his beads began; And he was by the bed of the Pope Before the string was done.

The Pope fall'd down upon his knees, In terror and confusion, And he confess'd the deadly sin, And he had absolution.

And all the Popes in bliss that be, Sung, O be joyful! then; And all the Popes in bale that be, They howl'd for envy then; For they before kept jubilee, Expecting his good company, Down in the Devil's den.

But what was this the Pope had done To bind his soul to Hell?
GONZALO HERMIGUEZ.

This story is related at length by Bernardo de Brito, in his Cronica de Coato, I. v. c. 1, where he has preserved, also part of a poem by Gonzalo Hermiguez. The verses are said to be the oldest in the Portuguese language; and Brito says there were more of them, but he thought it sufficient to cite these for his purpose. If they had been correctly printed, it might have been difficult to make out their meaning; but from a text so corrupted, it is impossible.

1.
In arms and in anger, in struggle and strife,
Gonzalo Hermiguez won his bride;
He slew the Moor who from the fray
Was rescuing Fatima that day;
In vain she shriek’d: Gonzalo press’d
The Moorish prisoner to his breast;
That breast in iron was array’d;
The gauntlet was bloody that grasp’d the Maid;
Through the beaver-sight his eye
Glared fiercely, and red, and wrathfully;
And while he bore the captive away,
His heart rejoiced, and he blest the day.

2.
Under the lemon walk’s odorous shade
Gonzalo Hermiguez woo’d the Maid;
The ringlets of his raven hair
Waved upon the evening air,
And gentle thoughts, that raise a sigh,
Soften’d the warrior’s dark-brown eye,
When he with passion and sweet song
Woo’d her to forgive the wrong.
Till she no more could say him nay;
And the Moorish Maiden blest the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

3.
To the holy Church, with pomp and pride,
Gonzalo Hermiguez led his bride.
In the sacred font that happy day
Her stain of sin was wash’d away;
There did the Moorish Maiden claim
Another faith, another name;

There, as a Christian convert, plight
Her faith unto the Christian Knight;
And Oriana blest the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

4.
Of Affonso Henriques’ court the pride
Were Gonzalo Hermiguez and his bride;
In battle strongest of the strong,
In peace the master of the song,
Gonzalo of all was first in fame,
The loveliest she and the happiest dame.
But ready for her heavenly birth,
She was not left to fade on earth;
In that dread hour, with Heaven in view,
The comfort of her faith she knew,
And blest on her death-bed the day
When Gonzalo bore her a captive away.

5.
Through a long and holy life,
Gonzalo Hermiguez mourn’d his wife.
The arms wherewith he won his bride,
Sword, shield, and lance, were laid aside.
That head which the high-plumed helm had worn
Was now of its tresses shaven and shorn,
A Monk of Alcobaca he
Eminent for sanctity.
Contented in his humble cell
The meekest of the meek to dwell,
His business was, by night and day,
For Oriana’s soul to pray.
Never day did he let pass
But scored to her account a mass;
Devoutly for the dear one dead
With self-inflicted stripes he bled;
This was Gonzalo’s sole employ,
This was Gonzalo’s only joy;
Till love, thus purified, became
A holy, yea, a heavenly flame;
And now in heaven doth bless the day
When he bore the Moorish captive away.

QUEEN ORRACA

AND

THE FIVE MARTYRS OF MOROCCO.

This legend is related in the Chronicle of Affonso II., and in the Historia Serafica of Fr. Manoel da Esperanza.

1.
The Friars five have girt their loins,
And taken staff in hand;
And never shall those Friars again
Hear mass in Christian land.

They went to Queen Orraca,
To thank her and bless her then;
And Queen Orraca in tears
Knelt to the holy men.

"Three things, Queen Orraca,
We prophesy to you:
Hear us, in the name of God!
For time will prove them true

"In Morocco we must martyr'd be;
Christ hath vouchsafed it thus:
We shall shed our blood for Him
Who shed his blood for us.

"To Coimbra shall our bodies be brought,
Such being the will divine;
That Christians may behold and feel
Blessings at our shrine.

"And when unto that place of rest
Our bodies shall draw nigh,
Who sees us first, the King or you,
That one that night must die.

"Fare thee well, Queen Orraca!
For thy soul a mass we will say,
Every day as long as we live,
And on thy dying day."

The Friars they blesst her, one by one,
Where she knelt on her knee;
And they departed to the land
Of the Moors beyond the sea.

2.
"What news, O King Affonso,
What news of the Friars five?
Have they preach'd to the Miramolin;
And are they still alive?"

"They have fought the fight, O Queen!
They have run the race;
In robes of white they hold the palm
Before the throne of Grace.

"All naked in the sun and air
Their mangled bodies lie;
What Christian dared to bury them,
By the bloody Moors would die."

3.
"What news, O King Affonso,
Of the Martyrs five what news?
Doth the bloody Miramolin
Their lustral still refuse?"

"That on a dunghill they should rot,
The bloody Moor decreed;
That their dishonor'd bodies should
The dogs and vultures feed; —

"But the thunder of God roll'd over them,
And the lightning of God flash'd round;
Nor thing impure, nor man impure,
Could approach the holy ground.

"A thousand miracles appall'd
The cruel Pagan's mind;
Our brother Pedro brings them here,
In Coimbra to be shrined."

4.
Every altar in Coimbra
Is dress'd for the festival day;
All the people in Coimbra
Are dight in their richest array; —

Every bell in Coimbra
Doth merrily, merrily ring;
The Clergy and the Knights await
To go forth with the Queen and the King.

"Come forth, come forth, Queen Orraca;
We make the procession stay."

"I beseech thee, King Affonso,
Go you alone to-day.

"I have pain in my head this morning;
I am ill at heart also:
Go without me, King Affonso,
For I am too faint to go."

"The relics of the Martyrs five
All maladies can cure;
They will requite the charity
You show'd them once, be sure:

"Come forth then, Queen Orraca;
You make the procession stay:
It were a scandal and a sin
To abide at home to-day."

Upon her palfrey she is set,
And forward then they go;
And over the long bridge they pass,
And up the long hill wind slow.

"Prick forward, King Affonso,
And do not wait for me;
To meet them close by Coimbra,
It were discourtesy; —

"A little while I needs must wait,
Till this sore pain be gone; —
I will proceed the best I can;
But do you and your Knights prick on.

The King and his Knights prick'd up the hill
Faster than before;
The King and his Knights have topp'd the hill,
And now they are seen no more.

As the King and his Knights went down the hill,
A wild boar cross'd the way;
"Follow him! follow him!" cried the King;
"We have time by the Queen's delay."

A-hunting of the boar astray
Is King Affonso gone;
Slowly, slowly, but straight the while,
Queen Orraca is coming on.
And winding now the train appears
Between the olive-trees:
Queen Orraca alighted then,
And fell upon her knees.

The Friars of Alancer came first,
And next the relics past;—
Queen Orraca look'd to see
The King and his Knights come last.

She heard the horses tramp behind;
At that she turn'd her face:
King Affonzo and his Knights came up
All panting from the chase.

"Have pity upon my poor soul,
Holy Martyrs five!" cried she:
"Holy Mary, Mother of God, Virgin, pray for me!"

That day in Coimbra
Many a heart was gay;
But the heaviest heart in Coimbra
Was that poor Queen's that day.

The festival is over,
The sun hath sunk in the west;
All the people in Coimbra
Have betaken themselves to rest.

Queen Orraca's Father Confessor
At midnight is awake,
Kneeling at the Martyrs' shrine,
And praying for her sake.

Just at the midnight hour, when all
Was still as still could be,
Into the Church of Santa Cruz
Came a saintly company.

All in robes of russet gray,
Poorly were they dight;
Each one girdled with a cord,
Like a Friar Minorite.

But from those robes of russet gray,
There flow'd a heavenly light;
For each one was the blessed soul
Of a Friar Minorite.

Brighter than their brethren,
Among the beautiful band,
Five were there who each did bear
A palm-branch in his hand.

He who led the brethren,
A living man was he;
And yet he shone the brightest
Of all the company.

Before the steps of the altar,
Each one bow'd his head;
And then with solemn voice they sung
The Service of the Dead.

"And who are ye, ye blessed Saints?"
The Father Confessor said;
"And for what happy soul sing ye
The Service of the Dead?"

"These are the souls of our brethren in bliss;
The Martyrs five are we:
And this is our father Francisco,
Among us bodily.

"We are come hither to perform
Our promise to the Queen;
Go thou to King Affonzo,
And say what thou hast seen."

There was loud knocking at the door,
As the heavenly vision fled;
And the porter called to the Confessor,
To tell him the Queen was dead.

THE OLD WOMAN OF BERKELEY, A BALLAD,

SHOWING HOW AN OLD WOMAN RODE DOUBLE, AND WHO RODE BEFORE HER.

_A.D. 859._ _Circum dies istos, mulier quemdam moloches, in villâ qua Berkeleia dicturus degens, gube amatire ac petulantia, flagitus modum uoque in senium et agerius nec non nomen, uique ad mortem impulit per se nomen. _Doverunt_
The Raven croak'd as she sat at her meal,
And the Old Woman knew what he said,
And she grew pale at the Raven's tale,
And sicken'd, and went to her bed.

"Now fetch me my children, and fetch them with speed,"
The Old Woman of Berkeley said;
"The Monk my son, and my daughter the Nun,
Bid them hasten, or I shall be dead."

The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun,
Their way to Berkeley went;
And they have brought, with pious thought,
The holy sacrament.

The Old Woman shriek'd as they enter'd her door;
And she cried with a voice of despair,
"Now take away the sacrament,
For its presence I cannot bear!"

Her lip it trembled with agony;
The sweat ran down her brow;
"I have tortures in store for evermore,
But spare me, my children, now!"

Away they sent the sacrament;
The fit it left her weak;
She look'd at her children with ghastly eyes,
And faintly struggled to speak.

"All kind of sin I have rioted in,
And the judgment now must be;
But I secured my children's souls;
Oh, pray, my children, for me!"

"I have 'pointed myself' with infants' fat;
The fiends have been my slaves;
From sleeping babes I have suck'd the breath;
And breaking by charms the sleep of death,
I have call'd the dead from their graves.

And the Devil will fetch me now in fire,
My witchcrafts to atone;
And I, who have troubled the dead man's grave,
Shall never have rest in my own.

Bless, I entreat, my winding sheet,
My children, I beg of you,
And with holy water sprinkle my shroud,
And sprinkle my coffin too.

And let me be chain'd in my coffin of stone,
And fasten it strong, I implore,
With iron bars, and with three chains
Chain it to the church floor.

And bless the chains, and sprinkle them;
And let fifty Priests stand round,
Who night and day the mass may say
Where I lie on the ground.

And see that fifty Choristers
Beside the bier attend me,
And day and night, by the taper's light,
With holy hymns defend me.

Let the church bells all, both great and small,
Be toll'd by night and day,
To drive from thence the fiends who come To bear my body away.

And ever have the church-door barr'd
After the even-song;
And I beseech you, children dear,
Let the bars and bolts be strong.

And let this be three days and nights,
My wretched corpse to save;
Till the fourth morning keep me safe,
And then I may rest in my grave."

The Old Woman of Berkeley laid her down,
And her eyes grew deadly dim;
Short came her breath, and the struggle of death Did loosen every limb.

They bless'd the old woman's winding sheet
With rites and prayers due;
With holy water they sprinkled her shroud,
And they sprinkled her coffin too.

And they chain'd her in her coffin of stone,
And with iron barr'd it down,
And in the church with three strong chains
They chain'd it to the ground.

And they bless'd the chains, and sprinkled them
And fifty Priests stood round,
By night and day the mass to say
Where she lay on the ground.
And fifty sacred Choristers
Beside the bier attend her,
Who day and night, by the tapers’ light,
Should with holy hymns defend her.

To see the Priests and Choristers
It was a goodly sight,
Each holding, as it were a staff;
A taper burning bright.

And the church bells all, both great and small,
Did toll so loud and long;
And they have barr’d the church door hard,
After the even-song.

And the first night the tapers’ light
Burnt steadily and clear;
But they without a hideous rout
Of angry fiends could hear; —

A hideous roar at the church door,
Like a long thunder peal;
And the Priests they pray’d, and the Choristers sung
Louder, in fearful zeal.

Loud toll’d the bell; the priests pray’d well;
The tapers they burnt bright;
The Monk her son, and her daughter the Nun,
They told their beads all night.

The cock he crew; the Fiends they flew
From the voice of the morning away;
Then undisturb’d the Choristers sing,
And the fifty Priests they pray;
As they had sung and pray’d all night,
They pray’d and sung all day.

The second night the tapers’ light
Burnt dismally and blue,
And every one saw his neighbor’s face
Like a dead man’s face to view.

And yells and cries without arise,
That the stoutest heart might shock,
And a deafening roaring like a catacata pouring
Over a mountain rock.

The Monk and Nun they told their beads
As fast as they could tell,
And aye as louder grew the noise,
The faster went the bell.

Louder and louder the Choristers sung,
As they trembled more and more;
And the Priests as they pray’d to Heaven for aid,
They smote their breasts full sore.

The cock he crew; the Fiends they flew
From the voice of the morning away;
Then undisturb’d the Choristers sing,
And the fifty Priests they pray;
As they had sung and pray’d all night,
They pray’d and sung all day.

The third night came, and the tapers’ flame
A frightful stench did make;
And they burnt as though they had been dipp’d
In the burning brimstone lake.

And the loud commotion, like the rushing of ocean,
Grew momentarily more and more;
And strokes as of a battering-ram
Did shake the strong church door.

The bellmen they for very fear
Could toll the bell no longer;
And still as louder grew the strokes,
Their fear it grew the stronger.

The Monk and Nun forgot their beads;
They fell on the ground in dismay;
There was not a single Saint in heaven
To whom they did not pray.

And the Choristers’ song, which late was so strong,
Falter’d with consternation;
For the church did rock as an earthquake shock
Uplifted its foundation.

And a sound was heard like the trumpet’s blast
That shall one day wake the dead;
The strong church door could bear no more,
And the bolts and the bars they fled; —

And the tapers’ light was extinguish’d quite;
And the Choristers faintly sung;
And the Priests, dismay’d, pant’d and pray’d,
And on all Saints in heaven for aid
They call’d with trembling tongue.

And in He came with eyes of flame,
The Devil, to fetch the dead;
And all the church with his presence glow’d
Like a fiery furnace red.

He laid his hand on the iron chains,
And like flax they moulder’d asunder,
And the coffin lid, which was barr’d so firm,
He burst with his voice of thunder.

And he bade the Old Woman of Berkeley rise,
And come with her master away;
A cold sweat started on that cold corpse,
At the voice she was forced to obey.

She rose on her feet in her winding-sheet;
Her dead flesh quiver’d with fear;
And a groan like that which the Old Woman gave Never did mortal hear.

She follow’d her Master to the church door;
There stood a black horse there;
His breath was red like furnace smoke,
His eyes like a meteor’s glare.

The Devil he flung her on the horse,
And he leap’d up before,
The Surgeon's Warning.

The subject of this parody was suggested by a friend, to whom also I am indebted for some of the stanzas.

Respecting the patent coffins herein mentioned, after the manner of Catholic Poets, who confound the actions they attribute to their Saints and Deity to be but fiction, I hereby declare that it is by no means my design to depreciate that useful invention; and all persons to whom this Ballad shall come are requested to take notice, that nothing herein asserted concerning the aforesaid coffins is true, except that the maker and patentee lives by St. Martin's Lane.

The Doctor whisper'd to the Nurse, And the Surgeon knew what he said; And he grew pale at the Doctor's tale, And trembled in his sick bed.

"Now fetch me my brethren, and fetch them with speed,"
The Surgeon affrighted said; "The Parson and the Undertaker, Let them hasten, or I shall be dead."

The Parson and the Undertaker They hastily came complying, And the Surgeon's Prentices ran up stairs When they heard that their Master was dying.

The Prentices all they enter'd the room, By one, by two, by three; With a sly grin came Joseph in, First of the company.

The Surgeon swore, as they enter'd his door,— "I was fearful his oaths to hear,— "Now send these scoundrels out of my sight, I beseech ye, my brethren dear!"

He foam'd at the mouth with the rage he felt, And he wrinkled his black eyebrow: "That rascal Joe would be at me, I know, But, zounds, let him spare me now!"

Then out they sent the Prentices; The fit it left him weak; He look'd at his brothers with ghastly eyes, And faintly struggled to speak.

"All kinds of carcases I have cut up, And now my turn will be;"

But, brothers, I took care of you; So pray take care of me.

"I have made candles of dead men's fat; The Sextons have been my slaves; I have bottled babes unborn, and dried Hearts and livers from rifled graves.

"And my Prentices now will surely come And carve me bone from bone; And I, who have rifled the dead man's grave, Shall never have rest in my own.

"Bury me in lead when I am dead, My brethren, I entreat, And see the coffin weigh'd, I beg, Lest the plumber should be a cheat.

"And let it be solder'd closely down, Strong as strong can be, I implore; And put it in a patent coffin, That I may rise no more.

"If they carry me off in the patent coffin, Their labor will be in vain; Let the Undertaker see it bought of the maker, Who lives by St. Martin's Lane.

"And bury me in my brother's church, For that will safer be; And, I implore, lock the church door, And pray take care of the key.

"And all night long let three stout men The vestry watch within; To each man give a gallon of beer, And a keg of Holland's gin;—

"Powder and ball, and blunderbuss, To save me if he can, And eke five guineas if he shoot A Resurrection Man.

"And let them watch me for three weeks, My wretched corpse to save; For then I think that I may stink Enough to rest in my grave."

The Surgeon laid him down in his bed; His eyes grew deadly dim; Short came his breath, and the struggle of death Did loosen every limb.

They put him in lead when he was dead, And, with precaution meet, First they the leaden coffin weigh, Lest the plumber should be a cheat.

They had it solder'd closely down, And examin'd it o'er and o'er; And they put it in a patent coffin, That he might rise no more.

For to carry him off in a patent coffin, Would, they thought, be but labor in vain,

Hereford, 1798.
So the Undertaker saw it bought of the maker,
Who lives by St. Martin's Lane.

In his brother's church they buried him,
That safer he might be;
They lock'd the door, and would not trust
The Sexton with the key.

And three men in the vestry watch,
To save him if they can;
And, should he come there, to shoot they swear
A Resurrection Man.

And the first night, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard as they went,
A guinea of gold the Sexton show'd
That Mister Joseph sent.

But conscience was tough; it was not enough;
And their honesty never swerved;
And they bade him go, with Mister Joe,
To the devil, as he deserved.

So all night long, by the vestry fire,
They quaff'd their gin and ale;
And they did drink, as you may think,
And told full many a tale.

The Cock he crew, Cock-a-doodle-doo!
Past five! the watchmen said;
And they went away, for while it was day
They might safely leave the dead.

The second night, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard as they went,
He whisper'd sneer, and show'd them two
That Mister Joseph sent.

The guineas were bright, and attracted their sight,
They look'd so heavy and new;
And their fingers itch'd as they were bewitch'd,
And they knew not what to do.

But they waver'd not long, for conscience was strong,
And they thought they might get more;
And they refused the gold, but not so rudely as before.

So all night long, by the vestry fire,
They quaff'd their gin and ale;
And they did drink, as you may think,
And told full many a tale.

The third night, as, by lantern light,
Through the church-yard they went,
He bade them see, and show'd them three
That Mister Joseph sent.

They look'd askance with greedy glance;
The guineas they shone bright;
For the Sexton on the yellow gold
Let fall his lantern light.

And they could not stand the sound in his hand,
For he made the guineas chink.

And conscience, late that had such weight,
All in a moment fails;
For well they knew that it was true
A dead man tells no tales.

And they gave all their powder and ball,
And took the gold so bright;
And they drank their beer, and made good cheer,
Till now it was midnight.

Then, though the key of the church-door
Was left with the Parson, his brother,
It open'd at the Sexton's touch, —
Because he had another.

And in they go, with that villain Joe,
To fetch the body by night;
And all the church look'd dismay'd
By his dark-lantern light.

They laid the pick-axe to the stones,
And they moved them soon asunder;
They shovell'd away the hard-press'd clay.
And came to the coffin under.

They burst the patent coffin first,
And they cut through the lead;
And they laugh'd aloud when they saw the shroud,
Because they had got at the dead.

And they allow'd the Sexton the shroud,
And they put the coffin back;
And nose and knees they then did squeeze
The Surgeon in a sack.

The watchmen, as they pass'd along,
Full four yards off could smell,
And a curse bestow'd upon the load
So disagreeable.

So they carried the sack a-pick-a-back,
And they carved him bone from bone;
But what became of the Surgeon's soul
Was never to mortal known.

Westbury, 1796.

HENRY THE HERMIT.

It was a little island where he dwelt,
A solitary islet, bleak and bare;
Short, scanty herbage spotting with dark spots
Its gray stone surface.  Never mariner
Approach'd that rude and unwelcoming coast,
Nor ever fisherman his lonely bark
Anchor'd beside its shore.  It was a place
Befitting well a rigid anchoret,
Dead to the hopes, and vanities, and joys,
And purposes of life; and he had dwelt
Many long years upon that lonely isle;
For in ripe manhood he abandon’d arms,
Honors, and friends, and country, and the world,
And had grown old in solitude. That isle
Some solitary man, in other times,
Had made his dwelling-place; and Henry
The little chapel which his toil had built
Now by the storms unroof’d, his bed of leaves
Wind-scatter’d; and his grave o’ergrown with grass,
And thistles, whose white seeds there wing’d in vain,
Wither’d on rocks, or in the waves were lost.
So he repair’d the chapel’s ruin’d roof,
Clear’d the gray lichens from the altar-stone,
And underneath a rock that shelter’d him
From the sea-blast, he built his hermitage.

The peasants from the shore would bring him
And beg his prayers; but human converse else
He knew not in that utter solitude;
Nor ever visited the haunts of men,
Save when some sinful wretch on a sick bed
Implored his blessing and his aid in death.
That summons he delay’d not to obey,
Though the night-tempest or autumnal wind
Madden’d the waves; and though the mariner,
Albeit relying on his saintly load,
Grew pale to see the peril. Thus he lived
A most austere and self-denying man,
Till abstinence, and age, and watchfulness,
Had worn him down, and it was pain at last
To rise at midnight from his bed of leaves,
And bend his knees in prayer. Yet not the less,
Though with reluctance of infirmity,
Rose he at midnight from his bed of leaves,
And bent his knees in prayer; but with more zeal,
More self-condemning fervor, raised his voice,
Imploring pardon for the natural sin
Of that reluctance, till the atoning prayer
Had satisfied his heart, and given it peace,
And the repented fault became a joy.

One night, upon the shore his chapel-bell
Was heard; the air was calm, and its far sounds
Over the water came, distinct and loud.
Alarm’d, at that unusual hour, to hear
Its toll irregular, a monk arose,
And cross’d to the island-chapel. On a stone
Henry was sitting there, dead, cold, and stiff,
The bell-ropc in his hand, and at his feet
The lamp* that stream’d a long, unsteady light.

Westbury, 1799.

ST. GUALBERTO.

ADRESSED TO GEORGE BURNETT.

Milton has made the name of Vallumbrosa familiar to English readers; few of whom, unless they have visited the spot,

* This story is related in the English Martyrology, 1689.
It is Gualberto! and mine aged eyes
Did not deceive me: yet full many a year
Hath slipp’d away, since last you bade farewell
To me your host and my uncomfortable cell.

8. “Twas but a sorry welcome then you found,
And such as suited ill a guest so dear.
The pile was ruinous, the base unsound;
It glads me more to bid you welcome here,
For you can call to mind our former state;
Come, brother, pass with me the new Moscera's gate.'”

9. So spake the cheerful Abbot; but no smile
Of answering joy relax'd Gualberto's brow;
He raised his hand, and pointed to the pile —
"Moscera better pleased me then, than now;
A palace this, befitting kingly pride!
Will holiness, my friend, in palace pomp abide?"

10. "Ay," cries Rodulfo, "'tis a stately place!
And pomp becomes the House of Worship well.
Nay, scowl not round with so severe a face!
When earthly kings in seats of grandeur dwell,
Where art exhausted decks the sumptuous hall,
Can poor and sordid huts becom the Lord of all?"

11. "And ye have rear'd these stately towers on high
To serve your God?" the Monk severely replied;
"It rose from zeal and earnest piety,
And prompted by no worldly thoughts beside?
Abbot, to him who prays with soul sincere,
However poor the cell, God will incline his ear.

12. "Rodulfo! while this haughty building rose,
Still was the pilgrim welcome at your door?
Did charity relieve the orphan's woes?
Clothed ye the naked? did ye feed the poor?
He who with alms most suceeds the distress'd,
Proud Abbot! know he serves his heavenly Father best.

13. "Did they in sumptuous palaces go dwell
Who first abandon'd all to serve the Lord?
Their place of worship was the desert cell;
Wild fruits and berries spread their frugal board;
And if a brook, like this, ran murmuring by,
They bless'd their gracious God, and thought it luxury.'”

14. Then anger darken'd in Rodulfo's face;
"Enough of preaching," sharply he replied;
"Thou art grown envious; 'tis a common case;
Humility is made the cloak of pride.
Proud of our home's magnificence are we;
But thou art far more proud in rags and beggary.'"

15. With that Gualberto cried in fervent tone,
"O Father, hear me! If this costly pile
Was for thine honor rear'd, and thine alone,
Bless it, O Father, with thy fostering smile!
Still may it stand, and never evil know,
Long as beside its walls the endless stream shall flow.

16. "But, Lord, if vain and worldly-minded men
Have wasted here the wealth which thou hast lent,
To pamper worldly pride; fraught on it then!
Soon be thy vengeance manifestly sent!
Let yonder brook, that gently flows beside,
Now from its base sweep down the unholy house of pride!"

17. He said, — and lo, the brook no longer flows!
The waters pause, and now they swell on high;
 Erect in one collected heap they rose;
The affrighted brethren from Moscera fly,
And upon all the Saints in Heaven they call,
To save them in their flight from that impending fall.

18. Down the heap'd waters came, and, with a sound
Like thunder, overthrown the fabric falls;
Swept far and wide, its fragments strow the ground,
Prone lie its columns now, its high-arch'd walls;
Earth shakes beneath the onward-rolling tide,
That from its base swept down the unholy house of pride.

19. Were old Gualberto's reasons built on truth,
Dear George, or like Moscera's base unsound?
This sure I know, that glad am I, in sooth,
He only play'd his pranks on foreign ground;
For had he turn'd the stream on England too,
The Vandal monk had spoil'd full many a goodly view.

20. Then Malmesbury's arch had never met my sight,
Nor Battle's vast and venerable pile;
I had not traversed then with such delight
The hallowed ruins of our Alfred's isle,
Where many a pilgrim's curse is well bestow'd
On those who rob its walls to mend the turnpike road.

21. Wells would have fallen, dear George, our country's pride;
And Canning's stately church been rear'd in vain;
Nor had the traveller Ely's tower descried,
Which when thou seest far o'er the sanny plain,
Dear George, I counsel thee to turn that way;
Its ancient beauties sure will well reward delay.

22.
And we should never then have heard, I think,
At evening hour, great Tom's tremendous knell.
The fountain streams that now in Christ-church
Had Niagara o'er the quadrangle;
But, as 'twas beauty that deserved the flood,
I ween, dear George, thy old Pompey might have stood.

23.
Then had not Westminster, the house of God,
Served for a concert-room, or signal-post:
Old Thames, obedient to the father's nod,
Had swept down Greenwich, England's noblest boast;
And, eager to destroy the unholy walls,
Fleet Ditch had roll'd up hill to overwhelm St. Paul's.

24.
George, dost thou deem the legendary deeds
Of saints like this but rubbish, a mere store
Of trash, that he flings time away who reads?
And would'st thou rather bid me puzzle o'er
Matter and Mind and all the eternal round,
Plunged headlong down the dark and fathomless profound?

25.
Now do I bless the man who undertook
These Monks and Martyrs to biographize;
And love to ponder o'er his ponderous book,
The mingle-mangle mass of truth and lies,
Where waking fancies mix'd with dreams appear,
And blind and honest zeal, and holy faith sincere.

26.
All is not truth; and yet, methinks, 'twere hard
Of wilful fraud such falblers to accuse;
What if a Monk, from better themes debarr'd, Should for an edifying story choose
How some great Saint the Flesh and Fiend o'ercame;
His taste I trow, and not his conscience, were to blame.

27.
No fault of his, if what he thus design'd,
Like pious novels for the use of youth, Obtain'd such hold upon the simple mind
That was received at length for gospel-truth.
A fair account! and should'st thou like the plea,
Thank thou our valued friend, dear George, who taught it me.

28.
All is not false which seems at first a lie.
Fernan Antolinez, a Spanish knight, Knelt at the mass, when, lo! the troops hard by
Before the expected hour began the fight.

Though courage, duty, honor, summon'd there,
He chose to forfeit all, not leave the unfinish'd prayer.

29.
But while devoutly thus the unarmed knight
Waits till the holy service should be o'er,
Even then the foremost in the furious fight
Was he beheld to bathe his sword in gore;
First in the van his plumes were seen to play,
And all to him decreed the glory of the day.

30.
The truth is told, and men at once exclaim'd,
Heaven had his Guardian Angel deign'd to send;
And thus the tale is handed down to fame.
Now, if our good Sir Fernan had a friend
Who in this critical season served him well,
Dear George, the tale is true, and yet no miracle.

31.
I am not one who scan with scornful eyes
The dreams which make the enthusiast's best delight;
Nor thou the legendary lore despise,
If of Gualberto yet again I write,
How first impell'd he sought the convent cell;
A simple tale it is, but one that please me well.

32.
Fortune had smiled upon Gualberto's birth,
The heir of Valdespesa's rich domains;
An only child, he grew in years and worth,
And well repay'd a father's anxious pains.
In many a field that father had been tried,
Well for his valor known, and not less known for pride.

33.
It chanced that one in kindred near allied
Was slain by his hereditary foe;
Much by his sorrow moved, and more by pride,
The father vow'd that blood for blood should flow;
And from his youth Gualberto had been taught
That with unceasing hate should just revenge be sought.

34.
Long did they wait; at length the tidings came
That, through a lone and unfrequented way,
Soon would Anselmo — such the murderer's name —
Pass on his journey home, an easy prey.
"Go," said the father, "meet him in the wood!"
And young Gualberto went, and laid in wait for blood.

35.
When now the youth was at the forest shade
Arrived, it drew toward the close of day;
Anselmo haply might be long delay'd,
And he, already wearied with his way,
Beneath an ancient oak his limbs reclined,
And thoughts of near revenge alone possess’d his mind.

36.
Slow sunk the glorious sun; a rosyate light
Spread o’er the forest from his lingering rays;
The glowing clouds upon Gualberto’s sight
Soften’d in shade,—he could not choose but gaze;
And now a placid grayness clad the heaven,
Save where the west retain’d the last green light of even.

37.
Cool breathed the grateful air, and fresher now
The fragrance of the autumnal leaves arose;
The passing gale scarce moved the o’erhanging bough,
And not a sound disturb’d the deep repose,
Save when a falling leaf came fluttering by,
Save the near brooklet’s stream that murmur’d quietly.

38.
Is there who has not felt the deep delight,
The hush of soul, that seems like these impart?
The heart they will not soften is not right;
And young Gualberto was not hard of heart.
Yet sure he thinks revenge becomes him well,
When from a neighboring church he heard the vesper-bell.

39.
The Romanist who hears that vesper-bell,
Howe’er employ’d, must send a prayer to Heaven.
In foreign lands I liked the custom well;
For with the calm and sober thoughts of even
It well accord’d; and weft thou journeying there,
It would not hurt thee, George, to join that vesper-prayer.

40.
Gualberto had been duly taught to hold
All pious customs with religious care;
And—for the young man’s feelings were not cold,—
He never yet had miss’d his vesper-prayer.
But strange misgivings now his heart invade;
And when the vesper-bell had ceased, he had not pray’d.

41.
And wherefore was it that he had not pray’d?
The sudden doubt arose within his mind,
And many a former precept then he weigh’d,
The words of Him who died to save mankind;
How ’twas the meek who should inherit Heaven,
And man must man forgive, if he would be forgiven.

42.
Troubled at heart, almost he felt a hope,
That yet some chance his victim might delay.

So as he mused adown the neighboring slope,
He saw a lonely traveller on his way;
And now he knows the man so much abhor’d,—
His holier thoughts are gone, he bares the murder-ous sword.

43.
"The house of Valdespesa gives the blow!
Go, and our vengeance to our kinsman tell!"
Despair and terror seized the unarm’d foe,
And prostrate at the young man’s knees he fell,
And stopp’d his hand and cried, "Oh, do not take
A wretched sinner’s life! mercy for Jesus’ sake!"

44.
At that most blessed name, as at a spell,
Conscience, the power within him, smote his heart.
His hand, for murder raised, unharmed fell;
He felt cold sweat-drops on his forehead start;
A moment mute in holy horror stood,
Then cried, "Joy, joy, my God! I have not shed his blood!"

45.
He raised Anselmo up, and bade him live,
And bless, for both preserved, that holy name;
And pray’d the astonish’d foeman to forgive
The bloody purpose led by which he came.
Then to the neighboring church he sped away,
His overburden’d soul before his God to lay.

46.
He ran with breathless speed,—he reach’d the door,—
With rapid throbs his feverish pulses swell;—
He came to crave for pardon, to adore
For grace vouchsafed; before the cross he fell,
And raised his swimming eyes, and thought that there
He saw the imaged Christ smile favoring on his prayer.

47.
A blest illusion! from that very night
The Monk’s most ardent life devout he led;
And still he felt the enthusiast’s deep delight;
Seraphic visions floated round his head;
The joys of heaven forcasted fill’d his soul;
And still the good man’s name adorns the sainted roll.

Era amigo de pobres, en tanto grado, que sentía mucho, que los Monasterios se edificassen sumamente: y asi visitando et de Moncera y viendo un edificio grande, y elegante, bautic a Rodulpho, que era allí. Abierto, con el rostro agraado le dijo: Con lo que has gastado, siguiendo tu parecer, en este magnifico edi.
fielo, has quitado el sustento a muchas pobres. Puso los ojos en un pequeño arreo, que corría allí cerca, y dijo, Dios Omnipotente, que sucede hacer grandes cosas de pequeñas criaturas, yo te ruego, que vea por medio de este pequeño arreo venganza de este gran edificio. Dios esto, y fuése de allí como abandonando el lugar; y siendo aíde, el arrebol corrió a crecer, y fue de suerte, que recogiendo un monte de agua, y tomando de atrás la corriente, vino con tan grande impulsa, que llevando piedras y arboles consigo, detrés el edificio.

Fernan Antolínez, a Spanish knight. — Same ibid., p. 479.

Atentio in aquella 8 balallia una cosa digna de memoria.
Fernan Antolínez, hombre noble y muy devoto, oia misa al
tiempo que se dio señal de atemor, costumbre ordinaria suya antes de la psela; per no dechara caminando, se quedó en el templo quando se tocó a la aurora. Esta piadad quam agradable fuese a Dios, se entendía por un milagro. Esteas preso en la Inglesa, después res Cousido en su casa, tenia no afren-tasen como a cabaher. En tanto, otro a el rememorar, es a sobre su Angel bueno, poeta entre las primeras tan valientemente, que la tormenta que le atormentaba, el se atribuyó en gran parte al valor de el dicho Antolínez. Confirmanlo el milagro las señales de los golpes, y las manchas de la sangre que se hallaron frescas en sus armas y caraclo. Así comunicado el caso, y sabido lo que passado, quedo mas conocida la bondad y esfuerzo de Antolí-nez — Miriana.

Perhaps this miracle, and its obvious interpretation, may have suggested to Florián the circumstance by which its Gonsolvo is prevented from combtling and killing the brother of his mistress. Florián is fond of Spanish literature.

A simple tale it is, but one that pleased me well.

Same ibid., p. 479.

Llamóse el padre Guallberto, y era señor de Valdesepe, que está entre Sest, y Florencia; orgúia la milion y como le metamos un su acento errantes, indignados, aun el hijo, que era ya hombre, como el padre, con mucho cuidado us-caban ocasión, como vengar aquella muerte. Sucedido, que viendo a Florencia el hijo, con un acento suyo, hombre valiente, y los dos bien armados, a cavalo, vio a su enemigo, y en lugar que eras imposible tréceles: lo que considerado por el contrario, y que tenía cierto su muerte, decidióse de un caballo, en que venía, y puesto de rodillas le pidió, juntas las manos, por Jesu Christo cruzificado, le perdóname la vida. Enternecióse Juan Guall-berto, oyendo el nombre de Jesus Christo crucificado e dixole, que por amor de aquel Señor, que ruego por los, que le pusieron en ella, el le perdóname. Pidiole, que se levantasse, y perdíeses el temor, que ya no por enemigo, sino por amigo le quería, y que de Dios, por quien habia esta, esperara el premio.
Pasó adiante Guallberto; y viendo una Iglesia en un monte cerca de Florencia, llamada de San Ministo, que era de Mengoa negros, entró en ella para dar gracias a Jesu Christo nuestro Sijor por la merced, que le havia hecho en suceserelle, de que perdóname, y no tomarase venanza de su enemigo: pese se de rodillas delante de un Cruceño, el qual, viendolo el, y otros que
estavan presentes, desde la Cruz inclinó la cabeza a Guallberto, as agradeciendo, y dandole gracias, de que por su amor osuviase perdóname la vida a su enemigo. Descubrióse el caso, y fue publico, y muy celebrado, y el Crucifixo fue tenido en grande

 NOTES TO ST. GUALBERTO.

He saw the imagined Christ smile favoring on his prayer.

Stanza 46, p. 480.

Sir Peter Damian relates a story similar to this of Gualberto in almost all circumstances, that Cuper found it advisable to disprove his authority on this occasion, and quote some of his own declarations, that he was not always satisfied of the truth or accuracy of what he related. Cum in tota alia narratiouibus ut siti circumstet factum Petrus Damianus, idem in hac Crucifazi historiis ipse eccecum omnium suspectus. The Hol- lander then proceeds to declare his own stout belief in the miracle as belonging to St. Gualberto. Ut ut est, ego Crucifazu sede incolumnis miraculam S. Nicolò Lorenzi, part. i, pp. 95—92.
1.
The Emperor Nap he would set off
On a summer excursion to Moscow;
The fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

2.
Four hundred thousand men and more
Must go with him to Moscow:
There were Marshals by the dozen,
And Dukes by the score;
Princes a few, and Kings one or two;
While the fields are so green, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

3.
There was Junot and Augereau,
Heigh-ho for Moscow!
Dombrowsky and Poniatowski,
Marshal Ney, lack-a-day!
General Rapp, and the Emperor Nap;
Nothing would do,
While the fields were so green, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
Nothing would do
For the whole of this crew,
But they must be marching to Moscow.

4.
The Emperor Nap he talk’d so big
That he frighten’d Mr. Roscoe.
John Bull, he cries, if you’ll be wise,
Ask the Emperor Nap if he will please
To grant you peace, upon your knees,
Because he is going to Moscow!
He’ll make all the Poles come out of their holes,
And beat the Russians, and eat the Prussians;
For the fields are green, and the sky is blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
And he’ll certainly march to Moscow!

5.
And Counsellor Brougham was all in a fume
At the thought of the march to Moscow:
The Russians, he said, they were undone,
And the great Fee-Faw-Fum
Would presently come,
With a hop, step, and jump, unto London.
For, as for his conquering Russia,
However some persons might scoff it,
Do it he could, and do it he would,
And from doing it nothing would come but good,
And nothing could call him off it.
Mr. Jeffrey said so, who must certainly know,
For he was the Edinburgh Prophet.
They all of them knew Mr. Jeffrey’s Review,
Which with Holy Writ ought to be reckon’d:

It was, through thick and thin, to its party true;
Its back was buff, and its sides were blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
It served them for Law and for Gospel too.

6.
But the Russians stoutly they turned to
Upon the road to Moscow.
Nap had to fight his way all through;
They could fight, though they could not parlez-vous;
But the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
And so he got to Moscow.

7.
He found the place too warm for him,
For they set fire to Moscow.
To get there he cost him much ado,
And then no better course he knew,
While the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
But to march back again from Moscow.

8.
The Russians they stuck close to him
All on the road from Moscow.
There was Tormazow and Jemalow,
And all the others that end in ow;
Milarodovitch and Jaladovitch,
And Karatschkovitch,
And all the others that end in itch;
Schamscheff, Souchosanoff,
And Schepaloff,
And all the others that end in eff;
Wasiltschikoff, Kostomaroff,
And Tchoglokoff,
And all the others that end in eff;
Rajeffsky, and Novereffsky,
And Rieffsky,
And all the others that end in effsky;
Ocharofisky and Rostoffsky,
And all the others that end in effsky;
And Platoff he play’d them off,
And Shiouvaloff he shovell’d them off,
And Markoff he mark’d them off,
And Krosnoff he cross’d them off,
And Tuchhoff he touch’d them off,
And Boroskoff he bored them off,
And Kutusoff he cut them off,
And Parenzoff he pared them off,
And Worrnzoff he worryed them off,
And Doctoroff he doctor’d them off,
And Rodinoff he flogg’d them off.
And, last of all, an Admiral came,
A terrible man with a terrible name,
A name which you all know by sight very well,
But which no one can speak, and no one can spell.
They stuck close to Nap with all their might;
They were on the left and on the right,
Behind and before, and by day and by night;
He would rather parlez-vous than fight;
But he look’d white, and he look’d blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
When parlez-vous no more would do,
For they remember'd Moscow.

9.
And then came on the frost and snow,
All on the road from Moscow.
The wind and the weather he found, in that hour,
Cared nothing for him, nor for all his power;
For him who, while Europe crouched under his rod,
Put his trust in his Fortune, and not in his God.
Worse and worse every day the elements grew,
The fields were so white, and the sky so blue,
Sacrebleu! Ventrebleu!
What a horrible journey from Moscow!

10.
What then thought the Emperor Nap
Upon the road from Moscow?
Why, I ween he thought it small delight
To fight all day, and to freeze all night;
And he was besides in a very great fright,
For a whole skin he liked to be in;
And so, not knowing what else to do,
When the fields were so white, and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
He stole away,—I tell you true,—
Upon the road from Moscow.
'Tis myself, quothe he, I must mind most;
So the Devil may take the hindmost.

11.
Too cold upon the road was he;
Too hot had he been at Moscow;
But colder and hotter he may be,
For the grave is colder than Moscowy;
And a place there is to be kept in view,
Where the fire is red, and the brimstone blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
Which he must go to,
If the Pope say true,
If he does not in time look about him;
Where his namesake almost
He may have for his Host;
He has reckon'd too long without him;
If that Host get him in Purgatory,
He won't leave him there alone with his glory;
But there he must stay for a very long day,
For from thence there is no stealing away,
As there was on the road from Moscow.

BROUGH BELLS.

The church at Brough is a pretty large, handsome, ancient building. The steeple is not so old, having been built about the year 1513, under the direction of Thomas Blenkinsop, of Helbeck, Esq. There are in it four excellent bells, by much the largest in the county, except the great bell at Kirby Thore. Concerning these bells at Brough, there is a tradition that they were given by one Branskill, who lived upon Stanemere, in the remotest part of the parish, and had a great many cattle. One time it happened that his Bull fell a bellowing, which in the dialect of the country is called cronning, this being the genuine Saxon word to denote that vociferation. Thereupon he said to one of his neighbors, 'Hearest thou how loud this bull craneth? If these cattle shall all cran together, might they not be heard from Brough hither?' He answered, 'Yea.' 'Well then,' says Branskill, 'I'll make them all cran together.' And he sold them all, and with the price thereof he bought the said bells, (or perhaps he might, get the old bells new cast and made larger.) There is a monument in the body of the church, in the south wall, between the highest and second window, and in which it is said the said Branskill was the last that was interred."—Nichols and Bryant's History and Antiquities of Westmorland and Cumberland, vol. i. p. 571.

At the further Brough there was a chapel or oratory, founded by John Branskill, (probably the same who gave the bells,) in 1596. Unto whom Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., of Helbeck, gave the ground called Gilgarth, on condition that he should build a chapel there, and also an hospital, with two beds in it for travellers and other poor people, and maintain for ever, paying to him and his heirs twopenny rent at Pentecost yearly, and an effect of such maintaining and repairing the said chapel, hospital, and beds, the land to revert to the said Thomas and his heirs. In pursuance whereof, he, the said John Branskill, founded an oratory or chapel, dedicated to Our Lady St. Mary, the Mother of Christ, and to St. Gabriel, the Archangel; who, as Roger, Bishop of Carlisle, and Richard, Abbot of Shap, did, by writing, seals, and hands and seals, affirmed, won many fair and divers miracles by the sufferance of our Lord God. Two priests were established to sing and to pray in the said chapel for evermore, for the souls of all the benefactors of the said chapel that were departed from the world, and for the welfare of those that were living. One of the said priests was to teach grammar, the other to instruct children willing to learn singing, freely, without any salary from them. The foundation of this chapel was confirmed both by the Bishop of Carlisle and the Archbishop of York, and yet was afterwards opposed by the Vicar of Brough, who conceived himself much prejudiced thereby, and particularly in regard of the oblations which were given from him to the said chapel. Whereupon he set up the cross, and lighted up candles in the church at mid-time of the day, caused the bells to be rung, and cursed with bell, book, and candle, all those that should receive any oblations of those that were parted to the said chapel, or should give any encouragement unto the same. Branskill, the founder, complained to the Archbishop's Court, at York, against the vicar, Mr. Rasebeck, and obtained a sharp citation against him; ensnaring him in an abandoned wretch, and inflating with diabolical venom for opposing so good a work. Notwithstanding which, Mr. Rasebeck appealed to the Pope, and an agreement was made between the founder and him, by a composition of twenty shillings yearly, to be paid to Mr. Rasebeck, and his successors, vicars of Brough.

Thus the chapel continued till the dissolution of the religious houses. And the priest that taught to sing being removed, the other that taught grammar was thought fit to be continued as master of a free-school; and by the commissioners, Sir Walter Mildmay and Robert Kellison, Esq., order was taken, and a fund settled for this purpose. So that a salary of 7l. 1s. 4d. was to be paid yearly to the master of the school by the king's auditors, they receiving all the rents and revenues which formerly belonged unto it as a chapel, and which were given to it by the founder and other benefactors.

This is all the endowment which it hath at present, (1777,) except a convenient dwelling-house and garden, which were given by one of the schoolmasters, Mr. John Beck. But it was formerly very beautifully endowed by various benefactors; as Henry, Earl of Cumberland, Edward Masgrave, of Hartley, Esq., William Masgrave, son of Richard Masgrave, of Brough, Thomas Blenkinsop, Esq., Hugh Newton, and divers others, who gave lands in Brough, Stanmore, Moreton, Yanesworth, Mekel-Sirickland, Bampton Cleveland, and Meekel-Sirickland, in Westmoreland; and in Stanemere, in Cumberland, and West-Laton, in Yorkshire, and Bernard Castle, in the county of Durham."—Bp. p. 574.
One day to Helbeck I had stroll'd,
Among the Crossfell Hills,
And, resting in its rocky grove,
Sat listening to the rills,—

The while to their sweet undersong
The birds sang blithe around,
And the soft west wind awoke the wood
To an intermitting sound.

Louder or fainter, as it rose
Or died away, was borne
The harmony of merry bells,
From Brough, that pleasant morn.

"Why are the merry bells of Brough,
My friend, so few?" said I;
"Theyxplont the expectant ear,
Which they should gratify."

"One, two, three, four; one, two, three, four;
'Tis still one, two, three, four;
Mellow and silvery are the tones;
But I wish the bells were more!"

"What! art thou critical?" quoth he;
"Eschew that heart's disease
That seeketh for displeasure where
The intent hath been to please."

"By those four bells there hangs a tale,
Which being told, I guess,
Will make thee hear their scanty peal
With proper thankfulness."

"Not by the Cliffords were they given,
Nor by the Tuftons' line;
Thou hearest in that peal the crune
Of old John Brunskill's kine."

"On Stanemore's side, one summer eve,
John Brunskill sat to see
His herds in yonder Borrowdale
Come winding up the lea."

"Behind them, on the lowland's verge,
In the evening light serene,
Brough's silent tower, then newly built
By Blenkinsop, was seen."

"Slowly they came in long array,
With loitering pace at will;
At times a low from them was heard,
Far off, for all was still."

"The hills return'd that lonely sound
Upon the tranquil air;
The only sound it was, which then
Awoke the echoes there."

"Thou hear'st that lordly bull of mine,
Neighbor,' quoth Brunskill then;
How loudly to the hills he crunes,
That crune to him again!"

"'Thinkest thou if you whole herd at once
Their voices should combine,
Were they at Brough, that we might not Hear plainly from this upland spot
That cruning of the kine?'"

"'That were a crune, indeed,' replied
His comrade, 'which, I ween,
Might at the Spital well be heard,
And in all dales between."

"'Up Mallerstang to Eden's springs,
The eastern wind upon its wings
The mighty voice would bear;
And Appleby would hear the sound,
Methinks, when skies are fair.'"

"'Then shall the herd,' John Brunskill cried,
'From you dumb steeple crune,
And thou and I, on this hill-side,
Will listen to their tune."

"'So, while the merry Bells of Brough,
For many an age ring on,
John Brunskill will remember'd be,
When he is dead and gone,—"

"'As one who, in his latter years,
Contented with enough,
Gave freely what he well could spare
To buy the Bells of Brough.'"

"Thus it hath proved: three hundred years
Since then have past away,
And Brunskill's is a living name
Among us to this day.'"

"More pleasure," I replied, "shall I
From this time forth partake,
When I remember Helbeck woods,
For old John Brunskill's sake."

"He knew how wholesome it would be,
Among these wild, wide fells,
And upland vales, to catch, at times,
The sound of Christian bells; —"

"What feelings and what impulses
Their cadence might convey
To herdsman or to shepherd boy,
Whiling in indolent employ
The solitary day; —"

"That, when his brethren were convened
To meet for social prayer,
He too, admonish'd by the call,
In spirit might be there; —"

"Or, when a glad thanksgiving sound,
Upon the winds of Heaven,
Was sent to speak a Nation's joy,
For some great blessing given,—"

"For victory by sea or land,
And happy peace at length;"
Peace by his country's valor won,
And 'stablish'd by her strength; —

"When such exultant peals were borne
Upon the morning air,
The sound should stir his blood, and give
An English impulse there."

Such thoughts were in the old man's mind,
When he that look'd down
From Stanmore's side on Borrodale,
And on the distant town.

And had I store of wealth, methinks,
Another herd of mine,
John Brunskill, I would freely give,
That they might crum with thine.

QUEEN MARY'S CHRISTENING.

The story is told at much greater length in La Historia del muy antiguo e invencible Rey Don Jaime de Aragon, Primero deste nombre, llamado El Conquistador. Compuesta primera en lengua Latina por el Maestro Bernardino Gomes Miedes, Arcediano de Murecia, y Canonigo de Valencia, agora sencillamente traducida por el mismo autor en lengua Castellana. — Valencia, 1584.

There are three chapters relating to the "mystery of this wonderful history," in the first book of this work.

Cap. x. Como salvo el Rey (D. Pedro) de Roma a Zaragoza, y de los modos que la Reyna su madre uso para casarle con la Señora de Mompeller, y como fue alía.

Cap. xi. De la notable invención y arte que la Reyna Doña María usa viéndose tan despreciada del Rey, para consuelo del.

Cap. xiii. Del Nacimiento del Príncipe Don Jaime, y de los estragos y suertes que en su bonitísimo acostumbraron.

Machiel thus gives his reason for taking such pains in compiling a faithful statement of the circumstances: — Confieren todos los historiadores antiguos y modernos en contar la extraña concepción y nacimiento del Infante Don Jaime; puesto que en el modo y discurso de toda cosa, como ella puso, discrepan en algunos; pues las unos lo pusieron breve y sucintamente, por más honestamente, como la propia historia del Rey; otros cuentan muchas y diversas cosas sobre ello, porque con amigos de pasar por todo, y cierto que concurrían todos con el Rey, y como esta dicha, en solo el modo dijeron. Por tanto, tomando de cada uno lo más prueable y menos discrepante, nos resolvemos en lo siguiente. — P. 12.

In justice to the Queen, I am bound to say that Miedes represents her as beautiful and of unblemished reputation, even by those who不信 her; and in justice to the King, professes as what, that there was a very strong suspicion of Doña Maria's being secretly married to another husband, by whom she had two daughters, a story which had reached the King, and which Miedes seems to accord.

The first wish of Queen Mary's heart
Is, that she may bear a son.
Who shall inherit in his time
The kingdom of Aragon.

She hath put up prayers to all the Saints
This blessing to accord,
But chiefly she hath call'd upon
The Apostles of our Lord.

The second wish of Queen Mary's heart
Is to have that son call'd James,
Because she thought for a Spanish King
Twas the best of all good names.

To give him this name of her own will
Is what may not be done,
For, having applied to all the Twelve,
She may not prefer the one.

By one of their names she hath vow'd to call
Her son, if son it should be;
But which, is a point wherein she must let
The Apostles themselves agree.

Already Queen Mary hath to them
Contracted a grateful debt;
And from their patronage she hoped
For these further blessings yet.

Alas! It was not her hap to be
As handsome as she was good;
And that her husband King Pedro thought so,
She very well understood.

She had lost him from her lawful bed
For lack of personal graces,
And by prayers to them, and a pious deceit,
She had compass'd his embraces.

But if this hope of a son should fail,
All hope must fail with it then,
For she could not expect by a second device
To compass the King again.

Queen Mary had her first child's wish —
She hath brought forth a beautiful boy;
And the bells have rung, and masses been sung,
And bonfires have blurred for joy.

And many's the cask of the good red wine,
And many the cask of the white,
Which was broach'd for joy that morning,
And emptied before it was night.

But now for Queen Mary's second heart's wish,
It must be determined now:
And Bishop Boyle, her Confessor,
Is the person who taught her how.

Twelve waxen tapers he hath had made,
In size and weight the same;
And to each of these twelve tapers,
He hath given an Apostle’s name.

One holy Nun had bleached the wax,
Another the wicks had spun;
And the golden candlesticks were bless’d,
Which they were set upon.

From that which should burn the longest,
The infant his name must take;
And the Saint who own’d it was to be
His Patron for his name’s sake.

A godlier or a goodlier sight
Was nowhere to be seen,
Methinks, that day, in Christendom,
Than in the chamber of that good Queen.

Twelve little altars have been there
Erected, for the nonce;
And the twelve tapers are set thereon,
Which are all to be lit at once.

Altars more gorgeously dress’d
You nowhere could desire;
At each there stood a ministering Priest
In his most rich attire.

A high altar hath there been raised,
Where the Crucifix you see;
And the sacred Fix that shines with gold
And sparkles with jewelry.

Bishop Boyle, with his precious mitre on,
Hath taken there his stand,
In robes which were embroidered
By the Queen’s own royal hand.

In one part of the ante-room
The Ladies of the Queen,
All with their rosaries in hand,
Upon their knees are seen.

In the other part of the ante-room,
The Chiefs of the realm you behold,
Ricos Omès, and Bishops, and Abbots,
And Knights, and Barons bold.

Queen Mary could behold all this
As she lay in her state bed;
And from the pillow needed not
To lift her languid head.

One fear she had, though still her heart
The unwelcome thought eschew’d,
That haply the unlucky lot
Might fall upon St. Jude.

But the Saints, she trusted, that ill chance
Would certainly forefend;

And moreover there was a double hope
Of seeing the wish’d-for end; —

Because there was a double chance
For the best of all good names;
If it should not be Santiago himself,
It might be the lesser St. James.

And now Bishop Boyle hath said the mass;
And as soon as the mass was done,
The priests, who by the twelve tapers stood,
Each instantly lighted one.

The tapers were short and slender too,
Yet to the expectant throng,
Before they to the socket burnt,
The time, I trow, seem’d long.

The first that went out was St. Peter,
The second was St. John;
And now St. Matthias is going,
And now St. Matthew is gone.

Next there went St. Andrew;
There goes St. Philip too;
And see! there is an end
Of St. Bartholomew.

St. Simon is in the snuff;
But it was a matter of doubt
Whether he or St. Thomas could be said
Soonest to have gone out.

There are only three remaining,
St. Jude, and the two St. James;
And great was then Queen Mary’s hope
For the best of all good names.

Great was then Queen Mary’s hope,
But greater her fear, I guess,
When one of the three went out,
And that one was St. James the Less.

They are now within less than quarter-inch,
The only remaining two!
When there came a thief in St. James,
And it made a gutter too!

Up started Queen Mary,
Up she sat in her bed;
"I never can call him Judas,"
She clasp’d her hands and said.

"I never can call him Judas!"
Again did she exclaim;
"Holy Mother, preserve us!
It is not a Christian name!"

She spread her hands, and clasp’d them again,
And the Infant in the cradle
Set up a cry, an angry cry,
As loud as he was able.

"Holy Mother, preserve us!"
The Queen her prayer renew’d;
When in came a moth at the window,
And flutter'd about St. Jude.

St. James hath fallen in the socket,
But as yet the flame is not out;
And St. Jude hath singed the silly moth
That flutters so blindly about.

And before the flame and the molten wax
That silly moth could kill,
It hath beat out St. Jude with its wings,
And St. James is burning still!

Oh, that was a joy for Queen Mary’s heart;
The babe is christened James;
The Prince of Aragon hath got
The best of all good names!

Glory to Santiago,
The mighty one in war!
James he is call’d, and he shall be
King James the Conqueror!

Now shall the Crescent wane,
The Cross be set on high
In triumph upon many a Mosque;
Woe, woe to Maw-netry!

Valencia shall be subdued;
Majorca shall be won;
The Moors be routed every where;
Joy, joy, for Aragon!

Shine brighter now, ye stars, that crown
Our Lady del Pilar,
And rejoice in thy grave, Cid Campeador,
Ruydiez de Bivar!

Keseick, 1829.

ROPRECHT THE ROBBER.

The story here versified is told by Taylor the Water Poet, in his "Three Weeks, Three Days, and Three Hours' Observations from London to Hamburg, in Germany; amongst Jews and Gentiles, with Descriptions of Towns and Towers, Castles and Citadels, artificial Gallowses and natural Haun-men; and dedicated for the present to the absent Odon-bian Knight Errant, Sir Thomas Coryat." It is in the volume of his collected works, p. 82, of the third paging.

Collein, which is the scene of this story, is more probably Cologne than Prussia, or of the same name in Prussia, than Cologne, to which great city the reader will perceive I had good reasons for transferring it.

PART I.

ROPRECHT the Robber taken at last;
In Cologne they have him fast;
Trial is over, and sentence past;
And hopes of escape were vain, he knew,
For the gallows now must have its due.

But though pardon cannot here be bought,
It may for the other world, he thought;
And so, to his comfort, with one consent
The Friars assured their penitent.

Money, they teach him, when rightly given,
Is put out to account with Heaven;
For suffrages therefore his plunder went,
Sinfully gotten, but piously spent.

All Saints, whose shrines are in that city,
They tell him, will on him have pity,
Seeing he hath liberally paid,
In this time of need, for their good aid.

In the Three Kings they bid him confide,
Who there in Cologne lie side by side:
And from the Eleven Thousand Virgins eke,
Intercession for him will they bespeak.

And also a slander he shall be
In the merits of their community;
All which they promise, he need not fear,
Through Purgatory will carry him clear.

Though the furnace of Babylon could not compare
With the terrible fire that rages there,
Yet they their part will so zealously do,
He shall only but frizzle as he flies through.

And they will help him to die well,
And he shall be hang’d with book and bell;
And moreover with holy water they
Will sprinkle him, ere they turn away.

For buried Roprecht must not be;
He is to be left on the triple tree;
That they who pass along may spy
Where the famous Robber is hanging on high.

Seen is that gibbet far and wide
From the Rhine and from the Dusseldorff side;
And from all roads which cross the sand,
North, south, and west, in that level land.

It will be a comfortable sight
To see him there by day and by night;
For Roprecht the Robber many a year
Had kept the country round in fear.

So the Friars assisted, by special grace,
With book and bell to the fatal place;
And he was hang’d on the triple tree,
With as much honor as man could be.

In his suit of irons he was hung:
They sprinkled him then, and their psalm they sung;
And turning away when this duty was paid,
They said, What a goodly end he had made!

The crowd broke up, and went their way;
All were gone by the close of day;
And Roprecht the Robber was left there
Hanging alone in the moonlight air.
The last who look'd back for a parting sight,
Beheld him there in the clear moonlight;
But the first who look'd when the morning shone,
Saw in dismay that Roprecht was gone.

PART II.

The stir in Cologne is greater to-day
Than all the bustle of yesterday;
Hundreds and thousands went out to see;
The irons and chains, as well as he,
Were gone, but the rope was left on the tree.

A wonderful thing! for every one said
He had hung till he was dead, dead, dead,
And on the gallows was seen, from noon
Till ten o'clock, in the light of the moon.

Moreover the Hangman was ready to swear
He had done his part with all due care;
And that certainly better hang'd than he
No one ever was, or ever could be.

Neither kith nor kin, to bear him away,
And funeral rites in secret pay,
Had he; and none that pains would take,
With risk of the law, for a stranger's sake.

So 'twas thought, because he had died so well,
He was taken away by miracle.
But would he again alive be found?
Or had he been laid in holy ground?

If in holy ground his relics were laid,
Some marvellous sign would show, they said;
If restored to life, a Friar he would be,
Or a holy Hermit certainly,
And die in the odor of sanctity.

That thus it would prove they could not doubt,
Of a man whose end had been so devout;
And to disputing then they fell
About who had wrought this miracle.

Had the Three Kings this mercy shown,
Who were the pride and honor of Cologne?
Or was it an act of proper grace,
From the Army of Virgins of British race,
Who were also the glory of that place?

Pardon, some said, they might presume,
Being a kingly act, from the Kings must come;
But others maintained that St. Ursula's heart
Would sooner be moved to the merciful part.

There was one who thought this aid divine
Came from the other bank of the Rhine;
For Roprecht there, too, had for favor applied,
Because his birthplace was on that side.

To Dusseldorf then the praise might belong,
And its Army of Martyrs, ten thousand strong;
But he for a Dusseldorf man was known,
And no one would listen to him in Cologne,
Where the people would have the whole wonder their own.

The Friars, who help'd him to die so well,
Put in their claim to the miracle;
Greater things than this, as their Annals could tell,
The stock of their merits for sinful men
Had done before, and would do again.

'Twas a whole week's wonder in that great town,
And in all places, up the river and down;
But a greater wonder took place of it then,
For Roprecht was found on the gallows again!

PART III.

With that the whole city flocked out to see;
There Roprecht was on the triple tree,
Dead, past all doubt, as dead could be;
But fresh he was as if spells had charm'd him,
And neither wind nor weather had harm'd him.

While the multitude stood in a muse,
One said, I am sure he was hang'd in shoes!
In this the Hangman and all concurred;
But now, behold, he was booted and spurr'd!

Plainly therefore it was to be seen,
That somewhere on horseback he had been;
And at this the people marvelled more,
Than at any thing which had happened before.

For not in riding trim was he
When he disappeared from the triple tree;
And his suit of irons he still was in,
With the collar that clipp'd him under the chin.

With that this second thought befell,
That perhaps he had not died so well,
Nor had Saints perform'd the miracle;
But rather there was cause to fear,
That the foul Fiend had been busy here!

Roprecht the Robber had long been their curse,
And hanging had only made him worse;
For bad as he was when living, they said
They had rather meet him alive than dead.

What a horse must it be which he had ridden!
No earthly beast could be so bestridden;
And when by a hell horse a dead rider was carried,
The whole land would be fearfully harried!

So some were for digging a pit in the place,
And burying him there with a stone on his face;
And that hard on his body the earth should be press'd,
And exorcists be sent for to lay him at rest.

But others, whose knowledge was greater, opined
That this corpse was too strong to be confined;
No weight of earth which they could lay
Would hold him down a single day,
If he chose to get up and ride away.

There was no keeping Vampires under ground;
And bad as a Vampire he might be found,
Pests against whom, it was understood,
Exorcism never had done any good.

But fire, they said, had been proved to be
The only infallible remedy;
So they were for burning the body outright,
Which would put a stop to his riding by night.

Others were for searching the mystery out,
And setting a guard the gallows about,
Who should keep a careful watch, and see
Whether Witch or Devil it might be
That helped him down from the triple tree; —

For that there were Witches in the land,
Was what all by this might understand;
And they must not let the occasion slip
For detecting that cursed fellowship.

Some were for this, and some for that,
And some they could not tell for what;
And never was such commotion known
In that great city of Cologne.

PART IV.

Pieter Snoye was a boor of good renown,
Who dwelt about an hour and a half from the town;
And he, while the people were all in debate,
Went quietly in at the city gate.

For Father Kijf he sought about,
His confessor, till he found him out;
But the Father Confessor wondered to see
The old man, and what his errand might be.

The good Friest did not wonder less
When Pieter said he was come to confess;
"Why, Pieter, how can this be so?
I confessed thee some ten days ago!"

"Thy conscience, methinks, may be well at rest,
An honest man among the best;
I would that all my flock, like thee,
Kept clear accounts with Heaven and me!"

Always before, without confusion,
Being sure of easy absolution,
Pieter his little slips had summ'd;
But he hesitated now, and he hau'd, and humm'd.

And something so strange the Father saw
In Pieter's looks, and his hum and his haw,
That he began to doubt it was something more
Than a trifle omitted in last week's score.

At length it came out, that in the affair
Of Roprecht the Robber he had some share;
'The Confessor then gave a start in fear—
"God grant there have been no witchcraft here!"

Pieter Snoye, who was looking down,
With something between a smile and a frown,
Felt that suspicion move his bile,
And look'd up with more of a frown than a smile.

"Fifty years I, Pieter Snoye,
Have lived in this country, man and boy,
And have always paid the Church her due,
And kept short scores with Heaven and you.

"The Devil himself, though Devil he be,
Would not dare impute that sin to me;
He might charge me as well with heresy;
And if he did, here, in this place,
I'd call him liar, and spit in his face!"

The Father, he saw, cast a gracious eye
When he heard him thus the Devil defy;
The wrath, of which he had eased his mind,
Left a comfortable sort of warmth behind,

Like what a cheerful cup will impart,
In a social hour, to an honest man's heart;
And he added, "For all the witchcraft here,
I shall presently make that matter clear.

"Though I am, as you very well know, Father Kijf,
A peaceable man, and keep clear of strife,
It's a queerish business that now I've been in;
But I can't say that it's much of a sin.

"However, it needs must be confess'd,
And as it will set this people at rest,
To come with it at once was best:
Moreover, if I delayed, I thought
That some might perhaps into trouble be brought

"Under the seal I tell it you,
And you will judge what is best to do,
That no hurt to me and my son may ensue.
No earthly harm have we intended,
And what was ill done has been well mended.

"I and my son, Piet Pieterszoon,
Were returning home by the light of the moon,
From this good city of Cologne,
On the night of the execution day;
And hard by the gibbet was our way.

"About midnight it was we were passing by,
My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and I,
When we heard a moaning as we came near,
Which made us quake at first for fear.

"But the moaning was presently heard again,
And we knew it was nothing ghostly then;
'Lord help us, Father!' Piet Pieterszoon said,
'Roprecht, for certain, is not dead!'

"So under the gallows our cart we drive,
And, sure enough, the man was alive;
Because of the irons that he was in,
He was hanging, not by the neck, but the chin.

"The reason why things had got thus wrong,
Was, that the rope had been left too long;
The Hangman's fault — a clumsy rogue,
He is not fit to hang a dog.

"Now Roprecht, as long as the people were there,
Never stirr'd hand or foot in the air;
But when at last he was left alone,
By that time so much of his strength was gone,
That he could do little more than groan.

"Piet and I had been sitting it out,
Till a latish hour, at a christening bout;
And perhaps we were rash, as you may think,
And a little soft, or so, for drink.

"Father Kijf, we could not bear
To leave him hanging in misery there;
And I was an act of mercy, I cannot but say,
To get him down, and take him away.

"And, as you know, all people said
What a goodly end that day he had made;
So we thought for certain, Father Kijf,
That, if he were saved, he would mend his life.

"My son, Piet Pieterszoon, and I,
We took him down, seeing none was nigh;
And we took off his suit of irons with care,
When we got him home, and we hid him there.

"The secret, as you may guess, was known
To Alit, my wife, but to her alone;
And never sick man, I dare aver,
Was better tended than he was by her.

"Good advice, moreover, as good could be,
He had from Alit, my wife, and me;
And no one could promise fairer than he:
So that we and Piet Pieterszoon, our son,
Thought that we a very good deed had done.

"You may well think we laughed in our sleeve,
At what the people then seem'd to believe;
Queer enough it was to hear them say,
That the Three Kings took Roprecht away; —

"Or that St. Ursula, who is in bliss,
With her Army of Virgins had done this:
The Three Kings and St. Ursula, too,
I warrant, had something better to do.

"Piet Pieterszoon, my son, and I,
We heard them talk as we stood by,
And Piet look'd at me with a comical eye.
We thought them fools, but, as you shall see,
Not over-wise ourselves were we.

"For I must tell you, Father Kijf,
That when we told this to Alit, my wife,
She at the notion perk'd up with delight,
And said she believed the people were right.

"Had not Roprecht put in the Saints his hope,
And who but they should have loosen'd the rope,
When they saw that no one could intend
To make at the gallows a better end?

"Yes, she said, it was perfectly clear
That there must have been a miracle here;
And we had the happiness to be in it,
Having been brought there just at the minute.

"And therefore it would become us to make
An offering for this favor's sake
To the Three Kings and the Virgins too,
Since we could not tell to which it was due.

"For greater honor there could be none
Than what in this business the Saints had done
To us and Piet Pieterszoon, our son;
She talk'd me over, Father Kijf,
With that tongue of hers, did Alit, my wife.

"Lord, forgive us! as if the Saints would deign
To come and help such a rogue in grain;
When the only mercy the case could admit
Would have been to make his halter fit!

"That would have made one hanging do,
In happy season for him too,
When he was in a proper cue;
And have saved some work, as you will see,
To my son, Piet Pieterszoon, and me.

"Well, Father, we kept him at bed and board,
Till his neck was cured and his strength restored,
And we should have sent him off this day
With something to help him on his way.

"But this wicked Roprecht, what did he?
Though he had been saved thus mercifully,
Hanging had done him so little good,
That he took to his old ways as soon as he could.

"Last night, when we were all asleep,
Out of his bed did this gallows-bird creep;
Piet Pieterszoon's boots and spurs he put on,
And stole my best horse, and away he was gone!

"Now Alit, my wife, did not sleep so hard,
But she heard the horse's feet in the yard;
And when she jogg'd me, and bade me awake,
My mind misgave me as soon as she spake.

"To the window my good woman went,
And watch'd which way his course he bent;
And in such time as a pipe can be lit,
Our horses were ready with bridle and bit.

"Away, as fast as we could hie,
We went, Piet Pieterszoon and I;
And still on the plain we had him in sight;
The moon did not shine for nothing that night.

"Knowing the ground, and riding fast,
We came up with him at last;
And — would you believe it? Father Kijf,
The ungrateful wretch would have taken my life,
If he had not miss'd his stroke with a knife!

"The struggle in no long time was done,
Because, you know, we were two to one;
But yet all our strength we were fain to try,
Piet Pieterszon, my son, and I."

"When we had got him on the ground,
We fastened his hands, and his legs we bound;
And across the horse we laid him then,
And brought him back to the house again.

"We have robb'd the gallow's, and that was ill
Said I to Piet Pieterszon, my son; [done!"

"And restitution we must make
To that same gallow's, for justice' sake."

"In his suit of irons the rogue we array'd,
And once again in the cart he was laid!
Night not yet so far was spent,
But there was time enough for our intent;
And back to the triple tree we went.

"His own rope was ready there;
To measure the length we took good care;
And the job which the bungling Hangman begun,
This time, I think, was properly done
By me and Piet Pieterszon, my son."

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

The legend on which this poem is founded is related in the Vida y hazañas del Gran Tamorlan, con la descripción de las Tierras de su Imperio y Señorío, escrita por Ray Gonzales de Clavijo, Camarero del muy alto y Poderoso Señor Don Enrique. Tercero deste nombre, Rey de Castilla y de Leon; con un itinerario de lo sucedido en la Embarcación, que por dicho
Señor el Rey hizo al dicho Pirata, llamado por otro nombre
Tamurbo, año del nacimiento de 1405.
The ambassadors had seen at Constantinople, in the Church of St. John of the Stone, the bravo tizniado of Sant Juan Baptista; el qual bravo era de so el ambo ayuso fasta en la mano. E este bravo fué guarnido, e non tenía salvo el cuello
e el hueso, y a las congunturas del codo a de la mano estaba guarneçida de oro con piedras. They then went to a church of our Lady, called Peribaelico, è aqui en esta Ileseza estaba el otro bravo del bienaventurado Sant Juan Baptista, el cual fué mostrado a las dichas Embajadores: el qual bravo era el derecho, y era desde el codo ayuso con su mano; è estaba bien fuémostrado a e; e como quiera que diere que todo el cuerpo del Bienaventurado Sant Juan fué que mado, salvo eluau dado de la mano derecha con que señalado quando díase, Ecce Agnes Dei, todo este dicho bravo estaba seno segun allí puseció; estaba engastado con unas vergas de oro delegadas, y falsoescle de el dedo rouler; y la razón que los Menges decía porque faltase quel dedo de allí, era esta: Decían que en la ciudad de Antioch, al tiempo que en ella avia idoleas, que anímba en ella una figura de Dragon, à que avian por costumbre las de la ciudad de dar cada uno a comer à aquel Dragon una persona.
E qui echaban seno a qual carcer; e que aquel à quien caía que non pudiere escasuar que la non comoie aquel Dragon. La qual auerse dis que capó en aquel tiempo à una fijá de un uno bueno, e que quando vido que non podía escañar de dar su fija à aquel Dragon, que une gran euittá en su corazon, e que con dolor de la fija, que se fuese à una Ileseza de Menges Christianos, que entonce en la dicha ciudad avia, è dicho à los Menges.

PART I.

PITTHYIAN was a Pagan,
An easy-hearted man,
And Pagan sure he thought to end,
As Pagan he began;
Thought he, the one must needs be true,
The old Religion, or the new,
And therefore nothing care I;
I call Diana the Divine;
My daughter worships at the shrine
Of the Christian Goddess, Mary.

In this uncertain matter
If I the wrong course take,
Mary to me will mercy show
For my Marana's sake.
If I am right, and Dian bend
Her dreadful bow, or Phoebus send
His shafts abroad for slaughter,
Safe from their arrows shall I be,
And the twin Deities for me
Will spare my dear-loved daughter.

If every one in Antioch
Had reasoned in this strain,
It never would have raised alarm
In Satan's dark domain.
But Mary's Image every day
Looks down on crowds who come to pray;
Her votaries never failer;
While Dian's temple is so bare,
That unless her Priestess take good care,
She will have a grass-green altar.

Perceiving this, the old Dragon
Inflamed with anger grew;
Earthquakes and Plagues were common ills,
There needed something new;
Some vengeance so severe and strange
That forepast times, in all their range,
With no portent could match it;
So for himself a nest he made,
And in that nest an egg he laid,
And down he sat to hatch it.

He built it by the fountain
Of Phlegothon's red flood,
In the innermost abyss, the place
Of central solitude;
Of adamantine blocks unewn,
With lava scoriar interstrown,
The sole material fittig;
With amianth he lined the nest,
And incombustible asbestos,
To bear the fiery sitting.

There, with malignant patience,
He sat in full despite,
Till this dracontine cockatrice
Should break its way to light.
Meantime his angry heart to cheer,
He thought that all this while no fear
The Antiochans stood in,
Of what, on deadliest vengeance bent,
With imperturbable intent,
He there for them was brooding.

The months of incubation
At length were duly past;
And now the infernal Dragon-chick
Hath burst its shell at last;
At which long-look'd-for sight enrap,
For joy the father Dragon clapp'd
His brazen wings like thunder,
So loudly that the mighty sound
Was like an earthquake felt around,
And all above and under.

The diabolic younging
Came out no callow birth,
Puling, defenceless, blind and weak,
Like bird or beast of earth;
Or man, most helpless thing of all
That fly, or swim, or creep, or crawl;
But in his perfect figure;
His horns, his dreadful tail, his sting,
Scales, teeth, and claws, and every thing,
Complete and in their vigor.

The Old Dragon was delighted,
And proud withal to see
In what perfection he had hatch'd
His hellish progeny;
And round and round, with fold on fold,
His tail about the imp he roll'd,
In fond and close enlacement;
And neck round neck, with many a turn,
He coild, which was, you may discern,
Their manner of embracement.

Repeated thrice the dreadful word
By every living soul was heard
Before the hour of morning.

And in the air a rushing
Past over, in the night;
And as it past, there past with it
A meteoric light;
The blind that piercing light intense
Felt in their long-seal'd visual sense,
With sudden, short sensation:
The deaf' that rushing in the sky
Could hear, and that portentous cry
Reach'd them with consternation.

The astonished Antiochans
Impatiently wait
The break of day, not knowing when
Or what might be their fate.
Alas! what then the people hear,
Only with certitude of fear
Their sinking hearts affrighted;
For in the fertile vale below,
Came news that, in that night of woe,
A Dragon had alighted.

It was no earthly monster
In Libyan deserts nurs'd;
Nor had the Lerna lake sent forth
This winged worm accruss'd;
The Old Dragon's own laied egg was this,
The fierce Young Dragon of the abyss,
Who from the fiery fountain,
Through earth's concavities, that night
Had made his way, and taken flight
Out of a burning mountain.

A voice that went before him
The cry of woe preferred;
The motion of his brazen wings
Was what the deaf had heard;
The flashing of his eyes, that light
The which upon their inward sight
The blind had felt astounded;
What wonder then, when from the wall
They saw him in the vale, if all
With terror were confounded?

Compared to that strong armor
Of scales which he was in,
The hide of a rhinoceros
Was like a lady's skin.
A battering-ram might play in vain
Upon his head, with might and main,
Though fifty men had work'd it;
And from his tail they saw him fling
Out, like a rocket, a long sting,
When he for pastime jerk'd it.

To whom of Gods or Heroes
Should they for aid apply?
Where should they look for succor now,
Or whither should they fly?
For now no Demigods were found
Like those whose deathless deeds abound
THE YOUNG DRAGON.

In ancient song and story;
No Hercules was then on earth,
Nor yet of her St. George's birth
Could Cappadocia glory.

And even these against him
Had found their strength but small;
He could have swallowed Hercules,
Club, lion-skin, and all.
Yea, had St. George himself been there
Upon the fiercest steed that e'er
To battle bore bestrider,
This dreadful Dragon, in his might,
One mouthful only, and one bite,
Had made of horse and rider.

They see how unavailing
All human force must prove;
Oh, might their earnest prayers obtain
Protection from above!
The Christians sought our Lady's shrine,
To invoke her aid divine;
And, with a like emotion,
The Pagans, on that fearful day,
Took to Diana's fane their way,
And offered their devotion.

But there the offended Goddess
Beheld them with a frown;
The indignant altar leaved itself,
And shook their offerings down;
The Priestess, with a deathlike hue,
Pale as the marble Image grew;
The marble Image redden'd;
And these poor suppliants, at the sight,
Felt, in fresh access of affright,
Their hearts within them deaden'd.

Behold the marble eyeballs
With life and motion shine!
And from the moving marble lips
There comes a voice divine,
A demon voice, by all the crowd
Distinctly heard, nor low, nor loud,
But deep, and clear, and thrilling;
And carrying to the soul such dread
That they perforce must what it said
Obey, however unwilling.

Hear! hear! it said, ye people!
The ancient Gods have sent,
In anger for your long neglect,
This signal punishment.
To mortal Mary vows were paid,
And prayers preferr'd, and offerings made;
Our temples were deserted;
Now when our vengeance makes ye wise,
Unto your proper Deities
In fear ye have reverted!

Hear now the dreadful judgment
For which ye have done:
The infernal Dragon will devour
Your daughters, one by one;
A Christian Virgin, every day,
Ye must present him for his prey,
With garlands deck'd, as meet is:
That with the Christians he begins
Is what, in mercy to your sins,
Ye owe to my entreaties.

Whether, if to my worship
Ye now continue true,
I may, when these are all consumed,
Avert the ill from you,
That on the Ancient Gods depends,
If they be made once more your friends
By your sincere repentance:
But for the present, no delay;
Cast lots among ye, and obey
The inexorable sentence.

PART III.

Though to the Pagan priesthood
A triumph this might seem,
Few families there were who thus
Could in their grief misunderstand;
For, oft in those distracted days,
Parent and child went different ways,
The sister and the brother;
And when, in spirit moved, the wife
Chose one religious course of life,
The husband took the other.

Therefore in every household
Was seen the face of fear;
They who were safe themselves, exposed
In those whom they held dear.
The lists are made, and in the urn
The names are placed to wait their turn
For this far worse than slaughter;
And from that fatal urn, the first
Drawn for this dreadful death accurs'd
Was of Pithyrian's daughter.

With Christian-like composure,
Marana heard her lot;
And though her countenance at first
Grew pale, she trembled not.
Not for herself the Virgin grieved;
She knew in whom she had believed,
Knew that a crown of glory
In Heaven would recompense her worth,
And her good name remain on earth
The theme of sacred story.

Her fears were for her father,
How he should bear this grief,
Poor wretched heathen, if he still
Remain'd in misbelief;
Her looks amid the multitude,
Who struck with deep compassion stood,
Are seeking for Pithyrian:
He cannot bear to meet her eye.
Where goest thou? whither wouldst thou fly,
Thou miserable Syrian?
Hath sudden hope inspired him,
Or is it in despair
That through the throng he made his way,
And sped he knew not where?
For how could he the sight sustain,
When now the sacrificial train
Inhumanly surround her!
How bear to see her when, with flowers
From roses and from jasmine bowers,
They like a victim crown'd her!

He knew not why nor whither
So fast he hurried thence,
But felt like one possess'd by some Controlling influence;
Nor turn'd he to Diana's flame,
Inly assured that prayers were vain
If made for such protection;
His pagan faith lie now forget,
And the wild way he took was not
His own, but Heaven's direction.

He who had never enter'd
A Christian church till then,
Except in idle mood profane,
To view the ways of men,
Now to a Christian church made straight,
And hastened through its open gate,
By his good Angel guided,
And thinking, though he knew not why,
That there some blessed Power on high
Had help for him provided.

Wildly he look'd about him
On many a form divine,
Whose Image o'er its altar stood,
And many a sculptured shrine,
In which believers might behold
Relics more precious than the gold
And jewels which encased them,
With painful search from far and near
Brought to be venerated here,
Where piety had placed them.

There stood the Virgin Mother,
Crown'd with a starry wreath,
And there the awful Crucifix
Appeared to bleed and breathe;
Martyrs to whom their palm is given,
And sainted Maids who now in Heaven
With glory are invested;
Glancing o'er these, his rapid eye
Toward one image that stood nigh
Was drawn, and there it rested.

The countenance that fix'd him
Was of a sun-burnt mien;
The face was like a Prophet's face
Inspired, but yet serene;
His arms, and legs, and feet were bare;
The raiment was of camel's hair,
That, loosely hanging round him,
Fell from the shoulders to the knee;
And round the loins, though elsewhere free,
A leathern girdle bound him.

With his right arm uplifted,
The great Precursor stood,
Thus represented to the life
In carved and painted wood.
Below the real arm was laid
Within a crystal shrine display'd
For public veneration;
Not now of flesh and blood,—but bone,
Sinews, and shrivell'd skin alone,
In ghastly preservation.

Moved by a secret impulse
Which he could not withstand,
Let me, Pithyrian cried, adore
That blessed arm and hand!
This day, this miserable day,
My pagan faith I put away,
Abjure it and abhor it;
And in the Saints I put my trust,
And in the Cross; and, if I must,
Will die a Martyr for it.

This is the arm whose succor
Heaven brings me here to seek!
Oh, let me press it to my lips,
And so its aid bespeak!
A strong faith makes me now presume
That when to this unhappy doom
A hellish power hath brought her,
The heavenly hand, whose mortal mould
I humbly worship, will unfold
Its strength, and save my daughter.

The Sacristan with wonder
And pity heard his prayer,
And placed the relic in his hand,
As he knelt humbly there.
Right thankfully the kneeling man
To that confiding Sacristan
Return'd it, after kissing;
And he within its crystal shrine
Replaced the precious arm divine,
Nor saw that aught was missing.

PART IV.

On piety audacious!
Oh boldness of belief!
Oh sacrilegious force of faith,
That then inspired the thief!
Oh wonderful extent of love,
That Saints enthroned in bliss above
Should bear such profanation,
And not by some immediate act,
Striking the offender in the fact,
Prevent the perpetration!

But sure the Saint that impulse
Himself from Heaven had sent,
In mercy predetermining
The marvellous event;
So inconceivable a thought,
Seeming with such irreverence fraught,
THE YOUNG DRAGON.

Could else have no beginning;      Midway between the Maid is left,
Nor else might such a deed be done, Alone, of human aid bereft:
As then Pithyrian ventured on,    The Dragon now hath spied her;
Yet had no fear of sinning.        But in that moment of most need,

Not as that Church he enter'd    Arriving breathless with his speed,
Did he from it depart,           Her Father stood beside her.
Like one bewildered by his grief,    On came the Dragon rampant,
But confident at heart;           Half running, half on wing,
Triumphantly he went his way,     His tail uplifted o'er his back
And bore the Holy Thumb away,    In many a spiral ring;
Elated with his plunder;         His scales he ruffled in his pride;
That Holy Thumb which well he knew His brazen pennons, waving wide,
Could pierce the Dragon through and through, Were gloriously distended;
Like Jupiter's own thunder.
His nostrils smoked; his eyes flash'd fire;
His lips were drawn; and in his ire
His mighty jaws extended.

Meantime was meek Marana    On came the Dragon rampant,
For sacrifice array'd;           Expecting there no check,
And now in sad procession forth    And open-mouth'd to swallow both
They led the flower-crown'd Maid. He stretch'd his burnish'd neck.
Of this infernal triumph vain,    Pithyrian put his daughter by,
The Pagan Priests precede the train;    Waiting for this with watchful eye,
Oh hearts devoid of pity!     And ready to prevent it;
And to behold the abhor'd event,    Within arm's length he let him come,
At far or nearer distance went    Then in he threw the Holy Thumb,
The whole of that great city.    And down his throat he sent it.

The Christians go to succor    The hugest brazen mortar
The sufferer with their prayers,    That ever yet fired bomb,
The Pagans to a spectacle    Could not have check'd this fiendish beast
Which dreadfully declares,    As did that Holy Thumb.
In this their over-ruling hour,    He stagger'd as he wheel'd short round;
Their Gods' abominable power;    His loose feet scraped along the ground,
Yet not without emotion    To lift themselves unable;
Of grief, and horror, and remorse,    His pennons in their weakness flagg'd;
And natural piety, whose force    His tail, erected late, now dragg'd,
Prevail'd o'er false devotion.    Just like a long, wet cable.

The walls and towers are cluster'd,    A rumbling and a tumbling
And every hill and height    Was heard in his inside;
That overlooks the vale, is throng'd    He gasp'd, he pant'd, he lay down,
For this accursed sight.    He roll'd from side to side;
Why art thou joyful, thou green Earth?    He moan'd, he groan'd, he snuff'd, he snored
Wherefore, ye happy Birds, your mirth    He growl'd, he howl'd, he raved, he roar'd;
Are ye in carols voicing?    But loud as were his clamors,
And thou, O Sun, in yon blue sky,    Far louder was the inward din,
How canst thou hold thy course on high    Like a hundred brawlers working in This day, as if rejoicing?    A caldron with their basons.

Already the procession    The hammering came faster,
Hath past the city gate;    More faint the moaning sound;
And now along the vale it moves    And now his body swells, and now
With solemn pace sedate.    It rises from the ground.
And now the spot before them lies    Not upward with his own consent,
Where, waiting for his promised prize,    Nor borne by his own wings, he went;
The Dragon's chosen haunt is;    Their vigor was abated;
Blacken'd beneath his blasting feet,    But lifted, no one could tell how,
Though yesterday a green retreat    By power unseen, with which he now
Beside the clear Orontes.    Was visibly inflated.

There the procession halted;    Abominable Dragon,
The Priests on either hand    Now art thou overmatch'd;
Dividing then, a long array,    Now art thou overmatch'd;
EPILOGUE TO THE YOUNG DRAGON.

407

And better had it been for thee
That thou hast ne'er been hatch'd;
For now, distended like a ball
To its full stretch, in sight of all,
The body mounts ascendant;
The head before, the tail behind,
The wings, like sails that want a wind,
On either side are pendant.

Not without special mercy
Was he thus borne on high,
Till he appear'd no bigger than
An Eagle in the sky.
For when about some three miles height,
Yet still in perfect reach of sight,—
Oh, wonder of all wonders!—
He burst in pieces, with a sound
Heard for a hundred leagues around,
And like a thousand thunders.

But had that great explosion
Been in the lower sky,
All Antioch would have been laid
In ruins, certainly.
And in that vast assembled rout
Who crowded joyfully about
Pithyrian and his daughter,
The splinters of the monster's hide
Must needs have made on every side
A very dreadful slaughter.

So far the broken pieces
Were now dispersed around,
And shiver'd so to dust, that not
A fragment e'er was found.
The Holy Thumb, (so it is thought,) When it this miracle had wrought,
At once to Heaven ascended;
As if, when it had thus display'd
Its power, and saved the Christian Maid,
Its work on earth was ended.

But at Constantinople
The arm and hand were shown,
Until the mighty Ottoman
O'erthrew the Grecian throne.
And when the Monks, this tale who told
To pious visitors, would hold
The holy hand for kissing,
They never fail'd, with faith devout,
In confirmation to point out
That there the Thumb was missing.

Keswick, 1829.

EPILOGUE

TO

THE YOUNG DRAGON.

I told my tale of the Holy Thumb
That split the Dragon asunder,
A TALE OF PARAGUAY; PREFACE.

I know in what responsive minds
My lightest lay will wake
A sense of pleasure, for its own,
And for its author's sake.

I know the eyes in which the light
Of memory will appear;
I know the lips, which, while they read,
Will wear a smile sincere; —

The hearts to which my sportive song
The thought of days will bring,
When they and I, whose Winter now
Comes on, were in our Spring.

And I their well-known voices too,
Though far away, can hear,

Distinctly, even as when in dreams
They reach the inward ear.

There speaks the man we knew of yore,'
Well pleased I hear them say;
'Such was he in his lighter moods,
Before our heads were gray.

'Booyant he was in spirit, quick
Of fancy, blithe of heart,
And Care, and Time, and Change have left
Untouch'd his better part.'

'Thus say my morning friends who now
Are in the vale of years,
And I, save such as thus may rise,
Would draw no other tears.'

Ballads and Metrical Tales.

Vol. II.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The two volumes of this collection, which consist of Ballads and Metrical Tales, contain the Author's earliest and latest productions of that kind; those which were written with most facility and most glee, and those upon which most time and pains were bestowed, according to the subject and the mode of treating it.

The Tale of Paraguay was published separately in 1825, having been so long in hand that the Dedication was written many years before the Poem was completed.

All for Love, and The Legend of a Cock and a Hen, were published together in a little volume in 1829.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

One of my friends observed to me, in a letter, that many stories which are said to be founded on fact, have in reality been founded on it. This is the case, if there be any gross violation committed, or ignorance betrayed, of historical manners in the prominent parts of a narrative wherein the writer affects to observe them; or when the groundwork is taken from some part of history so popular and well known that any mixture of fiction disturbs the sense of truth. Still more so, if the subject be in itself so momentous that any alloy of invention must of necessity degrade it; but most of all in themes drawn from Scripture, whether from the more familiar or the more awful portions; for when what is true is sacred, whatever may be added to it is so surely felt to be false, that it appears profane.

Founded on fact the Poem is, which is here committed to the world; but, whatever may be its defects, it is liable to none of these objections. The story is so singular, so simple, and, withal, so complete, that it must have been injured by any alteration. How faithfully it has been followed, the reader may perceive, if he chooses to consult the abridged translation of Dobrizhoffer's History of the Abipones; and for those who may be gratified with what Pinkerton has well called the lively singularity of the old man's Latin, the passage from the original is here subjoined.

Dedication.

To Edith May Southey.

1. Edith! ten years are number'd, since the day,
Which ushers in the cheerful month of May,
To us by thy dear birth, my daughter dear,
Was blest. Thou therefore didst the name partake
Of that sweet month, the sweetest of the year;
But fashioned it was given thee for the sake
Of a good man, thy father's friend sincere,
Who at the font made answer in thy name.
Thy love and reverence rightly may he claim,
For closely hath he been with me allied
In friendship's holy bonds, from that first hour
When in our youth we met on Tejo's side;
Bonds which, defying now all Fortune's power,
Time hath not loos'nd, nor will death divide.

2. A child more welcome, by indulgent Heaven
Never to parents' tears and prayers was given:
For scarcely eight months at thy happy birth
Had pass'd, since of thy sister we were left,—
Our first-born and our only babe, bereft.
Too fair a flower was she for this rude earth!
The features of her beautiful infancy
Have faded from me, like a passing cloud,
Or like the gleans of an evening sky:
And seldom hath my tongue pronounced her name
Since she was summoned to a happier sphere.
But that dear love, so deeply wounded then,
I in my soul with silent faith sincere
Devoutly cherish till we meet again.

3. I saw thee first with trembling thankfulness,
O daughter of my hopes and of my fears!
Press'd on thy senseless cheek a troubled kiss,
And breathed my blessing over thee with tears.
But memory did not long our bliss alloy;
For gentle nature, who had given relief,
Wear'd with new love the chasten'd heart from grief;
And the sweet season minister'd to joy.

4. It was a season when their leaves and flowers
The trees as to an Arctic summer spread;
When chilling wintry winds and snowy showers,
Which had too long usurp'd the vernal hours,
Like spectres from the sight of morning, fled
Before the presence of that joyous May;
And groves and gardens all the live-long day
Rung with the birds' loud love-songs. Over all,
One thrush was heard from morn till even-fall;

A TALE OF PARAGUAY; DEDICATION; PROEM. 501

Thy Mother well remembers when she lay
The happy prisoner of the genial bed,
How from thy lofty poplar's topmost spray,
At earliest dawn his thrilling pipe was heard;
And when the light of evening died away,
That blithe and indefatigable bird
Still his redundant song of joy and love preferr'd.

5.
How I have doted on thine infant smiles
At morning, when thine eyes unclosed on mine;
How, as the months in swift succession roll'd,
I mark'd thy human faculties unfold,
And watch'd the dawning of the light divine;
And with what artifice of playful guiles
Won from thy lips with still-repeated miles
Kiss after kiss, a reckoning often told,—
Something I seen thou know'st; for thou hast seen
Thy sisters in their turn such fondness prove,
And felt how childhood, in its winning years,
The attempter's soul to tenderness can move.
This thou canst tell; but not the hopes and fears
With which a parent's heart doth overflow,—
The thoughts and cares inwoven with that love,—
Its nature and its depth, thou dost not, canst not know.

6.
The years which since thy birth have pass'd away
May well to thy young retrospect appear
A measureless extent:—like yesterday
To me, so soon they fill'd their short career.
To thee discourse of reason have they brought,
With sense of time and change; and something too
Of this precocious state of things have taught,
Where Man abideth never in one stay;
And of mortality a mournful thought.
And I have seen thine eyes suffused in grief,
When I have said that with autumnal gray
The touch of old hath mark'd thy father's head;
That even the longest day of life is brief,
And mine is falling fast into the yellow leaf.

7.
Thy happy nature from the painful thought
With instinct turns, and scarcely canst thou bear
To hear me name the Grave. Thou knowest not
How large a portion of my heart is there!
The faces which I loved in infancy
Are gone; and bosom-friends of riper age,
With whom I fondly talk'd of years to come,
Summon'd before me to their heritage
Are in the better world, beyond the tomb.
And I have brethren there, and sisters dear,
And dearer babes. I therefore needs must dwell
Often in thought with those whom still I love so well.

8.
Thus wilt thou feel in thy maturer mind;
When grief shall be thy portion, thou wilt find Safe consolation in such thoughts as these;—
A present refuge in affliction's hour.
And if indulgent Heaven thy lot should bless
With all imaginable happiness,
Here shalt thou have, my child, beyond all power
Of chance, thy holiest, surest, best delight.
Take therefore now thy Father's latest lay,—
Perhaps his last;—and treasure in thine heart
The feelings that its musing strains convey.
A song it is of life's declining day,
Yet meet for youth. Vain passions to excite,
No strains of morbid sentiment I sing,
Nor tell of idle loves with ill-spent breath;
A reverent offering to the Grave I bring,
And twine a garland for the brow of Death.

Keswick, 1814.

PROEM.

That was a memorable day for Spain,
When on Pamplona's towers, so basely won,
The Frenchmen stood, and saw upon the plain
Their long-expected succors hastening on:
Exultingly they mark'd the brave array,
And deem'd their leader should his purpose gain,
Though Wellington and England barr'd the way.
Anon the bayonets glitter'd in the sun,
And frequent cannon flash'd, whose lurid light
Redden'd through sulphurous smoke; vast volleying round
Roll'd the war-thunders, and with long rebound
Backward from many a rock and cloud-capt height
In answering peals Pyrene sent the sound.
Impatient for relief, toward the fight
The hungry garrison their eye-balls strain:
Vain was the Frenchman's skill, his valor vain;
And even then, when eager hope almost
Had mov'd their irrepressible lips to prayer,
Averting from the fatal scene their sight,
They breathed the execrations of despair.
For Wellesley's star hath risen ascendant there,
Once more he drove the host of France to flight,
And triumph'd once again for God and for the right.

That was a day, whose influence far and wide
The struggling nations felt; it was a joy
Wherewith all Europe rung from side to side.
Yet hast Pamplona seen, in former time,
A moment big with mightier consequence,
Affecting many an age and distant clime.
That day it was which saw in her defence,
Contending with the French before her wall,
A noble soldier of Guipuzcoa fail,
Sore hurt, but not to death. For when long care
Restored his shatter'd leg, and set him free,
He would not brook a slight deformity,
As one who, being gay and debonair,
In courts conspicuous as in camps must be:
So he, forsooth, a shapely boot must wear;
And the vain man, with peril of his life,
Laid the recover'd limb again beneath the knife.
Long time upon the bed of pain he lay,
Whiling with books the weary hours away;
And from that circumstance and this vain man
A train of long events their course began,
Whose term it is not given us yet to see,
Who hath not heard Loyola’s sainted name,
Before whom Kings and Nations bow’d the knee?
Thy annals, Ethiopia, might proclaim
What deeds arose from that prolific day;
And of dark plots might shuddering Europe tell.
But Science, too, her trophies would display;
Faith give the martyrs of Japan their fame;
And Charity on works of love would dwell
In California’s dolorous regions drear;
And where, amid a pathless world of wood,
Gathering a thousand rivers on his way,
Huge Orellana rolls his affluent flood;
And where the hap-pier sons of Paraguay,
By gentleness and pious art subdued,
Bow’d their meek heads beneath the Jesuits’ sway,
And lived and died in filial servitude.

I love thus uncontr’l’d, as in a dream,
To muse upon the course of human things;
Exploring sometimes the remotest springs,
Far as tradition lends one guiding gleam;
Or following, upon Thought’s audacious wings,
Into Futurity, the endless stream.
But now, in quest of no ambitious height,
I go where Truth and Nature lead my way,
And ceasing here from desultory flight,
In measured strains I tell a Tale of Paraguay.

CANTO I.

1.
Jenner! forever shall thy honor’d name
Among the children of mankind be bless’d,
Who by thy skill last taught us how to tame
One dire disease,—the lamentable pest
Which Africa sent forth to scourge the West,
As if in vengeance for her sable brood
So many an age remorselessly oppress’d.
For that most fearful malady subdued
Receive a poet’s praise, a father’s gratitude.

2.
Fair promise be this triumph of an age
When Man, with vain desires no longer blind,
And wise, though late, his only war shall wage,
Against the miseries which afflict mankind,
Striving with virtues heart and strenuous mind
Till evil from the earth shall pass away.
Lo, this his glorious destiny assign’d!
For that bless’d consummation let us pray,
And trust in fervent faith, and labor as we may.

3.
The hideous malady which lost its power
When Jenner’s art the dire contagion stay’d,
Among Columbia’s sons, in fatal hour,
Across the wide Atlantic wave convey’d,
Its fiercest form of pestilence display’d:
Where’er its deadly course the plague began,
Vainly the wretched sufferer looked for aid;
Parent from child, and child from parent ran,
For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bonds of man.

4.
A feeble nation of Guaranis race,
Thinn’d by perpetual wars, but unsubdued,
Had taken up at length a resting-place
Among those tracts of lake, and swamp, and wood,
Where Mondai, issuing from its solitude,
Flows with slow stream to Empalado’s bed.
It was a region desolate and rude;
But thither had the horde for safety fled,
And being there conceal’d, in peace their lives they led.

5.
There had the tribe a safe asylum found
Amid those marshes wide and woodlands dense,
With pathless wilds and waters spread around,
And labyrinthine swamps, a sure defence
From human foes,—but not from pestilence.
The spotted plague appear’d, that direst ill;
How brought among them none could tell, or whence;
The mortal seed had laud among them still,
And quicken’d now to work the Lord’s mysterious will.

6.
Alas, it was no medicable grief
Which herbs might reach! Nor could the juggler’s power,
With all his antic mummeries, bring relief.
Faith might not aid him in that ruling hour,
Himself a victim now. The dreadful stour
None could escape, nor aught its force assuage.
The marriageable maiden had her dower
From death; the strong man sunk beneath its rage,
And death cut short the thread of childhood and of age.

7.
No time for customary mourning now;
With hand close-clinch’d to pluck the rooted hair,
To beat the bosom, on the swelling brow
Inflict redoubled blows, and blindly tear
The cheeks, indelent bloody furrows there,
The deep-traced signs indelible of woe;
Then to some crag, or bank abrupt, repair,
And giving grief its scope, infuriate throw
The impatient body thence upon the earth below.

8.
Devices these by poor, weak nature taught,
Which thus a change of suffering would obtain;
And flying from intolerable thought,
And piercing recollections, would full fain
Dissolve itself by sense of fleshly pain
From anguish that the soul must else endure,
Easier all outward torments to sustain,
Than those heart-wounds which only time can cure,
And He in whom alone the hopes of man are sure.

9.
None sorrow’d here; the sense of woe was scar’d,
When every one endured his own sore ill.
The prostrate sufferers neither hoped nor fear’d;
The body labor’d, but the heart was still:
So let the conquering malady fulfill
Its fatal course, rest cometh at the end!
Passive they lay with neither wish nor will
For aught but this; nor did they long attend
That welcome boon from death, the never-failing friend.

10.
Who is there to make ready now the pit,
The house that will content from this day forth
Its easy tenant? Who in vestments fit
Shall swath the sleeper for his bed of earth,
Now tractable as when a babe at birth?
Who now the ample funeral urn shall knead,
And, burying it beneath his proper earth,
Deposit there with careful hands the dead,
And lightly then relay the floor above his head?

11.
Unwept, unshrouded, and unsepulchred,
The hammock, where they hang, for winding-sheet
And grave suffices the deserted dead:
There from the annadillo’s searching feet
Safer than if within the tomb’s retreat.
The carrion birds obscene in vain essay
To find that quarry: round and round they beat
The air, but fear to enter for their prey,
And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

12.
But nature for her universal law
Hath other, surer instruments in store,
Whom from the haunts of men no wond’ring awe
Withholds as with a spell. In swarms they pour
From wood and swamp; and when their work is o’er,
On the white bones the mouldering roof will fall;
Seeds will take root, and spring in sun and shower;
And Mother Earth ere long with her green pall,
Resuming to herself the wreck, will cover all.

13.
Oh! better thus with earth to have their part,
Than in Egyptian catacombs to lie,
Age after age preserved by horrid art,
In ghastly image of humanity!
Strange pride that with corruption thus would vie!
And strange delusion that would thus maintain
The fleshy form, till cycles shall pass by,
And in the series of the eternal chain,
The spirit come to seek its old abode again.

14.
One pair alone survived the general fate;
Left in such dear and mournful solitude,
That death might seem a preferable state.
Not more depress’d the Arkite patriarch stood,
When landing first on Arrarat he view’d,
Where all around the mountain summits lay,
Like islands seen amid the boundless flood:
Nor our first parents more forlorn than they,
Through Eden when they took their solitary way.

15.
Alike to them it seem’d, in their despair,
Whither they wander’d from the infected spot.
Chance might direct their steps: they took no care;
Come well or ill to them, it matter’d not!
Left as they were in that unhappy lot,
The sole survivors they of all their race,
They reck’d not when their fate, nor where, nor what,
In this resignation to their hopeless case,
Indifferent to all choice or circumstance of place

16.
That palsying stupor past away ere long,
And as the spring of health resumed its power,
They felt that life was dear, and hope was strong.
What marvel? ’twas with them the morning hour,
When bliss appears to be the natural dower
Of all the creatures of this joyous earth;
And sorrow, fleeting, like a vernal shower,
Scarcely interrupts the current of our mirth;
Such is the happy heart we bring with us at birth.

17.
Though of his nature and his boundless love,
Erring, yet tutor’d by instinctive sense,
They rightly deem’d the Power who rules above
Had saved them from the wasting pestilence.
That favoring power would still be their defence;
Thus were they by their late deliverance taught
To place a child-like trust in Providence,
And in their state forlorn they found this thought
Of natural faith with hope and consolation fraught.

18.
And now they built themselves a leafy bower,
Amid a glade, slow Mondial’s stream beside,
Screen’d from the southern blast of piercing power;
Not like their native dwelling, long and wide,
By skilful toil of numbers edified,
The common home of all, their human nest,
Where threescore hammocks, pendant side by side,
Were ranged, and on the ground the fires were dress’d;
Alas, that populous hive hath now no living guest!

19.
A few firm stakes they planted in the ground,
Circling a narrow space, yet large enow;
These, strongly interknit, they closed around
With basket-work of many a plant bough.
The roof was like the sides; the door was low,
And rude the hut, and trimm'd with little care,
For little heart had they to dress it now;
Yet was the humble structure fresh and fair,
And soon its inmates found that love might sojourn there.

20.
Quiara could recall to mind the course
Of twenty summers; perfectly he knew
Whate'er his fathers taught of skill or force.
Right to the mark his whizzing lance he threw,
And from his bow the unerring arrow flew
With fatal aim: and when the laden bee
Buzz'd by him in its flight, he could pursue
Its path with certain ken, and follow free
Until he traced the hive in hidden bank or tree.

21.
Of answering years was Monnema, nor less
Expert in all her sex's household ways.
The Indian weed she skilfully could dress;
And in what depth to drop the yellow maize
She knew, and when around its stem to raise
The lighten'd soil; and well could she prepare
Its ripen'd seed for food, her proper praise;
Or in the cambers turn with frequent care
Its succulent head yet green, sometimes for daintier fare.

22.
And how to macerate the bark she knew,
And draw apart its beaten fibres fine,
And bleaching them in sun, and air, and dew,
From dry and glossy filaments entwine,
With rapid twirl of hand, the lengthening line;
Next interknotting well the twisted thread,
In many an even mesh its knots combine,
And shape in tapering length the pensile bed,
Light hammock there to hang beneath the leafy shed.

23.
Time had been when, expert in works of clay,
She lent her hands the swelling urn to mould,
And fill'd it for the appointed festal day
With the beloved beverage which the bold
Quaff'd in their triumph and their joy of old;
The fruitful cause of many an uproar rude,
When, in their drunken bravery uncontrol'd,
Some bitter jest awoke the dormant feud,
And wrath, and rage, and strife, and wounds, and death ensued.

24.
These occupations were gone by: the skill
Was useless now, which once had been her pride.
Content were they, when thirst impell'd, to fill
The dry and hollow gourd from Mondai's side;
The river from its sluggish bed supplied
A draught for repetition all unmeet;
Howbeit the bodily want was satisfied;
No feverish pulse ensued, nor irritable heat;
Their days were undisturbed, their natural sleep was sweet.

25.
She, too, had learn'd in youth how best to trim
The honor'd Chief for his triumphal day,
And covering with soft gowns the obedient limb
And body, then with feathers overlay,
In regular hues disposed, a rich display.
Well pleased the glorious savage stood, and eyed
The growing work; then, vain of his array,
Look'd with complacent from side to side,
Stalk'd with stouter step, and swell'd with statelier pride.

26.
Feasts and carousals, vanity and strife,
Could have no place with them in solitude
To break the tenor of their even life.
Quiara day by day his game pursued,
Searching the air, the water, and the wood,
With hawk-like eye, and arrow sure as fate;
And Monnema prepared the hunter's food:
Cast with him here in this forlorn estate.
In all things for the man was she a fitting mate.

27.
The Moon had gather'd oft her monthly store
Of light, and off in darkness left the sky,
Since Monnema a growing burden bore
Of life and hope. The appointed weeks go by;
And now her hour is come, and none is nigh
To help: but human help she needed none.
A few short threes endued with scarce a cry,
Upon the bank she laid her new-born son,
Then slid into the stream, and bathed, and all was done.

28.
Might old observances have there been kept,
Then should the husband to that pensile bed,
Like one exhausted with the birth, have creep'd,
And laying down in feeble guise his head,
For many a day been nursed and dieted
With tender care, to childling mothers due.
Certes a custom strange, and yet far spread
Through many a savage tribe, bow'er it grew,
And once in the old world known as widely as the new.

29.
This could not then be done; he might not lay
The bow and those unerring shafts aside;
Nor through the appointed weeks forego the prey,
Still to be sought amid those regions wide,
None being there who should the while provide
That lonely household with their needful food:
So, still Quiara through the forest plied
His daily task, and in the thickest wood
Still laid his snares for birds, and still the chase pursued.

30.
But seldom may such thoughts of mingled joy
A father's agitated breast dilate,
As when he first beheld that infant boy.
Who hath not proved it, ill can estimate
The feeling of that stirring hour,—the weight
Of that new sense, the thoughtful, pensive bliss.
In all the changes of our changeable state,
Even from the cradle to the grave, I wis,
The heart doth undergo no change so great as this.

31.
A deeper and unwonted feeling fill'd
These parents, gazing on their new-born son.
Already in their busy hopes they build
On this frail sand. Now let the seasons run,
And let the natural work of time be done
With them,—for unto them a child is born;
And when the hand of Death may reach the one,
The other will not now be left to mourn
A solitary wretch, all utterly forlorn.

32.
Thus Monnema and thus Quiara thought,
Though each the melancholy thought repress'd;
They could not choose but feel, yet utter'd not
The human feeling, which in hours of rest
Often would rise, and fill the bounding breast
With a dread foretaste of that mournful day,
When, at the inexorable Power's behest,
The unwilling spirit, called forlorn away,
Must leave, forever leave, its dear connatural clay.

33.
Link'd as they were, where each to each was all,
How might the poor survivor hope to bear
That heaviest loss which one day must befall,
Nor sink beneath the weight of his despair?
Scarce could the heart even for a moment dare
That miserable time to contemplate,
When the dread Messenger should find them there,
From whom is no escape,—and reckless Fate,
Whom it had bound so close, forever separate.

34.
Lighter that burden lay upon the heart
When this dear babe was born to share their lot;
They could endure to think that they must part.
Then too a glad consolatory thought
Arose, while gazing on the child they sought
With hope their dreary prospect to delude,
Till they almost believed, as fancy taught,
How that from them a tribe should spring renewed,
To people and possess that ample solitude.

35.
Such hope they felt, but felt that was to be
The undiscoverable to come might prove,
Unwise it were to let that bootless care
Disturb the present hours of peace and love.
For they had gained a happiness above
The state which in their native horde was known;
No outward causes were there here to move
Discord and alien thoughts; being thus alone
From all mankind, their hearts and their desires were one.

36.
Different their love in kind and in degree
From what their poor depraved forefathers knew,
With whom degenerate instincts were left free
To take their course, and blindly to pursue,
Unheeding they the ills that must ensue,
The bent of brute desire. No moral tie
Bound the hard husband to his servile crew
Of wives; and they the chance of change might try,
All love destroy'd by such preposterous liberty.

37.
Far other tie this solitary pair
Indissolubly bound; true helpmates they,
In joy or grief, in weal or woe to share,
In sickness or in health, through life's long day;
And reasuming in their hearts her sway
Benignant Nature made the burden light.
It was the Woman's pleasure to obey,
The Man's to ease her toil in all he might;
So each in serving each obtain'd the best delight.

38.
And as connubial, so parental love
Obey'd unerring Nature's order here,
For now no force of impious custom strove
Against her law; —such as was wont to rear
The unhappy heart with usages severe,
Till hardened mothers in the grave could lay
Their living babes with no compunctious tear;
So monstrous men become, when from the way
Of primal light they turn through heathen paths astray.

39.
Deliver'd from this yoke, in them henceforth
The springs of natural love may freely flow:
New joys, new virtues with that happy birth
Are born, and with the growing infant grow.
Source of our purest happiness below
Is that benignant law which hath entwined
Dearest delight with strongest duty, so
That in the healthy heart and righteous mind
Ever they co-exist, inseparably combined.

40.
Oh! bliss for them when in that infant face
They now the unfolding faculties desery,
And fondly gazing, trace — or think they trace —
The first faint speculation in that eye,
Which hitherto hath roll'd in vacancy!
Oh! bliss in that soft countenance to seek
Some mark of recognition, and espy
The quiet smile which in the innocent cheek
Of kindness and of kind its consciousness doth speak!

41.
For him, if born among their native tribe,
Some haughty name his parents had thought good,
As weening that wherewith they should ascribe
The strength of some fierce tenant of the wood,
The water, or the aerial solitude,
Jaguar or vulture, water-wolf or snake,
The beast that prowls abroad in search of blood,
Or reptile that within the treacherous brake
Waits for the prey, upcoil’d, its hunger to askale.

42.
Now soften’d as their spirits were by love,
Abhorrent from such thoughts they turn’d away;
And with a happier feeling, from the dove,
They named the child Yeruiti. On a day,
When, smiling at his mother’s breast in play,
They in his tones of murmuring pleasure heard
A sweet resemblance of the stock-dove’s lay,
Fondly they named him from that gentle bird;
And soon such happy use endure’d the fitting word.

43.
Days past, and moons have wax’d and waned,
and still
This dovelet, nestled in their leafy bower,
Obtains increase of sense, and strength, and will,
As in due order many a latent power
Expands,—humanity’s exalted dower;
And they, while thus the days serenely fled,
Beheld him flourish as a vigorous flower,
Which, lifting from a genial soil its head,
By seasonable suns and kindly showers is fed.

44.
Erelong the cares of helpless babyhood
To the next stage of infancy give place,
That age with sense of conscious growth endued,
When every gesture hath its proper grace:
Then come the unsteady step, the tottering pace;
And watchful hopes and emulous thoughts appear;
The imitative lips essay to trace
Their words, observant both with eye and ear,
In muffled sounds which parents love to hear.

45.
Serenely thus the seasons pass away;
And, oh! how rapidly they seem to fly
With those for whom to-morrow, like to-day,
Glides on in peaceable uniformity!
Five years have since Yeruti’s birth gone by,
Five happy years;—and ere the Moon which then
Hung like a Sylphid’s light canoe on high
Should fill its circle, Momnema, again,
Laying her burden down, must bear a mother’s pain.

46.
Alas, a keener pang, before that day,
Must by the wretched Momnema be borne!
In quest of game Quiara went his way
To roam the wilds, as he was wont, one morn;
She look’d in vain at eve for his return,
By moonlight, through the midnight solitude,
She sought him; and she found his garments torn,
His bow and useless arrows in the wood,
Marks of a jaguar’s feet, a broken spear, and blood.

CANTO II.

1.
O thou who, listening to the Poet’s song,
Dost yield thy willing spirit to his sway,
Look not that I should painfully prolong
The sad narration of that fatal day
With tragic details; all too true the lay!
Nor is my purpose e’er to entertain
The heart with useless grief; but, as I may,
Blend in my calm and meditative strain
Consolatory thoughts, the balm for real pain.

2.
O Youth or Maiden, whose heart thou art,
Safe in my guidance may thy spirit be;
I would not wantonly the tender heart;
And if sometimes a tear of sympathy
Should rise, it will from bitterness be free—
Yea, with a healing virtue be ended,
As thou, in this true tale, shalt hear from me
Of evils overcome, and grief subdued,
And virtues springing up like flowers in solitude.

3.
The unhappy Momnema, when thus bereft,
Sunk not beneath the desolating blow.
Widow’d she was; but still her child was left;
For him must she sustain the weight of woe,
Which else would in that hour have laid her low.
Nor wish’d she now the work of death complete;
Then only doth the soul of woman know
Its proper strength, when love and duty meet;
Invincible the heart wherein they have their seat.

4.
The seamen who, upon some coral reef,
Are cast amid the interminable main,
Still cling to life, and, hoping for relief,
Drag on their days of wretchedness and pain.
In turtle-shells they hoard the scanty rain,
And eat its flesh, sun-dried for lack of fire,
Till the weak body can no more sustain
Its wants, but sinks beneath its sufferings dire;
Most miserable man who sees the rest expire!

5.
He lingers there while months and years go by,
And holds his hope though months and years have past;
And still at morning round the farthest sky,
And still at eve his eagle glance is cast,
If there he may behold the far-off mast
Arise, for which he hath not ceased to pray.

6.
He lingers there while months and years go by,
And holds his hope though months and years have past;
And still at morning round the farthest sky,
And still at eve his eagle glance is cast,
If there he may behold the far-off mast
Arise, for which he hath not ceased to pray.

So strong a hold hath life upon the soul,
Which sees no dawning of eternal light,
But subject to this mortal frame’s control,
Forgetful of its origin and right,
Content in bondage dwells and utter night.
By worthier ties was this poor mother bound
To life; even while her grief was at the height,
Then in maternal love support she found,
And in maternal cares a healing for her wound.

7.
For now her hour is come: a girl is born,
Poor infant, all unconscious of its fate,
How passing strange, how utterly forlorn!
The genial season served to mitigate,
In all it might, their sorrowful estate,
Supplying to the mother, at her door,
From neighboring trees, which bent beneath their weight,
A full supply of fruitage now mature;
So in that time of need their sustenance was sure.

8.
Nor then alone, but alway did the Eye
Of Mercy look upon that lonely bower.
Days past, and weeks; and months and years went by,
And never evil thing the while had power
To enter there. The boy, in sun and shower,
Rejoicing in his strength to youthfed grew;
And Mooma, that beloved girl, a dower
Of gentleness from bounteous nature drew,
With all that should the heart of womankind imbue.

9.
The tears which o'er her infancy were shed
Profuse, resented not of grief alone:
Maternal love their bitterness alloy'd,
And, with a strength and virtue all its own,
Sustain'd the breaking heart. A look, a tone,
A gesture of that innocent babe, in eyes
With saddest recollections overflown,
Would sometimes make a tender smile arise,
Like sunshine opening through a shower in vernal skies.

10.
No looks but those of tenderness were found
To turn upon that helpless infant dear;
And as her sense unfolded, never sound
Of wrath or discord brake upon her car.
Her soul its native purity sincere
Possess'd, by no example here defiled;
From envious passions free, exempt from fear,
Unknowning of all ill, amid the wild
Beloving and beloved she grew, a happy child.

11.
Yea, where that solitary bower was placed,
Though all unlike to Paradise the scene,
(A wide circumference of woodlands waste,) Something of what in Eden might have been
Was shadow'd there imperfectly, I ween,
In this fair creature: safe from all offence,
Expanding like a shelter'd plant serene,
Evils that fret and sting being far from thence,
Her heart in peace and joy retain'd its innocence.

12.
At first the infant to Yeruti proved
A cause of wonder and disturbing joy.
A stronger tie than that of kindred moved
His innost being, as the happy boy
Felt in his heart of hearts, without alloy,
The sense of kind: a fellow creature she,
In whom, when now she ceased to be a toy
For tender sport, his soul rejoiced to see
Connatural powers expand, and growing sympathy

13.
For her he cull'd the fairest flowers, and sought
Throughout the woods the fairest fruits for her.
The cayman's eggs, the honeycomb he brought
To this beloved sister,—whatsoe'er,
To his poor thought, of delicate or rare
The wilds might yield, solicitous to find.
They who affirm all natural acts declare
Self-love to be the ruder of the mind,
Judge from their own mean hearts, and foully
Wrong mankind.

14.
Three souls in whom no selfishness had place
Were here; three happy souls, which undefiled,
Albeit in darkness, still retain'd a trace
Of their celestial origin. The wild
Was as a sanctuary where Nature smiled
Upon these simple children of her own,
And, cherishing whate'er was meek and mild,
Call'd forth the gentle virtues, such alone,
The evils which evoke the stronger being unknown.

15.
What though at birth we bring with us the seed
Of sin, a mortal taint,—in heart and will
Too surely felt, too plainly shown in deed,—
Our fatal herbage; yet are we still
The children of the All-Merciful; and ill
They teach, who tell us that from hence must flow
God's wrath, and then, his justice to fulfill,
Death everlasting, never-ending woe:
O miserable lot of man if it were so!

16.
Falsely and impiously teach they who thus
Our heavenly Father's holy will misread!
In bounty hath the Lord created us,
In love redeem'd. From this authentic creed
Let no bewildering sophistry impede
The heart's entire assent, for God is good.
Hold firm this faith, and, in whatever need,
Doubt not but thou wilt find thy soul endued
With all-sufficing strength of heavenly fortitude!

17.
By nature pecetable and frail are we,
Easily beguiled; to vice, to error prone;
But apt for virtue too. Humanity
Is not a field where taxes and thorns alone
Are left to spring; good seed hath there been sown
With no unsparing hand. Sometimes the shoot
Is choked with weeds, or withers on a stone;
But in a kindly soil it strikes its root,
And flourishest, and bringeth forth abundant fruit.

18.
Love, duty, generous feeling, tenderness,
Spring in the uncontaminated mind;
And these were Moona's natural dower. Nor less
Had liberal Nature to the boy assign'd,
Happier herein than if 'mong mankind
Their lot had fallen,—oh, certes happier here!
That all things tended still more close to bind
Their earliest ties, and they from year to year
Retain'd a childish heart, fond, simple, and sincere.

19.
They had no sad reflection to alloy
The calm contentment of the passing day,
Nor foresight to disturb the present joy.
Not so with Monnema; albeit the sway
Of time had reach'd her heart, and worn away,
At length, the grief so deeply seated there,
The future often, like a burden, lay
Upon that heart, a cause of secret care
And melancholy thought; yet did she not despair.

20.
Chance from the fellowship of human kind
Had cut them off, and chance might reunite.
On this poor possibility her mind
Reposed; she did not for herself invite
The unlikely thought, and cherish with delight
The dream of what such change might happily bring;
Gladness with hope long since had taken flight
From her; she felt that life was on the wing,
And happiness, like youth, has here no second spring.

21.
So were her feelings to her lot composed,
That to herself all change had now been pain.
For Time upon her own desires had closed;
But in her children as she lived again,
For their dear sake she learnt to entertain
A wish for human intercourse renew'd;
And oftentimes, while they devour'd the strain,
Would she beguile their evening solitude
With stories strangely told and strangely understood.

22.
Little she knew, for little had she seen,
And little of traditionary lore
Had reach'd her ear; and yet to them, I ween,
Their mother's knowledge seem'd a boundless store.
A world it opened to their thoughts, yea, more,—
Another world beyond this mortal state.
Bereft of her, they had indeed been poor;
Being left to animal sense, degenerate;
Mere creatures, they had sunk below the beasts' estate.

23.
The human race, from her they understood,
Was not within that lonely hut confined,
But distant far beyond their world of wood
Were tribes and powerful nations of their kind;
And of the old observances which bind
People and chief, the ties of man and wife,
The laws of kin religiously assign'd,
Rites, customs, scenes of riotry and strife,
And all the strange vicissitudes of savage life.

24.
Wondering they listen to the wondrous tale;
But no repining thought such tales excite:
Only a wish, if wishes might avail,
Was haply felt, with juvenile delight,
To mingle in the social dance at night,
Where the broad moonshine, level as a flood,
O'erspread the plain, and in the silver light,
Well pleased, the placid elders sat and view'd
The sport, and seem'd therein to feel their youth renew'd.

25.
But when the darker scenes their mother drew,
What crimes were wrought when drunken fury
raged;
What miseries from their fatal discord grew,
When horde with horde in deadly strife engaged;
The rancorous hate with which their wars they waged;
The more unnatural horrors which ensued,
When, with invertebrate vengeance unassuaged,
The victors round their slaughter'd captives
stood,
[blood;—
And babes were brought to dip their little hands in 26.

Horrent they heard; and with her hands the Maid
Press'd her eyes close, as if she strove to blot
The hateful image which her mind portray'd.
The Boy sat silently, intent in thought;
Then, with a deep-drawn sigh, as if he sought
To heave the oppressive feeling from his breast,
Complacently compared their harmless lot
With such wild life, outrageus and unblest;
Securely thus to live, he said, was surely best.

27.
On tales of blood they could not bear to dwell;
From such their hearts abhorrent shrunk in fear.
Better they liked that Monnema should tell
Of things unseen; what Power had placed them
here,
And whence the living spirit came, and where
It past, when parted from this mortal mould;
Of such mysterious themes with willing ear
They heard, devoutly listening while she told Strangely-disfigured truths, and fables feign'd of old.

28.
By the Great Spirit man was made, she said;
His voice it was which peal'd along the sky,
And shook the heavens, and fill'd the earth with Alone and inaccessible, on high [dread.
He had his dwelling-place eternally,
And Father was his name. This all knew well;
But none had seen his face; and if his eye
Regarded what upon the earth befell,
Or if he cared for man, she knew not: — who could tell?

29.

But this, she said, was sure — that after death
There was reward, and there was punishment:
And that the evil-doers, when the breath
Of their injurious lives at length was spent,
Into all noxious forms abhor'd were sent,
Of beasts and reptiles; so retaining still
Their old propensities, on evil bent,
They work'd where'er they might their wicked will,
The natural foes of man, whom we pursue and kill.

30.

Of better spirits, some there were who said
That in the grave they had their place of rest.
lightly they laid the earth upon the dead,
Lest in its narrow tenement the guest
Should suffer underneath such load oppress'd.
But that death surely set the spirit free,
Sad proof to them poor Montena address'd,
Drawn from their father's fate; no grave had he Wherein his soul might dwell. This therefore could not be.

31.

Likelier they taught who said that to the Land
Of Souls the happy spirit took its flight,
A region underneath the sole command
Of the Good Power; by him for the upright
Appointed and replenish'd with delight;
A land where nothing evil ever came,
Sorrow, nor pain, nor peril, nor affliction,
Nor change, nor death; but there the human frame,
Untouch'd by age or ill, continued still the same.

32.

Winds would not pierce it there, nor heat and cold
Grieve, nor thirst parch, and hunger pine; but there
The sun by day its even influence hold
With genial warmth, and thro' the unclouded air
The moon upon her nightly journey far: The lakes and fish-full streams are never dry;
Trees ever green perpetual fruitage bear;
And, wheresoe'er the hunter turns his eye,
Water, and earth, and heaven, to him their stores supply.

33.

And once there was a way to that good land,
For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew,
By which the adventurer might, with foot and hand,
From branch to branch his upward course pursue;
An easy path, if what were said be true,
Albeit the ascent was long; and when the height
Was gain'd, that blissful region was in view,
Wherein the traveller safely might alight,
And roam abroad at will, and take his free delight.

34.

O happy time, when ingress thus was given
To the upper world, and at their pleasure they Whose hearts were strong might pass from Earth
To Heaven
By their own act and choice: In evil day
Mishap had fatally cut off that way,
And none may now the Land of Spirits gain,
Till from its dear-looked tenement of clay,
Violence or age, infirmity and pain,
Divorce the soul which there full gladly would remain.

35.

Such grievous loss had by their own misdeed
Upon the unworthy race of men been brought.
An aged woman once, who could not speed
In fishing, earnestly one day besought
Her countrymen, that they of what they caught
A portion would upon her wants bestow.
They set her hunger and her age at nought,
And still to her entreaties answered no!
And mock'd her, till they made her heart with rage
o'erflow.

36.

But that Old Woman, by such wanton wrong
Inhamed, went hurrying down; and in the pride
Of magic power, wherein the crone was strong,
Her human form infirm she laid aside.
Better the Capiguara's limbs supplied
A strength accordant to her fierce intent;
These she assumed, and, burrowing deep and wide
Beneath the Tree, with vicious will, she went,
To inflict upon mankind a lasting punishment.

37.

Downward she wrought her way, and all around
Laboring, the solid earth she undermined,
And loosen'd all the roots; then from the ground
Emerging, in her hatred of her kind,
Resumed her proper form, and breathed a wind
Which gather'd like a tempest round its head:
Eftsoon the lofty Tree its top inclined,
Uptorn with horrible convulsion dread,
And over half the world its mighty wreck lay spread.

38.

But never scion sprouted from that Tree,
Nor seed sprang up; and thus the easy way,
Which had till then for young and old been free,
Was closed upon the sons of men for aye.
The mighty ruin moulder'd where it lay,
Till not a trace was left; and now in sooth
Almost had all remembrance past away.
This from the elders she had heard in youth;
Some said it was a tale, and some a very truth.
39.
Nathless departed spirits at their will
Could from the Land of Souls pass to and fro;
They come to us in sleep when all is still,
Sometimes to warn against the impending blow,
Alas! more oft to visit us in woe:
Though in their presence there was poor relief!
And this had sad experience made her know;
For when Quiara came, his stay was brief,
And, waking then, she felt a freshen'd sense of grief.

40.
Yet to behold his face again, and hear
His voice, though painful, was a deep delight;
It was a joy to think that he was near,
To see him in the visions of the night,—
To know that the departed still requite
The love which to their memory still will cling:
And though he might not bless her waking sight
With his dear presence, 'twas a blessed thing
That sleep would thus sometimes his actual image bring.

41.
Why comes he not to me? Yeruti cries;
And Mooma, echoing with a sigh the thought,
Ask'd why it was that to her longing eyes
No dream the image of her father brought;
Nor Monnema to solve that question sought
In vain, content in ignorance to dwell;
Perhaps it was because they knew him not;
Perhaps — but sooth she could not answer well;
What the departed did, themselves alone could tell.

42.
What one tribe held another disbelieved,
For all concerning this was dark, she said;
Uncertain all, and hard to be received.
The dreadful race, from whom their fathers fled,
Beastial and horrid, their abode was theirs,
And where their Spirits chose to go,
The ghosts of other men retired in dread
Before the face of that victorious foe;
No better, then, the world above, than this below!

43.
What then, alas! if this were true, was death?
Only a mournful change from ill to ill!
And some there were who said the living breath
Would ne'er be taken from us by the will
Of the Good Father, but continue still
To feed with 'his the mortal frame he gave,
Did not mischance or wicked witchcraft kill; —
Evils from which no care availed to save,
And whereby all were sent to fill the greedy grave.

44.
In vain to counterwork the baleful charm
By spells of rival witchcraft it was sought;
Less potent was that art to help than harm.
No means of safety old experience brought:
Nor better fortune did they find who thought
From Death, as from some living foe, to fly;
For speed or subterfuge avails'd them nought;

But whereas'er they fled they found him nigh:
None ever could elude that unseen enemy.

45.
Bootless the boast, and vain the proud intent
Of those who hoped, with arrogant display
Of arms and force, to scare him from their tent,
As if their threatsful shouts and fierce array
Of war could drive the Invisible away!
Sometimes, regardless of the sufferer's groan,
They dragg'd the dying out, and as a prey
Exposed him, that, content with him alone,
Death might depart, and thus his fate avert their own.

46.
Depart he might,— but only to return
In quest of other victims, soon or late;
When they who held this fond belief, would learn,
Each by his own inevitable fate,
That, in the course of man's uncertain state,
Death is the one and only certain thing.
Oh folly then to fly or deprecate
That which, at last, Time, ever on the wing,
Certain as day and night, to weary age must bring!

47.
While thus the Matron spake, the youthful twain
Listed in deep attention, wistfully;
Whether with more of wonder or of pain
Unceth it were to tell. With steady eye
Intent they heard; and when she paused, a sigh
Their sorrowful foreboding seem'd to speak:
Questions to which she could not give reply
Yeruti ask'd; and for that Maiden meek,
Involuntary tears ran down her quiet cheek.

48.
A different sentiment within them stirr'd,
When Monnema recall'd to mind, one day,
Imperfectly, what she had sometimes heard
In childhood, long ago, the Elders say,—
Almost from memory had it pass'd away,—
How there appear'd amid the woodlands men
Whom the Great Spirit sent there to convey
His gracious will; but little heed she then
Had given, and like a dream it now recurr'd again.

49.
But these young questioners, from time to time,
Call'd up the long-forgotten theme anew.
Strange men they were; from some remotest clime,
She said, of different speech, uncomly to view,
Having hair upon their face, and white in hue:
Across the World of waters wide they came
Devotedly the Father's work to do,
And seek the Red Men out, and in his name
His merciful laws, and love, and promises proclaim.

50.
They served a Maid more beautiful than tongue
Could tell, or heart conceive. Of human race,
All heavenly as that Virgin was, she sprung;
But for her beauty and celestial grace,
Being one in whose pure elements no trace
Had e'er inhered of sin or mortal stain,
CANTO III.

A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

The highest Heaven was now her dwelling-place; There as a Queen divine she held her reign, And there in endless joy forever would remain.

51.

Her feet upon the crescent Moon were set, And, moving in their order round her head, The Stars compose her sparkling coronet. There at her breast the Virgin Mother fed A Babe divine, who was to judge the dead; Such power the Spirit gave this awful Child: Severe he was, and in his anger dread, Yet alway at his Mother's will grew mild, So well did he obey that Maiden unafraid.

52.

Sometimes she had descended from above To visit her true votaries, and requite Such as had served her well. And for her love, These bearded men, forsaking all delight, With labor long and dangers infinite, Across the great blue waters came, and sought The Red Men here, to win them, if they might, From bloody ways, rejoiced to profit aught, Even when with their own lives the benefit was bought.

53.

For trusting in this heavenly Maiden's grace, It was for them a joyful thing to die, As men who went to have their happy place With her, and with that Holy Child, on high, In fields of bliss above the starry sky, In glory, at the Virgin Mother's feet; And all who kept their lessons faithfully An everlasting guerdon there would meet, When Death had led their souls to that celestial seat.

54.

On earth they offer'd, too, an easy life To those who their mild lessons would obey, Exempt from want, from danger, and from strife; And from the forest leading them away, They placed them underneath this Virgin's sway, A numerous fellowship, in peace to dwell; Their high and happy office there to pay Devotions due, which she required well, Their heavenly Guardian she in whatsoever befell.

55.

Thus Monnema remember'd, it was told By one who, in his hot and headstrong youth, Had left her happy service; but when old, Lamented oft, with unwailing ruth, And thoughts which, sharper than a serpent's tooth, Pierced him, that he had changed that peaceful place For the fierce freedom and the ways uncoth Of their wild life, and lost that Lady's grace, Wherefore he had no hope to see in Heaven her face.

56.

And she remember'd, too, when first they fled For safety to the farthest solitude Before their cruel foes, and lived in dread That thither, too, their steps might be pursued By those old enemies thirsting for blood, How some among them hoped to see the day When these beloved messengers of good To that lone hiding-place might find the way, And them to their abode of blessedness convey.

57.

Such tales excited in Yeruti's heart A stirring hope that haply he might meet Some minister of Heaven; and many a part Untrod before, of that wild wood retreat, Did he, with indefatigable feet, Explore; yet ever from the fruitless quest Return'd at evening to his native seat By daily disappointment undepress'd,— So buoyant was the hope that fill'd his youthful breast.

58.

At length the hour approach'd that should fulfil His harmless heart's desire, when they shall see Their fellow-kind, and take for good or ill The fearful chance,—for such it needs must be,— Of change from that entire simplicity. Yet wherefore should the thought of change appall? Grief it perhaps might bring, and injury, And death;—but evil never can befall The virtuous, for the Eye of Heaven is over all.

Amid those marshy woodlands far and wide, Which spread beyond the soaring vulture's eye, There grew, on Empalado's southern side, Groves of that tree whose leaves adust Supply The Spaniards with their daily luxury; A beverage whose salubrious use obtains Through many a land of mines and slavery, Even over all La Plata's sea-like plains, And Chili's mountain realm, and proud Peru's domains.

2.

But better for the injured Indian race Had woods of manchineel the land o'erspread: Yea, in that tree so bless'd by Nature's grace A direr curse had they inherited, Than if the Upas there had reared its head, And sent its baleful scions all around, Blasting where'er its effluent force was shed, In air and water, and the infected ground, All things wherein the breath or sap of life is found.

3.

The poor Guaranies dreamt of no such ill, When, for themselves in miserable hour, The virtues of that leaf, with pure good will, They taught their unsuspected visitor, New in the land as yet. They learnt his power
Too soon, which law nor conscience could restrain;
A fearless, but inhuman conqueror,
Heart-harden'd by the accrued lust of gain:
O fatal thirst of gold! O foul reproach for Spain!

4.
For gold and silver had the Spaniards sought,
Exploring Paraguay with desperate pains;
Their way through forests, axe in hand, they wrought;
Drench'd from above by unremitting rains.
They waded over inundated plains,
Forward by hope of plunder still allured;
So they might one day count their golden gains.
They cared not at what cost of sin procured;
All dangers they defied, all sufferings they endured.

5.
Barren alike of glory and of gold
That region proved to them; nor would the soil
Unto their unindustrious hands unfold
Harvests, the fruit of peace, and wine and oil,
The treasures that repay contented toil
With health and weal; treasures that with them bring
No guilt for priest and penance to assuage,
Nor with their venom arm the awaken'd sting
Of conscience at that hour when life is vanishing.

6.
But, keen of eye in their pursuit of gain,
The conquerors look'd for lucre in this tree:
An annual harvest there might they attain,
Without the cost of annual industry.
'Twas but to gather in what there grew free,
And share Potosi's wealth. Nor hence alone,
But gold in glad exchange they soon should see
From all that once the Incas called their own,
Or where the Zippa's power or Zaque's laws were known.

7.
For this, in fact though not in name a slave,
The Indian from his family was torn;
And droves on droves were sent to find a grave
In woods and swamps, by toil severe outworn,
No friend at hand to succor or to mourn,
In death unpitied, as in life unbles's'd.
O miserable race, to slavery born!
Yet when we look beyond this world's unrest,
More miserable then the oppressors than the op'press'd.

8.
Often had Kings essay'd to check the ill
By edicts not so well enforced as meant;
A present power was wanting to fulfill
Remote authority's sincere intent.
To Avarice, on its present purpose bent,
The voice of distant Justice spake in vain;
False magistrates and priests their influence lent
The accrued thing for lucre to maintain:
O fatal thirst of gold! O foul reproach for Spain!

9.
O foul reproach! but not for Spain alone,
But for all lands that bear the Christian name!
Where'er commercial slavery is known;
O shall not Justice, trumpet-tongued, proclaim
The foul reproach, the black offence, the same?
Hear, guilty France! and thou, O England, hear!
Thou who hast half redeem'd thyself from shame,
When slavery from thy realms shall disappear,
Then from this guilt, and not till then, wilt thou be clear.

10.
Uncheck'd in Paraguay it ran its course,
Till all the gentler children of the land
Well nigh had been consumed without remorse.
The bolder tribes meantime, whose skilful hand
Had tamed the horse, in many a warlike band
Kept the field well with bow and dreadful spear.
And now the Spaniards dared no more withstand
Their force, but in their towns grew pale with fear.
If the Mocobio or the Abipon drew near.

11.
Bear witness, Chaco, thou, from thy domain
With Spanish blood, as erst with Indian, fed!
And Corrientes, by whose church the slain
Were piled in heaps, till for the gather'd dead
One common grave was dug, one service said!
Thoou too, Parana, thy sad witness bear
From shores with many a mournful vestige spread,
And monumental crosses here and there,
And monumental names that tell where dwellings were!

12.
Nor would with all their power the Kings of Spain,
Austrian or Bourbon, have at last avail'd
This torrent of destruction to restrain,
And save a people every where assail'd
By men before whose face their courage quail'd,
But for the virtuous agency of those
Who with the Cross alone, when arms had fail'd,
Achieved a peaceful triumph o'er the foes,
And gave that weary land the blessings of repose.

13.
For whosesoe'er the Spaniards felt or fear'd
An Indian enemy, they call'd for aid
Upon Loyola's sons, now long endur'd
To many a happy tribe, by them convey'd
From the open wilderness or woodland shade,
In towns of happiest polity to dwell.
Freely these faithful ministers essay'd
The arduous enterprise, contented well
If with success they sped, or if as martyrs fell.

14.
And now it chanced some traders, who had fell'd
The trees of precious foliage far and wide
On Empalado's shore, when they beheld
The inviting woodlands on its northern side,
Cross'd thither in their quest, and there espied
Yeruti’s footsteps: searching then the shade,
At length a lonely dwelling they descried,
And at the thought of hostile hordes dismay’d,
To the nearest mission sped, and ask’d the Jesuit’s aid.

15. That was a call which ne’er was made in vain
Upon Loyola’s sons. In Paraguay
Much of injustice had they to complain,
Much of neglect; but faithf ul laborers they
In the Lord’s vineyard, there was no delay
When summon’d to his work. A little band
Of converts made them ready for the way;
Their spiritual father took a Cross in hand
To be his staff, and forth they went to search the land.

16. He was a man of rarest qualities,
Who to this barbarous region had confined
A spirit with the learned and the wise
Worthy to take its place, and from mankind
Receive their homage, to the immortal mind
Paid in its just inheritance of fame.
But he to humbler thoughts his heart inclined;
From Gratz, amid the Styrian hills, he came,
And Dobrizhoff er was the good man’s honor’d name.

17. It was his evil fortune to behold
The labors of his painful life destroy’d;
His flock, which he had brought within the fold,
Dispersed; the work of ages render’d void,
And all of good that Paraguay enjoy’d
By blind and suicidal Power o’erthrown.
So he the years of his old age employ’d,
A faithful chronicler in hanging down
Names which he loved, and things well worthy to be known.

18. And thus, when exiled from the dear-loved scene,
In proud Vienna he begrudged the pain
Of sad remembrance; and the Empress Queen,
That great Teresa, she did not disdain
In gracious mood sometimes to entertain
Discourse with him both pleasurable and sage;
And sure a willing ear she well might deign
To one whose tales may equally engage
The wondering mind of youth, the thoughtful heart of age.

19. But of his native speech because well nigh
Dissolve in him forgetfulness had wrought,
In Latin he compos’d his history —
A garrulous, but a lively tale, and fraught
With matter of delight and food for thought.
And if he could in Merlin’s glass have seen
By whom his tunes to speak our tongue were taught,
The old man would have felt as pleased, I ween,
As when he won the ear of that great Empress Queen.

20. Little he deem’d when with his Indian band
He through the wilds set forth upon his way,
A Poet then unborn, and in a land
Which had proscribed his order, should one day
Take up from thence his moralizing lay,
And shape a song that, with no fiction dress’d,
Should to his worth its grateful tribute pay,
And sinking deep in many an English breast,
Foster that faith divine that keeps the heart at rest.

21. Behold him on his way! the breviary
Which from his girdle hangs, his only shield;
That well-known habit is his panoply,
That Cross, the only weapon he will wield:
By day, he bears it for his staff afiel d,
By night, it is the pillow of his bed:
No other lodging these wild woods can yield
Than earth’s hard lap, and rustling overhead
A canopy of deep and tangled boughs far spread.

22. Yet may they not without some cautious care
Take up their inn content upon the ground.
First it behoves to clear a circle there,
And trample down the grass and plantation round,
Where many a deadly reptile might be found,
Whom with its bright and comfortable heat
The flame would else allure: such plagues abound
In these thick woods, and therefore must they beat their tent to such height.

23. The earth, and trample well the herbs beneath their feet.

24. And now they heap dry reeds and broken wood:
The spark is struck, the crackling flago ts blaze;
And cheer that uncustom’d solitude.
Soon have they made their frugal meal of maize;
In grateful adoration then they raise
The evening hymn. How solemn in the wild
That sweet accordant strain wherewith they praise the Queen of Angels, merciful and mild!
Hail, holiest Mary! Maid, and Mother undefiled.

25. Blame as thou mayst the Papist’s erring creed,
But not their salutary rite of even!
The prayers that from a pious soul proceed,
Though misdirected, reach the ear of Heaven.
Us, unto whom a purer faith is given,
As our best birthright it behooves to hold
The precious charge; but, oh, beware the heaven
Which makes the heart of charity grow cold!
We own one Shepherd, we shall be at last one fold.

26. Thinkest thou the little company who here
Pour forth their hymn devout at close of day,
Feel it no aid that those who hold them dear,
At the same hour the self-same homage pay,
Commending them to Heaven when far away?
That the sweet bells are heard in solemn chime
Through all the happy towns of Paraguay,
Where now their brethren in one point of time
Join in the general prayer, with sympathy sublime?

26. That to the glorious Mother of their Lord
Whole Christendom that hour its homage pays?
From court and cottage that with one accord
Ascends the universal strain of praise?
Amid the crowded city's restless ways,
One reverential thought pervades the throng;
The traveller on his lonely road obeys
The sacred hour, and as he fares along,
In spirit hears and joins his household's even-song.

27. What if they think that every prayer enrolld
Shall one day in their good account appear;
That guardian Angels hover round and fold
Their wings in adoration while they hear;
Ministrant Spirits through the ethereal sphere
Waft it with joy, and to the grateful theme,
Well pleased, the Mighty Mother bends her ear?
A vain delusion this we rightly deem:
Yet what they feel is not a mere illusive dream.

28. That prayer perform'd, around the fire reclined
Beneath the leafy canopy they lay
Their limbs: the Indians soon to sleep resign'd;
And the good Father with that toilsome day
Fatigued, full faint to sleep, — if sleep he may,—
Whom all tormenting insects there assail;
More to be dreaded than beasts of prey
Against whom strength may cope, or skill prevail;
But art of man against these enemies must fail.

29. Patience itself, that should the sovereign cure
For ills that touch ourselves alone, supply,
Lends little aid to one who must endure
This plague: the small tormentors fill the sky,
And swarm about their prey; there he must lie
And suffer while the hours of darkness wear;
At times he utters with a deep-drawn sigh
Some name adored, in accents of despair
Breathed sorrowfully forth, half murmur and half prayer.

30. Welcome to him the earliest gleam of light;
Welcome to him the earliest sound of day;
That, from the sufferings of that weary night
Released, he may resume his willing way,
Well pleased again the pests to esay
Of that drear wilderness, with hope renew'd:
Success will all his labors overpay;
A quest like his is cheerfully pursued;
The heart is happy still that is intent on good.

31. "And now where Empalado's waters creep
Through low and level shores of woodland wide,
They come; prepared to cross the sluggish deep,
An ill-shaped coracle of hardest hide,
Ruder than ever Cambrian fisher pried
Where Towycey and the salt-sea waters meet,
The Indians launch; they steady it and guide,
Winning their way with arms and practised feet,
While in the tottering bont the Father keeps his seat.

32. For three long summer days on every side
They search in vain the sylvan solitude;
The fourth a human footstep is espied,
And through the mazes of the pathless wood
With hound-like skill and hawk-like eye pursued;
For keen upon their pious quest are they
As e'er were hunters on the track of blood.
Where softer ground or trodden herbs betray
The slightest mark of man, they there explore the way.

33. More cautious when more certain of the trace,
In silence they proceed; not like a crew
Of jovial hunters, who the joyous chase
With hound and horn in open field pursue,
Cheering their way with jubilant hallow,
And hurrying forward to their spoil desired,
The panting game before them, full in view:
Human thoughts this little band inspired,
Yet with a hope as high their gentle hearts were fired.

34. Nor is their virtuous hope devoid of fear;
The perils of that enterprise they know;
Some savage horde may have its fastness here,
A race to whom a stranger is a foe,
Who not for friendly words, nor proffer'd show
Of gifts, will peace or parlory entertain.
If by such hands their blameless blood should flow
To serve the Lamb who for their sins was slain,
Blessed indeed their lot, for so to die is gain!

35. Them, thus pursuing where the track may lead,
A human voice arrests upon their way;
They stop, and thither, whence the sounds proceed,
All eyes are turn'd in wonder, — not dismay,
For sure such sounds might charm all fear away;
No nightingale whose brooding mate is nigh,
From some sequester'd bower at close of day,
No lark rejoicing in the orient sky;
Ever pour'd forth so wild a strain of melody.

36. The voice which through the ringing forest floats
Is one which having ne'er been taught the skill
Of marshalling sweet words to sweeter notes,
Utters all unpremeditate, at will,
A modulated sequence, loud and shrill,
Of inarticulate and long-breathed sound,
Varying its tones with rise, and fall, and trill,
Till all the solitary woods around
With that far-piercing power of melody resound.
A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

37. In mute astonishment attend to hear,
As if by some enchantment held, they stood,
With bending head, fix'd eye, and eager ear,
And hand upraised in warning attitude
To check all speech or step that might intrude
On that sweet strain. Them leaving, thus spell-bound,
A little way alone into the wood
The Father gently moved toward the sound,
Treading with quiet feet upon the grassy ground.

38. Anon advancing thus the trees between,
He saw beside her bower the songstress wild,
Not distant far, himself the while unseen.
Mooma it was, that happy maiden mild,
Who, in the sunshine, like a careless child
Of nature, in her joy was caroling.
A heavier heart than hers it had beguiled
So to have heard so fair a creature sing
The strains which she had learnt from all sweet birds of spring.

39. For these had been her teachers, these alone;
And she, in many an emulous essay,
At length into a descant of her own
Had blended all their notes, a wild display
Of sounds in rich, irregular array;
And now as blithe as bird in vernal bower,
Pour'd in full flow the unexpressive lay,
Rejoicing in her consciousness of power,
But in the inborn sense of harmony yet more.

40. In joy she had begun the ambitious song,
With rapid interchange of sink and swell;
And sometimes high the note was rais'd, and long
Produced, with shake and effort sensible,
As if the voice exulted there to dwell;
But when she could no more that pitch sustain,
So thrillingly attuned the cadence fell,
That with the music of its dying strain
She moved herself to tears of pleasurable pain.

41. It might be deem'd some dim presage possess'd
The virgin's soul; that some mysterious sense
Of change to come, upon her mind impress'd,
Had then call'd forth, e'er she departed thence,
A requiem to their days of innocence.
For what thou least in thy native shade
There is one change alone that may compensate,
O Mooma, innocent and simple maid,
Only one change, and it will not be long delay'd!

42. When now the Father issued from the wood
Into that little glade in open sight,
Like one entranced, beholding him, she stood;
Yet had she more of wonder than afflict,
Yet less of wonder than of dread delight,
When thus the actual vision came in view;
For instantly the maiden read aright
Wherefore he came; his garb and beard she knew;
All that her mother heard had then indeed been true.

43. Nor was the Father fail'd with less surprise;
He too strange fancies well might entertain,
When this so fair a creature met his eyes.
He might have thought her not of mortal strain;
Rather, as bards of yore were wont to reign,
A nymph divine of Mondai's secret stream;
Or haply of Diana's woodland train;
For in her beauty Mooma such might seem,
Being less a child of earth than like a poet's dream.

44. No art of barbarous ornament had scar'd
And stain'd her virgin limbs, or file'd her face;
Nor ever yet had evil passion marr'd
In her sweet countenance the natural grace
Of innocence and youth; nor was there trace
Of sorrow, or of hardening want and care.
Strange was it in this wild and savage place,
Which seem'd to be for beasts a fitting lair,
Thus to behold a maid so gentle and so fair.

45. Across her shoulders was a hammock flung;
By night it was the maiden's bed, by day
Her only garment. Round her as it hung,
In short, unequal folds of loose array,
The open meshes, when she moves, display
Her form. She stood with fix'd and wondering eyes;
And trembling like a leaf upon the spray,
Even for excess of joy, with eager cries
She call'd her mother forth to share that glad surprise.

46. At that unwonted call, with quicken'd pace,
The matron hurried thither, half in fear.
How strange to Mommema a stranger's face!
How strange it was a stranger's voice to hear!
How strangely to her disaccustom'd ear
Came even the accents of her native tongue!
But when she saw her countrymen appear,
Tears for that unexpected blessing sprung,
And once again she felt as if her heart were young.

47. Soon was her melancholy story told
And glad consent unto that Father good
Was given, that they to join his happy fold
Would leave with him their forest solitude.
Why comes not now Yeruti from the wood?
Why tarrieth he so late this blessed day?
They long to see their joy in his renew'd,
And look impatiently toward his way,
And think they hear his step, and chide his long delay.

48. He comes at length, a happy man, to find
His only dream of hope fulfill'd at last.
The sunshine of his all-belonging mind
There is no doubt or fear to overcast;
No chilling forethought checks his bliss; the past
Leaves no regret for him, and all to come
Is change, and wonder, and delight. How fast
Hath busy fancy conjured up a sum
Of joys unknown, whereof the expectancy makes him dumb!

49.
O happy day, the Messenger of Heaven
Hath found them in their lonely dwelling-place!
O happy day, to them it would be given
To share in that Eternal Mother's grace,
And one day see in Heaven her glorious face,
Where Angels round her mercy-throne adore!
Now shall they mingle with the human race,
Sequester'd from their fellow-kind no more;
O joy of joys supreme! O bliss for them in store!

50.
Full of such hopes this night they lay them down;
But, not as they were wont, this night to rest.
Their old tranquillity of heart is gone;
The peace wherewith till now they have been blest
Hath taken its departure. In the breast
Fast-following thoughts and busy fancies throng;
Their sleep itself is feverish, and possess'd
With dreams that to the wakeful mind belong;
To Mooma and the youth then first the night
seem'd long.

51.
Day comes, and now a first and last farewell
To that fair bower within their native wood,
Their quiet nest till now. The bird may dwell
Henceforth in safety there, and rear her brood,
And beasts and reptiles undisturb'd intrude;
Reckless of this, the simple tenants go,
Emerging from their peaceful solitude,
To mingle with the world,—but not to know
Its crimes, nor to partake its cares, nor feel its woe.

CANTO IV.

1.
The bells rung lilthly from St. Mary's tower
When in St. Joachin's the news was told
That Dobrizhoffer from his quest that hour
Drew nigh: the glad Guaranes, young and old,
Thro' through the gate, rejoicing to behold
His face again; and all with heartfelt glee
Welcome the Pastor to his peaceful fold,
Where so beloved amid his flock was he,
That this return was like a day of jubilee.

2.
How more than strange, how marvellous a sight
To the new-comers was this multitude!
Something like fear was mingled with affright,
When they the busy scene of turmoil view'd;
Wonder itself the sense of joy subdued,
And with its all-unwonted weight oppress'd
These children of the quiet solitude;
And now and then a sigh that heaved the breast
Unconsciously bewray'd their feeling of unrest.

3.
Not more prodigious than that little town
Seem'd to these comers, were the pomp and power
To us of ancient Rome in her renown;
Nor the elder Babylon, or ere that hour
When her high gardens, and her cloud-capt tower,
And her broad walls before the Persian fell;
Nor those dread vales on Nile's forsaken shore,
Whose ruins yet their pristine grandeur tell,
Wherein the demon Gods themselves might deign to dwell.

4.
But if, all humble as it was, that scene
Possess'd a poor and uninstructed mind
With awe, the thoughtful spirit, well I ween,
Something to move its wonder there might find,
Something of consolation for its kind,
Some hope and earnest of a happier age,
When vain pursuits no more the heart shall blind,
But Faith the evils of this earth assuage,
And to all souls assure their heavenly heritage.

5.
Yes; for in history's mournful map, the eye
On Paraguay, as on a sunny spot,
May rest complacent: to humanity,
There, and there only, hath a peaceful lot
Been granted, by Ambition troubled not,
By Avarice unbeast, exempt from care,
By perilous passions undisturb'd. And what
If Glory never rear'd her standard there,
Nor with her clarion's blast awoke the slumbering air?

6.
Content and cheerful Piety were found
Within those humble walls. From youth to age
The simple dwellers paced their even round
Of duty, not desiring to engage
Upon the world's contentious stage,
Whose ways they wisely had been train'd to dread:
Their inoffensive lives in pupillage
Perpetually, but peacefully they led,
From all temptation saved, and sure of daily bread.

7.
They on the Jesuit, who was nothing loath,
Reposed alike their conscience and their cares;
And be, with equal faith, the trust of both
Accepted and discharged. The bliss is theirs
Of that entire dependence that prepares
Entire submission, let what may befall;
And his whole careful course of life declares
That for their good he holds them thus in thrall,
Their Father and their Friend, Priest, Ruler, all in all.
8. Food, raiment, shelter, safety, he provides;
No forecast, no anxieties have they;
The Jesuit governs, and instructs, and guides;
Their part is to honor and obey,
Like children under wise parental sway.
All thoughts and wishes are to him confess'd;
And when, at length, in life's last, weary day,
In sure and certain hope they sink to rest,
By him their eyes are closed, by him their burial blest.

9. Deem not their lives of happiness devoid,
Though thus the years their course obscurely fill;
In rural and in household arts employ'd,
And many a pleasing task of plant skill,
For emulation here annix'd with ill,
Sufficient scope was given. Each had assign'd
His proper part, which yet left free the will;
So well they knew to mould the duteous mind
By whom the scheme of that wise order was combined.

10. It was a land of priestcraft, but the Priest
Believed himself the fables that he taught:
Corrupt their forms, and yet those forms at least
Preserv'd a salutary faith that wrought,
Maugre the alloy, the saving end it sought.
Benevolence had gain'd such empire there,
That even superstition had been brought
An aspect of humanity to wear,
And make the weal of man its first and only care.

11. Nor lack'd they store of innocent delight,
Music and song, and dance and proud array,
Whate'er might win the ear, or charm the sight;
Banners and pageantry in rich display
Brought forth upon some Saint's high holyday,
The altar dress'd, the church with garlands hung,
Arches and floral bowers beside the way,
And festal tables spread for old and young,
Gladness in every heart, and mirth on every tongue.

12. Thou who desoisest so debased a fate,
As in the pride of wisdom thou mayst call
These meek, submissive Indians' low estate,
Look round the world, and see where over all
Injuruous passions hold mankind in thrall,
How barbarous Force asserts a ruthless reign,
Or Mammon, o'er his portion of the ball,
Hath learn'd a baser empire to maintain —
Mammon, the god of all who give their souls to gain.

13. Behold the fraudulent arts, the covert strife,
The jarring interests that engross mankind;
The low pursuits, the selfish aims of life;
Studies that weary and contract the mind,
That bring no joy, and leave no peace behind;
And Death approaching to dissolve the spell!
The immortal soul, which hath so long been blind,
Recovers then clear sight, and sees too well
The error of its ways, when irretrievable.

14. Far happier the Guaranies' humble race,
With whom, in dutiful contentment wise,
The gentle virtues had their dwelling-place.
With them the dear, domestic charities
Sustain'd no blight from fortune; natural ties
There suffer'd no divorcement, save alone
That which in course of nature might arise;
No artificial wants and ills were known;
But there they dwelt as if the world were all their own.

15. Obedience in its laws that takes delight
Was theirs; simplicity that knows no art;
Love, friendship, grateful duty in its height;
Meekness and truth, that keep all strife apart,
And faith and hope which elevate the heart
Upon its heavenly heritage intent.
Poor, erring, self-temperator that thou art,
O Man! and on thine own undoing bent,
Wherewith canst thou be blest, if not with these content?

16. Mild pupils in submission's perfect school,
Two thousand souls were gather'd here, and here
Beneath the Jesuit's all-embracing rule
They dwelt, obeying him with love sincere,
That never knew distrust, nor felt a fear,
Nor anxious thought which wears the heart away.
Sacred to them their laws, their Ruler dear;
Humbler or happier none could be than they,
Who knew it for their good in all things to obey.

17. The Patron Saint, from whom their town was named,
Was that St. Joachin, who, legends say,
Unto the Saints in Limbo first proclaim'd
The Advent. Being permitted, on the day
That Death enlarged him from this mortal clay,
His daughter's high election to behold,
Thither his soul, glad herald, wing'd its way,
And to the Prophets and the Patriarchs old
The tidings of great joy and near deliverance told.

18. There on the altar was his image set,
The lamp before it burning night and day,
And there was incensed, when his votaries met
Before the sacred shrine, their heads to say,
And for his fancied intercession pray,
Devoutly as in faith they bent the knee.
Such adoration they were taught to pay;
Good man, how little had he seen'd that he Should thus obtain a place in Rome's idolatry!

19. But chiefly there the Mother of our Lord,
His blessed daughter, by the multitude
Was for their special patroness adored.
Amid the square on high her image stood,
Chasping the Babe in her beatitude,
The Babe Divine on whom she fix'd her sight;
And in their hearts, albe the work was rude,
It rais'd the thought of all-commanding might,
Comb'n with boundless love and mercy infinite.

20.
To this great family the Jesuit brought
His new-found children now; for young and old
He deem'd alike his children while he wrought
For their salvation.—seeking to unfold
The saving mysteries in the creed enroll'd,
To their slow minds, that could but ill conceive
The import of the mighty truths he told.
But errors they have none to which they cleave,
And whatso' er he tells they willingly believe.

21.
Safe from that pride of ignorance were they
That with small knowledge thinks itself full wise,
How at believing ought should these delay,
When every where new objects met their eyes
To fill the soul with wonder and surprise?
Not of itself, but by temptation bred,
In man doth impious unbelief arise;
It is our instinct to believe and dread;
God bids us love, and then our faith is perfected.

22.
Quick to believe, and slow to comprehend,
Like children, unto all the teacher taught
Submissively an easy car they lend:
And to the font at once he might have brought
These converts, if the Father had not thought
Their's was a case for wise and safe delay,
Lest lightly learn'd might lightly be forgot;
And meanwhile due instruction day by day
Would to their opening minds the sense of truth convey.

23.
Of this they reck’d not whether soon or late;
For overpowering wonderment possess'd
Their faculties; and in this new estate
Strange sights, and sounds, and thoughts, well night oppress'd
Their sense, and raised a turmoil in the breast
Resenting less of pleasure than of pain;
And sleep afforded them no natural rest,
But in their dreams, a mixed, disorder'd train,
The busy scenes of day disturb'd their hearts again.

24.
Even when the spirit to that secret wood
Return'd, slow Mondæ's silent stream beside,
No longer there it found the solitude
Which late it left: strange faces were descried,
Voices, and sounds of music far and wide,
And buildings seem'd to tower amid the trees,
And forms of men and beasts on every side,
As ever-wakeful fancy hears and sees
All things that it had heard, and seen, and more than these.

25.
For in their sleep strange forms deform'd they saw
Of frightful fiends, their ghostly enemies,
And souls who must abide the rigorous law
Weltering in fire, and there with dolorous cries
Blaspheming roll around their hopeless eyes;
And those who doom'd a shorter term to bear
In penal flames, look upward to the skies,
Seeking and finding consolation there,
And feel, like dew from heaven, the precious aid of prayer.

26.
And Angels who around their glorious Queen
In adoration bent their heads abased;
And infant faces in their dreams were seen
Hovering on cherub-wings; and Spirits placed
To be their guards invisible, who chased
With fiery auras their fiendish foes away;
Such visions overheated fancy traced,
Peopleing the night with a confused array
That made its hours of rest more restless than the day.

27.
To all who from an old erratic course
Of life, within the Jesuit's fold were led,
The change was perious. They felt the force
Of habit, when, till then in forests bred,
A thick, perpetual unbrage overhead,
They came to dwell in open light and air.
This ill the Fathers long had learnt to dread,
And still devised such means as might prepare
The new-reclaim'd unhurt this total change to bear.

28.
All thoughts and occupations to commence,
To change their air, their water, and their food,
And those old habits suddenly uprooted,
Conform'd to which the vital powers pursed
Their functions, — such mutation is too rude
For man's fine frame unshaken to sustain,
And these poor children of the solitude
Began ere long to pay the bitter pain
That their new way of life brought with it in its train.

29.
On Momemba the apprehended ill
Come first; the matron sunk beneath the weight
Of a strong malady, whose force no skill
In healing might avert or mitigate.
Yet, happy in her children's safe estate,
Her thankfulness for them she still express'd;
And yielding then complacently to fate,
With Christian rites her passing hour was bless'd,
And with a Christian's hope she was consign'd to rest.

30.
They laid her in the Garden of the Dead;
Such as a Christian burial-place should be
Was that fair spot, where every grave was spread
With flowers, and not a weed to spring was free;
CANTO IV.  A TALE OF PARAGUAY.  519

But the pure blossoms of the orange-tree
Dropt’d like a shower of fragrance on the bier;
And palms, the type of immortality,
Planted in stately colonnades appear,
That all was verdant there throughout the unvarying year.

31.
Nor ever did irreverent feet intrude
Within that sacred spot; nor sound of mirth,
Unseemly there, profane the solitude,
Where solemnly committed earth to earth,
Waiting the summons for their second birth,
Whole generations in Death’s peaceful fold
Collected lay; green innocence, ripe worth,
Youth full of hope, and age whose days were told,
Compress’d alike into that mass of mortal mould.

32.
Mortal, and yet at the Archangel’s voice
To put on immortality. That call
Shall one day make the sentient dust rejoice;
These bodies then shall rise, and cast off all
Corruption, with whate’er of earthly thrall
Had clogg’d the heavenly image, then set free.
How then should Death a Christian’s heart
appall?
Let, Heaven for you is open; — enter, ye
Children of God, and heirs of his eternity!

33.
This hope supported Mooma, hand in hand
When with Yeruti at the grave she stood.
Less even now of death they understand
Than of the joys eternal that ensued;
The bliss of infinite beatitude
To them had been their teacher’s favorite theme,
Wherewith their hearts so fully were imbued,
That it the sole reality might seem,
Life, death, and all things else, a shadow or a dream.

34.
Yea, so possess’d with that best hope were they,
That if the heavens had opened overhead,
And the Archangel with his trump that day
To judgment had convok’d the quick and dead,
They would have heard the summons not with dread,
But in the joy of faith that knows no fear;
Come, Lord! come quickly! would this pair have said,
And thou, O Queen of men and Angels dear,
Lead us, whom thou hast loved, into thy happy sphere!

35.
They wept not at the grave, though overwrought
With feelings there as if the heart would break.
Some happy might have deem’d they suffered not;
Yet they who look’d upon that Maiden meek
Might see what deep emotion blanched her cheek.

An inward light there was which fill’d her eyes,
And told, more forcibly than words could speak,
That this disruption of her earliest ties
Had shaken mind and frame in all their faculties.

36.
It was not passion only that disturb’d
Her gentle nature thus; it was not grief;
Nor human feeling by the effort curb’d
Of some misleading duty, when relief
Were surely to be found, albeit brief,
If sorrow at its springs might freely flow;
Nor yet repining, stronger than belief
In its first force, that shook the Maiden so,
Though these alone might that frail fabric overthow.

37.
The seeds of death were in her at that hour;
Soon was their quickening and their growth display’d;
Thenceforth she droop’d and wither’d like a flower,
Which, when it flourish’d in its native shade,
Some child to his own garden hath convey’d,
And planted in the sun, to pine away.
Thus was the gentle Mooma seen to fade,
Not under sharp disease, but day by day
Losing the powers of life in visible decay.

38.
The sunny hue that tinged her cheek was gone;
A deathly paleness settled in its stead;
The light of joy which in her eyes had shine,
Now like a lamp that is no longer fed
Grew dim; but when she raised her heavy head,
Some proffer’d help of kindness to partake,
Those feeble eyes a languid lustre shed,
And her sad smile of thankfulness would wake
Grief even in callous hearts for that sweet sufferer’s sake.

39.
How had Yeruti borne to see her fade?
But he was spared the lamentable sight,
Himself upon the bed of sickness laid.
Joy of his heart, and of his eyes the light,
Had Mooma been to him, his soul’s delight,
On whom his mind forever was intent,
His darling thought by day, his dream by night,
The playmate of his youth in mercy sent,
With whom his life had passed in peacefulest content.

40.
Well was it for the youth, and well for her
As there in placid helplessness she lay,
He was not present with his love to stir
Emotions that might shake her feeble clay,
And rouse up in her heart a strong array
Of feelings, hurtful only when they bind
To earth the soul that soon must pass away.
But this was spared them; and no pain of mind
To trouble her had she, instinctively resign’d.
41.
Nor was there wanting to the sufferers aught
Of careful kindness to alleviate:
The affliction; for the universal thought
In that poor town was of their sad estate,
And what might best relieve or mitigate
Their case, what help of nature or of art;
And many were the prayers compassionate
That the good Saints their healing would impart,
Breathed in that maid's behalf from many a tender heart.

42.
And vows were made for her, if vows might save;
She for herself the while preferr'd no prayer;
For when she stood beside her Mother's grave,
Her earthly hopes and thoughts had ended there.
Her only longing now was, free as air
From this obstructive flesh to take her flight
For Paradise, and seek her Mother there,
And then, regaining her beloved sight,
Rest in the eternal sense of undisturb'd delight.

43.
Her heart was there, and there she felt and knew
That soon full surely should her spirit be.
And who can tell what foretastes might ensue
To one, whose soul, from all earth's thralldom free,
Was waiting thus for immortality?
Sometimes she spake with short and hurried breath,
As if some happy sight she seem'd to see,
While, in the fulness of a perfect faith,
Even with a lover's hope, she lay and look'd for death.

44.
I said that for herself the patient maid
Preferr'd no prayer; but oft her feeble tongue
And feebler breath a voice of praise essay'd;
And duly when the vesper bell was rung,
Her evening hymn in faint accord she sung
So piously, that they who gathered round,
Awe-stricken on her heavenly accents hung,
As though they thought it were no mortal sound,
But that the place whereon they stood was holy ground.

45.
At such an hour, when Dobrizhoffer stood
Beside her bed, oh! how unlike, he thought,
This voice to that which, ringing through the wood,
Had led him to the secret bower he sought!
And was it then for this that he had brought
That harmless household from their native shade?
Death had already been the mother's lot;
And this fair Mooma, was she form'd to fade
So soon,—so soon must she in earth's cold lap be laid?

46.
Yet he had no misgiving at the sight;
And wherefore should lie? He had acted well,
And deeming of the ways of God aright,
Knew that to such as these, what'er befell
Must needs for them be best. But who could dwell
Unmoved upon the fate of one so young,
So blithesome late? What marvel if tears fell
From that good man as over her he hung,
And that the prayers he said came faltering from his tongue!

47.
She saw him weep, and she could understand
The cause thus tremulously that made him speak.
By his emotion moved, she took his hand;
A gleam of pleasure o'er her pallid cheek
Past, while she look'd at him with meaning meek,
And for a little while, as loath to part,
Detaining him, her fingers, lank and weak,
Play'd with their hold; then letting him depart,
She gave him a slow smile that touch'd him to the heart.

48.
Mourn not for her! for what hath life to give
That should detain her ready spirit here?
Thinkest thou that it were worth a wish to live,
Could wishes hold her from her proper sphere?
That simple heart, that innocence sincere
The world would stain. Fitter she ne'er could be
For the great change; and now that change is near,
Oh, who would keep her soul from being free?
Maiden beloved of Heaven, to die is best for thee!

49.
She hath pass'd away, and on her lips a smile
Hath settled, fix'd in death. Judged they aright,
Or suffered they their fancy to beguile
The reason, who believed that she had sight
Of Heaven before her spirit took its flight;
That Angels waited round her lowly bed;
And that, in that last effort of delight,
When lifting up her dying arms, she said,
I come! a ray from heaven upon her face was shed?

50.
St. Joachin's had never seen a day
Of such profuse and general grief before,
As when, with tapers, dirge, and long array,
The Maiden's body to the grave they bore.
All eyes, all hearts, her early death deplore;
Yet, wondering at the fortune they lament,
They the wise ways of Providence adore,
By whom the Pastor surely had been sent,
When to the Mondai woods upon his quest he went.
51. This was, indeed, a chosen family,
For Heaven's especial favor mark'd, they said;
Shut out from all mankind they seem'd to be;
Yet mercifully there were visited,
That so within the fold they might be led,
Then call'd away to bliss. Already two
In their baptismal innocence were dead;
The third was on the bed of death they knew,
And in the appointed course must presently ensue.

52. They marvell'd, therefore, when the youth once more
Rose from his bed, and walk'd abroad again;
Severe had been the malady, and sore
The trial, while life struggled to maintain
Its seat against the sharp assaults of pain;
But life in him was vigorous; long he lay
Ere it could its ascendancy regain;
Then, when the natural powers resumed their sway,
All trace of late disease past rapidly away.

53. The first inquiry, when his mind was free,
Was for his Sister. She was gone, they said,
Gone to Her Mother, evermore to be
With her in Heaven. At this no tears he shed,
Nor was he seen to sorrow for the dead;
But took the fatal tidings in such part
As if a dull, unfailing nature bred
His unconcern; for hard would seem the heart
To which a loss like his no suffering could impart.

54. How little do they see what is, who frame
Their hasty judgment upon that which seems!
Waters that babble on their way proclaim
A shallowness; but in their strength deep streams
Flow silently. Of death Yeruti deems
Not as an ill, but as the last great good,
Compar'd wherewith all other he esteems
Transient and void: how then should thought intrude
Of sorrow in his heart for their beatitude?

55. While dwelling in their sylvan solitude
Less had Yeruti learn'd to entertain
A sense of age than death. He understood
Something of death from creatures he had slain;
But here the ills which follow in the train
Of age had first to him been manifest,—
The shrunk form, the limbs that move with pain,
The failing sense, infirmity, unrest,—
That in his heart he said to die betimes was best.

56. Nor had he lost the dead: they were but gone
Before him, whither he should shortly go.
Their robes of glory they had first put on;
He, cumber'd with mortality, below

57. 'Twas but in open day to close his eyes,
And shut out the unprofitable view
Of all this weary world's realities,
And forthwith, even as if they lived anew,
The dead were with him; features, form, and hue,
And looks, and gestures, were restored again:
Their actual presence in his heart he knew;
And when their converse was disturb'd, oh then
How flat and stale it was to mix with living men!

58. But not the less, what'er was to be done,
With living men he took his part content,
At loom, in garden, or a-field, as one
Whose spirit, wholly on obedience bent,
To every task its prompt attention lent.
Alert in labor he among the best;
And when to church the congregation went,
None more exact than he to cross his breast,
And kneel, or rise, and do in all things like the rest.

59. Cheerful he was, almost like one elate
With wine, before it hath disturb'd his power
Of reason. Yet he seem'd to feel the weight
Of time; for always, when from yonder tower
He heard the clock tell out the passing hour,
The sound appeared to give him some delight;
And when the evening shades began to lower,
Then was he seen to watch the fading light
As if his heart rejoiced at the return of night.

60. The old man, to whom he had been given in care,
To Dobrizhoffier came one day, and said,
The trouble which our youth was thought to bear
With such indifference hath deranged his head.
He says that he is nightly visited;
His Mother and his Sister come and say
That he must give this message from the dead,
Not to defer his baptism, and delay
A soul upon the earth which should no longer stay.

61. A dream the Jesuit deem'd it; a deceit
Upon itself by feverish fancy wrought;
A mere delusion, which it were not meet
To censure, lest the youth's distemper'd thought
Might thereby be to further error brought;
But he himself its vanity would find,—
They argued thus,—if it were noticed not.
His baptism was in fitting time design'd,
The father said, and then dismiss'd it from his mind

62. But the old Indian came again ere long
With the same tale, and freely then confess'd
His doubt that he had done Yeruti wrong;
For something more than common seem'd impress'd;
And now he thought that certes it were best
From the youth's lips his own account to hear;
Haply the father then to his request
Might yield, regarding his desire sincere,
Nor wait for further time if there were aught to fear.

63.
Considerately the Jesuit heard, and bade
The youth be called. Yeruti told his tale.
Nightly these blessed spirits came, he said,
To warn him he must come within the pale
Of Christ without delay; nor must he fail
This warning to their pastor to repeat,
Till the renewed entreaty should prevail.
Life's business then for him would be complete,
And 'twas to tell him this they left their stary seat.

64.
Came they to him in dreams?—he could not tell;
Sleping or waking now small difference made;
For even, while he slept, he knew full well
That his dear Mother and that darling Maid
Both in the Garden of the Dead were laid;
And yet he saw them as in life, the same,
Save only that in radiant robes array'd,
And round about their presence when they came
There shone an effluent light as of a harmless flame.

65.
And where he was he knew, the time, the place, —
All circumstantial things to him were clear.
His own heart undisturb'd. His Mother's face
How could he choose but know; or, knowing, fear
Her presence and that Maid's, to him more dear
Than all that had been left him now below?
Their love had drawn them from their happy sphere;
That dearest love unchanged they came to show;
And he must be baptized, and then he too might go.

66.
With searching ken the Jesuit, while he spake,
Persuaded him, if in countenance or tone
Aught might be found appearing to partake
Of madness. Mark of passion there was none;
None of derangement: in his eye alone,
As from a hidden fountain emanate,
Something of an unusual brightness shone:
But neither word nor look betrayed a state
Of wandering, and his speech, though earnest, was sedate.

67.
Regular his pulse, from all disorder free,
The vital powers perform'd their part assign'd;
And to whate'er was ask'd collectively
He answer'd. Nothing troubled him in mind;
Why should it? Were not all around him kind?
Did not all love him with a love sincere,
And seem in serving him a joy to find?

He had no want, no pain, no grief, no fear;
But he must be baptized; he could not tarry here.

68.
Thy will be done, Father in heaven who art!
The pastor said, nor longer now denied;
But with a weight of awe upon his heart
Enter'd the church, and there, the font beside,
With holy water, chrism, and salt applied,
Perform'd in all solemnity the rite.
His feeling was that hour with fear allied;
Yeruti was a sense of pure delight,
And while he knelt his eyes seem'd larger and more bright.

69.
His wish hath been obtain'd; and this being done,
His soul was to its full desire content.
The day in its accustom'd course pass'd on;
The Indian mark'd him ere to rest he went,
How o'er his beads, as he was wont, he bent,
And then, like one who casts all care aside,
Lay down. The old man fear'd no ill event,
When, "Ye are come for me!" Yeruti cried;
"Yes, I am ready now!" and instantly he died.

NOTES.

So he, forsooth, a shapeless boot must wear — Poem, p. 501.

His leg had been set by the French after their conquest of Pamplona, and re-set after his removal to his father's house. The latter operation is described as having been most severe, but borne by him, in his wonted manner, without any manifestation of suffering. For some time his life was despaired of. "When the danger of death was past, and the bones were knitted and becoming firm, two inconveniences remained: one occasioned by a portion of bone below the knee, which projected so as to occasion some deformity; the other was a contraction of the leg, which prevented him from walking erect or standing firmly on his feet. Now, as he was very solicitous about his appearance, and intended at that time to follow the course of a military life, which he had begun, he inquired of his medical attendants, in the first place, whether the bone could be removed, which stood out in so unsightly a manner. They answered that it was possible to remove it, but the operation would be exceedingly painful, much more so than any which he had undergone before. He nevertheless directed them to cut it out, that he might live his will, and (as he himself related in my hearing, says Ribadeneyra) that he might wear fashionable and well-fitting boots. Nor could he be discoursed from this determination. He would not consent to be bound during the operation, and went through it with the same firmness of mind which he had manifested in the former operations. By this means the deformity of the bone was removed. The contraction of the leg was in some degree relieved by other applications, and especially by certain machines, with which, during many days, and with great and continual pain, it was stretched; nevertheless it could not be so extended, but that it always remained something shorter than the other." — Ribadeneyra, Vita S. Ignatii Loyola, Acta SS, Jul. 1, 7, p. 539.

A close-fitting boot seems to have been as fashionable at one time as close-fitting ruminancies of buckskin were about the year 1790; and perhaps it was as severe an operation to get into them for the first time. "The greasy shoemaker," says Tom Nash, with his squirrel's skin, and a whole stall of ware upon his arm, cutters, and wrenches his legs for an hour together, and after shows his tally. By St. Loy that draws de la tierra, son los pies: quiso sin duda que fuerza la humildad de su fábula; pero los galanes vieron los quitar la humildad con los alzados y los cazuelones con el zapato.

Esquina esto a Dios tanto, que avisando de hacer al hombre animal que pisara la tierra, hizo la tierra de tal calidad, que se pudiera imponer en ella la herida del hombre. Abierta dice su sepultura el pie que se levanta, y parece que se levanta de la sepultura.

Temblando creador, con el pie que pisaba, que quisiera tragarse la tierra a cada paso. — El día de Fiesta. Obra de D. Juan de Zavala, p. 179, 180.

1. En comes the shoemaker in the odor of haste and fatigue. He takes the shoes off the last with as much difficulty as if he were skimming the basts. The gastant seats himself upon a chair; the shoemaker knocks down, and takes possession of one foot, which he handles as if he were sent there to administer the torture. He puts one shoeing skin 2 in the heel of the shoe, fits the other upon the point of the foot, and then begins to guide the shoe over the shoeing-kin. Peaceably has it got farther than the toes when is found necessary to drag it with pincers, and even then it is hard work. The patient stands up, fatigued with the operation, but well pleased that the shoes are tight; and by the shoemaker's directions he stumps three or four times on the floor, with such force that it must be of iron.
trouble might have been saved by making the shoe a little larger than the foot. Presently both have to go through the same pains with the other foot. Now comes the last and terrible act of payment. The tradesman collects his tools, receives his money, and goes out at the door, looking at the silver to see if it is good, and leaving the gallant walking as much as if he had put his best foot forward.

If they who wear tight shoes think that thereby they can lessen the size of their feet, they are mistaken. The bones cannot be squeezed one into another; if therefore the shoe is made short, the foot must be crooked at the joints, and grow upward if it is not allowed to grow forward. If it is pinched in the breadth, the flesh which is thus constrained must extend itself in length. They, who are shot thus miserably remain with just the same quantity of foot.

Of all animals, man is the one to which, in proportion to its size, nature has given the largest feet; because as his whole body is to be supported upon them, and he has only two, she chose that he should walk in safety. He who wishes to abbreviate them acts as if he were inclined to fall, and to fall into vices which will do him more injury if he fell upon stones. The feet are the part which in the fabric of the human body are placed nearest to the earth; they are meant therefore to be the humblest part of his frame, but galls take away all humility by adorning and setting them forth in bravery. This so displeases the Creator, that having to make an animal whose walk should upon the earth, he made the earth of such properties, that the footsteps should sink into it. The foot which is lifted from the ground leaves its own grave open, and seems as if it rose from the grave. What a tremendous thing is it then to set off with adornments that which the earth wishes to devour at every step!"

Whiling with books the tedious hours away. — Proem, p. 502.

"Vede quanto importa a leggiadre de boni livri! Se a libro foro de cavallerìa, sabbia Ignacio hum grande cavallerìa; foy hum libro de profani, sabbia hum Santo... Se leva cavallerìa, sabbia Ignacio hum Cavallegro de ardente espadà; lea vidas de Santas, sabbia hum Santo de ardente tocha.—Vieyra, Sermà de S. Ignacio, t. i. 388.

See, says Vieyra, the importance of reading good books. If it had been a book of knight-errantry, Ignacio would have become a great knight-errant; it was the Lives of the Saints, and Ignatius became a great saint. If he had read about knights, he might have proved a Knight of the Burning Sword; he read about saints, and proved a Saint of the Burning Torch. Nothing could seem more probable than that Cervantes had been a part of Loyola's history in his mind; for he was described as the most famous of Don Quixote's馍馍, if Cervantes had not shown himself in one of his dramas to be thoroughly imbued with the pestilent superstition of his country. El dichoso Rafan is one of those monstrous compositions which nothing but the anti-christian fishes of the Renascent church could have produced.

London, however, supposes that Cervantes intended to satirize a favorite dogma of the Spaniards. The passage occurs in his thirteenth conversation.

"The most dexterous attack ever made against the worship among catholics, which opens so many side-chapels to pilfering and imposture, is that of Cervantes, "Leopold. I do not remember in what part."

"President. Throughout Don Quixote. Dulcinea was the peerless, the immaculate, and death was denounced against all who hesitated to admit the assertion of her purity. Surely your poetry never could have imagined t. at Cervantes was such a knight-errant as to attack knight-errantry, a folly that had ceased more than a century, if indeed it was any folly at all; and the idea that he ridiculed the poems and romances founded on it is not less improbable, for they contained all the literature of the nation, excepting the gariture of chapter-houses, theology, and priest, as with a thread of gold, the beautiful histories of this illustrious people. He delighted the idlers of romance by the jokes he scattered amongst them on the false taste of his predecessors and of his rivals; and he delighted his own heart by this solitary archery; well knowing what amusement those who came another day would find in picking up his arrows and discovering the bull's-eye hits.

"Clothes V. was the knight of La Mancha, devoting his labors and vigil, his wars and treaties, to the chimerical idea of making all minds, like watches, turn their indexes by a simultaneous movement to one point. Sancho Panza was the symbol of the people, possessing sound sense in all other matters, but ready to follow the most extravagant visionary ideas, when it suited him to be such. Benedetto di Virgilio, the Italian ploughman, thus describes the course of Loyola's reading, in his heroic poem upon that Saint's life.

NOTES TO A TALE OF PARAGUAY.

It is odd that in Hindustan, where it might have been supposed superstition would have facilitated the introduction of this practice, a pious fraud was found necessary for removing the prejudices against it.

Moore's Strenuivacutia, a Brahmin, thus writes to Dr. Anderson, at Madras, on vaccine inoculation:

"It might be useful to remove a prejudice in the minds of the people, arising from the term cow-pox, being taken literally in our 'Vernacular' tongue; whereas, there can be no doubt that it has been a drop of nectar from the exultant udders of the cows in England, and no way similar to the humor discharged from the tongue and feet of diseased cattle in this country."

For tyrannous fear dissolved all natural bands of man.

The small-pox spread its destructive and desolating power, as the fire consumes the dry grass of the field. The fatal infection spread around with a baneful rapidity, which no flight could escape, and with a fatal effect that nothing could resist. It destroyed with its pestilent breath whole families and tribes; and the horrid scene presented to those who had the melancholy and afflictive opportunity of beholding it, a combination of the dead, the dying, and such as, to avoid the horrid fate of their friends around them, prepared to dispose the plague of its prey, by terminating their own existence.

The habits and lives of these devoted people, which provided not to-day for the wants of to-morrow, must have heightened the pains of such an affliction, by leaving them not only without remedy, but even without alleviation. Nought was left them but to submit in agony and despair.

To aggravate the picture, if aggravation were possible, may be added the pitted carcasses which the wolves, with a furious voracity, dragged forth from the huts, or which were mangled within them by the dogs, whose hunger was satisfied with the disfigured remains of their masters. Nor was it uncommon for the father of a family, whom the infection had not reached, to call them around him, to represent the cruel sufferings and horrid fate of their relations, from the influence of some evil spirit, who was preparing to extirpate their race; and to incite them to battle death, with all its horrors, by their own poison. At the same time, if their hearts failed them in this necessary act, he was himself ready to perform the deed of mercy with his own hand, as the last act of his affliction, and instantly to follow them to the common place of rest and refuge from human evil."

And from the silent door the jaguar turns away.

The jnitiis, however, secure us, that Loyola is not the author of their society; and that it is not allowable either to think or say so. Societas Jesu ut in S. Ignatii de Loyola non dux nostrum, ita nec originem primam, adhuc sentire ac loqui, nesum. (Longo primo Senelli Zac, Jesu, p. 64.) Jesu primum a patribus auctor Societatis is the title of a chapter in this the eleventh volume, which is a curious and very beautiful book. Then follows Beato Virgo maritius, patronus, unde altera veluti auctor Societatis. Lastly, Post Christian et Mariam Societatis Auctor et Parcae sanctus Ignatius. 54

On the 30th August, 1794, the French plundered the rich church of Loyola, at Azpeitia, and proceeding to Elgoibar, loaded five carts with the spoils of the church of that place. This party of marauders consisted of 300. The peasants collected, fell upon them, and after an obstinate conflict of three hours, recovered the whole boat, which they conveyed to Vitoria in triumph. Among other things, a relic of Loyola was recovered, which was carried in procession to the church, the victorious peasants accompanying it. — Muratouille, Hist. de la Guerre de l'Espagne, p. 86.
is called a tigre cedazo, a fleshed tiger. There was one which infested the road between Santa Fé and Santiago, and had killed ten men; and after which a party of soldiers were sent to destroy it. The same thing is said of the lion and other beasts of prey, probably with truth; not, as is vulgarly supposed, because they have a particular appetite for this kind of food, but because, having once fed upon man, they from that time regard him, like any other animal of inferior strength, as their natural prey. It is a constant observation in Numidia," says Bruce, "that the lion avoids and flies from the face of man, till by some accident it has been brought within range, and the beast, which has prevailed against him; then that feeling of superiority, inspired by the Creator in the heart of all animals, for man's preservation, seems to forsake him. The lion, having once tasted human blood, relishes the pursuit after the flock. He鹿's a highway or frequent path, and few are ever known, in the kingdom of Tunis, to interrupt the road to a market for several weeks; and in this he persists, till hunters or soldiers are sent out to destroy him." Dobrizhofer saw the skin of a jaguar which was as long as the standard hide. He says, also, that he saw one attack two horses which were coupled with a thong, kill one, and drag the other away after it.

A most unpleasant habit of this beast is, that in cold or wet weather he chooses to lodge within doors, and will steal into the house. A girl at Corrientes, who slept with her mother, says she was lying under the bed when she rose in the morning; she had presence of mind to bid her mother lie still, went for help, and soon rid the house of its perilous visitor. Cat-like, the jaguar is a good climber; but Dobrizhofer tells us how a traveller who takes to a tree for shelter may profit by the position of the road it is on. When one of our conscripto was killed, he says, Igpliillos di arboris pedem minutis usque conspiceret, sui res est. Qua dixit parvi sagit silico. (i. 289.) He who first did this must have been a good marksman as well as a cool friend, and it was well for him that he reserved his fire till the jaguar was within shot.

Dobrizhofer seems to credit an opinion (which is held in India of the tiger also) that the jaguar's claws are in a certain degree venomous; the scar which they leave is said to be always liable to a very painful and burning sense of heat. But that author, in his usual amusing manner, repels many credulous notions concerning the animal; as that its burn-claws are a remedy for the tooth-ache; and that it has a mode of decoying fish, by standing neck-deep in the water, and spitting out a white foam, which allures them within reach. Teclo (30) says the same thing of a large snake.

An opinion that wounds inflicted by the stroke of animals of this kind are venomous is found in the East also. Captain Williamson says, “However trivial the scratches made by the claws of tigers may appear, yet, whether it be owing to any noxious quality in the claw itself, or to the manner in which the tiger other animals, or to the absence of any hesitation in saying, that at least a majority of such as have been under my notice died; and I have generally remarked, that those whose cases appeared the least alarming were most suddenly carried off. I have ever thought the perturbation arising from the nature of the attack to have a considerable share in the fatality alluded to, especially as I never knew any one wounded by a tiger to die without suffering for some days under that most dreadful symptom, a locked jaw! Such as have been wounded to appearance severely, but accompanied with a moderate hemorrhage, I have commonly found to recover, excepting in the rainy season; that period I always expect serious consequences from either a bite or a scratch." — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 52.

Wild beasts were so numerous and fierce in one part of Mexico, among the Omotes, that Fr. Juan de Grimalyn says in 1579, there were a particular appetite for this kind of food, by them. “There then prevailed an opinion," he proceeds, "and still it prevails among many, that those tigers and lions were certain Indian sorcerers, whom they called Nahualas, who, by diabolical art transform themselves into beasts, and tear the bodies of men in two, or three, or for seven parts. The offences which they have received, or to do them evil, which is the proper condition of the Devil, and an effect of his fierceness. Some traces of these diabolical acts have been seen in our time; for in the year 1579, the deaths of this kind being many, and the suspicion prevailing, some Indians were put to the question, and they confessed the crime, and were executed for it. With all this experience and proof, there are many persons who doubt these transformations, and say that the land being mountainous produces wild beasts, and the beasts being once fleshed commit these great ravages. And it was through the weak understandings of the Indians that they were persuaded to believe their conjurers could thus metamorphose themselves; and, if these poor wretches confessed themselves guilty of such a crime, it was owing to their weakness under the terror; and so they suffered for an offence which they had never committed.”

Father Grimalyn, however, holds with his Father S. Augustine, who has said, concerning such things, hae ad na non quibuscumque quilibet credere poteramus insigniores, sed eis referrebus persecutionem, quos nobis non existimaremus falsos moram et nos ut nos putamus, scilicet ut maxime. "Thus," he says, "wonderful things were related of certain inn-keepers in Italy, who transformed passengers into beasts of burden, to bring to their inns straw, bony, and whatever was wanted from the towns, and then metamorphosed them into their own persons, that they might purchase, as customers, the very commodities they had carried. And in our times the witches of Logrone make so many of these transformations, that now no one can doubt them. This matter of the Nahualas, or sorcerers of Tututepec, has been confessed by so many, that that alone suffices to make it credible. The best proof which can be adduced is that there was a devil, and that there ought to be no more concerning it. And it is temerity to condemn the judges, for it is to be believed that they made all due inquiry. Our brethren who have been ministers there, and are also judges of the interior court, (that is, of the conscience,) have all held these transformations to have done; so that there ought to be no more doubt concerning it. On the contrary, it is useful to understand it, that if at any time in heathen lands the devil should work any of these metamorphoses, the Indians may see we are not surprised at them, and do not hold them as miraculous, but can explain them from the reason and cause of these effects, which astonish and terrify us so greatly." He proceeds to show that the devil can only exercise this power as far as he is permitted by God, in punishment for sin, and that the metamorphosis is not real, but only apparent; the sorcerer not being actually transformed into a lion, but seeming as if he were both to himself and others. In what manner he can tear a man really to pieces with imaginary claws, and devour him in earnest with an imaginary mouth, the ghouf liar has not condescended to explain.—Historia de la Orden de S. Augustine en la Provincia de N. España, pp. 34, 35.

Preserved with horrid art
In ghastly image of humanity. — Canto I. st. 13.

The more ghastly in proportion as more of the appearance of life is preserved in the revolting practice. Such, however, it was not to the feelings of the Egyptians, who had as much pride in a collection of their ancestors, as one of the strongest family feeling could have in a collection of family pictures. The body, Diodorus says, is delivered to the kindred with every member so whole and entire that no part of the body seems to be altered, even to the very hairs of the eyelids and the eyebrows, so that the beauty and shape of the face seems just as before. By which means many of the Egyptians, laying up the bodies of their ancestors in statey monuments, perfectly see the true visage and countenance of those who were buried many ages before they themselves were born; so that in regarding the proportion of every one of these bodies, and the lineaments of their faces, they take exceeding great delight. Covering with soft gauze the obdurate limb
And body, then with feathers lights.
In regular havoc deplored.
—Canto I, st. 25.

Inconvenient as this may seem, it was the full dress of the Tupi and Guaraní tribes. A fashion less gorgeous and elaborate, but more refined, is described by one of the best old travellers to the East, François Eyraud.

The inhabitants of the Maldives use on feast days this kind of garment. They drape sandals (sandalwood) and camparine, on very sleek and smooth stones, (which they bring from the firm land,) and sometimes other sorts of odoriferous woods. After they compound it with water distilled of flowers, and overspread their bodies with this paste, from the girdle upwards; adding many forms with their fingers, such as they imagine. It is somewhat like cut and pinked doublets, and of an excellent savour. They dress their wives or lemanas in this sort, and make upon their backs works and shadows as they please. “Print skin Purchas calls this.”—Perraud de Lavall, Purchas, p. 165.

The abominable practice of tarring and feathering was but too well known during the American war. It even found its way to England. I remember, when a child, to have seen a man in this condition in the streets of Bristol.

The costume of the savage, who figures so frequently in the pages of the sixteenth century, seems to have been designed to imitate the Brazilian tribes, best known to the French and English at that time. Indeed, this is stated by Vincent Carbois, when, in describing an entertainment given to Marechal de Vaudancourt by the captains of the galleys at Marseilles, he says, August lif six galleries ensemble de front, et fait dresser les tables dessus, et tapissées en façon de grandes salles; ayant accoutumés les fentres en Bretonnais pour servir, ils firent une infinité de garnitures et de tournures à la façon des sauvages, que personne n'eut encore vues; dont tout le monde, avec une extrême algarisssance, s'ébattit merveilleusement.

Drinking feasts.

The point of honor in drinking is not the same among the savages of Guiana, as among the English potators; they account him that is drunk first the bravest fellow. —Harcourt's Voyage.

A custom strange, and yet far spread
Through many a savage tribe, how'er it grew,
And once in the old world known as widely as the new.
—Canto I. st. 28.

Je la trouvo chez les Bercianos, ou les premiers peuples d'Espagne; je la trouvo chez les anciens habitans d'isle de Coree; elle etoit chez les Tihuanecos en Ame.; elle est aujourd'hui dans quelquesendes de nos provins voisines d'Espagne, ou elle d'apporte faire couvade; elle est encore vers le Japon, et dans l'Amérique chez les Caribbones et les Galibies. —Lahont, Mours.

Strabo says this strange custom existed in Cantabria, (l. iii. p. 174, ed. 1571) so that its Gascon extraction has been direct. Dioscorus Siculus is the authority for its existence in Cordes. (Book iii. ch. i, English translation, 1614, vol. i. p. 205) Apuleius Rhodius describes it among the Tiberians, (l. ii. 1621) de sorcié Nymphédos de tres voyages, says the scholar.

Voici la brutalité de nos sauvages dans leur réjouissance pour l'excruciation de leur famille. C'est qu'un même teint que la femme est délivré avec mat set au fil, pour s'y plaindre et y faire l'excusatoire; costume que bien que bourgeoise et ridicule se trouve maintenant à ce que l'on dit, paralyser les yeux d'une certaine province de France; et ils appellent cela la couvade. Mais ce qui est de plus curieux pour le pauvre Cérabe qui s'est mis au feu et à l'armée, c'est qu'on lui fait faire diriquer ou deux jours de suite, ne lauy donnant rien par jour qu'en morceau
Till hardened mothers in the grace bay
Their living bays with no conjunctions ten;
Canto I. st. 33.

This dreadful practice is carried to such an extent in the heart of South America, that whole tribes have become extinct in consequence of it, and of another practice, hardly less nefarious.

Those bloody African savages, the Gigas, reared no children whatsoever; "for as soon," says Battell, "as the woman is delivered of her child, it is presently hurst quick; so that there is not one child brought up in all this generation. But when they take any town, they keep the boys and girls of thirteen or fourteen years of age as their own children, but the men and women they kill and eat. These little boys they train up in the wars, and hang a collar about their necks for a disgrace, which is never taken off till he prove himself a man, and brings his enemy's head to the general; and then it is taken off, and he is a free man, and is called 'gosso,' or 'soldier.' This maketh them all desperate and forward to be free, and counted men, and so they do increase. A generation without generation, says Purchas, p. 377.

Among the causes for which the Kuitennemaw women procure abortion, Mackenzie (p. 98) avouches that it of hatred for the father. No other traveller has ever suspected the existence of this motive. They sometimes kill their female children to save them from the miseries which they themselves have suffered.

The practice among the Panches of Bogota was, that if the first-born was a girl, it was destroyed, and every girl in succession till the first-born boy was born; this last was allowed to live; but if the first-born were a boy, all the children then were reared.—Fiedlerius, p. 11.

Perhaps the most flagitious motive for which this erime has ever become a practice, is that which the Guiana women assign for it; they destroy the greater number of their female infants in order to keep up the value of the sex. (Arara, t. ii. 85.—100. See Hist. of Brazil, vol. ii. 379.) A knowledge of the evils which polygamy brings among some of their neighbors may have led to this mode of preventing it.

Fuliter Gaminus one day bitterly repriemed a Betowya woman (whom he describes as having more capacity than any other of the Indians in those parts) for killing her new-born daughter. She listen to him without lifting her eyes from the ground, and when he had done, and thought that she was convinced of her guilt, and heartily repented of it, she said, "Father, if you will not be angry, I will tell you what is in my heart." He promised that he would not, and bade her speak freely. This she said to me, he says, as follows, literally translated from the Betowya tongue. "Would to God, Father, would to God, my mother when she brought me forth had loved me so well and pitied me so much as to have saved me from all those troubles which I have endured till this day, and am to endure till death! If my mother had buried me as soon as I was born, I should have died, but should not have felt death, and should have been better aware of the death which must come, and should have escaped so many things bitterer than death; who knows how many more such I must endure before I die!" Consider well, Father, the hardships that a poor Indian woman endures among these Indians! They go with us to the plantations, but they have a bow and arrow in their hands, nothing more. But we go with a basket full of things on the back, one child at the breast, another upon the basket. Their business is to shoot a bird or a fish, ours is to dig and work in the field; at evening they go home without any burdens; we, beside our children, have to carry roots for their food, and maize to make their drink. They, when they reach the house, go to converse with their friends; we have to seek wood, fetch water, and prepare their supper. Having supped, they go to sleep; but we almost all the night are pounding maize to make their chicha. And what is the end of this our watching and labor? They drink the chicha, they get drunk, and being out of their senses, beat us with sticks, take us by the hair, drag us about and trample on us. Would to God, Father, that my mother had buried me when she brought me forth! You know that I complain with crying and sobbing, and I have said you that every day, but our greatest pain you do not know, because you never can suffer it. You do not know, Father, the death it is for the poor Indian woman, when having served her husband as a slave, sweating in the field, and in the house without sleep, at the end of twenty years she sees him take a girl for another wife. Her he loves, and though she ill uses our children, we cannot interfeire, for he neither loves us nor cares for us now. A girl is to command over us, and treat us as her servants, and if we speak, they silence us with sticks. Can any Indian woman who has given birth to a child, be so happy as to save it from all these troubles, and deliver it from this slavery, worse than death? I say again, Father, would to God my mother had made me feel her kindness by burying me as soon as I was born! Then would not this heart have had now so much to feel, use these eyes so much to weep for?" Here, says Gaminus, tears put an end to her speechs; and the next is, that all which she said, and all she would have said, if grief had allowed her to proceed, is true.—Ortunio Illustrias, t. ii. p. 65, ed. 1791.

FROM THE DAVE.

They named the child Yeriti.—Canto I. st. 42.

This is the Guaraní name for the species described by Arara, t. iv. p. 139, No. ccccx.
Some of the Orinoco tribes believe that their first forefathers gave up their treasure in the grass. The Takanas, one of the rudest of the Orinoco tribes, suppose themselves descended from a pile of stones upon the top of a rock called Baraquina, and that they all return to stone as they came from it; so that this mass of rock is composed of their forefathers. Therefore, though they bury their dead, within the year in which they take off their heads and carry them to the holes in the rock. — Guatilla, t. i. c. 6.

These are the odd people who always for a first marriage give a girl to an old man, and a youth to an old woman. Polygamy is not in use among them; and they say, that if the young people came together, there could be no good household management. — Guatilla, t. i. c. 12.

P. Labbé (Lett. E. d. t. viii. p. 189, edit. 1781) speaks of a tribe on the north bank of the Plata who put their women to death when they were thirty years old, thinking they had then lived long enough. I have not seen this custom mentioned by any other writer, nor do I believe that it can possibly have existed.

And Father was his name. — Canto H. st. 38.

Tupa. It is the Tupi and Guaraní name for Father, for Thunder, and for the Supreme Being.

The Patagunes call the Supreme Being Soyqch, a word which is said to express that which cannot be seen, which is within itself, and which is out of the world. They may thus explain the word; but it cannot contain this meaning; it is a definition of what they mean, and apparently not such as a savage would give. The dead call Soyqchite; they who are with God, and out of the world.

The Patagunes, Peruvians, and Mulches have no name for God. Their prayers are made to the sun, whom they regard as the giver of all good. A Jesuit once admonished them to worship God who created all things, and this orb among the rest; but they replied, they had never known any thing greater or better than the sun. — Dobrizhoffer, t. i. p. 100.

The most remarkable mode of superstition I remember to have met with is one which is mentioned by the Bishop of Santa Muta, in his History of the Nuevo Reyno de Granada. He tells us, that "the Pijosos of the Nuevo Reyno worshipped nothing visible or invisible, except the spirits of those whom they killed for the purpose of defiling them. For they thought that if an innocent person were put to death, he became a god, and in that capacity would be grateful to those who were the authors of his apostasy. For this reason they used to attack strangers and kill them; not thinking one of their own horde, or of their enemies, could be esteemed innocent, and therefore fitting. A woman or a child would do. But after a few months they held it necessary to make a new god, the old one either having lost his power, or changed his place, or perhaps by that time discharged himself of his debt of gratitude." — Piedrahita, p. 12.

And once there was a way to that good land, For in mid-earth a wondrous Tree there grew. — Canto H. st. 33.

Las Morobis flagrun a Arbol, que en su idioma llaman Nufio de gran diametro que crece de una rama de roble. — Notice par Curieul, p. 100.

Petróleo, in Spanish, means the small, swelling, or round-shaped rocks, and sometimes the tree, or plant, of the same name, as well as the subject of the following

The land of souls. — Canto H. st. 39.

Many of the Indian speculations respecting the condition of souls in a future state are given in my History of Brazil. A description of a Pueblo of the tribe of that name, as given by Ossian MacPherson, may be found in the notes to MacLe. A Tonga one is thus described in the very curious and valuable work of Mr. Mariner.

"The Tonga people universally and positively believe in the existence of a large island lying at a considerable distance to the N. W. of their own islands, which they consider to be the place of residence of their gods, and of the souls of their nobles and matutiboes. This island is supposed to be much larger than all their own islands put together; to be well stocked with all kinds of useful and ornamental trees, always in a state of high perfection, and always bearing the richest fruits and the most beautiful flowers, according to their respective natures; that when these fruits or flowers are plucked, others immediately occupy their place, and that the whole atmosphere is filled with the most delightful fragrance that the imagination can conceive, proceeding from the various kinds of plants.

This island is also well stocked with the most beautiful birds of all imaginable kinds, as well as with abundance of hogs, all of which are immortal, unless they are killed to provide food for the Tongas or gods; but the moment a hog or bird is killed, another, having born or died immediately comes into existence to supply its place, the same as with the fruits and flowers; and this, as far as they know or suppose, is the only mode of propagation of plants and animals.

The island of Bototo is supposed to be so far off as to render it dangerous for the inhabitants to attempt going there; and it is supposed, moreover, that even if they were to succeed in reaching so far, unless it happened to be the particular will of the gods, they would be sure to miss it. They give, however, an account of a Tonga canoe, which, in her return from the Perique Islands a long time ago, was driven by stress of weather to Bototo: ignorant of the place where they were, and being much in want of provisions, and seeing the country abounded in all sorts of fruit, the crew landed, and proceeded to pick some bread fruit, but to their unspeakable astonishment they could no more hurt it than if it had been done by them. They then walked through the trunks of the trees, and passed through the substance of the houses, (which were built like those of Tonga,) without feeling any resistance. They at length saw some of the Bototo, who passed through the substance of their bodies as if there was nothing there. The Bototoes recommended them to go away immediately, as they had no proper food for them, and promised them a fair wind and a speedy passage. They accordingly put directly to sea, and in two days, sailing with the utmost velocity, they arrived at Hamon, (the next Island,) where, at which place they wanted to touch before they got to Tonga. Having remained at Hamon two or three days, they sailed for Tonga, where they arrived with great speed, but in the course of a few days they all died, not as a punishment for having been at Bototo, but as a natural consequence, the air of Bototo, as it were, infecting mortal bodies with speedy death."

In Yucatan their notion of the happy after death was, that they rested in a delightful land, under the shade of a great tree, where there was plenty of food and drink. — Herrera, iv. 10, n.

The Austril tribes believe that the dead live in some region under the earth, where they have their tents, and hunt the souls of estreches. — Dobrizh. ii. 295.

The Persians have a great reverence for large, old trees, thinking that the souls of the happy delight to dwell in them, and for this reason they call the Bototo, ter, that signifies the old man, by which name they also designate the supposed inhabitant. Pietro Della Valle describes a prodigious tree of this character, in the hollow of which tapers were always kept burning to the honor of the Ter. He pitched his tent under its boughs twice; once with his wife when on his way to embark for Europe, and again when returning with her company. The second time, he speaks of this last night's lodging as very affecting. We soon forgive this excellent traveller for his coxcombry, take an interest in his domestic affairs, and part with him at last as with an old friend.

Who thought
From Death, as from some living frag to frag. — Canto II. st. 41.

An opinion of this kind has extended to people in a much higher grade of society than the American Indios.

"After the Devil appeared in Dwarika in a human shape, the color of his skin being black and yellow, his head close shorn, and all his limbs distorted. He placed himself at men's doors, so that all those who saw him shuddered with apprehension, and became even as dead men from mere affright. Every person to whom he came shot an arrow at him; and the moment the arrow quitted the bow-string, they saw the spectre no more, nor knew which way he was gone." Life of Creechoe.

This is a poetical invention; but such an invention has formed a popular belief in Greece, if M. Pouvezville may be trusted.

"The Evil Eye, the Cacochenian, has been seen wandering over the roofs of the houses. Who can dare to doubt this? It was in the form of a withered old woman, covered with festoons, as it was heard to call by their names those who are to be cut off from the number of the living. Nocturnal concerts, voices murmuring amid the silence of the darkest nights have been heard in the air; phantoms have been seen wandering about in solitary places, in the streets, in the markets; the dogs have howled with the most dismal and melancholy tone, and their cries have been repeated by the echoes along the desert streets. It is when such things happen, as I was told very seriously by an inhabitant of Nauplia di Romagna, that great care must be taken not to answer if you should be called during the night: If you hear symphonies, bury yourself in the bed clothes, and do not listen to them; it is the Old Woman, it is the Plague itself that knocks at your door." — Pouvezville, 189.

The Patagones and other Austral tribes attribute all diseases to an evil spirit. Their conjurers therefore beat drums by the patient, which have hideous figures painted upon them, thinking thus to frighten away the cause. If he dies, his relations endeavor to take vengeance upon those who pretended to cure him; but if one of the chiefs dies, all the conjurers are slain, unless they can save themselves by flight. — Dobrizhoffer, t. ii. 286.

They dragged the dying out. — Canto II. st. 45.

The Austral tribes sometimes bury the dying, thinking it an act of mercy thus to shorten their sufferings. (Dobrizhoffer, t. ii. 286.) But in general this practice, which extends widely among savages, arises from the selfish feeling assigned in the text. Superstition, without this selfishness, produces a practice of the same kind, though not absolutely as brutal, in the East. "The moora or chaliches are small lizards in which a Hindoo, when given over by his physicians, is deposed, and left alone to expire, and be carried off by the sacred flood." Owen, in Forbes, iv. 99.

When the patient is in hope of recovery, the patient is generally removed from the bed, and laid on a platform of fresh earth, either out of doors, or prepared purposely in some adjoining room or viranda, that he may there breathe his last. In a physical sense, this removal at so critical a period must be often attended with fatal consequences; though perhaps not quite so decisive as that of exposing an aged parent or a dying friend on the banks of the Ganges. I now only mention the circumstances as forming part of the Hindoo religious system. After having expired upon the earth, the body is carried to the water-side, and washed with many ceremonies. In his then laid upon the funeral pile, that the fire may have a share of the victim: the ashes are finally scattered in the air, and fall upon the water.

"During the funeral ceremony, which is solemn and affecting, the Brahmins address the respective elements in words to the following purport; although there may be a different mode of performing these religious rites in other parts of Hindostan.

"O Earth! to thee we commend our brother; of thee he was formed; by thee he was sustained; and unto thee he now returns!"

"O Water! thou didst contribute to the life of our brother; then wert one of his sustaining elements. His remains are now dispersed; receive thy share of him, who has now taken an everlasting flight!"

And she, in many an cautious essay,
At length into a decent of her own
Had blended all their notes. — Canto III. st. 39, &c.

An extract from a journal written in Switzerland will be the best comment upon the description in these stanzas, which indeed were probably suggested by my recollections of the Staubach.

"When we were at the waterfall, some half score peasants, chiefly women and girls, assembled just out of reach of the spray, and set up — surely the wildest choruses that ever was heard by human ears — a song, not of articulate sounds, but in which the voice was used as a mere instrument of music, more flexible than any which art could produce, — sweet, powerful, and thrilling beyond description." It will be seen by the subjoined sonnet of Mr. Wordsworth's, who visited this spot three years after me, that he was not less impressed than I had been by this wild concert of voices.

On approaching the Staubach, Lauterbrunnen
Tracks let me follow far from human kind
Which these illusive greetings may not reach;
Where only Nature lends her voice to teach
Careless pursuit, and captures unconfined.
No Mermaid warbles (to sail the wind
That drives some vessel towards a dangerous beach)
More thrilling melodies! no cavern'd Witch,
Chanting a love-spell, ever intertwined
Nature shrill and wild with art more musical!
Alas! that from the lips of object Want
And Inleness in tatters mendicate
They should proceed — enjoyment to inhale,
And with regret and useless pity haunt
This bold, this pure, this sky-born Waterfall!

"The vocal powers of these musical beggars (says Mr. Wordsworth) may seem to be exaggerated; but this wild and savage air was utterly unlike any sounds I had ever heard; the notes reached me from a distance, and on what occasion they were sung I could not guess, only they seemed to belong in some way or other to the waterfall; and reminded me of religious services chanted to streams and fountains in pagan times."

Some dim preface. — Canto III. st. 41.

Upon this subject an old Spanish romance speaks thus:
Aunque hombre no sabe lo de adelante como ha de mover, el espíritu lo sabe, y antes que venga su dueño al diablo y de aquél se le perdiera los grandes sospecha que hombres dan a soberanía no podiendo en ninguna cosa, como a muchos acoce; que aquel que el espíritu echa de ci, el espíritu es que siente el mal que ha de ser. — Cronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, p. ii. 171.

Across her shoulders was a handcuff flung. — Canto III. st. 45.

Pinkerton, in his Geography, (vol. ii. p. 535, n. 3d ed.)
The Estomenderos compelled the unhappy people whom they found living where they liked, to settle in such places as were most convenient for the work. It is said that they were now to be compulsorily employed. All their work was task-work, imposed with little moderation, and exacted without mercy.

This tyranny extended to the women and children; and as all the Spaniards, the officers of justice as well as the Estomenderos, were induced to it, the hardihood of the latter to whom they could look for protection. Even the institutions of Christianity, by which the Spanish government hoped to better the temporal condition of its new subjects, were made the occasion of new grievances and more intolerable oppression.

For, as the laws were legally free,—free, therefore, to marry where they pleased, and the wives were to hold husbands,—every means was taken to prevent a marriage between two Indians who belonged to different Departamentos, and the interest of the master counteracted all the efforts of the priest. The Spanish women are said to have exceeded their husbands in cruelty on such occasions, and to have instigated them to the most violent and injurious measures, that they might not lose their female attendants. The consequence was, that profigies of manners among the Indians was rather encouraged than restrained, as it is now in the English sugar islands, where the planter is not a religious man.—Lexicon, 1, 1, § 5, 6, 7.

St. Joachim.—Canto IV. st. 17.

The legend of his visit to Limbo is given here in a translated extract from that very curious work, the Life of the Virgin Mary, as related by herself to Sister Maria de Jesus, Abbess of the Franciscan Convent of the Inmaculada Concepcion at Agrola, and published with the sanction of all the ecclesiastical authorities in Spain.

After some conversation between the Almighty and the Virgin, at that time three years and a half old, the Franciscan confessor, who was the accomplice of the abbess in this blasphemous imposture, proceeds thus:—

"The Most High received this morning sacrifice of his tender spence, Mary the most holy, and with a pious composure said to her, 'Thou art beautiful in thy thoughts, O Prince's daughter, my dove, and my beloved! I admitt thy desires, which are agreeable to my eyes: and it is my will, in fulfillment of them, that thou shouldst understand the time draws nigh, when by my divine appointment thy father Joachin must pass from this mortal life to the life immortal and eternal. His death shall be short, and he will soon rest in peace, and be placed with the Saints in Limbo, awaiting the redemption of the whole human race.' "This information from the Lord mother disturbed nor troubled the regal breast of Mary, the Virgin pure and chaste; yet so the love of children to their parents is a debt due by nature, and that love in all its perfection existed in this most holy child, a natural grief at losing her most holy father Joachin, whom as a daughter she devoutly loved, could not fail to be resented. The tender and sweet child Mary felt a movement of grief compatible with the serenity of her magnanimous heart: and acting with greatness in every thing, following both grace and nature, she made a fervent prayer for her father Joachin: she besought the Lord, that, as the mighty and true God, he would look upon him in the hour of his happy death, and defend him from the Devil, especially in that hour, and preserve him, and appoint him in the number of his elect, as one who in his life had confessed and magnified his holy and adorable name. And the more to oblige his Majesty, the most faithful daughter offered to give up her voluntary father, the most holy Joachin, all that the Lord might ordain.

"His Majesty accepted this petition, and consol'd the divine child, assuring her that he would be with her father as a merciful and compassionate remembrancer of those who love and serve him, and that he would place him in the bosoms of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and he prepared her again to receive and suffer other troubles. Eight days before the death of the holy Patriarch Joachin, Mary the most holy lady had other advices from the Lord, declaring the day and hour in which he it was to die, and he occurred, only six months after our Queen went to reside in the temple. When her Highness had received this information from the Lord, she besought the twelve angels, (who, I have before said), were those whom St. John names in the Revelation,) that they would be with her father Joachin in his sickness, and comfort him, and consoled his aged heart in his last hour. And when the last hour of his transit she sent all those of her guard, and besought the Lord that he would manifest to her father for his greater consolation. The Most High granted this, and in every thing fulfilled the desire of her elect, unique, and perfect soul. And the great Patriarch and ever Virgin Joachin saw the thousand holy angels who guided his daughter Maria, at whose petition and desire the grace of the Almighty superabounded, and by his command the angel said to Joachin these things:—

"Man of God, the Most High and Mighty is thy eternal salvation, and he sends thee from his holy place the necessary and timely assistance for thy soul! Mary, thy daughter, sends us to be with thee at this hour, in which thou hast to pay to thy Creator the debt of natural death. She is thy most faithful and powerful intercessor with the Most High, in whose name and peace depart thou from this world with consolation and joy, that he hath made thee parent of so blessed a daughter. And although his incomprehensible Majesty, in his serene wisdom, hath not till now manifested to thee the sacred dignity in which he will constitute thy daughter, it is his pleasure that thou shouldst know it now, to the intent that thou mayest magnify him and praise him, and that at such news the jubilee of thy spirit may be joined with the grief and natural sadness of death. Mary, thy daughter, and our Queen, is the one chosen by the arm of the One-infecting, that the Divine forswore in her clothed herself with flesh, and with the human form. She is to be the happy Mother of the Messiah, blessed among women, superior to all creatures, and inferior only to God himself. Thy most happy daughter is to be the repairer of what the human race lost by the first fall, and the high mountains wherein the new law of grace is to be formed and established. Therefore, as thou livest now in the world its restauratrix and daughter, by whom God prepares for it the fitting remedy, depart thou in joy; and the Lord will bless thee from Zion, and give thee a place among the Saints, that thou mayest attain to the sight and possession of the happy Jerusalem."

"While the holy Angels spoke these words to Joachin, St. Anna, his wife, was present, standing by the pillow of his bed; and she heard, and, by divine permission, understood them. At the same time, the holy Patriarch Joachin lost his speech, and entering upon the common way of all flesh, began to die, with a marvellous struggle between the delight of such joyful tidings and the pain of death. During this conflict with his interior powers, many and fervent acts of divine love to her, and of praise for thanksgiving, mixed with humiliation, and other virtues, did he heroically perform; and thus absorbed in the new knowledge of so divine a mystery he came to the end of his natural life, dying the precious death of the Saints. His most holy spirit was carried by the Angels of the Holy Fathers and of the Just, and for a new constitution and light in the long night wherein they dwelt, the Most High ordered that the soul of the holy Patriarch Joachin should be the new Parannym and Ambassador of his Great Majesty, for announcing to all that congregation of the Just, how the day of eternal light had now dawned, and the day-break was Mary, the most holy daughter of Joachin and of Anna, from whom should be born the Sun of Divinity, Christ, Restorer of the whole human race. The Holy Fathers and the Just in Limbo heard these tidings, and in their jubilee composed new hymns of him, and this Most High. And the news of the marriage of Mary the most holy was born; and the three years and a half of her Highness's age make sixty-nine and a half, a few days more or less.

"The holy Patriarch and father of our Queen being dead, the holy Angels of her guard returned incontinent to her presence, and gave her notice of all that had occurred in her father's transit. Forthwith the most prudent child solicited consent with great love; and the other Joachin, who was the mother St. Anna, entreating that the Lord would, as a father, direct and govern her in the solitude wherein, by the loss of her husband, Joachin, she was left. St. Ann herself sent also news of his death, which was first communicated to the Mistress of our divine Princess, that, in imparting it, she might console her. The Mistress did this, and the most wise child heard her, with all composure and dissimulation, but with the patience and the modesty of a Queen; but she was not ignorant of the event which the Mistress related to her as news."—Misa del Cisne de Dios, par. 1, 2, e. 10, §664—669. Madrid, 1741.

It was in the middle of the seventeenth century that the work, from which this extract is translated, was published among the Spaniards as a new revelation. Gross and blasphemous as the Imposture is, the work was still current when I perused my copy, about twenty years ago, and it is not included in the Spanish Index Expurgatorius of 1790, the last (I believe) which was published, and which is now before me."

He could not marry her.—Caato IV, st. 67.

A case precisely of the same kind is mentioned by Mr. Mariner. "A young Chief at Tonga, a very handsome man, was inspired by the ghost of a woman in Botoboto, who had fallen in love with him. On a sudden, he felt himself tow-spirited, and, shortly afterwards, fainted away. When he came to himself, he was very ill, and was taken accordingly to the house of a priest. As yet, he did not know who it was that inspired him, but the priest informed him that it was a woman of Botoboto, mentioning her name, who had died some years before, and who wished him now to die, that he might be near her. He accordingly died in two days. The Chief said he suspected this, from the dreams he had had at different times, when the figure of a woman came to him in the night. Mr. Mariner was with the sick Chief three or four times during his illness, and heard the priest foretell his death, and relate the occasion of it."—Mariner.

The following similar case appeared in a newspaper:—"Died, on Sunday last, in the 29th year of the reign of William and Mary, aged 29, a native of the west coast of Greenland. This Eskimo has occupied a considerable share of the public attention, and his loss will be very generally felt. He had already rendered important service to the country in the late expedition of discovery, and great credit has been gained by the utility which he would prove on the expedition about to sail for Hafflin's Bay. The Admiralty, with great liberality and judgment, had directed the greatest pains to be taken in his further education; and he had been several months in Edinburgh with this view, when he was seized with a violent inflammation in the chest, which carried him off in a few days. He was extremely docile, and, though rather slow in the attainment of knowledge, he was industrious, zealous, and cheerful; and was always grateful for the kindness and attention shown to him. His amiable disposition and simple manners had interested those who had opportunities of knowing him personally, in a way that will not soon be forgotten. To the public, his loss, we fear, is irreparable—to his friends, it is doubly severe. Just before his death, the poor Eskimo said he knew he was going to die; that his father and mother had died in the same way; and that his sister, who was the last of all his relations, had just appeared to him, and called him away."—Edinburgh Courant, Feb. 19.
ALL FOR LOVE, OR A SINNER WELL SAVED.

TO CAROLINE BOWLES.

Could I look forward to a distant day
With hope of building some elaborate lay,
Then would I wait till worthier strains of mine
Might bear inscribed thy name, O Caroline!
For I would, while my voice is heard on earth,
Bear witness to thy genius and thy worth.
But we have both been taught to feel with fear
How frail the tenure of existence here,
What unforeseen calamities prevent.
Alas, how oft! the best-resolved intent;
And therefore this poor volume I address
To thee, dear friend, and sister Poetess.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Keswick, 21 Feb. 1829.

The story of the following Poem is taken from a Life of St. Basil, ascribed to his contemporary St. Amphiliocbus,
Bishop of Iconium; a Latin version of which, made by Cardinal Urus in the ninth century, is inserted by Rosweyde, among the Lives of the Fathers, in his compilation Historia Ecumenica. The original had not then been printed, but Rosweyde obtained a copy of it from the Royal Library at Paris. He intimates no suspicion concerning the authenticity of the life, or the truth of this particular legend;
oberving only, that hac narratio apud solam inuentar Amphiliocbum. It is, indeed, the flower of the work, and as such had been culled by some earlier translator than Urus.
The very learned Dominican, P. François Combeuf, published the original, with a version of his own, and endeavored to establish its authenticity in opposition to Baronius, who supposed the life to have been written by some other Amphiliocbus, not by the Bishop of Iconium. Had Combeuf possessed powers of mind equal to his erudition, he might even then have been in some degree prejudiced upon this subject, for, according to Baillet, il a voit un accrocument particulier pour S. Basil. His version is inserted in the Acta Sanctorum, (Jan. t. ii. pp. 227—257.) But the Bel-landist Baillet brands the life there as apocryphal; and in his annotations treats Combeuf more rudely, it may be suspected, than he would have done, had he not belonged to a rival and hostile order.
Should the reader be desirous of comparing the Poem with the Legend, he may find the story, as transcribed from Rosweyde, among the Notes.

I.

A youth hath enter'd the Sorcerer's door,
But he dares not lift his eye,
For his knees fail, and his flesh quakes,
And his heart beats audibly.

"Look up, young man!" the Sorcerer said;
"Lay open thy wishes to me!
Or art thou too modest to tell thy tale?
If so, I can tell it thee.

"Thy name is Eleémon;
Protæris's freedman thou art;
And on Cyra, thy Master's daughter,
Thou hast madly fix'd thy heart.

"But fearing (as thou well mayest fear!)
The high-born Maid to woo,
Thou hast tried what secret prayers, and vows,
And sacrifice might do.

"Thou hast prayed unto all Saints in Heaven,
And to Mary their vaunted Queen;
And little fartherance hast thou found
From them, or from her, I ween!

"And thou, I know, the Ancient Gods,
In hope forlorn, hast tried,
If haply Venus might obtain
The maiden for thy bride.

"On Jove and Phæbus thou hast call'd,
And on Astarte's name;
And on her, who still at Ephesus
Retains a faded fame.

"Thy voice to Baal hath been raised;
To Nile's old Deities;
And to all Gods of elder time,
Adored by men in every clime,
When they ruled earth, seas, and skies.

"Their Images are deaf!
Their Oracles are dumb!
And therefore thou, in thy despair,
To Abibas art come.

"Ay, because neither Saints nor Gods
Thy pleasure will fulfil,
Thou comest to me, Eleémon,
To ask if Satan will!

"I answer thee, Yes. But a faint heart
Can never accomplish its ends;
Put thy trust boldly in him, and be sure
He never forsakes his friends."

While Eleémon listen'd
He shudder'd inwardly,
At the ugly voice of Abibas,
And the look in his wicked eye.

And he could then almost have given
His fatal purpose o'er;
But his Good Angel had left him
When he entered the Sorcerer's door.

So, in the strength of evil shame,
His mind the young man knit
Into a desperate resolve,
For his had purpose fit.

"Let thy Master give me what I seek,
O Servant of Satan," he said,
"As I ask firmly, and for his Renounce all other aid!"
"Time presses. Cyra is content
To bid the world farewell,
And pass her days, a virgin vow'd,
Among Emmelia's sisterhood,
The tenant of a cell.

"Thus hath her father will'd, that so
A life of rigor here below
May fit her for the skies,
And Heaven acceptably receive
His costliest sacrifice.

"The admiring people say of this
That Angels, or that Saints in bliss,
The holy thought inspire;
And she is call'd a blessed Maid,
And he a happy Sire.

"Through Cappadocia far and wide
The news hath found its way,
And crowds to Caesarea flock
To attend the solemn day.

"The robes are ready, rich with gold,
Even like a bridal dress,
Which at the altar she will wear
When self-devoted she stands there
In all her loveliness.

"And that coarse habit too, which she
Must then put on, is made,
Therein to be for life and death
Unchangeably array'd.

"This night, this precious night is ours;
Late, late, I come to you;
But all that must be dared, or done,
Prepared to dare and do."

"Thou hast hesitated long!" said Abibas,
"And thou hast done amiss,
In praying to Him whom I name not,
That it never might come to this!

But thou hast chosen thy part, and here thou art;
And thou shalt have thy desire;
And though at the eleventh hour
Thou hast come to serve our Prince of Power,
He will give thee in full thine hire.

"These Tablets take;" (he wrote as he spake;)
"My letters, which thou art to bear,
Wherein I shall commend thee
To the Prince of the Powers of the Air.

"Go from the North Gate out, and take
On a Pagan's tomb thy stand;
And, looking to the North, hold up
The Tablets in thy hand;—

"And call the Spirits of the Air,
That they my messenger may bear
To the place whither he would pass,
And there present him to their Prince
In the name of Abibas.

"The passage will be swift and safe;
No danger awaits thee beyond;
Thou wilt only have now to sign and seal,
And hereafter to pay the Bond."

II.

Shunning human sight, like a thief in the night,
Eleciom made no delay,
But went unto a Pagan's tomb
Beside the public way.

Enclosed with barren elms it stood,
There planted when the dead
Within the last abode of man
Had been deposited.

And thrice ten years those barren trees,
Enjoying light and air,
Had grown and flourished, while the dead
In darkness moulder'd there.

Long had they overtopp'd the tomb;
And closed was now that upper room
Where friends were wont to pour,
Upon the honor'd dust below,
Libations through the floor.

There on that unblest monument
The young man took his stand,
And northward he the tablets held
In his uplifted hand.

A courage not his own he felt,
A wicked fortitude,
Wherewith bad influences unseen
That hour his heart endured.

The rising Moon grew pale in heaven
At that unhappy sight;
And all the blessed Stars seem'd then
To close their twinkling light;
And a shuddering in the elms was heard,
Though winds were still that night.

He call'd the Spirits of the Air,
He call'd them in the name
Of Abibas; and at the call
The attendant Spirits came.

A strong hand, which he could not see,
Took his uplifted hand;
He felt a strong arm circle him,
And lift him from his stand;—

A whirl of unseen wings he heard
About him every where,
Which onward, with a mighty force,
Impell'd him through the air.

Fast through the middle sky and far
It hurried him along;
All for Love, or a Sinner Well Saved.

The Hurricane is not so swift,
The Torrent not so strong;

The Lightning travels not so fast,
The Sunbeams not so far;
And now behind him he hath left
The Moon and every Star.

And still, erect as on the tomb
In impious act he stood,
Is he rapt onward — onward — still
In that fix'd attitude.

But as he from the living world
Approach'd where Spirits dwell,
His bearers there in thinner air
Were dimly visible; —

Shapeless, and scarce to be described
In darkness where they flew;
But still, as they advanced, the more
And more distinct they grew.

And when their way fast-speeding they
Through their own region went,
Then were they in their substance seen,
The angelic form, the fiendish mien,
Face, look, and lineament.

Behold where dawns before them now,
Far off, the boreal ray,
Sole daylight of that frozen zone,
The limit of their way.

In that drear realm of outer night,
Like the shadow, or the ghost of light,
It moved in the restless skies,
And went and came, like a feeble flame
That flickers before it dies.

There the fallen Seraph reign'd supreme
Amid the utter waste;
There, on the everlasting ice
His dolorous throne was placed.

Son of the Morning! is it then
For this that thou hast given
Thy seat, preeminent among
The hierarchies of Heaven? —

As if dominion here could joy
To blasted pride impart;
Or this cold region slake the fire
Of Hell within the heart!

Thither the Evil Angels bear
The youth, and, rendering homage there
Their service they o'erspoke,
And in the name of Abibas
Present him to their Prince:

Just as they seized him when he made
The Sorcerer's mandate known,
In that same act and attitude
They set him before the throne.

The fallen Seraph cast on him
A dark, disdainful look;
And from his raised hand scornfully
The profer'd tablets took.

"Ay, — love!" he cried. "It serves me well.
There was the Trojan boy,—
His love brought forth a ten years' war,
And fired the towers of Troy.

"And when my own Mark Antony
Against young Cesar strove,
And Rome's whole world was set in arms,
The cause was, — all for love!"

"Some for ambition sell themselves;
By avarice some are driven;
Pride, envy, hatred, best will move
Some souls; and some for only love
Renounce their hopes of Heaven.

"Yes, of all human follies, love,
Methinks, hath served me best;
The Apple had done but little for me,
If Eve had not done the rest.

"Well then, young Amorist, whom love
Hath brought unto this pass,
I am willing to perform the word
Of my servant Abibas.

"Thy Master's daughter shall be thine,
And with her sire's consent;
And not more to thy heart's desire
Than to her own content.

"Yea, more; — I give thee with the girl,
Thine after-days to bless,
Health, wealth, long life, and whatsoever
The world calls happiness.

"But, mark me! — on conditions, youth!
No gathering here we know!
Dost thou here, solemnly, this hour,
Thy hope of Heaven forego?

"Dost thou renounce thy baptism,
And bind thyself to me,
My woful portion to partake
Through all eternity?

"No lurking purpose shall avail,
When youth may fail and courage quail,
To cheat me by contrition!
I will have thee written down among
The children of Perdition.

"Remember, I deceive thee not,
Nor have I tempted thee!
Thou comest of thine own accord,
And actest knowingly.

"Dost thou, who now to choose art free,
Forever pledge thyself to me?
As I shall help thee, say! " —
"I do; so help me, Satan!" said
The wilful castaway.

"A resolute answer," quoth the Fiend;
"And now then, Child of Dust,
In further proof of that firm heart,
Thou wilt sign a Bond before we part;
For I take thee not on trust!"

Swift as thought, a scroll and a reed were brought,
And to Eleiimon’s breast,
Just where the heart-stroke plays, the point
Of the reed was gently press’d.

It pierced not in, nor touch’d the skin;
But the sense that it caused was such,
As when an electric pellet of light
Comes forcibly out at a touch;—

A sense no sooner felt than gone,
But, with that short feeling, then
A drop of his heart’s blood came forth
And fill’d the fatal pen.

And with that pen accurs’d he sign’d
The execrable scroll,
Whereby he to perdition bound
His miserable soul.

"Eleiimon, Eleiimon!" then said the Demon,
"The girl shall be thine,
By the tie she holds divine,
Till time that tie shall sever;
And by this writing thou art mine,
Forever, and ever, and ever!"

III.

Look at you silent dwelling now!
A heavenly sight is there,
Where Cyra in her Chamber kneels
Before the Cross in prayer.

She is not loath to leave the world;
For she hath been taught with joy
To think that prayer and praise thenceforth
Will be her life’s employ.

And thus her mind hath she inclined,
Her pleasure being still (An only child, and motherless)
To do her Father’s will.

The moonlight falls upon her face,
Upraised in fervor meek,
While peaceful tears of piety
Are stealing down her cheek.

That duty done, the harmless maid
Dispos’d herself to rest;
No sin, no sorrow in her soul,
No trouble in her breast.

But when upon the pillow then,
Composed, she laid her head,
She little thought what unseen Powers
Kept watch beside her bed.

A double ward had she that night,
When evil near her drew;
Her own Good Angel guarding her,
And Eleiimon’s too.

Their charge it was to keep her safe
From all unholy things;
And o’er her, while she slept, they spread
The shadow of their wings.

So when an Evil Dream drew nigh,
They barr’d him from access,
Nor suffer’d him to reach her with
A breath of sinfulness.

But with his instigations they
A hallowing influence blend,
And made his fiendish ministry
Subserve to their intent.

Thus, while in troubled sleep she lay,
Strange impulses were given,
Emotions earthly and of earth,
With heavenly ones of Heaven.

And now the nightingale hath ceased
Her strain, who all night long
Hath in the garden rosier trill’d
A rich and rapturous song.

The storks on roof, and dome, and tower,
Forbear their clattering din,
As now the motions and the sounds
Of daily life begin.

Then, as from dreams that seem’d no dreams,
The wondering Maid awoke,
A low, sweet voice was in her ear,
Such as we might expect to hear
If some Good Angel spoke.

According with her dreams, it said,
"So, Cyra, must it be;
The duties of a wedded life
Hath Heaven ordain’d for thee."

This was no dream full well she knew;
For open-eyed she lay,
Conscious of thought and wakefulness,
And in the light of day;
And twice it speake, if doubt had been,
To do all doubt away.

Alas! but how shall she make known
This late and sudden change?
Or how obtain belief for what
Even to herself is strange?

How will her Father brook a turn
That must to all seem shame?
How hear to think that vulgar tongues
Are busy with her name?

That she should for a voice—a dream—
Expose herself to be the theme
Of wonder and of scorn;—
Public as her intent had been,
And this the appointed morn!

The Nuns even now are all alert;
The altar hath been dress'd,
The scissors that should clip her hair
Provided, and the black hood there,
And there the sable vest.

And there the Priests are robing now;
The Singers in their station;
Hack! in the city she can hear
The stir of expectation!

Through every gate the people pour,
And guests on roof, and porch, and tower,
Expectant take their place;
The streets are swarming, and the church
Already fills space.

Speak, then, she must: her heart she felt
This night had changed its choice;
Nor dared the Maiden disobey,—
Nor did she wish to (sooth to say,)—
That sweet and welcome voice.

Her Father comes: she studies not
For gloss, or for pretence;
The plain, straight course will Cyra take
(Which none without remorse forsake)
Of truth and innocence.

"O Father, hear me patiently!"
The blushing Maiden said;
"I tremble, Father, while I speak,
But surely not for dread;—

"If all my wishes have till now
Found favor in thy sight,
And ever to perform thy will
Hath been my best delight,
Why should I fear to tell thee now
The visions of this night?"

"I stood in a dream at the altar,—
But it was as an earthly Bride;
And Eleemon, thy freedman,
Was the Bridegroom at my side.

"Thou, Father, gavest me to him,
With thy free and full consent;
And—why should I dissemble it?—
Methought I was content.

Months then and years were crowded
In the course of that busy night;
I clasp'd a baby to my breast,
And, oh! with what delight!

"Yea, I was fruitful as a vine;
Our Heavenly Parent me and mine
In all things seem'd to bless;
Our ways were ways of peace, our paths
Were paths of pleasantness.

"When I taught lisping lips to pray,
The joy it was to me,
O Father, thus to train these plants
For immortality!

"I saw their little winning ways
Their grandparents' love engage;
Methought they were the pride, the joy,
The crown of his old age.

"When from the Vision I awoke,
A voice was in my ear,—
A waking voice,—I heard it twice;
No human tongue was near;—

"No human utterance so could reach
The secret soul, no human speech
So make the soul rejoice;
In hearing it I felt and knew
It was an Angel's voice!

"And thus, in words distinct, it said:—
'So, Cyra, must it be!'
The duties of a wedded life
Hath Heaven ordain'd for thee.'"

Her cheek was like the new-blown rose,
While thus she told her tale;
Proterius listened earnestly,
And as he heard grew pale;—

For he, too, in the dreams of night,
At the altar had seem'd to stand,
And to Eleemon, his freedman,
Had given his daughter's hand.

Their offspring, courting his caress,
About his knees had throng'd;
A lovely progeny, in whom,
When he was in the silent tomb,
His line should be prolong'd.

And he had heard a waking voice,
Which said it so must be,
Pronouncing upon Cyra's name
A holiest eulogy:—

"Her shall her husband praise, and her
Her children bless'd shall call;
Many daughters have done virtuously,
But thine excellest them all!"

No marvel if his heart were moved;
The dream he saw was one;
He kiss'd his trembling child, and said,
"The will of Heaven be done!"

Little did child or sire in this
The work of sorcery fear;
As little did Elefimon think
That the hand of Heaven was here.

   — IV. —

From house to house, from street to street,
The rapid rumor flies;
Incredulous ears it found, and hands
Are lifted in surprise;
And tongues through all the astonish'd town
Are busier now than eyes.

"So sudden and so strange a change!
A Freedman, too, the choice!
The shame,—the scandal,—and for what?
A vision and a voice!

"Had she not chosen the strait gate, —
The narrow way,—the holy state,—
The Sanctuary's abode?
Would Heaven call back its votary
To the broad and beaten road?

"To carnal wishes would it turn
The mortified intent?
For this are miracles vouchsafed?
For this are Angels sent?

"A plain collusion! a device
Between the girl and youth!
Good easy man must the Father be,
To take such tale for truth!"

So judged the acrid and the austere,
And they whose evil heart
Inclines them, in whate'er betides,
To take the evil part.

But others, whom a kindlier frame
To better thoughts inclined,
Preserved, amid their wonderment,
An equitable mind.

They would not of Proteus thus
Injuriously miseem, —
A grave, good man, and with the wise
For wisdom in esteem.

No easy ear, or vain belief,
Would he to falsehood lend;
Nor ever might light motive him
From well-weigh'd purpose bend.

And surely on his pious child,
The gentle Cyra, meek and mild,
Could no suspicion rest;
For in this daughter he had been
Above all fathers blest.

As dutiful as beautiful,
Her praise was widely known,
Being one who, as she grew in years,
Had still in goodness grown.

And what though Elefimon were
A man of lowly birth?
Enough it was if Nature had
Ennobled him with worth.

"This was no doubtful thing," they said,
"For he had in the house been bred,
Nor e'er from thence removed;
But there from childhood had been known,
And trusted, and approved.

"Such as he was, his qualities
Might to the world excuse
The Maid and Father for their choice,
Without the vision and the voice,
Had they been free to choose.

"But Heaven by miracle had made
Its pleasure manifest;
That manifested will must set
All doubtful thoughts to rest.
Mysterious though they be, the ways
Of Providence are best."

The wondering City thus discoursed;
To Abbas alone
The secret truth, and even to him
But half the truth, was known.

Meantime the Church hath been prepared
For spousal celebration;
The Sisters to their cells retire,
Amazed at such mutation.

The habit and hood of camel's hair,
Which with the sacred scissors there
On the altar were display'd,
Are taken thence, and in their stead
The marriage rings are laid.

Behold, in garments gay with gold,
For other spousals wrought,
The Maiden from her Father's house
With bridal pomp is brought.

And now before the Holy Door
In the Ante-nave they stand;
The Bride and Bridegroom side by side,
The Paraphernalia, in festal pride,
Arranged on either hand.

Then from the Sanctuary the Priests,
With incense burning sweet,
Advance, and at the Holy Door
The Bride and Bridegroom meet.

There to the Bride and Bridegroom they
The marriage tapers gave;
And to the altar as they go,
With cross-way movement to and fro,
The thurible they wave.

For fruitfulness, and perfect love,
And constant peace, they pray'd,
On Eleemon, the Lord’s Servant,
And Cyra, the Lord’s Handmaid.

They call’d upon the Lord to bless
Their spousal celebration,
And sanctify the marriage rite
To both their souls’ salvation.

A pause at every prayer they made;
Whereat, with one accord,
The Choristers took up their part,
And sung, in tones that thrill’d the heart,
Have mercy on us, Lord!

Then with the marriage rings the priest
Betroth’d them each to each,
And, as the sacred pledge was given,
Resumed his awful speech; —

Pronouncing them, before high Heaven
This hour espoused to be,
Now and for evermore, for time,
And for eternity.

This did he in the presence
Of Angels and of men;
And at every pause the Choristers
Intoned their deep Amen!

Then to that gracious Lord, the Priest
His supplication made,
Who, as our sacred Scriptures tell,
Did bring Rebecca to the well
When Abraham’s servant pray’d.

He call’d upon that gracious Lord
To establish with his power
The espousals made between them,
In truth and love, this hour; —

And with his mercy and his word
Their lot, now link’d, to bless,
And let his Angel guide them
In the way of righteousness.

With a Christian benediction,
The Priest dismiss’d them then,
And the Choristers, with lusier voice,
Intoned the last Amen!

The days of Espousals are over;
And on the Crowning-day,
To the sacred fane the bridal train,
A gay procession, take again
Through thronging streets their way.

Before them, by the Paranymps,
The coronals are borne,
Composed of all sweet flowers of spring
By virgin hands that morn.

With lighted tapers in array
They enter the Holy Door,
And the Priest with the waving thuribule
Perfumes the way before.

He raised his voice, and call’d aloud
On Him who from the side
Of our first Father, while he slept,
Form’d Eve to be his bride; —

Creating Woman thus for Man
A helpmate meet to be,
For youth and age, for good and ill,
For weal and woe, united still
In strict society, —

Flesh of his flesh; appointing them
One flesh to be, one heart.
Whom God hath joined together,
Them let not man dispart!

And on our Lord he call’d, by whom
The marriage feast was blest,
When first by miracle he made
His glory manifest.

Then, in the ever-blessed Name,
Almighty over all,
From the man’s Paranymp he took
The marriage coronal; —

And crowning him therewith, in that
Thrice holy Name, he said,
“Eleemon, the Servant of God, is crown’d
For Cyra, the Lord’s Handmaid!”

Next, with like action and like words,
Upon her brow he set
Her coronal, intwined wherein
The rose and lily met;
How beautifully they beseem’d
Her locks of glossy jet!

Her he for Eleemon crown’d,
The Servant of the Lord; —
Alas, how little did that name
With his true state accord!

“Crown them with honor, Lord!” he said,
“With blessings crown the righteous head!
To them let peace be given,
A holy life, a hopeful end,
A heavenly crown in Heaven!”

Still as he made each separate prayer
For blessings that they in life might share,
And for their eternal bliss,
The echoing Choristers replied,
“O Lord, so grant thou this!”

How differently, meantime, before
The altar as they kneel,
While they the sacred rites partake
Which endless matrimony make,
The Bride and Bridegroom felt!

She, who possess’d her soul in peace
And thoughtful happiness,
With her whole heart had inly join’d
In each devout address.
V.

Twelve years have held their quiet course
Since Cyra's nuptial day;
How happily, how rapidly,
Those years have past away!

Bless'd in her husband she hath been;
He loved her as sincerely,
(Most sinful and unhappy man!)
As he had bought her dearly.

She hath been fruitful as a vine,
And in her children bless'd;
Sorrow hath not come near her yet,
Nor fears to shake, nor cares to fret,
Nor grief to wound the breast.

And bless'd alike would her husband be,
Were all things as they seem;
Eleemon hath every earthly good,
And with every man's esteem.

But where the accursed reed had drawn
The heart-blood from his breast,
A small red spot remain'd
Indelibly impress'd.

Nor could he from his heart throw off
The consciousness of his state;
It was there with a dull, uneasy sense,
A coldness and a weight;—

It was there when he lay down at night,
It was there when at morn he rose;
He feels it whatever he does,
It is with him wherever he goes.

No occupation from his mind
That constant sense can keep;
It is present in his waking hours,
It is present in his sleep;—

But still he felt it most,
And with painfulest weight it press'd,
O miserable man!
When he was happiest.

O miserable man,
Who hath all the world to friend,
Yet dares not in prosperity
Remember his latter end!

But happy man, what'er
His earthly lot may be,
Who looks on Death as the Angel
That shall set his spirit free,
And bear it to its heritage
Of immortality!

In such faith hath Proterius lived;
And strong is that faith, and fresh,
As if obtaining then new power,
When he hath reach'd the awful hour
Appointed for all flesh.

Eleémon and his daughter
With his latest breath he bless'd,
And saying to them, "We shall meet
Again before the Mercy-seat!"
Went peacefully to rest.

This is the balm which God
Hath given for every grief;
And Cyra, in her anguish,
Look'd heavenward for relief.

But her miserable husband
Heard a voice within him say,
"Eleémon, Eleémon,
Thou art sold to the Demon!"
And his heart seem'd dying away.

Whole Cesarea is pour'd forth
To see the funeral state,
When Proterius is borne to his resting-place
Without the Northern Gate.

Not like a Pagan's is his bier
At doleful midnight borne
By ghastly torchlight, and with wail
Of women hired to mourn.

With tapers in the face of day,
These rites their faithful hope display;
In long procession slow,
With hymns that fortify the heart,
And prayers that soften woe.

In honor of the dead man's rank,
But of his virtues more,
The holy Bishop Basil
Was one the bier who bore.

And with the Bishop side by side,
As nearest to the dead allied,
Was Eleémon seen:
All mark'd, but none could read ariight
The trouble in his mien.

"His master's benefits on him
Were well bestow'd," they said,
"Whose sorrow now full plainly show'd
How well he loved the dead."

They little ween'd what thoughts in him
The solemn psalm awoke,
Which to all other hearts that hour
Its surest comfort spoke: —

"Gather my Saints together;
In peace let them be hid,
They who with me," thus saith the Lord,
"Their covenant have made!"

What pangs to Elecemon then,
O wretchedest of wretched men,
That psalmody convey’d!
For conscience told him that he, too,
A covenant had made.

And when he would have closed his ears
Against the unwelcome word,
Then from some elms beside the way
A Raven’s croak was heard.

To him it seem’d a hollow voice
That warn’d him of his doom;
For the tree whereon the Raven sat
Grew over the Pagan’s tomb.

VI.

When weariness would let her
No longer pray and weep,
And midnight long was past,
Then Cyra fell asleep.

Into that wretched sleep she sunk
Which only sorrow knows,
Wherein the exhausted body rests,
But the heart hath no repose.

Of her Father she was dreaming,
Still aware that he was dead,
When, in the visions of the night,
He stood beside her bed.

Crown’d and in robes of light he came;
She saw he had found grace;
And yet there seem’d to be
A trouble in his face.

The eye and look were still the same
That she from her cradle knew;
And he put forth his hand, and blest her,
As he had been wont to do.

But then the smile benign
Of love forsook his face,
And a sorrowful displeasure
Came darkly in its place; —

And he cast on Elecmon
A melancholy eye,
And sternly said, "I bless thee not,— Bondman! thou knowest why!"

Again to Cyra then he turn’d,—
"Let not thy husband rest

Till he hath wash’d away with tears
The red spot from his breast!

"Hold fast thy hope, and Heaven will not
Forsake thee in thine hour;
Good Angels will be near thee,
And evil ones shall fear thee,
And Faith will give thee power."

Perturb’d, yet comforted, she woke;
For in her waking ear
The words were heard which promised her
A strength above all fear.

An odor, that refresh’d no less
Her spirit with its blessedness
Than her corporeal frame,
Was breathed around, and she surely found
That from Paradise it came.

And, though the form revered was gone,
A clear, unearthly light
Remain’d, encompassing the bed,
When all around was night.

It narrow’d as she gazed;
And soon she saw it rest,
Concentred, like an eye of light,
Upon her husband’s breast.

Not doubting now the presence
Of some good presiding Power,
Collectedness as well as strength
Was given her in this hour.

And rising half, the while in deep
But troubled sleep he lay,
She drew the covering from his breast
With cautious hand away.

The small, round, blood-red mark she saw;
Elecmon felt her not;
But in his sleep he groan’d, and cried,
"Out! out — accursed spot!"

The darkness of surrounding night
Closed then upon that eye of light.
She waited for the break
Of day, and lay the while in prayer
For that poor sinner’s sake —

In fearful, miserable prayer;
But while she pray’d, the load of care
Less heavily bore on her heart,
And light was given, enabling her
To choose her difficult part.

And she drew, as comfortable texts
Unto her thoughts recur’d,
Refreshment from the living well
Of God’s unerring word.

But when the earliest dawn appear’d,
Herself in haste she array’d,
And watch’d his waking patiently,
And still as she watched she pray'd;
And when Eleémon had risen,
She spake to him, and said:

"We have been visited this night;
My Father's Ghost I have seen;
I heard his voice,—an awful voice!—
And so hast thou, I ween!"

Eleémon was pale when he awoke;
But paler then he grew,
And over his whole countenance
There came a deathlike hue.

Still he controll'd himself, and sought
Her question to beguile,
And forcing, while he answer'd her,
A faint and hollow smile,—

"Cyra," he said, "thy thoughts possess'd
With one too painful theme,
Their own imaginations
For reality disdain;
Let not my dearest, best beloved,
Be troubled for a dream!"

"O Eleémon," she replied,
"Dissemble not with me thus;
Ill it becomes me to forget
What Dreams have been to us!"

"Thinkest thou there can be peace for me,
Near to me as thou art,
While some unknown and fearful sin
Is festering at thy heart?"

"Eleémon, Eleémon,
I may not let thee rest,
Till thou hast wash'd away with tears
The red spot from thy breast!"

"Thus to conceal thy crime from me,
It is no tenderness;
The worst is better known than fear'd.
Whatever it be, confess;
And the Merciful will cleanse thee
From all unrighteousness!"

Like an aspen leaf he trembled;
And his imploring eye
Bespake compassion, o'er his lips
Could utter their dread'd reply.

"O dearly loved, as dearly bought,
My sin and punishment I had thought
To bear through life alone;
Too much the Vision hath reveal'd,
And all must now be known!

"On thee, methinks, and only thee,
Dare I for pity call;
A'bor me not,—renounce me not,—
My life, my love, my all!"

"And, Cyra, sure, if ever cause
Might be a sinner's plea,
'Twould be for that lost wretch who sold
His hope of Heaven for thee!"

"Thou seest a miserable man
Given over to despair,
Who has bound himself, by his act and deed,
To the Prince of the Powers of the Air."

She seized him by the arm,
And hurrying him into the street,
"Come with me to the Church," she cried,
"And to Basil the Bishop's feet!"

VII.

PUBLIC must be the sinner's shame,
As heinous his offence;
So Basil said, when he ordinance
His form of penitence.

And never had such dismay been felt
Through that astonish'd town,
As when, at morn, the Crier went Proclaiming up and down,—

"The miserable sinner, Eleémon,
Who for love hath sold himself to the Demon,
His guilt before God and man declares;
And beseeches all good Christians
To aid him with their prayers."

Many were the hearts compassionate
Whom that woful petition moved;
For he had borne his fortune meekly,
And therefore was well beloved.

Open his hand had been,
And liberal of its store;
And the prayers of the needy arose,
Who had daily been fed at his door.

They, too, whom Cyra's secret aid
Relieved from pressing cares,
In this her day of wretchedness,
Repaid her with their prayers.

And from many a gentle bosom
Supplications for mercy were sent,
If haply they might aid
The wretched penitent.

Sorely such aid he needed then!
Basil himself, of living men
The powerfulst in prayer,
For pity, rather than in hope,
Had bidden him not despair.

So hard a thing for him it seem'd
To wrest from Satan's hand
The fatal Bond, which, while retain'd,
Must against him in judgment stand.

"Dost thou believe," he said, "that Grace Itself can reach this grief?"
With a feeble voice, and a woful eye,
"Lord, I believe!" was the sinner's reply;
"Help thou mine unbelief!"

The Bishop then cross'd him on the brow,
And cross'd him on the breast;
And told him, if he did his part
With true remorse and faithful heart,
God's mercy might do the rest.

"Alone in the holy Relic-room
Must thou pass day and night,
And wage with thy ghostly enemies
A more than mortal fight.

"The trial may be long, and the struggle strong,
Yet be not thou dismay'd;
For thou mayst count on Saints in Heaven,
And on earthly prayers for aid.

"And in thy mind this scripture bear
With steadfast faithfulness, what'er
To appall thee may arrive,—
When the wicked man turneth away from his sin,
He shall save his soul alive!"

"Take courage as thou lookest around
On the relics of the blest;
And night and day, continue to pray,
Until thy tears have wash'd away
The stigma from thy breast!"

"Let me be with him!" Cyra cried;
"If thou mayst not be there;
In this sore trial I at least
My faithful part may bear:

"My presence may some comfort prove,
Yea, haply some defence;
O Father, in myself I feel
The strength of innocence!"

"Nay, Daughter, nay; it must not be!
Though dutiful this desire;
He may by Heaven's good grace be saved,
But only as if by fire;—

"Sights which should never meet thine eye
Before him may appear;
And fiendish voices proffer words
Which should never assault thy ear;
Alone must he this trance sustain;
Keep thou thy vigils here!"

He led him to the Relic-room;
Alone he left him there;
And Cyra with the Nuns remain'd
To pass her time in prayer.

Alone was Eleemon left
For mercy on Heaven to call;
Deep and unceasing were his prayers,
But not a tear would fall.

His lips were parch'd, his head was hot,
His eyeballs throb'd with heat;

And in that utter silence
He could hear his temples beat.

But cold his feet, and cold his hands;
And at his heart there lay
An icy coldness unreliev'd,
While he pray'd the livelong day.

A long, long day! It pass'd away
In dreadful expectation;
Yet free throughout the day was he
From outward molestation.

Nor sight appear'd, nor voice was heard,
Though every moment both he fear'd;
The Spirits of the Air
Were busy the while in infusing
Suggestions of despair.

And he in strong endeavor still Against them strove with earnest will;
Heart-piercing was his cry,
Heart-breathed his groaning; but it seem'd
That the source of tears was dry.

And now had evening closed;
The dim lamp-light alone
On the stone cross, and the marble walls,
And the shrines of the Martyrs, shone.

Before the Cross Eleemon lay:
His knees were on the ground;
Courage enough to touch the Cross
Itself, he had not found.

But on the steps of the pedestal
His lifted hands were laid;
And in that lowest attitude
The suffering sinner pray'd.

A strong temptation of the Fiend,
Which bade him despair and die;
He with the aid of Scripture
Had faithfully put by;
And then, as with a dawning hope,
He raised this contrite cry:—

"O that mine eyes were fountains!
If the good grace of Heaven
Would give me tears, methinks I then
Might hope to be forgiven!"

To that mock prayer a short, loud laugh
From fiendish lips replied:
Close at his ear he felt it,
And it sounded on every side.

From the four walls and the vaulted roof
A shout of mockery rung;
And the echoing ground repeated the sound,
Which peal'd above, and below, and around,
From many a fiendish tongue.

The lamps went out at that hideous shout,
But darkness had there no place,
For the room was fill'd with a lurid light
That came from aDemon's face.
A dreadful face it was,—too well
By Electimon known!
Alas! he had seen it when he stood
Before the dolorous Throne.

"Electimon! Electimon!"
Sternly said the Demon,
How have I merited this?
I kept my covenant with thee,
And placed thee in worldly bliss!

"And still thou mightest have had,
Thine after-days to bless,
Health, wealth, long life, and whatsoever
The World calls happiness.

"Fool, to forego thine earthly joys,
Who hast no hope beyond!
For judgment must be given for me,
When I sue thee upon the Bond.

"Remember I deceived thee not;
Nor had I tempted thee:
Thou camest of thine own accord,
And didst act knowingly!"

"I told thee thou mightst vainly think
To cheat me by contrition,
When thou wert written down among
The Children of Perdition!"

"'So help me, Satan!' were thy words
When thou didst this allow;
I help'd thee, Electimon, then,—
And I will have thee now!""

At the words of the Fiend, from the floor
Electimon in agony sprung;
Up the steps of the pedestal he ran,
And to the Cross he clung.

And then it seem'd as if he drew,
While he clasp'd the senseless stone,
A strength he had not felt till then,
A hope he had not known.

So when the Demon ceased,
He answer'd him not a word;
But, looking upward, he
His faithful prayer preferr'd:

"All, all, to Thee, my Lord
And Savior, I confess!
And I know that Thou canst cleanse me
From all unrighteousness!

"I have turned away from my sin;
In Thee do I put my trust;
To such Thou hast promised forgiveness,
And Thou art faithful and just!""

With that the Demon disappear'd;
The lamps resumed their light;
Nor voice nor vision more
Disturb'd him through the night.

He stirr'd not from his station,
But there stood fix'd in prayer;
And when Basil the Bishop enter'd
At morn, he found him there.

VIII.

Well might the Bishop see what he
Had undergone that night;
Remorse and agony of mind
Had made his dark hair white.

So should the inner change, he wene'd,
With the outward sign accord;
And holy Basil cross'd himself,
And blest our gracious Lord.

"Well hast thou done," said he, "my son,
And faithfully fought the fight;
So shall this day complete, I trust,
The victory of the night.

"I fear'd that forty days and nights
Too little all might be;
But great and strange hath been the change
One night hath wrought in thee."

"O Father, Father," he replied,
"And hath it been but one?
An endless time it seem'd to me!
I almost thought Eternity
With me had been begun.

"And surely this poor flesh and blood
Such terrors could not have withstood,
If grace had not been given;
But when I clasp'd the blessed Cross,
I then had help from Heaven.

"The coldness from my heart is gone;
But still the weight is there,
And thoughts, which I abhor, will come
And tempt me to despair.

"Those thoughts I constantly repel;
And all, methinks, might yet be well,
Could I but weep once more,
And with true tears of penitence
My dreadful state deplore.

"Tears are denied; their source is dried!"
And must it still be so?
O Thou, who from a rock didst make
The living waters flow,—

"A broken and a bleeding heart
This hour I offer Thee;
And, when Thou seest good, my tears
Shall then again be free!"
A knocking at the door was heard
As he ended this reply;
Hearing that unexpected sound,
The Bishop turn'd his eye,
And his venerable Mother,
Emmelia, the Abbess, drew nigh.

"We have not ceased this mournful night,"
Said she, "on Heaven to call;
And our afflicted Cyra
Hath edified us all.

"More fervent prayers from suffering heart,
I ween, have never been sent;
And note she asks, as some relief,
In this her overwhelming grief,
To see the penitent.

"So earnestly she ask'd, that I
Her wish would not defer;
And I have brought her to the door:
Forgive me, Son, if I err.

"Hard were I did not consent
To thy compassionate intent,
O Mother," he replied;
And raising then his voice, "Come in,
Thou innocent!" he cried.

That welcome word when Cyra heard,
With a sad pace and slow,
Forward she came, like one whose heart
Was overcharged with woe.

Her face was pale,—long illness would
Have changed those features less;
And long-continued tears had dimm'd
Her eyes with heaviness.

Her husband's words had reach'd her ear
When at the door she stood;
"Thou hast pray'd in vain for tears," she said,
"While I have pour'd a flood!

"Mine flow, and they will flow; they must;
They cannot be repress'd!
And oh, that they might wash away
The stigma from thy breast!

"Oh that these tears might cleanse that spot,— Tears which I cannot check!"
Profusely weeping as she spake,
She fell upon his neck.

He clasp'd the mourner close, and in
That passionate embrace,
In grief for her, almost forgot
His own tremendous case.

Warm as they fell he felt her tears,
And in true sympathy,
So gracious Heaven permitted then,
His own to flow were free.

And then the weight was taken off,
Which at his heart had press'd:

O mercy! and the crimson spot
Hath vanish'd from his breast!

At that most happy sight,
The four, with one accord,
Fell on their knees, and blest
The mercy of the Lord.

"What then! before the strife is done,
Would ye of victory boast?"
Said a Voice above: "they reckon too soon,
Who reckon without their host!"

"Mine is he by a Bond
Which holds him fast in law:
I draw it myself for certainty,
And sharper than me must the Lawyer be
Who in it can find a flaw!

"Before the Congregation,
And in the face of day,
Whoever may pray, and whoever gainsay,
I will challenge him for my Bondsman,
And carry him quick away!"

"Ha, Satan! dost thou in thy pride,
With righteous anger Basil cried,
"Duly the force of prayer?
In the face of the Church wilt thou brave it?
Why, then we will meet thee there!

"There mayst thou set forth thy right,
With all thy might, before the sight
Of all the Congregation;
And they that hour shall see the power
Of the Lord unto salvation!

"A challenge fair! We meet then there;
Rejoin'd the Prince of the Powers of the Air;
"The Bondsman is mine by right.
Let the whole city come at thy call,
And great and small: in face of them all,
I will have him in thy Despite!"

So having said, he tarried not
To hear the Saint's reply.
"Beneath the sign which Constantine,
Said Basil, "beheld in the sky,
We strive, and have our strength therein,
Therein our victory!"

IX.

The Church is fill'd; so great the faith
That City in its Bishop hath;
And now the Congregation
Are waiting there in trembling prayer
And terrible expectation.

Emmelia and her sisterhood
Have taken there their seat;
And Choristers, and Monks, and Priests,
And Psalmists there, and Exorcists,
Are station'd in order meet.
In sackcloth clad, with ashes strown
Upon his whiter hair,
Before the steps of the altar,
His feet for penance bare,
Eleonora stands, a spectacle
For men and Angels there.

Beside him Cyra stood, in weal
Or woe, in good or ill,
Not to be sever'd from his side,
His faithful helpmate still.

Dishevell'd were her raven locks,
As one in mourner's guise;
And pale she was, but faith and hope
Had now resumed her eyes.

At the altar Basil took his stand;
He held the Gospel in his hand,
And in his ardent eye
Sure trust was seen, and conscious power,
And strength for victory.

At his command the Chorister
Enounced the Prophet's song,
"To God our Savior mercies
And forgivenesses belong."

Ten thousand voices join'd to raise
The holy hymn on high,
And hearts were thrill'd and eyes were fill'd
By that full harmony.

And when they ceased, and Basil's hand
A warning signal gave,
The whole huge multitude was hush'd
In a stillness like that of the grave.

The Sun was high in a bright blue sky;
But a chill came over the crowd,
And the Church was suddenly darken'd,
As if by a passing cloud.

A sound as of a tempest rose,
Though the day was calm and clear;
Intrepid must the heart have been
Which did not then feel fear.

In the sound of the storm came the dreadful Form;
The Church then darken'd more,
And He was seen erect on the screen
Over the Holy Door.

Day-light had sicken'd at his sight;
And the gloomy Presence threw
A shade profound over all around,
Like a cheerless twilight hue.

"I come hither," said the Demon,
"For my Bondsman Eleonora!
Mine is he, body and soul.
See all men!" and with that on high
He held the open scroll.

The fatal signature appear'd,
To all the multitude,

Distinct as when the accursed pen
Had traced it with fresh blood.

"See all men!" Satan cried again,
And then his claim pursued.

"I ask for justice! I prefer
An equitable suit!
I appeal to the Law, and the case
Admitteth of no dispute.

"If there be justice here,
If Law have place in Heaven,
Award upon this Bond
Must then for me be given.

"What to my rightful claim,
Basil, canst thou gainsay,
That I should not seize the Bondsman,
And carry him quick away?

"The writing is confess'd;—
No plea against it shown;—
The forfeit is mine,
And now I take my own!

"Hold there!" cried Basil, with a voice
That arrested him on his way,
When from the screen he would have swoopt
To pounce upon his prey;—

"Hold there, I say! Thou canst not sue
Upon this Bond by law!
A sorry legalist were he
Who could not, in thy boasted plea,
Detect its fatal flaw.

"The Deed is null, for it was framed
With fraudulent intent;
A thing unlawful in itself;
A wicked instrument,—
Not to be pleaded in the Courts.—
Sir Fiend, thy cause is shent!

"This were enough; but, more than this,
A maxim, as thou knowest, it is,
Whereof all Laws partake,
That no one may of his own wrong
His own advantage make.

"The man, thou sayest, thy Bondsman is;
Mark, now, how stands the fact!
Thou hast allow'd, nay, aided him,
As a Freedman, to contract
A marriage with this Christian woman here,
And by a public act.

"That act being publicly perform'd
With thy full cognizance,
Claim to him as thy Bondsman thou
Canst never more advance;—

"For when they solemnly were then
United, in sight of Angels and men,
The matrimonial band
Gave to the wife a right in him;
And we on this might stand.
"Thy claim upon the man was by
Thy silence then forsaken;
A marriage thus by thee procured
May not by thee be shaken;
And thou, O Satan, as thou seest,
In thine own snare art taken!"

So Basil said, and paused awhile;
The Arch-fiend answer'd not;
But he heaved in vexation
A sulphurous sigh for the Bishop's vocation,
And thus to himself he thought: —

"The Law thy calling ought to have been,
With thy wit so ready, and tongue so free!
To prove by reason, in reason's despite,
That right is wrong, and wrong is right,
And white is black, and black is white,—
What a loss have I in thee!"

"I rest not here," the Saint pursued;
"Though thou in this mayst see
That in the meshes of thine own net
I could entangle thee!"

"Fiend, thou thyself didst bring about
The spousal celebration,
Which link'd them by the nuptial tie
For both their souls' salvation.

"Thou sufferedst them before high Heaven
With solemn rites espoused to be,
Then and for evermore, for time
And for eternity.

"That tie holds good; those rites
Will reach their whole intent;
And thou of his salvation vouch
Thyself the instrument.

"And now, methinks, thou seest in this
A higher power than thine;
And that thy ways were overruled,
To work the will divine!"

With rising energy he spake,
And more majestic look;
And with authoritative hand
Held forth the Sacred Book.

Then with a voice of power he said,
"The Bond is null and void!
It is nullified, as thou knowest well,
By a Covenant whose strength by Hell
Can never be destroy'd! —

"The Covenant of grace,
That greatest work of Heaven,
Which whose claims in perfect faith,
His sins shall be forgiven.

"Were they as scarlet red,
They should be white as wool;
This is the All-mighty's Covenant,
Who is All-merciful!"

"His Minister am I!
In his All-mighty name
To this repentant sinner
God's pardon I proclaim!

"In token that against his soul
The sin shall no longer stand,
The writing is effaced, which there
Thou holdest in thy hand!

"Angels that are in bliss above
This triumph of Redeeming Love
Will witness, and rejoice;
And ye shall now in thunder hear
Heaven's ratifying voice!"

A peal of thunder shook the pyle;
The Church was fill'd with light;
And when the flash was past, the Fiend
Had vanish'd from their sight.

He fled as he came, but in anger and shame;
The pardon was complete;
And the insipious scroll was dropp'd, a blank,
At Eleemon's feet.

stances wherein he has supposed the resemblance to exist. It appears to have been one of those fiction which were composed honestly as works of imagination, not like the lives of St. Paul and St. Peter, written, not derived from them and so many of their respective orders, with a fraudulent intent, to impose upon mankind. Like other such fictions, it has been adopted and legitimated by credulity and fraud, and the blessed Mary, the Virgin of Antioch, has her place accordingly in the Acta Sanctorum, on the 22d of May. But as the legend evidently was not written when Antioch was a Christian city, and, moreover, as the legend itself contains nothing whatever by which its age could be determined, Pulebrophe presents it as so doubtful a case both for and against, that I am at a loss to bring it to Antiochius's bed-chamber; but the temptations of worldly wealth, which are offered, have only the effect of alarming them; they rise in the middle of the night, and go toward the Church, there to pray for protection and deliverance; and, on the way thereunto, one demon takes upon himself the other's place, the other possesses the master, and thus decoys Mary into the apartment where Antiochius is expecting her. She is, however, allowed to depart unmolested, upon a promise to return at the end of fifteen days, and live with him as a servant, provided he will utter no ridicule. Nothing can be more unlike the story of Providence's daughter. Having extorted an oath from her, that she would return according to this promise, Antiochius remains, wondering at the great power of the Magician.

"Certes," thought he, "one who can do what he hath done in this matter is greater than all men; why, then, should I not be content to live with this woman, who will enable me to equal himself?"

And, being inflamed with this desire, he said within himself, "If I were such as he is, whatever I wished for would be within my reach." This thought came into his mind as if it were by Divine Providence, to the end that he might willingly let the virgin depart, and that she might not be bound by the nefarious oath which she had taken, and that the devil, who was the instigator of his evil desires, might be confounded in his design, both upon the virgin herself, and upon him who was at this time the virgin's husband.

"As soon, therefore, as it was day, Antiochius went out to seek for the Sorcerer, and to give him thanks. Having found him, and saluted him, he delivered to him, with many thanks, the gold which he had promised; and then, falling at his feet, earnestly entreated that he might be made such as the Sorcerer himself was, promising that, if this could be effected through his means, he would requite him with whatever sum he might demand. But the Sorcerer replied, 'that it was not possible for him to be made a sorcerer also, because he was a Christian, having been made such by his baptism.' But Antiochius answered, 'Then I renounce my baptism and Christian name, if I may be made a sorcerer.' Still the Sorcerer replied, 'Thou canst not be made a sorcerer; neither canst thou keep the laws of the sorcerers, which if thou went not to keep, thou wouldst then fall from a place which could never again be recovered.' But Antiochius, again embracing his feet, promised that he would perform whatever should be enjoined him. Then the Sorcerer, seeing his perseverance, asked for paper, and having written therein what he thought good, gave it to Antiochius, with these words: 'Believe, and thou shalt see the effects of this:' And he wrote the command, that he should go that night, out of the city, supperless, and stand upon yonder little bridge. A huge multitude will pass over it, at midnight, with a mighty uproar, and with their Prince seated in a chariot; yet fear not thou, for thou wilt not be hurt, having with thee this my writing; but hold up the writing, so that it may be perceived; and if thou shouldst be asked what thou dost there at that hour, or who thou art, say, 'The Great Master sent me to my Lord the Prince, with this letter, that I might deliver it unto him.' But take heed neither to sign thyself as a Christian, nor to call upon Christ; for in either case thy desire would then be frustrated.'

"Antiochius, therefore, having received the letter, went his way; and as he passed by the Virgin Mary, who was there standing upon the little bridge, holding up the writing in his hand. About midnight, a great multitude came there, and horsemen in great numbers, and the Prince himself sitting in a chariot; and they who went first surrounded him, saying, 'Who is this that standeth here?' To whom Antiochius made the answer, 'The Great Master hath sent me to my Lord the Prince with this letter.' And they took the letter from him, and delivered it to the Prince, who sat in the chariot; and he, having received and read the same, wrote something in the same paper, and delivered it, saying, in the name of the Great Master, 'Bring this letter to carry it to the Sorcerer. So, in the morning, Antiochius, having returned, delivered it to the Sorcerer, who, having perused it, said, 'Wouldst thou know what he hath written to us? even just as I before said to thee, to wit, Knowest thou not that this man is a Christian? Such a one I can to no wise admit, unless, according to our manner, he perform all things, and renounce and abhorreth his faith.' When Antiochius heard this, he replied, 'Master, now as everbefore I abjure the name of Christian, and the faith, and the baptism. Then the Sorcerer answered again, and giving the writing to Antiochius, said, 'Go again, and take thy stand at night at the same place, and when he shall come, give him this, and attend to what he shall say.' Accordingly he went his way, and took his stand at the time and place appointed. Behold, at the same hour, it happened that those said words were written, and they said unto him, 'Wherefore hast thou returned hither?' Antiochius answered and said, 'Lord, the Great Master hath sent me back with this writing.' The Prince then received it, and read, and again wrote in it, and gave it again to be returned to the Charon. To whom Antiochius went again in the morning, and he, having read the writing, said unto him, 'Knowest thou what he hath written unto me in reply? I wrote to him, saying, 'All these things, Lord, he hath abjured before me; admit him, therefore, if it pleaseth thee.' But he hath written back, 'Unless he abjure all this in writing, and in the presence of all the people.'" Say now, then, what wilt thou that I should do for thee?"

"The wretched Antiochius answered and said, 'Master, I am ready to do this also.' And with that he sealed himself, and wrote these:—I, Antiochius, abjure Christ and his faith, I abjure also his baptism, and the cross, and the Christian name, and I promise that I will never again use them, or invoke them. But, while he was thus writing, a copious sweat ran from him, from the top of his head to the soles of his feet, so that his whole inner garment was wet therewith, as he himself afterwards confessed to the Conunissional téachers, and when he thereupon went on writing, and when it was finished, he gave the writing to the Sorcerer to read, who, when he had perused it, said, 'This is well; go thy way again, and he will now certainly receive thee. And when he shall have admitted thee, say to him reverently, I beseech thee, Lord, assign to me those who may be at my bidding; and he will assign unto thee as many as thou wilt have. But this I advise thee, not to take more than one or two familiaris, inasmuch as more would perplex thee, and would be perpetually disturbing thee night and day, that thou mightest give them what thou wouldest.' Then Antiochius returned to the same place as before, and waited there, and the same company came there again at midnight, and the leader of them, having inventaneously recognized Antiochius, began to cry out, 'Lord, the Great Master hath again sent this man with his commandment: and the Prince made him draw nigh. And Antiochius, drawing nigh, gave unto him his profession of abjuration, full of calamity and woe. He, having received and read it, raised it on high in his hand, and began to exclaim, 'Christ, behold the remnant of the sorcerers of the old times: and he alighted and executed thee! I am not the author of this deed; but he, offering himself to my service with many entreaties, hath of his own accord written this his profession of abjuration, and delivered it to me. Have thou therefore no care of him from the time to time!' And he repeated these words a second time, and again a third.

"But when Antiochius heard that dreadful voice, he trembled from head to foot, and began at the same time to cry aloud, and to say, 'Give me back the writing! I am a Christian! I beseech thee, I adjure thee! I will be a Christian! Give me back the profession which I have wickedly written? But when the miserable case of my profession was arranged, I never again mayst thou have this thy profession, which I shall produce in the terrible day of judgment. From this moment thou art mine, and I have thee in my power at will, unless an outrage be done to justice.

With the Bishop's leave, I departed; but my holy amanuensis, Ibanus, Anathemia lay prostrate on his face upon the bridge till it was dawn, weeping and lamenting his condition. As soon as it was daylight he rose, and returned to his own house, where he remained weeping and lamenting, not knowing what he should do. Now there was another city, some eighteen miles off, where the Bishop was departed, named Alexandria. But he, who had done what he had done. Having then cut off his hair, and clad himself in sackcloth, he departed, and came unto the Bishop, and having made himself known, was admitted to him, and threw himself at his feet, saying, 'I beseech thee, baptize me?' But the Bishop replied, 'Can I believe that thou hast not yet been baptized? Thus, taking the Bishop by the hand, in the whole multitude, saying, 'I have indeed received baptism when I was a child, but having now renounced it in writing, behold I am unap- tized?' To which the Bishop replied, 'How canst thou persuade that thou hast been unapostized of the baptism whereby I was baptized?' Anathemia answered, 'I in that unhappy hour when I wrote the abjuration of my Lord and Savior, and of his baptism, incontinent a profuse sweat burst out, even from the top of my head to the soles of my feet, so that my inner garments were wet therewith; and for five years I did believe of a truth, that even as I then abjured my baptism, so did it depart from me. Now, if thou canst, O venerable Father, help me, in compassion upon one who has thus voluntarily undone himself.' He said this prostrate on the ground, and beseeched with tears.

When the Bishop, the Bishop, the Bishop, in this, he threw himself upon the ground, and lay there beside Anathemis, weeping and praying to the Lord. Then, after a long while, rising, he rose Anathemis, and said to him, 'Verily, son, I dare not again purify by baptism a man who hath been already baptized, for among Christians there is no second baptism, except of tears. Yet do not thou despair of thy salvation, nor of the divine mercy, but rather commit thyself to God, praying and humbly beseeching him for all the remainder of thy life; and God, who is good and merciful, may render back to thee the writing of thy abjuration, and moreover forgive thee that impiety, as he forgave the ten thousands talents to the debtor in the Gospel. Hope not to find a better way than this, for there is no other to be found.' He then being persuaded thus to do, and having obtained the Bishop's prayers, went his way, weeping and groaning for the sin which he had committed; and having returned home, he sold all his goods, and set at liberty all his people, both men servants and maid servants, giving them also of his possessions, and the rest of his goods he distributed to the churches, and to the poor, secretly, by the hand of a faithful servant. Moreover, he gave three pounds of gold to the mother of that Virgin, with the love of whom the Demon, to his own de- struction, had inflamed him, having placed them in a certain church, saying, 'I beseech ye, pray to God for me a sinner: I shall never again trouble you, nor any other person; for I deplore I know not whether, to bewail the wickedness of my deeds.' Thus this man did, and from that time he was seen no more, casting himself wholly upon the mercy of God, to which none who hath betaken himself can perish.

But we, who have heard the relation of this dreadful thing, praise the Almighty Lord our God, and adore the greatness of his works, that he hath protected the virgin Maria in her holy intimation of leaving a single life, and hath taken her mother out of poverty, affording liberality to them both for their support and maintenance, and hath delivered her also from the reproach of an amanuensis, avoiding thereby the impiety which had passed between Maria the virgin and her enemy Anthemia, by annulling it. For the Lord brought these things to pass before the fifteen days, which were the appointed time between them, had elapsed. Wherefore we may say with the Evangelist, Our Lord hath done all things well. Nor hath he suffered the suppliant, who seeks him in penitence, to perish; for he saith, 'I cannot but call to the righteous, but sinners to repentance. Let us, therefore, continue to entreat him, that we may be protected by his Al- mighty hand, and may be delivered from all the devices of the Devil, and that, being aided by the prayers of the Saints, where we may be worthy to attain an union with God of Heaven. To the Lord our God belong all honor, and glory, and adoration, now and always, forever and ever. Amen.'

The Greeks appear to have delighted in fictions of this peculiar kind. The most extravagant of such legends is that of St. Justinia and her Cyprian, which Martene and Durand present as a veritable history, confounding Bishop Fell for treating it as fabulous! It is much too long for insertion in this place, but it would be injured by abbreviating it. The reader may find it in the Theodorus Nuxus Ascenditorum, t. ii. pp. 1612—1620.

Ciccius has taken it for the subject of his Magica Prodigia.

The marriage. — p. 538, col. 2.

The description of the marriage service is taken from Dr. King's work upon 'the Rites and Ceremonies of the Greek Church in Russia.' In all the offices of the Greek Church, he says, there is not perhaps a more curious service than this of matrimony, nor any which carries more genuine marks of antiquity; as from the bare present of it may be seen, at one view, most of the ceremonies which antiquarians have taken great pains to ascertain. It agrees very closely with the ritual given by Martene, De Antiquis Ecclesiae Ritiibus, t. ii. pp. 390—398.

In these ceremonies,

'The which do endless matrimony make,'

the parties are betrothed to each other 'for their salvation,'

—now and forever, even unto ages of ages.'

The coronas
Composed of all sweet flowers. — p. 509, col. 1.

'Formerly these crowns were garlands made of flowers or shrubs; but now there are generally in all churches crowns of silver, or other metals, kept for that purpose.' — Dr. King's Rites, &c. p. 232.

'A certain crown of flowers used in marriages,' says the excellent Bishop Heber, 'writing from the Carpathic,' has been denounced to me as a device of Satan! And a gentle- man has just written to complain that the Danish Government of Tranquebar will not allow him to excommunicate some young persons for wearing marks, and acting, as it appears, in a Christmas mummary, or at least in some private rustic the- "m leus que las slomus tayta (a modern joke). If this be heathen, Heaven help the wicked! But I hope you will not suspect that I shall lead my countenance to this kind of ecclesiastical tyranny, or consent to men's con- sciences being burdened with restrictions so foreign to the cheerful spirit of the Gospel.' — vol. iii. pp. 416.
NOTES TO ALL FOR LOVE, &c.

Basil, of loving morn

The power felt in prayer. — p. 542, col. 2.

The most remarkable instance of St. Basil’s power in prayer is to be found, not in either of his lives, the vocations or the apocalyptic one, but in a very curious account of the opinions held by the Armenian Christians, as drawn up for the information of Pope Benedict XII, and inserted by Domenico Bernardino in his Historia de tuti l’Eremon (Seccdo setv. cap. iv. l. 11). There is an account, that in the sixth day of the Creation, when the rebellions angels fell from heaven through that opening in the firmament which the Armenians call Arocen, nud we the Galaxy, one unlucky angel, who had no participation in their sin, but seems to have been caught in the turmoil, fell with them; and many other would in like manner have fallen by no fault of their own, if the Lord had not said unto them, Paz vobis. But this unfortunate angel was not restored till he obtained, it is not said how, the prayers of St. Basil; his condition meantime, from the sixth day of the Creation to the fourth century of the Christian era, must have been even more uncomfortable than that of Klosters’s repentant Devil. — p. 512, § 16.

Eleazar’s penance. — p. 543, col. 1.

In the legend the penitent is left forty days and nights to contend with the Powers of Darkness in the Relic Chamber.

Captain Hall relates an amusing example of the manner in which the penitent was punished on the ninth day of his novitiate.

"I went," he says, "to the Convent of La Cruz to visit a friend who was doing penance, not for a sin he had committed, but for one he was preparing to commit. The case was this: — Don N. had recently lost his wife, and, not knowing how to live in solitude, proposed to his brother-in-law and being of a disposition to take little trouble in such a research, or, probably, thinking that no labor could procure for him any one so suitable as what his own house afforded, he proposed the matter to his lately lamented wife’s sister, who had lived in his house. She was quite acquainted with the family, and not only a very good sort of person, but one well acquainted with all the details of his household, known and esteemed by his children, and accustomed to his society.

"The church, however, looked exceedingly grave upon the occasion; not, however, as I at first supposed, from the nearness of the connection, or the shortness of the interval since the first wife’s death, but because the intended lady had stood godmother to four of Don N.’s children. This, the church said, was a serious sin to the new alliance, which nothing could ever wash clean of guilt. On the contrary, were it not for the woman’s plea of necessity, Don N. was urgent; and a council was assembled to deliberate on the matter. The learned body declared, after some discussion, the case to be a very knotty one; and that, as the lady had been four times godmother to Don N.’s children, it was impossible she could marry him. Nevertheless, the Fathers (compassionate persons!) wished to give the unhappy couple another chance; and agreed to refer the question to a learned doctor in the neighborhood, skilled in all difficult questions of casuistry. This sage person decided that, according to the canons of the church, the marriage should take place in payment of a fine of four hundred dollars; two for the poor in pocket, and two for the poor in spirit; namely, the priests. But to expiate the crime of marrying a quadruple godmother, a slight penance must also be submitted to in the following manner. Don N. was to place himself on his knees before the altar, with a long wax candle burning in his hand, while his intended lady stood by his side holding another: this was to be repeated in the face of the congregation, for one hour, during every Sunday and fast-day throughout a whole year; after which purifying exposure, the parties were to be held eligible to proceed with the marriage. Don N., who chose rather to put his conscience than his knees to such discipline, took his own measures on the occasion. That these were, the idle public took the liberty of guessing broadly enough, but no one could tell precisely. After all the trash had been talked, it was announced, that the case had undergone a careful reexamination, and that it had been deemed proper to commute the penance into one week’s retirement from the world; that is to say, Don N. was to shut himself up in the Convent of La Cruz, there to fast and pray in solitude and silence for seven days. The manner in which this penance was performed is an appropriate commentary on the whole transaction. The penitent, sides flung about by two or three soldiers of the convent, passed the evening in discussing some capital wine, sent out for the occasion by Don N. himself, after eating a dinner, prepared by the cook of the convent, the best in New Galatia. As for silence and solitude, his romping boys and girls were with him during all the morning; besides a score of visitors, who strolled daily out of town as far as the convent, to keep up to the poor man’s spirits, by relating all the gossip which was Abbot about his marriage, his penitence, and the wonderful kindness of the church." — Capt. Hall's Journal, vol. iv. p. 514.

"I have read of a gentleman," says Bishop Taylor, "who, being on his death-bed, and his confessor searching and dressing his wounded soul, was found to be obliged to make restitution of a considerable sum of money, with the diminution of his estate. His confessor found him desirous to be saved, a lover of his religion, and yet to have a kindness for his estate, which he desired might be entirely transmitted to his beloved heir: he would serve God with all his heart, and repeated him of his sin, of his rapine and injustice; he begged for par don passionately, he hardly hoped for mercy or resolution, in case he did resolve, to live strictly, to have God, to reverence his priests, to be charitable to the poor; but to make restitution he found impossible to him, and he hoped the commandment would not require it of him, and desired to be relieved by an easy and a favorable interpretation; for it is ten thousand pities some priests, and some good men, are as narrow in their understanding of the word in vain, but it is worse, infinitely worse, if the man should perish. What should the confessor do in this case? — shall not the man be relieved, and his pietie be accepted; or shall the rigor and severity of his confessor, and his scrupulous fears and impertinence, cast away a soul either into future misery, or present discomfort? Neither one nor other was to be done; and the good man was only to consider what God had made necessary, not what the vices of his penitent and his present follies should make so. Well; the priest proceeds to do his duty, and, in the end, hangs a gold medal on the neck of the sick man, [restitutio ablata!; i. e. the sick man could have no ease by the loss of a duty. The poor cleric desires the confessor to deal with his son, and try if he could be made willing that his father might go to heaven at charge of his son, which when he had attempted, he was answered with extreme readiness and injurious language; which caused great trouble to the priest and to the dying father. At last the religious man found out this device, telling his penitent, that unless by corporal penances there could be made satisfaction in exchange of restitution, he knew nothing that could suit the case. So which was obliged to restitution, was to descend upon the son, he thought something might be hoped, if, by way of communation, the son would hold his finger in a burning candle for a quarter of an hour. The glad father, being overjoyed at this loophole of eternity, this glimpse of heaven, and the certain retaining of the whole estate, called to his son, told him the condition and the advantages to them both, making no question but he would gladly undertake the penance. But the son with indignation replied, I would not endure so much torture to save my father. To which the priest, considering his advantage, made this quick return to the old man: — Sir, if your son will not, for a quarter of an hour, endure the pains of a burning finger to save your soul, will you, to save a portion of the estate for him, endure the flames of hell to eternal ages? The unconscionableness of the olds, and the ungratefulness of the son, and the importunity of the priest, and the fear of hell, and the indispensable necessity of restitution, awakened the old man from his lethargy, and he bowed himself to the rule, made restitution, and had hopes of pardon and comfort; a most pious and pleasant work to be held in the holy church."

The penances which Indian fanatics voluntarily undertake and perform would be deemed impossible in Europe, if they had not been witnessed by so many persons of unquestionable authority. The penances which the Brahins enjoyn are probably much more severe than they would otherwise be, on this account, lest they should seem trifling in the eyes of a people accustomed to such exhibitions.

"If a Shudhu go to a Brahmans of bad character, he must renounce life by casting himself into a huge fire. If a Shoobru go to a Brandon of unsullied character, he must tie straw round the different parts of his body, and cast himself into the fire. The women must place on an ass and let round the end of the Great Way: and the title of this is, they must wander to those sacred places of the Hindoos where the climate is exceedingly cold, and proceed till she actually perish with cold. This is a meritorious way of terminating life, and is mentioned as such in the Hindoo writings. — Wack, vol. 1, p. 477.

Sometimes the law is frustrated by its own severity. It is a doxum of general notoriety, that if a Junagum has the misfortune to lose his Lignum, he ought not to survive the misfortune. Poorna, the present minister of Mysore, relates an incident of a Lignayet friend of his, who had unhappily lost his portable god, and came to take a last farewell. The Indians, like more enlightened nations, readily laugh at the absurdities of every sect but their own, and Poorna gave him better counsel. It is a part of the ceremonial, preceding the sacrifice of the individual, that the principal persons of the sect should assemble on the banks of some holy stream, and placing in a basket the lingum images of the whole assembly, purify them in the sacred waters. The destined victim, in conformity to the advice of his friend, suddenly seized the basket, and overturned its contents into the rapid Cauveri. "Now, my friend," said he, "we are on equal terms: let us prepare to die together." The discussion terminated according to expectation. The whole party took an oath of inviolable secrecy, and each privately provided himself with a new image of the deity, and returned home.

In 1790, when the Mahattas were to have complimented Lord Cornwallis at Seringesapuram, their general, Parasu Ram Bhao, became lunatic from eating with a Bramin who had — kissed a cockerel's wife. There was no stream near holy enough to wash away the impurity; so he made with his whole immense army to the junction of the Tungah and the Badra. Major Moor, who was with him, says, during this march, enclosed for a military point of view, the army had waste scores of towns and thousands of villages — indeed, whole districts; we fought battles, stormed forts, destroyed a large army, and ran every military risk. Having reached the sacred place of junction, he washed, and having been made clean, was weighed against gold and silver; his weight was 16,000 pugsals, about 7000 lbs., which was given to the Bramins. They who had eaten with the Bramin at the same time, in like manner washed away the defilement; but the weighing is a ceremony peculiar to the great. — Moor's Hindu Dedications, p. 231.

"The present king of Travancore has conquered, or carried war into all the countries which lay round his dominions, and lives in the continual exercise of his arms. To atone for the losses and evils which the Brahman had done him: that it was necessary he should be born soon: this ceremony consisted in putting the prince into the body of a golden cow of immense value, where, after he had him the time prescribed, he came out regenerated, and free from all the crimes of his former life. The cow was afterwards cut up, and divided amongst the seers who had invented this extraordinary method for the remission of his sins." — Oem's Fragments.

A far less expensive form was observed among the ancient Greeks, in cases wherein a second birth was deemed indispensable. Far in Greece they thought not these pure and clear, who had been carried forth for death to be interred, or whose sepulchre and funerals had been solemnized or prepared; neither were such allowed to frequent the company of others, nor suffered to come near unto their sacrifices. And there goeth a report of a certain man named Aristinus, one of those who had been possessed with this superstition; how he sent unto the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, for to make supplication and prayer unto the god, for to be delivered out of this perplexed anxiety that troubled him by occasion of the said custom, or law, then in force, and that the prophesies Python returned this answer:

"Look wherewever women do, in chidden newly haid, Unto the wells which they brought forth, the very same, I say, See that be done to thee again; and after that be sure, Unto the blessed Gods with hands to sacrifice, most pure.

"Which oracle thus delivered, Aristinus, having well pondered and considered, committed himself as an infant new born unto women, far to be washed, to be wrapped in swaddling clothes, and to be sucked with the breast-head: after which all such others, whom we call Hysteroptomena, is to say, those whose graves were made as if they were dead, did the semblable. Howbeit some do say that, before Aristinus was born, these ceremonies were observed about these Hysteroptomeni, and that this was a right ancient custom kept in the semblable case." — Fluctius's Morals, tr. by Whitton Holland, p. 850.

The lamps went out. — p. 513, col. 2.

There is the authority of a Holy Man, in the Romance of Merlin, — which is as good authority for such a fact as any thing in the Acts Sanctorum, — that the Devil, like other wild beasts who prove about seeking what they may devour, is afraid of a light. The Holy Man's advice to a pious damsel is never to lie down in the dark: "grande que la osa te con- cre dan y od toujours elert, car le Direit hait toutes chers choses; ne veint pas coucherets on ilyclerette." — vol. l. ff. 4.

And white is black, and black is white. — p. 517, col. 1.

Satan might have been reconciled to St. Basil's profession if he had understood, by his faculty of second-sight, that this, which it is sometimes the business of a lawyer to prove, would one day be the duty of the Romanists to believe, if their church were to tell them so. No less a personage than St. Ignatius Loyola has asserted this. In his Exercitium Spirituali, the 13th of the Rules which are laid down at sanctiendum cum Ecclesia, is in these words:

"Denique, si ipse Ecclesiae Catholicae nonnunc uniam, confirm-moxique eum, si quid, quod oculis nostri apparuit augment, sigillum illa esse declaravit, debemus ulla, quidem sigillum, solumm qua. Inhibita antiqua credendum est, etem esse Dominii nostri Jesu Christi, et Ecclesiae orthodoxa, sponsum ejus, spectat, per quem gubernetur ac designetur ad unum ministriorem ab omnibus, deum quem album esse Deum, qui animadvertit Dei locutus procederet, et qui none temporis Ecclesiae hierarchicam instituit atque regit." — p. 114. Antwerp, 1635. Such is the implicit obedience enjoined in those Spiritual Exercises, of which Pope Paul III. said in his letter, "semper habemus Ignatii, Omnia et singula in eis contenta, ex certa necessitat nostri, approbamus, cultumque, ac praeclara scripta patrocinio communum." The Romanists are to believe that black is white, if the Roman Church tells them so: morally and politically it has often told them so, and they have believed and acted accordingly.

The impious scroll was dropped, a blank, At Eleventh's feet. — p. 517, col. 2.

This is not the only miracle of this kind recorded of St. Basil.

"There was a certain woman of noble family, and born of rich parents, who was wholly made up of the vanities of this world, and beyond measure arogant in all things; she, becoming a widow, wasted her substance shamelessly, living a loose and prodigal life, doing none of those things which are enjoined by the Lord, but wallowing like a swine in the mire and filth of her iniquities. But being at length, by the will of God, brought to a consideration of her own estate, and her mind filled with consciousness of the immeasurableness of things which she had committed, she called to remembrance the multitude of her sins, and bewailed them peevishly, saying, 'Woe to me a sinner, how shall I render an account of the multitude of my sins! I have profaned a sacred temple; I have defiled the soul which inhabith this body! Woe are me, woe is me, what have I done! what hath befalleth me? Shall I say, like the Harlot or the Publican, that I have sinned? But no one has sinned like me! How, then, shall I be assured that God will receive my repentance?' While she mediated in herself upon these things, He, who would that all should be saved and brought back into the way of truth, and would have no one perish, was pleased to bring unto her remembrance all the sins which she had committed from her youth up to the time of the priest's death. And she was accustomed to go to the church that he might pray there, she ran before to meet him, and threw the writing at his feet, and prostrated herself before him, saying. 'O holy man of God, have compassion upon me a sinner, yea, the vessel of sinners!' The most blessed man stopped not, and asked of her wherefore she thus groaned and lamented; and she said unto him, 'Saint of God, see, I have set down all my sins and iniquities in this writing, and I have folded it, and fastened it with lead; do not thou, I charge thee, open it, but by thy powerful prayers blot out all that is written therein.' Then the great and holy Basil held up the writing, and, looking toward Heaven, said, 'O Lord, to Thee alone all the doings of this woman are manifest! Thou hast taken away the sins of the world, and more easily mayst thou blot out those of this single soul. Before thee, Lord, all our offences are numbered; but the於 this soul are even inscrutable. Before the church, holding the aforesaid writing in his hand; and prostrating himself before the altar, there he remained through the night, and on the morrow, during the performance of all the masses which were celebrated there, entreatings God for this woman's sake. And when she came to him, he gave her the writing, and said to her, 'Woman, hast thou heard that the remission of sins can come from God alone? She answered, 'Yea, Father; and therefore have I supplicated thee that thou shouldst intercede with that most merciful God in my behalf.' And he desired that the angels of God which had found that it was all blotted out, save only that the one great and most heinous sin still remained written there. But she, seeing that this great sin was still legible as before, beat her breast, and began to bewail herself, and falling at his feet again, with many tears she said, 'Have compassion upon me, O Servant of the Most High, and as thou hast once exerted thyself in prayer for all my sins, and hast prevailed, so now intercede, as thou canst, that this offence also may be blotted out.' Thereat holy Basil went for pity; and he said unto her, 'Woman, arise! I also am a sinner, and have myself need of forgiveness. He who hath blot out one sinner's sin, how much more shall he have compassion upon me!'—Apostolical Homilies.
THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA;
BEING THE LEGEND OF A COCK AND A HEN,
to the Honor and Glory of SANTIAGO.

A CHRISTMAS TALE.

"Res similis fata; sed quid mihi fragere prodest."—Ovid, Met. xiii. v. 935.

Hic erat also no lean story of theirs!—Lightfoot.

The Legend, (for a genuine Legend it is,) which has been made the subject of the ensuing Ballad, is related by Bishop
Patrick in his Pardle of the Pilgrim. (ch. xxxv. pp. 429—434.)
Udal ap Rhys relates it in his Tour through Spain and Portugal. (pp. 35—38.) Both these writers refer to Lucius Maricines Suecius as their authority. And it is told also in the Journal du Voyage d’Espagne, (Paris, 1625,) by a Conseller who was attached to the French Embassy in that country. (p. 18.)

The story may likewise be found in the Acta Sanctorum.
A duplicate of the principal miracle occurs in the third volume, for the month of May, (dir. 157, p. 171,) and is there scribed to S. Domingo de la Calzada, the author, Luiz de la Vega, contending, that both relations are to be received as true, the Briton (Henschenius) contrariwise opening that they are distinct miracles, but leaving the reader neverthless to determine freely for himself intra id molit, in vero credere volit, nunquam damnatur esse quod sub quodam circumstantiarum locum et vitam est.

In the sixth volume of the same work, for the month of July,
(die 25A,) the legend of the Pilgrim is twice told, once
(p. 45) as occurring to a native of Utrecht, (Curnius Heidenreich is the author,) once as having befallen a German at Thonbuse, (p. 50;) the latter story is in the collection of Santiago’s miracles, which Pope Calixtus II.
is said to have compiled. The extract from Lucius Maricines Suecius may also be seen there. His is here annexed as it stands in the fifth book of that author’s work de rebus Hisponic memorabilibus.

Of this St. James that book proclaims
Great actions manifold;
But more amazing are the things
Which of him in Spain are told; —

How once a ship, of marble made,
Came sailing o'er the sea,
Wherein his headless corpse was laid,
Perfumed with sanctity; —

And how, though then he had no head,
He afterwards had two,
Which both work'd miracles so well,
That it was not possible to tell
The false one from the true; — *

And how he used to fight the Moors
Upon a milk-white charger:
Large tales of him the Spaniards tell,
Munchausen tells no larger.

But in their cause, of latter years,
He has not been so hearty;
For that he never struck a stroke is plain,
When our Duke, in many a hard campaign,
Beat the French armies out of Spain,
And conquer'd Bonaparte.

Yet still they worship him in Spain,
And believe in him with might and main;
Santiago there they call him;
And if any one there should doubt these tales,
They've an Inquisition to maul him.

At Compostella, in his Church,
His body and one head
Have been, for some eight hundred years,
By Pilgrims visited.

Old scores might there be clean rubb'd off;
And tickets there were given
To clear all toll-gates on the way
Between the Church-yard and Heaven.

Some went for payment of a vow
In time of trouble made;
And some, who found that pilgrimage
Was a pleasant sort of trade; —

And some, I trow, because it was Believed, as well as said,

* Whereby, my little friends, we see
That an original may sometimes be
No better than its fac simile;
A useful truth I trow,
Which picture-buyers won't believe,
But which picture-dealers know.

Young Connoisseurs who will be,
Remember I say this —
For your benefit hereafter —
In a parenthesis.

And not to interrupt
The order of narration,
This warning shall be printed
By way of annotation.

THE LEGEND.

PART I.

Once on a time, three Pilgrims true,
Being Father, and Mother, and Son,
For pure devotion to the Saint,
This pilgrimage begun.

Their names, little friends, I am sorry to say,
In none of my books can I find;
But the son, if you please, we'll call Pierre;
What the parents were call'd, never mind.

From France they came, in which fair land
They were people of good renown;
And they took up their lodging one night on the way
In La Calzada town.

Now, if poor Pilgrims they had been,
And had lodged in the Hospice instead of the Inn,
My good little women and men,
Why, then you never would have heard
This tale of the Cock and the Hen.

For the innkeepers they had a daughter,
Sad to say, who was just such another
As Potiphar's daughter, I think, would have been,
If she follow'd the ways of her mother.

This wicked woman to our Pierre
Behaved like Potiphar's wife;
And, because she fail'd to win his love,
She resolved to take his life.

So she pack'd up a silver cup
In his wallet privily;
And then, as soon as they were gone,
She raised a hue and cry.

The Pilgrims were overtaken;
The people gather'd round;
Their wallets were search'd, and in Pierre's
The silver cup was found.

They dragg'd him before the Alcayde;
A hasty Judge was he;
"The thief," he said, "was plain and proved,
And hang'd the thief must be."

So to the gallows our poor Pierre
Was hurried instantly.

If I should now relate
The pitious lamentation,
Which for their son these parents made,
My little friends, I am afraid
You'd weep at the relation.

But Pierre in Santiago still
His constant faith professed;
When to the gallows he was led,
"Twas a short way to Heaven," he said,
"Though not the pleasantest."

And from their pilgrimage he charged
His parents not to cease,
Saying that, unless they promised this,
He could not be hang'd in peace.

They promised it with heavy hearts:
Pierre then, therewith content,
Was hang'd; and they upon their way
To Compostella went.

---

PART II.

Four weeks they travell'd painfully;
They paid their vows, and then
To La Calzada's fatal town
Did they come back again.

The Mother would not be withheld,
But go she must to see
Where her poor Pierre was left to hang
Upon the gallows tree.

Oh tale most marvellous to hear,
Most marvellous to tell!
Eight weeks had he been hanging there,
And yet was alive and well!

"Mother," said he, "I am glad you're return'd;
It is time I should now be released:
Though I cannot complain that I'm tired,
And my neck does not ache in the least.

"The Sun has not search'd me by day;
The Moon has not chill'd me by night;
And the winds have but help'd me to swing,
As if in a dream of delight.

"Go you to the Alcayde,
That hasty Judge unjust;
Tell him Santiago has saved me,
And take me down he must!"

Now, you must know the Alcayde,
Not thinking himself a great sinner,
Just then at table had sat down,
About to begin his dinner.

His knife was raised to carve,
The dish before him then;
Two roasted fowls were laid therein;
That very morning they had been
A Cock and his faithful Hen

In came the Mother wild with joy;
"A miracle!" she cried;
But that most hasty Judge unjust
Repell'd her in his pride.

"Think not," quoth he, "to tales like this
That I should give belief!
Santiago never would bestow
His miracles, full well I know,
On a Frenchman and a thief."

And pointing to the Fowls, o'er which
He held his ready knife,
"As easily might I believe
These birds should come to life!"

The good Saint would not let him thus
The Mother's true tale withstand;
So up rose the Fowls in the dish,
And down dropp'd the knife from his hand.

The Cock would have crow'd if he could;
To cackle the Hen had a wish;
And they both slipp'd about in the gravy,
Before they got out of the dish.

And when each would have open'd its eyes,
For the purpose of looking about them,
They saw they had no eyes to open,
And that there was no seeing without them.

All this was to them a great wonder;
They stagger'd and reel'd on the table;
And either to guess where they were,
Or what was their plight, or how they came there,
Alas! they were wholly unable; —

Because, you must know, that that morning —
A thing which they thought very hard —
The Cook had cut off their heads,
And thrown them away in the yard.

The Hen would have prank'd up her feathers,
But plucking had sadly deform'd her;
And for want of them she would have shiver'd
with cold,
If the roasting she had had not warm'd her.

And the Cock felt exceedingly queer;
He thought it a very odd thing
That his head and his voice were he did not know where,
And his gizzard tuck'd under his wing.

The gizzard got into its place,
But how, Santiago knows best;
And so, by the help of the Saint,
Did the liver and all the rest.

The heads saw their way to the bodies;
In they came from the yard without check,
And each took its own proper station,
To the very great joy of the neck.

And in flew the feathers, like snow in a shower,
For they all became white on the way;
And the Cock and the Hen in a trice were reflect'd,
And then who so happy as they?

Cluck! cluck! cried the Hen right merrily then
The Cock his clarion blew;
Full glad was he to hear again
His own cock-a-doo-del-doo!

PART III.

"A miracle! a miracle!"
The people shouted, as they might well,
When the news went through the town;
And every child, and woman, and man
Took up the cry, and away they ran
To see Pierre taken down.

They made a famous procession;
My good little women and men,
Such a sight was never seen before,
And I think will never again.

Santiago's Image, large as life,
Went first with banners, and drum, and sife;
And next, as was most meet,
The twice-born Cock and Hen were borne
Along the thronging street.

Porch'd on a cross-pole hoisted high,
They were raised in sight of the crowd;
And, when the people set up a cry,
The Hen she cluck'd in sympathy,
And the Cock he crow'd aloud.

And because they very well knew for why
They were carried in such solemnity,

And saw the Saint and his banners before 'em,
They behaved with the greatest propriety,
And most correct decorum.

The Knife, which had cut off their heads that morn,
Still red with their innocent blood, was borne;
The scullion boy he carried it;
And the Skewers also made a part of the show,
With which they were truss'd for the spit.

The Cook in triumph bore that Spit
As high as he was able;
And the Dish was display'd, wherein they were laid,
When they had been served at table.

With eager faith the crowd press'd round;
There was a scramble of women and men
For who should dip a finger-tip
In the blessed Gravy then.

Next went the Alcayde, beating his breast,
Crying aloud, like a man distress'd,
And amaz'd at the loss of his dinner,
"Santiago, Santiago!
Have mercy on me a sinner!"

And lifting oftentimes his hands
Towards the Cook and Hen,
"Orate pro nobis!" devoutly he cried;
And as devoutly the people replied,
Whenever he said it, "Amen!"

The Father and Mother were last in the train;
Rejoicingly they came,
And extoll'd, with tears of gratitude,
Santiago's glorious name.

So, with all honors that might be,
They gently unhang'd Pierre;
No hurt or harm had he sustain'd,
But, to make the wonder clear,
A deep, black halter-mark remain'd
Just under his left ear.

PART IV.

And now, my little listening dears,
With open mouths and open ears,
Like a rhymer whose only art is
That of telling a plain, unvarnish'd tale,
To let you know, I must not fail,
What became of all the parties.

Pierre went on to Compostella
To finish his pilgrimage;
His parents went back with him joyfully,
After which they return'd to their own country;
And there, I believe, that all the three
Lived to a good old age.

For the gallows on which Pierre
So happily had swung,
THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELA.

These blessed Fowls, at seven years' end,
In the odor of sanctity died;
They were carefully pluck'd, and then
They were buried, side by side.

And, lest the fact should be forgotten,
(Which would have been a pity.)
'Twas decreed, in honor of their worth,
That a Cock and Hen should be borne thenceforth
In the arms of that ancient City.

Two eggs Saint Hen had laid, no more;
The chicken were her delight;
A Cock and Hen they proved,
And both, like their parents, were virtuous and white.

The last act of the Holy Hen
Was to rear this precious brood; and, when Saint Cock and she were dead,
This couple, as the lawful heirs,
Succeeded in their stead.

They also lived seven years;
And they laid eggs but two,
From which two milk-white chicken
To Cock and Henhood grew;
And always their posterity
The self-same course pursue.

Not one of these eggs ever added,
(With wonder be it spoken?)
Not one of them ever was lost,
Not one of them ever was broken.

Sacred they are; neither magpie, nor rat,
Snake, weasel, nor marten approaching them:
And woe to the irreverent wretch
Who should even dream of poaching them!

Thus, then, is this great miracle
Continued to this day;
And to their Church all Pilgrims go,
When they are on the way;
And some of the feathers are given them;
For which they always pay.

No price is set upon them;
And this leaves all persons at ease;
The Poor give as much as they can,
The Rich as much as they please.

But that the more they give the better,
Is very well understood;
Seeing whatever is thus disposed of
Is for their own souls' good;—

For Santiago will always
Befriend his true believers;
And the money is for him, the Priests
Being only his receivers.

To make the miracle the more,
Of these feathers there is always store,
And all are genuine too;

It was resolved that never more
On it should man be hung.

To the Church it was transplanted,
As ancient books declare;
And the people in commotion,
With an uproar of devotion,
Set it up for a relic there.

What became of the halter I know not,
Because the old books show not;
But we may suppose and hope,
That the city presented Pierre
With that interesting rope.

For in his family — and this
The Corporation knew —
It rightly would be valued more
Than any cordon bleu.

The Innkeeper's wicked daughter
Confess'd what she had done;
So they put her in a convent,
And she was made a Nun.

The Alcayde had been so frighten'd
That he never ate fowls again;
And he always pull'd off his hat
When he saw a Cock and Hen.
Wherever he sat at table,
Not an egg might there be placed;
And he never even muster'd courage for a custard,
Though garlic tempted him to taste
Of an omelet now and then.

But always, after such a transgression,
He hasten'd away to make confession;
And not till he had confess'd,
And the Priest had absolved him, did he feel
His conscience and stomach at rest.

The twice-born Birds to the Pilgrim's Church,
As by miracle consecrated,
Were given; and there unto the Saint
They were publicly dedicated.

At their dedication the Corporation
A fund for their keep supplied;
And after following the Saint and his banners,
This Cock and Hen were so changed in their manner,
That the Priests were edified.

Gentle as any turtle-dove,
Saint Cock became all meekness and love;
Most dutiful of wives,
Saint Hen she never peck'd again;
So they led happy lives.

The ways of ordinary fowls
You must know they had clean forsaken;
And if every Cock and Hen in Spain
Had their example taken,
Why, then — the Spaniards would have had
No eggs to eat with bacon.
NOTES TO THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

All of the original Cock and Hen, Which the Priests will swear is true.

Thousands a thousand times told have bought them;
And if myriads and tens of myriads sought them,
They would still find some to buy;
For, however great were the demand,
So great would be the supply.

And if any of you, my small friends,
Should visit those parts, I dare say
You will bring away some of the feathers,
And think of old Robin Gray.

NOTES.

The marble ship I have not found any where except in Goddes, who must have found it in some version of the legend which has not fallen into my hands. But that the ship was made of marble I believe to be quite as true as any other part of the legend of Santiago. — Whether of marble or not, it was a miraculous ship which, without oars or sails, performed the voyage from Joppa to Iria Tiara, now El Patron, in Galicia, in seven days.

Classical fables were still so popular when the Historia Compostellana was written, that the safe passage of this ship over the Syrett, and between Seylla and Olarydis, is ascribed to the presiding hand of Providence. — España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6.

How the body came to leave its head behind is a circumstance which has not been accounted for; and yet it requires explanation, because we are assured that Santiago took particular care not to part with his head, when it was cut off.

"At the moment," says the Annalist of Galicia, "when the cruel executioner severed from its neck the precious head of the sacred Apostle, the body miraculously raised its hands and caught it, and in that posture it continued till night. The astonished Jews attempted to separate it, but in vain; for upon touching the venerable corpse, their arms became cold, as if frozen, and they remained without the use of them." — Anales de Galicia, por El Doctor D. Francisco Xavier Manuel de la Huerta y Pega. — Santiago, 1753.

"Cortada la cabeza no Dios en tierra,
Que por vir de Dios, et con las manos,
Esoes que cogen al vuelo a la alferena,
Que no pueden quitarselas brazos.
Chistoval de Meo: El Patron de España, ff. 62.

Perhaps his companions dropped it on their way to the coast, for the poet tells as they travelled in the dark, and in a hurry:

"Cubierta de la noche con el mano
Sin que ninguno atrevia los impulsa,
Mas presto que si fueran a golpe,
Llecan el cuerpo a la ciudad de Jope.
" — Ib. ff. 65.

But according to the Historia Compostellana, (España Sagrada, t. xx. p. 6.) there is the testimony of Pope St. Leo, that the original head came with the body.

And more, though then he had no head,
He afterward had two. — p. 555, col. 1.

This is a small allowance, and must be understood with reference to the two most authentic ones in that part of the world,—that at Braga, and one of the two at Compostella.

It is a common thing for Saints to be polycephalous; and Santiago is almost as great a pluralist in heads as St. John the Baptist has been made by the dealers in relics. There are some half dozen heads, and almost as many whole bodies ascribed to him,—all in good odor, all having worked miracles, and all, beyond a doubt, equally authentic.

And how he used to fight the Moors. — p. 555, col. 1.

Most appropriately therefore, according to P. Sautel, was he called Barmorges.

"Complicece media cataphracta in aere doctor,
Qui divit in triplicibus barbara cæsara fugam.
Tum eio tam valde car terga delere philantges
Nanimur Tuntria Filius ina patrat." —

"siendo arca en España nuestro amparo y defensa en las guerras, mereció con razón este nombre: para unos fines que trueno mi reya espartado, confusas y desbaratadas los grandes execrados de los Moros." — Morales, Cronica Gen. de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 4.

"Vittoria Esposa, vitoria, que tiene en tu defensa,
uso de los Dese Pares;
mas no de nación Francesa.
Hijo es tuyo, y tantos mata que parece que sea fuerte
cecela a la de la muerte
quando mas furiosa y presta." —

Ledesma, Conceptas Espartales, p. 242.

The Spanish Clergy had a powerful motive for propagating these fables; their Privilegio de los votos being one of the most gainful, as well as most impudent fancies, that ever was committed.

"The two sons of Zebedee manifested," says Morales, "their courage and great heart, and the faith which was strengthening in them, by their eagerness to revenge the injury done to their kinsman and master when the Samaritans would not receive him into their city. Then Santiago and St. John distinguished themselves from the other Apostles, by coming forward, and saying to our Savior, 'Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from Heaven and consume them?' It seems as if (according to the Castilian proverb concerning kinsmen) their blood boiled in them to kill and to destroy, because of the part which they had in his. But he was not in such haste. O glorious Apostle Santiago, to shed the blood of others for Christ, your cousin-german! It will not be long before you will give it to him, and for him will give all your own. Let him first shed his for you, that, when yours shall be mingled with it by another new tie of spiritual relationship, and by a new friendship in martyrdom, it shall be more esteemed by him, and held in great account. Let the debt be well made out, that the payment may be the more due. Let the benefit be completed, that you may make the recompense under greater obligation, and with more will. Then will it be worth more, and manifest more gratitude. Learn meantime from your Master, that love is not shown in killing and destroying the souls of others for the beloved, but in mortifying and offering your own to death. This, which is the height and perfection of love, your Master will teach you, and thenceforth you will not content yourself with any thing less. And if you are desirous, for Christ's sake, to strike and slay his enemies, have patience awhile, fierce Saint! (Santo furioso). There will come a time when you shall wage war for your Master, sword in hand, and in your person shall slaughter myriads and myriads of Moors, his wicked enemies." — Cronica General de España, l. ix. c. vii. § 8.

An old hymn, which was formerly used in the service of his day's, likens this Apostle to a Lion's whelp!

"Electus hic Apostolus
Decorus et amabilis,
Veil. Leonis catalus
Victi bella certamina." — Divi Tutelares, 229.
NOTES TO THE PILGRIM TO COMPOSTELLA.

"Thirty-eight visible appearances," says the Padre Muestra Fray Felipe de la Gandara, Chronicler General of the Kingdom of Galicia, "thirty-eight visible appearances, as in many different battles, aiding and favoring the Spaniards, are recounted by the very learned Don Manuel Eraso Gimeno, as his most erudite and laborious work on the Preaching of the Spaniards in Spain; from which work the illustrious Doctor Don Antonio Calderón has collected them in his book upon the Excellencies of this Apostle. And I hold it for certain that his appearances have been many more; and that in every victory, which the Spaniards have achieved over their enemies, their Great Captain has been present with his favor and intercession."—Armas y Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 68.

The Chronicler proceeds to say that Galicia may be especially proud of part of its past in all these victories, the Saint having publicly praised himself upon his connection with that kingdom; for being asked in a battle once, who and what he was, (being a stranger,) he replied, "I am a Soldier, a Kinsman of the Eternal King, a Citizen and Inhabitant of Compostella, and my name is James." For this fact the Chronicler assures us that book of manuscript sermons, preached in Paris three centuries before his time by a Franciscan Friar, is sufficient authority: "Ex valute autoritd!"—Armas y Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, p. 649.

.... still they worship him in Spain, And believe in him with might and main.—p. 555, col. 1.

"The true name of this Saint," says Ambrosio de Morales, "was Jacobo, (that is, according to the Spanish form,) taken with little difference from that of the Patriarch Jacob. A greater is that which we Spaniards have made, corrupting the word little by little, till it has become the very different one which we now see. From Santo Jacobo we shortened it, as we commonly do with proper names, and said Santo Iaco. We clipped it again after this abbreviation, and by taking away one letter, and changing another, made it into Santiago. The alteration did not stop here; but because Vago or Tiago by itself did not sound distinctly and well, we began to call it Diego, as they call it in Spanish writings of two or three hundred years old. At last, having passed through all these mutations, we rested with Diego for the ordinary name, reserving that of Santiago when we speak of the Saint."—Corónica General de España, l. v. c. viij. p. 92.

Thus may be seen the change in the name of Jacobus Apostolus with acquirements and vulgaridad Jacobo Apostol, a Girones Postolo, o Iaco Apostol."—Expulsd Sagrada, l. xix. p. 71.

It has not been explained how Jack in this country was transferred from James to John. The Prior Cayrasco de Figueras assures us that St. James was a gentleman, his father Zebedee being

"Veras de ultrasound y Galileo, Puesto que unir un arte pictorica, Que decoros no era ilustre, ni fees, Ni ahora en muchas partes menos glores, La gente prudente tuve afeo, O por en merced, a su exercicio."—Templo Militante, p. ili. p. 83.

Morales also takes some pains to establish this point. Zede- dece, he assures us, (the word principal, error de un nombre, con que segun la pro vincia, su nombre, n. ii, iii. vi. 3.) nut it is clear, he says, "como padre y hijos tienen esta trata de la progreccion haustamente, mas como senores que como oficiales."—Corónica de España, l. ix. c. viii. § 3.

"They're an Inquisition to wond him."—p. 555, col. 1.

Under the dominion of that atrocious Tribunal Ambrosio de Morales might truly say, "No one will dare deny that the body of the glorious Apostle is in the city which is named after him, and that it was brought thither, and afterwards discovered there by the great miracles,"—of which he proceeds to give an account. "People have been burnt for less,"—as a fellow at Leobs said the other day of a woman whom he suspected of bewitching him.

There is nothing of which the Spanish and Portuguese authors have boasted with greater complacency and pleasure than of the said Inquisition. A notable example of this is afforded in the following passage from the Templo Militante, Fios Santanería, y Templo de Vesta, by D. Bartolome Cuyrus de Figueras, Prior and Canon of the Cathedral Church of Gran Canary. (Lisbon, 1613.)

"——Historia España, Aunque de mucho puede glorizarse, No está en caso el valor que te acompaña, Sino en tener la F. por custodiar : Por esta la princesa una extraña, Y todo el océno de confiar ; Por esta la tierra brasileño, Y el esclavo Tattera profundo.

Pilgrim to Compostela, in his Church,
His body and soul dead
Have been, for some eight hundred years,

— a visitar el cuerpo santo
Todo fiel Christiano la sin toma:
Adonde viene peregrino tanto
Como a Jerusalem, y como a Roma,
Que a él el tiempo y por las caminos
Viven de todo lo mundo peregrinos

Varía gente fiel, pueblo diverso,
El Santuario celebre frecuenta,
Aunque el casi unfragado piloto,
Libre de la maritima tormenta:
Que des de la luz de luna nadie
Tocando de acalma cuenta,
Que de la tempestad casi sin habla,
Con la vida salio sobre esta tablas.

The high altar at Compostella is, as all the altars formerly were in Galicia and Astorias, not close to the wall, but a little detached from it. It is ten feet in length, and very wide, with a splendid frontispiece of silver. The altar itself is hollow, and at the Gospel end there is a small door, never opened except to royal visitors, and when a new Archbishop first comes to take possession. It was opened for Ambrosio de Morales, because he was commissioned to inspect the churches; nothing, however, was to be seen within, except two large, flat stones, which formed the floor, and at the end of them a hole about the size of an orange, but filled with mortar. Below is the vault in which the body of Santiago is said to be deposited in the marble coffin wherein it was found. The vault extends under the altar and its steps, and some way back under the Capella Mayor: it is in part a part of the Crypt walled off with a thick wall, para dar encoro el todo el santo cuerpo.

The Saint, whose real presence is thus carefully concealed, receives his pilgrims in effigy. The image is a life figure of stone, a little less than life, gilt and painted, holding in one hand a book, and in the other a crucifixion cross, and giving a blessing with the other. Esta en cebolla, without either crown or glory, on the head, but a large silver crown is suspended immediately above, almost so as to touch the head; and the last encroopy which a pilgrim performs is to ascend to the image, which is over the altar, by a staircase from the Epistle side, kiss it reverently on the head, embruce it, and place this crown upon it, and then go down on the Gospel side. — Fierro de Morales, t. xx. p. 151.

"Ingenas sub templo fornas, et clausura per umbros..." (Morales, H. l. xx. p. 151.)

"Thousand Virgins. These are from the list which Morales gives; but that good and learned man, who often swallowed the bull and stuck at the tail, omitted some more curious ones, which are recorded in an ancient itinerary. (Espafia Sagrada, t. xix. p. 314.) Among those are part of our Lord’s remnant, of the earth on which he stood, of the head which he brake, of his blood, and of the Virgin’s milk.

A late editor of Old Fontanais is reminded in one of his notes of !Gallus agnoscere omnes, in the passage in the play, which, as we should have seen, is evidently allusive to such relics as those at Compostella.

"...there can I show thee..."

The ball of gold that set all Troy on fire:

They shall thee see the scarf of Cupid’s mother,

Stoic’d from the soft moist ivory of her arm.

To wrap about Adonis’ wounded thigh;

They shall thee see a wheel of Titan’s car,

Which dropped from Heaven when Phaeton fired the world.

"It will give thee — the fire of Proserpine.

Which, in reward for a sweet Thracian song,

The black bow’d Empress threw to Orpheus,

Being come to fetch Eurydice from hell;"

...all who in their mortal stages

Did not perform this pilgrimage, Must make it when they were dead. — p. 555, col. 2.

"Haec lignis propestat urbes, haec g erecta flora..."

"...etiam aequat, Colligite omnes, et Flundria comit..."

"...Confluit, et dona altera accursoc frequenter;"

"...qui vero forsit qui non haec templo patientes..."

"...altar, and sanctum, alae oratus loci..."

F. Bartholomew PEREZ, Pecieosio, lib. vii. p. 117.

Fray Luis de Escobar has this among the five hundred proverbs of his Libro: —

"...el camino a la muerte es como el de Santiago."

"Las gastronomias, &c. &c. 149.

It seems to allude to this superstition, meaning, that it is a journey which all must take. The particular part of the pilgrimage, which must be performed either in ghost or in person, is that of crawling through a hole in the rock at El Padron, which is said to have been made with his staff. In allusion to this part of the pilgrimage, which is not deemed so indispensable at Compostella as at Padron, they have this proverb — Quien va a Santiago, y no va a Padron, o fort, Romerón a don."

The pilgrim, indeed, must be inquisitive who would not extend his journey thither; a copious fountain, of the coolest and finest water which Morales tasted in Galicia, rises under the high altar, but on the outside of the church; the pilgrims drink of it, and wash in its waters, as the Apostle is said to have done; they ascend the steps in the rock upon their knees, and finally perform the passage which must be made by all: — "it is not considered the site, and it is here seen that of all ways the town, which was above in the town, and to both architects great Urnas of great arches and frescoes of wax of days in large, larger es apurada para mucha contemplation." — Vide de Morales, p. 174.

The scallopshell, — p. 555, col. 2.

"The scallops, being denounced by ancient authors the Shells of Fools, or Gallicone St. James, it has not been determined which; one of St. Christopher’s arms, of modest dimensions; and seven heads of the Eleven..."
family, (Church Hist. cent. xii. p. 42,) who gave their arms gules, three scallop-shells argent, he says, 'which scallop-shells were six, the other form being crescent-shaped, and capacious, smooth within, and artificially plated without, was at times cup and dish to the pilgrims in Palestine, and thereupon their arms often charged therewith.'

That the scallop-belonged exclusively to the Compostellan pilgrims to prevent any misunderstanding, the late Mr. F. T. Babington, in a similar way, bear a arm in his unurefined, and with five scallops.

'This is the origin of the shells with which the pilgrims, who come to visit the body of our glorious Patron, adorn themselves, the custom having, without doubt, been preserved by tradition from that time. The circumstances are confirmed by pictures recorded, which show them to have been preserved in various cities. In the Church of St. Maria de Arenas at Rome, on the Gospel side, there is a spacious chapel, dedicated to our glorious Patron; it was painted in the year 1118, and in one compartment this adventure is represented: there is the ship, having the body of the Apostle on the poop, and the seven Disciples on board: close to the ship, upon the sea, is a knight upon a black horse, with a red saddle and trappings, both covered with scallop-shells. The same story is painted in the parish church of Santiago at Madrid: and it is related in a very ancient manuscript, which is preserved in the library of the Monastery of St. Juan de los Reyes, at Toledo. In the Ancient Breviary of the Holy Church of Oviedo, mention is made of this prodigy in these verses, upon the vener of the glorious Saint:

*Cædis mare cerecatras,
Sed a profundo ducitur,
Notae Regis submersuses
Tutæ pleias consequitis.*

Finally, the fact is authenticated by their Holinesses Alexander III., Gregory IX., and Clement V., who in their Bulls grant a faculty to the Archbishop of Compostella, that they may communicate those who sell these shells to pilgrims any where except in the city of Santiago, and they assign this reason, that because the shells are the badge of the Apostle Santiago.

And the Scallop shell was adopted as a badge of the Church of Rome, which is enriched with the body of St. Clement, Pope and Martyr, is a picture of the Apostle Santiago, apparently more than five hundred years old, which is adorned with scallop-shells on the garment and hat, as his proper badge.—Athlæus de Oviedo, vol. i. pp. 95, 96.

Bouzas, in his account of this hearing, says nothing of its origin. But he says, 'The Essipple (according to Dioscorides) is rendered of the Dew and Air, and hath no blood at all in itself, notwithstanding in man's body of any other food it turneth soonest into blood. The eating of this fish raw is said to cure a certain disease. He added, that the shell of the knight, Our Lord Christ has thought good to show by this act all persons present and to come, who may choose to love and serve this his servant, and who shall go to visit him where he shall be interred, that they take with them from thence other such scallop-shells as those with which thou art covered, as a seal of privilege, confirming that they are his, and will be so from that time forward: and he promises that afterwards, in the Day of the last Judgment, they shall be recognized of God for his and that, because of the honor which they have done to this his servant and friend, in going to visit him and to reverence him, he will receive them into his glory and his Paradise.'

'When the knight heard these words, immediately he made the disciples baptize him; and while they were so doing, he noticed, with devotion and attention, the ceremonies on the sacred ministry, and, when it was done, he took his leave of them, commending himself to their grace, and entreating of them that they would commend him in their prayers to Christ and his Apostle Santiago. At that instant the wind, which till then had been moderate, began to increase, and to raise a violent wind. The knight then directed his course toward the shore, riding upon the water, in sight of the great multitude, which from the shore was watching him; and when he reached the shore, and was surrounded by them, he related to them the adventures he had heard and what he had been shown in the sight of such stupendous miracles, were converted, and the knight, with his own hand, baptized his bride.'

The facts are thus related, to the letter, in the Sanctuarial Portuguesa, from whence the Brevearies of Alesmaça and St. Cuculate copied it, and that of Oviedo in the Hymn for the Apostle's Day,—from which authorizations the copies have arisen. The copies are to this: Scallops are descended from this knight, because the scallop is called by that name in their tongue, and that family bear it in their arms. The Pimentelles make the same pretensions, and also bear four scallops in their shield. The Ribadeneyras also adopt, in a similar way, bear a arm in their shield with five scallops.

Sir John Hawkins says, "that the pilgrims to St. James of Compostella executed a staff, or walking-stick, into a musical instrument for recreation on their journey."—*History of Music,
vol. iv. p. 129, quoted in Fosbrooke's British Mischief, p. 165.
Mr. Fosbrooke thinks that "this ascription of the invention of the Boardun to those pilgrims in particular is very questionable." Sir John probably supposed, with Richelet, that the Boardun was peculiar to these pilgrims, and therefore that they had invented it.

Mr. Fosbrooke more than doubtless the Etymon from a musical use. "The barbarous Greek Bopyrion," he observes,
"signified a boast of burden, and the Boardun was a staff of support. But the various meanings of the word, as given by Cotgrave, make off its history satisfactorily. Bourdon, a drone, or drone-bell, (Richelet says grosse mouche, orometic

drone of a bagpipe; also a pilgrim's staff; also a walking-staff,

It was doubtless applied to the use of pitching the stone, or accompanying the songs which pilgrims used to recrete themselves on their journeys, and supposed by Menestrier to be harmful and canticles."—Fosbrooke, p. 422.

In Germany, "walking-sticks that serve as tubes for pipes,

There is a postscript to this story, as melancholy as the tale itself. The sick, and the crippled, and the lame, had been brought to this church, in expectation of obtaining a miraculous cure by virtue of the new relics which had arrived. Among these was a poor woman in the last stage of disease, who had been brought upon her pallet into the church, and was laid in a corner, and left there; nor was it observed that this poor creature was in articulo mortis, till the pigeon flew to the place, and alighted upon her, and so drew the attention of the people in the church to the dying woman, quam quidam, pronit credum, nunc columba monstraret, uema moventem videor. PREFACE.

SEVERAL years ago, in the Introduction of my "Letters to Mr. Charles Butler, vindicating the Book of the Church," I had occasion to state that, while a school-boy at Westminster, I had formed an intention of exhibiting the most remarkable forms of Mythology which have at any time obtained among mankind, by making each the groundwork of a narrative poem. The performance, as might be expected, fell far short of the design, and yet it proved something more than a dream of juvenile ambition.

I began with the Mahomedan religion, as being that with which I was then best acquainted myself, and of which every one who had read the Arabian Nights' Entertainments possessed all the knowledge necessary for readily understanding and entering into the intent and spirit of the poem. Mr. Wilberforce thought that I had conveyed in it a very false impression of that religion, and that the moral sublimity which he admired in it was owing to this flattering misrepresentation. But Thalaba the Destroyer was essentially an Arabian Tale. The design required that I should bring into view the best features of that system of belief and worship which had been developed under the Covenant with Ishmael, placing in the most favorable light the morality of the Koran, and what the least corrupted of the Mahommedans retain of the patriarchal faith. It would have been altogether incongruous to have touched upon the abominations engraved upon it; first by the false Prophet himself, who appears to have been far more remarkable for audacious profligacy than for any intellectual endowments, and afterwards by the spirit of Oriental despotism which accompanied Mahommedanism wherever it was established.

Heathen Mythologies have generally been represented by Christian poets as the work of the Devil and his Angels; and the machinery derived from them was thus rendered credible, according to what was during many ages a received opinion. The plan upon which I proceeded in Madoc was to produce the effect of machinery as far as was consistent with the character of the poem, by representing the most remarkable religion of the New World such as it was, a system of atrocious priestcraft. It was not here, as in Thalaba, the foundation of the poem, but, as usual in what are called epic poems, only incidentally connected with it.

When I took up, for my next subject, that mythology which Sir William Jones had been the first to introduce into English poetry, I soon perceived that the best mode of treating it would be to construct a story altogether mythological. In what form to compose it was then to be determined. No such question had arisen concerning any of my former poems. I should never for a moment have thought of any other measure than blank verse for Jean of Arc, and for Madoc, and afterwards for Rederick. The reason why the irregular, rhymeless lyrics of Dr. Sayers were preferred for Thalaba was, that the freedom and variety of such verse were suited to the story. Indeed, of all the laudatory criticisms with which I have been favored during a long literary life, none ever gratified me more than that of Henry Kirke White upon this occasion, when he observed, that if any other known measure had been adopted, the poem would have been deprived of half its beauty, and all its propriety. And when he added, that the author never seemed to inquire how other men would treat a subject, or what might be the fashion of the times, but took that course which his own sense of fitness pointed out, I could not have desired more appropriate commendation.

The same sense of fitness which made me choose for an Arabian tale the simplest and easiest form of verse, induced me to take a different course in an Indian poem. It appeared to me, that here neither the tone of morals, nor the strain of poetry, could be pitched too high; that nothing but moral sublimity could compensate for the extravagance of the fictions, and that all the skill I might possess in the art of poetry was required to counterbalance the disadvantage of a mythology with which few readers were likely to be well acquainted, and which would appear monstrous if its deformities were not kept out of sight. I endeavored, therefore, to combine the utmost richness of versification with the greatest freedom. The spirit of the poem was Indian, but there was nothing Oriental in the style. I had learnt the language of poetry from our own great masters and the great poets of antiquity. No poem could have been more deliberately planned, nor more carefully composed. It was commenced at Lisbon on the first of May, 1801, and recommenced in the summer of the same year at Kingsdown, in the same house (endeavored to me once by many delightful but now mournful recollections) in which Madoc had been finished, and Thalaba begun. A little was added during the winter of that year in London. It was resuscitated at Kingsdown in the summer of 1802, and then laid aside till 1806, during which interval Madoc was reconstructed and published. Resuming it then once more, all that had been written was recast at Keswick; there I proceeded with it biannually, and finished it on the 25th of November, 1809. It is the only one of my long poems of which detached parts were written to be afterwards inserted in their proper places. Were I to name the persons to whom it was communicated during its progress, it would be admitted now that I might well be encouraged by their approbation; and, indeed, when it was published, I must have been very unreasonable if I had not been satisfied with its reception.

It was not till the present edition of these Poems was in the press, that, eight-and-twenty years after Keahama had been published, I first saw the article upon it in the Monthly Review, parts of which cannot be more appropriately preserved anywhere than here; it shows the determination with which the Reviewer entered upon his task, and the importance which he attached to it.

"Throughout our literary career we cannot recollect a more favorable opportunity than the present for a full discharge of our critical duty. We are indeed bound now to make a firm stand for the purity of our poetic taste against this last and most desperate assault, conducted as it is by a writer of considerable reputation, and unquestionably of considerable abilities. If this poem were to be tolerated, all things after it may demand impurity, and it will be in vain to contend hereafter for any established rule of poetry as to design and subject, as to character and incident, as to language and versification. We may return at once to the rude hymn in honor of Bacchus, and indite strains adapted to the recitation of rustic in the season of the vintage:—

Quae concertat aegerique paenulti facibus ora.

It shall be our plan to establish these points, we hope, beyond reasonable controversy, by a complete analysis of the twenty-four sections (as they may truly be called) of the portentous work, and by ample quotations interspersed with remarks, in which we shall endeavor to withhold no praise that can fairly be claimed, and no censure that is obviously deserved."

The reviewer fulfilled his promises, however much he failed in his object. He was not more liberal of censure than of praise, and he was not sparing of quotations. The analysis was sufficiently complete for the purposes of criticism, except that the critic did not always give himself the trouble to understand what he was determined to ridicule. "It is necessary for us," he said, "according to our purpose of deterring future writers from the choice of such a story, or for such a management of that story, to detail the gross follies of the work in question; and, tedious as the operation may be, we trust that, in the judgment of all those lovers of literature who duly value the preservation of sound principles of composition among us, the end will excuse the means." The means were ridicule and reprobation, and the end at which he aimed was thus stated in the Reviewer's peroration.
"We know not that Mr. Southey’s most devoted admirers can complain of our having omitted a single incident essential to the display of his character or the development of his plot. To other readers we should apologize for our prolixity, were we not desirous, as we hinted before, of giving a death-blow to the gross extravagances of the author’s school of poetry, if we cannot hope to reform so great an offender as himself. In general, all that nature and all that art has lavished on him is rendered useless by his obstinate adherence to his own system of fancied originality, in which every thing that is good is old, and every thing that is new is good for nothing. Convinced as we are that many of the author’s faults proceed from mere idleness, deserving even less indulgence than the erroneous principles of his poetical system, we shall conclude by a general exhortation to all critics to condemn, and to all writers to avoid, the example of combined carelessness and perversity which is here afforded by Mr. Southey; and we shall mark this last and worst eccentricity of his Muse with the following character:—Here is the composition of a poet not more distinguished by his genius and knowledge, than by his contempt for public opinion and the utter depravity of his taste—a depravity which is incorrigible, and, we are sorry to add, most unblushingly rejoicing in its own hopelessness of amendment."

The Monthly Review has, I believe, been for some years defunct. I never knew to whom I was beholden for the good service rendered me in that Journal, when such assistance was of most value; nor by whom I was subsequently, during several years, favored in the same Journal with such flagrant civilities as those of which the reader has here seen a sample.

KESWICK, 19th May, 1833.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

In the religion of the Hindoos, which of all false religions is the most monstrous in its fables, and the most fatal in its effects, there is one remarkable peculiarity. Prayers, penances, and sacrifices, are supposed to possess an inherent and actual value, in no degree depending upon the disposition or motive of the person who performs them. They are drafts upon Heaven, for which the Gods cannot refuse payment. The worst men, bent upon the worst designs, have in this manner obtained power which has made them formidable to the Supreme Deities themselves, and rendered an Acastar, or Incarnation of Veeshnoo the Preserver, necessary. This belief is the foundation of the following Poem. The story is original; but, in all its parts, consistent with the superstition upon which it is built; and however startling the fictions may appear, they might almost be called credible when compared with the genuine tales of Hindoo mythology.

No figures can be imagined more anti-picturesque, and less poetical, than the mythological personages of the Bramins. This deformity was easily kept out of sight:—their hundred hands are but a clumsy personification of power; their numerous heads only a gross image of divinity, "whose countenance," as the Bhagvat-Geeta expresses it, "is turned on every side." To the other obvious objection, that the religion of Hindostan is not generally known enough to supply fit machinery for an English poem, I can only answer, that, if every allusion to it throughout the work is not sufficiently self-explained to render the passage intelligible, there is a want of skill in the poet. Even those readers who should be wholly unacquainted with the writings of our learned Orientalists, will find all the preliminary knowledge that can be needful, in the brief explanation of mythological names prefixed to the Poem.

Brama, . . . the Creator.

Veeosnoo, . . . the Preserver.

Seeva, . . . the Destroyer.

These form the Trimourtee, or Trinity, as it has been called, of the Bramins. The allegory is obvious, but has been made for the Trimourtee, not the Trimourtee for the allegory; and those Deities are regarded by the people as three distinct and personal Gods. The two latter have at this day their hostile sects of worshipers; that of Seeva is the most numerous; and in this Poem, Seeva is represented as Supreme among the Gods. This is the same God whose name is variously written Seeh, Seiven, and Sira; Chiven by the French; Xiven by the Portuguese; and whom European writers sometimes denominate Eswarn, Ishwren, Mahendoo, Mahadeva, Ruten,—according to which of his thousand and eight names prevailed in the country where they obtained their information.

Siva, . . . God of the Elements.

The Swesna, . . . his Paradise, — one of the Hindoo heavens.

Yames, . . . Lord of Hell, and Judge of the Dead.

Padaoo, . . . Hell, . . . under the Earth, and, like the Earth, of an octagon shape; its eight gates are guarded by many Gods.

Mlestats, . . . the Goddess who is chiefly worshipped by the lower castes.

Pollees, . . . or Ganesh, . . . the Protector of Travellers. His statues are placed in the highways, and sometimes in a small, lonely sanctuary, in the streets and in the fields.

Caasman, . . . the Father of the Immortals.

Deeves, . . . the Inferior Deities.

Pees, . . . Good Spirits.

Aumos, . . . Evil Spirits, or Devils.

Glendouners, . . . the most beautiful of the Good Spirits, the "Grinders of Somnemart,

THE FUNERAL.

1.

Midnight, and yet no eye
Through all the Imperial City closed in sleep!
Behold her streets a-blaze
With light that seems to kindle the red sky,
Her myriads swarming through the crowded Ways
Master and slave, old age and infancy,
All, all abroad to gaze;
House-top and balcony
Clustered with women, who throw back their veils
With unimpeded and inanimate sight
To view the funeral pomp which passes by,
As if the mournful rite
Were but to them a scene of joyance and delight.

2. Vainly, ye blessed twinklers of the night,
Your feeble beams ye shed,
Quench'd in the unnatural light which might out-
Even the broad eye of day;
And thou from thy celestial way
Pourest, O Moon, an incipient ray!
For lo! ten thousand torches flame and flare
Upon the midnight air,
Blotting the lights of heaven
With one portentous glare.
Behold, the fragrant smoke, in many a fold
Ascending, floats along the fiery sky
And hangeth visible on high,
A dark and waving canopy.

3. Hark! 'tis the funeral trumpet's breath!
'Tis the dirge of death!
At once ten thousand drums begin,
With one long thunder-peat the ear assailing;
Ten thousand voices then join in,
And with one deep and general din
Pour their wild wailing.
The song of praise is drown'd
Amid the deafening sound;
You hear no more the trumpet's tone,
You hear no more the mourner's moan,
Though the trumpet's breath, and the dirge of death,
Swell with commingled force the funeral yell.
But rising over all, in one acclaim,
Is heard the echoed and reecho'd name,
From all that countless rout—
Arvalan! Arvalan!
Arvalan! Arvalan!
Ten times ten thousand voices in one shout
Call Arvalan! the overpowering song,
From house to house repeated, rings about,
From tower to tower rolls round.

4. The death-procession moves along;
Their bald heads shining to the torches' ray,
The Brahmins lead the way,
Chanting the funeral song,
And now at once they shout,
Arvalan! Arvalan!
With quick rebound of sound,
All in accordant cry,
Arvalan! Arvalan!
The universal multitude reply.
In vain ye thunder on his ear the name;
Would ye awake the dead?
Borne upright in his palanquin,
There Arvalan is seen!
A glow is on his face, — a lively red;
It is the crimson canopy
Which o'er his cheek a reddening shade bathed shed;
He moves, — he nods his head, —
But the motion comes from the bearers' tread,
As the body, borne aloft in state,
Sways with the impulse of its own dead weight.

5. Close following his dead son, Kehama came,
Nor joining in the ritual song,
Nor calling the dear name;
With head depressed, and funeral vest,
And arms enfolded on his breast,
Silent and lost in thought he moves along.
King of the world, his slaves, unconfined now,
Behold their wretched Lord; rejoiced they see
The mighty Rajah's misery;
That nature in his pride hath dealt the blow,
And taught the Master of Mankind to know
Even he himself is man, and not exempt from woe.

6. O sight of grief! the wives of Arvalan,
Young Azla, young Nealliny, are seen!
Their sister-robe's of white,
With gold and jewels bright,
Each like an Eastern queen.
Woe! woe! around their palanquin,
As on a bridal day,
With symphony, and dance, and song,
Their kindred and their friends come on.
The dance of sacrifice! the funeral song!
And next the victim slaves in long array,
Richly bedight to grace the fatal day,
Move onward to their death;
The clarions' stirring breath
Lifts their thin robes in every flowing fold,
And swells the woven gold,
That on the agitated air,
Flutters and glitters to the torch's glare.

7. A man and maid of aspect wan and wild,
Then, side by side, by bowmen guarded, came;
O wretched father! O unhappy child!
Their eyes were all eyes of all the throng exploring —
Is this the daring man
Who raised his fatal hand at Arvalan?'
Is this the wretch condemn'd to feel
Kehama's dreadful wrath?
Then were all hearts of all the throng deploiring;
For not in that innumerable throng
Was one who loved the dead; for who could know
What aggravated wrong
Provoked the desperate blow!

8. Far, far behind, beyond all reach of sight,
In order'd files the torches flow along,
One ever-lengthening line of gliding light:
Far, far behind,
Rolls on the undistinguishable clamor
Of horn, and trump, and tambour;
Incessant as the roar
Of streams which down the wintry mountain pour,
And louder than the dread commotion
Of breakers on a rocky shore,
When the winds rage over the waves,
And Ocean to the Tempest raves.

9.
And now toward the bank they go,
Where, winking on their way below,
Deep and strong the waters flow.
Here doth the funeral pile appear
With myrrh and ambergris bestrew'd,
And built of precious sandal wood.
They cease their music and their outcry here;
Gently they rest the bier;
They wet the face of Arvalan,—
No sign of life the sprinkled drops excite;
They feel his breast,—no motion there;
They feel his lips,—no breath;
For not with feeble, nor with erring hand,
The brave avenger dealt the blow of death.
Then, with a doubling peel and deeper blast,
The tambours and the trumpets sound on high,
And with a last and loudest cry
They call on Arvalan.

10.
Woe! woe! for Azla takes her seat
Upon the funeral pile;
Calmly she took her seat,
Calmly the whole terrific pomp survey'd;
As on her lap the while
The lifeless head of Arvalan was laid.

11.
Woe! woe! Neallny, The young Neallny,
They strip her ornaments away,
Bracelet and anklet, ring, and chain, and zone;
Around her neck they leave
The marriage knot alone,
That marriage band, which, when
You wanting moon was young,
Around her virgin neck
With bridal joy was hung.
Then with white flowers, the coronal of death,
Her jetty locks they crown.

12.
O sight of misery!
You cannot hear her cries,—their sound
In that wild dissonance is drown'd;—
But in her face you see
The supplication and the agony,—
See in her swelling throat the desperate strength
That with vain exertion struggles yet for life;
Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,
Now wildly at full length
Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread;—
They force her on, they bind her to the dead.

13.
Then all around retire;
Circling the pile, the ministering Bramins stand,
Each lifting in his hand a torch on fire.
Alone the Father of the dead advanced
And lit the funeral pyre.

14.
At once on every side
The circling torches drop;
At once on every side
The fragrant oil is pour'd;
At once on every side
The rapid flames rush up.
Then hand in hand the victim band
Roll in the dance around the funeral pyre;
Their garments' flying folds
Float inward to the fire;
In drunken whirl they wheel around;
One drops,—another plunges in;
And still with overwhelming din
The tambours and the trumpets sound;
And clap of hand, and shouts, and cries,
From all the multitude arise;
While round and round, in giddy wheel,
Intoxicate they roll and reel,
Till one by one whirl'd in they fall,
And the devouring flames have swallow'd all.

15.
Then all was still; the drums and clarions ceased;
The multitude were hush'd in silent awe;
Only the roaring of the flames was heard.

II.

THE CURSE.

1.

Alone towards the Table of the Dead
Kehama moved; there on the altar-stone
Honey and rice he spread.
There, with collected voice and painful tone,
He call'd upon his son.
Lo! Arvalan appears;
Only Kehama's powerful eye could behold
The thin, ethereal spirit hovering nigh;
Only the Rajah's ear
Receiv'd his feeble breath.
And is this all? the mournful Spirit said,
This all that thou canst give me after death?
This unavailing pomp,
These empty pageantries, that mock the dead?

2.

In bitterness the Rajah heard,
And groan'd, and smote his breast, and o'er his face
Cowl'd the white mourning vest.

3.

Arvalan.
Art thou not powerful,—even like a God?
And must I, through my years of wandering,
Shivering and naked to the elements,
In wretchedness await
The hour of Yamen's wrath?
He moved toward the pile,
And raised his hand to lash the crowd, and cried,
Bring forth the murderer! At the Rajah's voice,
Calmly, and like a man whom fear had stunned,
Ladurlad came, obedient to the call,
But Kailyal started at the sound,
And gave a wondrous shriek; and back she drew,
And eagerly she roll'd her eyes around,
As if to seek for aid, albeit she knew
No aid could there be found.

8.

It chanced that near her, on the river-brink,
The sculptured form of Marriatula stood;
It was an Idol roughly hewn of wood,
Artless, and mean, and rude;
The Goddess of the poor was she;
None else regarded her with piety.
But when that holy Image Kailyal view'd,
To that she sprang, to that she clung;
On her own Goddess with close-clasping arms,
For life: the maiden hung.

9.

They seized the maid; with unremitting grasp
They bruised her tender limbs;
She, nothing yielding, to this only hope
Clings with the strength of frenzy and despair;
She screams not now, she breathes not now,
She sends not up one vow,
She forms not in her soul one secret prayer,
All thought, all feeling, and all powers of life
In the one effort centring. Wretched they
With tug and strain would force the maid away;
Didst thou, O Marriatula, see their strife?
In pity didst thou see the suffering maid?
Or was thine anger kindled, that rude hands
Assail'd thy holy Image? — for behold
The holy image shaks!

10.

Irreverently bold, they deem the maid
Relax'd her stubborn hold,
And now with force redoubled drag their prey;
And now the rooted Idol to their sway
Bends, — yields, — and now it falls. But then they scream;
For lo! they feel the crumbling bank give way,
And all are plunged into the stream.

11.

She hath escaped my will, Kehama cried;
She hath escaped, — but thou art here;
I have thee still.
The worse criminal!
And on Ladurlad, while he spake, severe
He fix'd his dreadful frown.
The strong reflection of the pile
Lit his dark lineaments,
Lit the protruded brow, the gathered front,
The steady eye of wrath.

12.

But while the fearful silence yet endured,
Ladurlad roused himself;
I. THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

Ere yet the voice of destiny
Which trembled on the Rajah's lips was loosed,
   Eager he interposed,
As if despair had waken'd him to hope;
Mercy! oh mercy! only in defence—
   Only instinctively—
Only to save my child, I smote the Prince;
King of the world, be merciful!
Crush me — but torture not!

13. The Man-Almighty deign'd him no reply;
   He stood motionless, he stood silent; in no human mood
Of mercy, in no hesitating thought
Of right and justice. At the length he raised
His brow, yet unrelax'd,—his lips unclosed,
   And, uttered from the heart,
With the whole feeling of his soul enforced,
The gathered vengeance came.

14. I charm thy life
   From the weapons of strife,
From stone and from wood,
   From fire and from flood,
From the serpent's tooth,
   And the beasts of blood:
From Sickness I charm thee,
   And Time shall not harm thee;
But Earth, which is mine,
   Its fruits shall deny thee;
And Water shall hear me,
   And know thee and fly thee;
And the Winds shall not touch thee
   When they pass by thee,
And the Dews shall not wet thee,
   When they fall nigh thee:
And thou shalt seek Death
   To release thee, in vain;
Thou shalt live in thy pain,
   While Kehama shall reign,
With a fire in thy heart,
   And a fire in thy brain;
And Sleep shall obey me,
   And visit thee never,
And the Curse shall be on thee
   Forever and ever.

15. There where the Curse had stricken him,
   There stood the miserable man,
There stood Ladurlad, with loose-hanging arms,
   And eyes of idiot wandering.
Was it a dream? alas!
   He heard the river flow;
He heard the crumbling of the pile;
   He heard the wind which shower'd
The thin, white ashes round.
   There motionless he stood,
As if he hoped it were a dream,
   And feared to move, lest he should prove
The actual misery;
   And still at times he met Kehama's eye,
Kehama's eye, that fastened on him still.

III. THE RECOVERY.

1. The Rajah turned toward toward the pile again;
   Loud rose the song of death from all the crowd;
Their din the instruments begin,
   And once again join in
   With overwhelming sound.
Ladurlad starts,—he looks around;
What hast thou here in view,
O wretched man, in this disastrous scene?
The soldier train, the Bramins who renew
Their ministry around the funeral pyre,
The empty palanquins,
The dimly-fading fire.

2. Where, too, is she whom most his heart held dear,
   His best-beloved Kailyal, where is she,
The solace and the joy of many a year
   Of widowhood? is she then gone,
And is he left all-utterly alone,
   To bear his blasting curse, and none
To succor or deplore him?
He staggers from the dreadful spot; the throng
   Give way in fear before him;
Like one who carries pestilence about,
Shuddering they shun him, where he moves along
   And now he wanders on
Beyond the noisy rout:
He cannot fly and leave his Curse behind;
   Yet doth he seem to find
A comfort in the change of circumstance.
Adown the shore he strays,
Unknowing where his wretched feet shall rest,
   But farthest from the fatal place is best.

3. By this in the orient sky appears the gleam
   Of day. Lo! what is yonder in the stream,
Down the slow river floating slow,
   In distance indistinct and dimly seen?
The childless one, with idle eye,
   Followed its motion thoughtlessly;
Idly he gazed, unknowing why,
And half unconscious that he watch'd its way.
Belike it is a tree
Which some rude tempest, in its sudden sway,
   Tore from the rock, or from the hollow shore
The undermining stream hath swept away.

4. But when anon outswelling, by its side,
   A woman's robe he spied,
Oh then Ladurlad started,
   As one, who in his grave
   Had heard an Angel's call.
Yea, Marratally, thou hast deign'd to save!
   Yea, Goddess! it is she,
Kailyal, still clinging senselessly
To thy dear Image, and in happy hour
Upborne amid the wave
By that preserving power.

5.
Headlong in hope and in joy
Ladurlad plunged in the water;
The Water knew Kehama's spell;
The Water shrunk before him.
Blind to the miracle,
He rushes to his daughter,
And treads the river depths in transport wild,
And clasps, and saves his child.

6.
Upon the farther side, a level shore
Of sand was spread: thither Ladurlad bore
His daughter, holding still with senseless hand
The saving Goddess; there upon the sand
He laid the livid maid,
Raised up against his knees her drooping head;
Bent to her lips,—her lips as pale as death,—
If he might feel her breath,
His own the while in hope and dread suspended;
Chafed her cold breast, and ever and anon
Let his hand rest, upon her heart extended.

7.
Soon did his touch perceive, or fancy, there
The first faint motion of returning life.
He chafes her feet, and lays them bare
In the sun; and now again upon her breast
Lays his hot hand; and now her lips he press'd,
For now the stronger throbb of life he knew;
And her lips tremble too!
The breath comes palpably:
Her quivering lids unclose,
 Feebly and feebly fall,
Relapsing, as it seem'd, to dead repose.

8.
So in her father's arms thus languidly,
While over her with earnest gaze he hung,
Silent and motionless she lay,
And painfully and slowly writhed at fits;
At fits, to short convulsive starts was stung.
Till when the struggle and strong agony
Had left her, quietly she lay reposed;
Her eyes now resting on Ladurlad's face,
Relapsing now, and now again unlosed.
The look she fix'd upon his face implies
No thought nor feeling; senselessly she lies,
Composed like one who sleeps with open eyes.

9.
Long he lean'd over her,
In silence and in fear.
Kailyal! — at length he cried in such a tone
As a poor mother ventures who draws near,
With silent footsteps, to her child's sick bed.
My Father! cried the maid, and raised her head,
Awakening then to life and thought,—thou here?
For when his voice she heard,
The dreadful past recur'd,
Which dimly, like a dream of pain,
Till now with troubled sense confused her brain.

10.
And hath he spared us then? she cried,
Half rising as she spake,
For hope and joy the sudden strength supplied;
In mercy hath he curb'd his cruel will,
That still thou livest? But as thus she said,
Impatient of that look of hope, her sire
Shook hastily his head;
Oh! he hath laid a Curse upon my life,
A clinging curse, quoth he;
Hast sent a fire into my heart and brain,
A burning fire, forever there to be!
The Winds of Heaven must never breathe on me;
The Rains and Dews must never fall on me;
Water must mock my thirst, and shrink from me;
The common Earth must yield no fruit to me;
Sleep, blessed Sleep! must never light on me;
And Death, who comes to all, must fly from me,
And never, never, set Ladurlad free.

11.
This is a dream! exclaimed the incredulous maid,
Yet in her voice the while a fear express'd,
Which in her larger eye was manifest.
This is a dream! she rose, and laid her hand
Upon her father's brow, to try the charm;
He could not bear the pressure there;—he shrunk;
He warded off her arm,
As though it were an enemy's blow; he smote
His daughter's arm aside.
Her eye glanced down; her mantle she espied,
And caught it up,—Oh misery! Kailyal cried,
He bore me from the river-depths, and yet
His garment is not wet!

IV.

THE DEPARTURE.

1.
Reclined beneath a Cocoa's feathery shade
Ladurlad lies,
And Kailyal on his lap her head hath laid,
To hide her streaming eyes.
'The boatman, sailing on his easy way,
With envious eye beheld them where they lay;
For every herb and flower
Was fresh and fragrant with the early dew;
Sweet sung the birds in that delicious hour,
And the cool gale of morning, as it blew,
Not yet subdued by day's increasing power,
Ruffling the surface of the silvery stream,
Swept o'er the moisten'd sand, and raised no shower.
Telling their tale of love,
The boatman thought they lay
At that lone hour, and who so blest as they?

2.
But now the Sun in heaven is high;
The little songsters of the sky
Sit silent in the sultry hour;
They pant and palpitate with heat;
Their bills are open languidly
To catch the passing air;
They hear it not, they feel it not,
It murmurs not, it moves not.
The boatman, as he looks to land,
Admires what men so mad to linger there,
For yonder Cocoa's shade behind them falls,
A single spot upon the burning sand.

3.
There all the morning was Ladurlad laid
Silent and motionless, like one at ease;
There motionless upon her father's knees
Reclined the silent maid.

The man was still, pondering with steady mind,
As if it were another's Curse,
His own portentous lot;
Scanning it o'er and o'er in busy thought,
As though it were a last night's tale of woe,
Before the cottage door
By some old baldam sung,
While young and old, assembled round,
Listened, as if by witchery bound,
In fearful pleasure to her wondrous tongue.

4.
Musing so long he lay; that all things seem
Unreal to his sense, even like a dream,
A monstrous dream of things which could not be.
That beating, burning brow,—why it was now
The height of noon, and he was lying there
In the broad sun, all bare!
What if he felt no wind! the air was still.
That was the general will
Of Nature, not his own peculiar doom;
Yon rows of rice erect and silent stand,
The shadow of the Cocoa's highest plume
Is steady on the sand.

5.
Is it indeed a dream? He rose to try;
Impatient to the water side he went,
And down he bent,
And in the stream he plunged his lusty arm
To break the visionary charm
With fearful eye and fearful heart,
His daughter watch'd the event;
She saw the start and shudder,
She heard the in-drawn groan,
For the Water knew Kehama's charm;
The Water shrunk before his arm;
His dry hand moved about unmoisten'd there;
As easily might that dry hand avail
To stop the passing gale,
Or grasp the impassive air.
He is Almighty then!
Exclaim'd the wretched man in his despair:
Air knows him; Water knows him; Sleep
His dreadful word will keep;
Even in the grave there is no rest for me,
Cut off from that last hope,—the wretch's joy;
And Vesshnoo hath no power to save,
Nor Sceva to destroy.

6.
Oh! wrong not them! quoth Kailyal;
Wrong not the Heavenly Powers!
Our hope is all in them. They are not blind!
And lighter wrongs than ours,
And lighter crimes than his,
Have drawn the Incarnate down among mankind
Already have the Immortals heard our cries,
And in the mercy of their righteousness
Behold us in the hour of our distress!
She spake with streaming eyes,
Where pious love and ardent feeling beam.
And turning to the Image threw
Her grateful arms around it,—It was thou!
Who savedst me from the stream!
My Marriataly, it was thou!
I had not else been here
To share my Father's Curse,
To suffer now,—and yet to thank thee thus!

7.
Here then, the maiden cried, dear Father, here
Raise our own Goddess, our divine Preserver!
The righty of the earth despise her rites;
She loves the poor who serve her.
Set up her Image here;
With heart and voice the guardian Goddess bless;
For jealousy would she resent
Neglect and thanklessness;—
Set up her Image here,
And bless her for her aid with tongue and soul sincere.

8.
So saying, on her knees the maid
Began the pious toil.
Soon their joint labor scoops the easy soil;
They raise the Image up with reverent hand,
And round its rooted base they heap the sand.
O Thou whom we adore
O Marriataly, thee do I implore,
The virgin cried; my Goddess, pardon thou
The unwilling wrong, that I no more,
With dance and song,
Can do thy daily service, as of yore;
The flowers which last I wreathed around thy brow,
Are withering there; and never now
Shall I at eve adore thee,
And swimming round, with arms outspread,
Poise the full pitcher on my head,
In dexterous dance before thee,
While underneath the reedy shed, at rest
My father sat the evening rites to view,
And blest thy name, and blest
His daughter too.

9.
Then heaving from her heart a heavy sigh,
O Goddess! from that happy home, cried she;
The Almighty Man hath forced us!
And homeward with the thought unconsciously
She turn'd her dizzy eye. —But there on high,
With many a dome, and pinnacle, and spire,
The summit of the Golden Palaces
Blazed in the dark blue sky, aloft, like fire.
Father, away! she cried, away!
Why linger we so nigh?
For not to him hath Nature given
The thousand eyes of Deity,
Always and everywhere, with open sight,
To persecute our flight!
Away — away! she said,
And took her father’s hand, and like a child
He followed where she led.

V.

THE SEPARATION.

1.
Evening comes on: arising from the stream,
Homeward the tall flamingo wings his flight;
And where he sails athwart the setting beam,
His scarlet plumage glows with deeper light.
The watchman, at the wish’d approach of night,
Gladly forsakes the field, where he all day,
To scare the winged plunderers from their prey,
With shout and sling, on yonder clay-built height,
Hath borne the sultry ray.
Hark! at the Golden Palaces
The Brahm strikes the hour.
For leagues and leagues around, the brazen sound
Rolls through the stillness of departing day,
Like thunder far away.

2.
Behold them wandering on their hopeless way,
Unknowing where they stray,
Yet sure where’er they stop to find no rest.
The evening gale is blowing;
It plays among the trees;
Like plumes upon a warrior’s crest,
They see you cocoa tossing to the breeze.
Ladurlad views them with impatient mind;
Impatiently he hears
The gale of evening blowing,
The sound of waters flowing,
As if all sights and sounds combined
To mock his irremediable woe;
For not for him the blessed waters flow;
For not for him the gales of evening blow;
A fire is in his heart and brain,
And Nature hath no healing for his pain.

3.
The Moon is up, still pale
Amid the lingering light.
A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky,
Sails slowly o’er the vale,
And darkens round, and closes in the night.
No hospitable house is nigh,
No traveller’s home, the wanderers to invite;
Forlorn, and with long watching overworn,
The wretched father and the wretched child
Lie down amid the wild.

4.
Before them, full in sight,
A white flag, flapping to the winds of night.
Marks where the tiger seized a human prey.
Far, far away, with natural dread
Slumbering the perilous spot,
At other times abhorrent had they fled;
But now they heed it not.
Nothing they care; the boding death flag now
In vain for them may gleam and flutter there.
Despair and agony in him
Prevent all other thought;
And Kadiylah hath no heart or sense for aught,
Save her dear father’s strange and miserable lot.

5.
There, in the woodland shade,
Upon the lap of that unhappy maid,
His head Ladurlad laid,
And never word he spake;
Nor heaved he one complaining sigh,
Nor groaned he with his misery,
But silently, for her dear sake,
Endured the raging pain.
And now the moon was hid on high;
No stars were shimmering in the sky;
She could not see her father’s eye,
How red with burning agony:
Perhaps he may be cooler now,
She hoped, and long’d to touch his brow
With gentle hand, yet did not dare
To lay the painful pressure there.
Now forward from the tree she bent,
And anxiously her head she bent,
And listened to his breath.
Ladurlad’s breath was short and quick,
Yet regular it came,
And like the shudder of the sick,
In pantings still the same.
Oh, if he sleeps! — her lips unclose,
Intently listening to the sound,
That equal sound so like repose.
Still quietly the sufferer lies,
Bearing his torment now with resolute will;
He neither moves, nor groans, nor sighs.
Both satiate cruelty bestow
This little respite to his woe,
She thought, or are there Gods who look below?

6.
Perchance, thought Kadiylah, willingly deceived
Our Marriatalah hath his pain relieved,
And she hath bade the blessed Sleep assuage
His agony, despite the Rajah’s rage.
That was a hope which fill’d her gushing eyes,
And made her heart in silent yearnings rise,
To bless the power divine in thankfulness.
And yielding to that joyful thought her mind,
Backward the maid her aching head reclined
Against the tree, and to her father’s breath
In fear she hearken’d still with earnest ear.
But soon forgetful fits the effort broke;
In starts of recollection then she woke,
Till now, benignant Nature overcame
The Virgin’s weary and exhausted frame,
Nor able more her painful watch to keep,
She closed her heavy lids, and sunk to sleep.

7.

Vain was her hope! he did not rest from pain;
The Curse was burning in his brain;
Alas! the innocent maiden thought he slept;
But sleep the Rajah's dread commandment kept;
Sleep knew Kehama's Curse.
The dews of night fell round them now;
They never bathed Ladurbad's brow;
They knew Kehama's Curse.
The night-wind is abroad;
Aloft it moves among the stirring trees;
He only heard the breeze,—
No healing aid to him it brought;
It play'd around his head, and touch'd him not;
It knew Kehama's curse.

8.

Listening, Ladurbad lay in his despair,
If Kailyal slept, for wherefore should she share
Her father's wretchedness, which none could cure?
Better alone to suffer; he must bear
The burden of his Curse; but why endure
The unavailing presence of his grief?
She, too, apart from him, might find relief;
For death the Rajah deem'd her, and as thus
Already she his dread revenge had fled,
So might she still escape, and live secure.

Gently he lifts his head,
And Kailyal does not feel;
Gently he rises up,—she slumbers still;
Gently he steals away with silent tread.
Anon she started, for she felt him gone;
She call'd, and through the stillness of the night,
His step was heard in flight.
Mistrustful for a moment of the sound,
She listens; till the step is heard no more;
But then she knows that he indeed is gone,
And with a thrilling shriek she rushes on.
The darkness and the wood impede her speed;
She lifts her voice again—
Ladurbad!—and again, alike in vain,
And with a ponderous cry
Straining its tone to hoarseness;—far away,
Selfish in musing,
He heard the call, and faster did he fly.

She leans against that tree whose jutting bough
Smote her so rudely. Her poor heart,
How audibly it panted,
With sudden stop and start!
Her breath, how short and painfully it came!
Hark! all is still around her,—
And the night so utterly dark,
She opened her eyes, and she closed them,
And the blackness and blank were the same.

'Twas like a dream of horror, and she stood
Half doubting whether all indeed were true.

A Tiger's howl, loud echoing through the wood,
Roused her; the dreadful sound she knew,
And turn'd instinctively to what she fear'd.
Far off the Tiger's hungry howl was heard;
A nearer horror met the maiden's view,
For right before her a dun form appear'd,
A human form in that black night,
Distinctly shaped by its own lurid light,
Such light as the sickly Moon is seen to shed,
Through spell-raised fogs, a bloody, balful red.

That Spectre fix'd his eyes upon her full;
The light which shone in their accursed orbs
Was like a light from Hell;
And it grew deeper, kindling with the view.
She could not turn her sight
From that infernal gaze, which like a spell
Bound her, and held her rooted to the ground.
It paled every power;
Her limbs avail'd her not in that dread hour;
There was no moving them;
Thought, memory, sense were gone;
She heard not now the Tiger's nearer cry;
She thought not on her father now;
Her cold heart's-blood ran back;
Her hand lay senseless on the bough it clasp'd;
Her feet were motionless;
Her fascinated eyes
Like the stone eyeballs of a statue fix'd,
Yet conscious of the sight that blasted them.

The wind is abroad;
It opens the clouds;
Scattered before the gale,
They hurry through the sky,
And the darkness, retiring, rolls over the vale.
The Stars in their beauty come forth on high,
And through the dark blue night
The Moon rides on triumphant, broad and bright.
Distinct and darkening in her light
Appears that Spectre foul;
The moonbeam gives his face and form to sight,
The shape of man,
The living form and face of Arvalan!—
His hands are spread to clasp her.

But at that sight of dread the Maid awoke;
As if a lightning-stroke
Had burst the spell of fear,
Away she broke all frantically, and fled.
There stood a temple near, beside the way,
An open fence of Pollcar, gentle God,
To whom the travellers for protection pray.
With elephantine head and eye severe,
Here stood his image, such as when he seiz'd
And tore the rebel Giant from the ground,
With mighty trunk wreathed round
His impotent bulk, and on his tusks, on high
Impaled upheld him between earth and sky.

Thither the affrighted Maiden sped her flight,
And she hath reach'd the place of sanctuary;
And now within the temple in spite,
Yea, even before the altar, in his sight,
Hath Arvalan, with fleshy arm of might,
Seized her. That instant the insulted God
Caught him aloft, and from his sinnous grasp,
As if from some tort catapult let loose,
Over the forest hurl'd him all abroad.

16.
O'ercome with dread,
She tarried not to see what heavenly Power
Had saved her in that hour:
Breathless and faint she fled.
And now her foot struck on the knotted root
Of a broad mancinel, and there the Maid
Fell senselessly beneath the deadly shade.

VI.

CASYAPA.

1.
Shall this, then, be thy fate, O lovely Maid?
Thus, Kaiylah, must thy sorrows then be ended?
Her face upon the ground,
Her arms at length extended,
There, like a corpse, behold her laid
Beneath the deadly shade.
What if the hungry Tiger, prowling by,
Should sniff his banquet night?
Alas! Death needs not now his ministry;
The baleful houghis hung o'er her,
The poison-dews descend.
What Power will now restore her?
What God will be her friend?

2.
Bright and so beautiful was that fair night,
It might have calm'd the gay amid their mirth,
And given the wretched a delight in tears.
One of the Glendoveres,
The loveliest race of all of heavenly birth,
Hovering with gentle motion o'er the earth,
Amid the moonlight air,
In sportive flights was floating round and round,
Unknowning where his joyous way was tending.
He saw the Maid where motionless she lay,
And stoop'd his flight descending,
And raised her from the ground.
Her heavy eyelids are half closed;
Her cheeks are pale and livid like the dead;
Down hang her loose arms listlessly;
Down hangs her languid head.

3.
With timely pity touch'd for one so fair,
The gentle Glendover
Press'd her, thus pale and senseless, to his breast,
And springs aloft in air with sinewy wings,
And bears the Maiden there,
Where Himakoot, the holy Mount, on high
From mid-earth rising in mid-heaven,
Shines in its glory like the throne of Even.

Soaring with strenuous flight above,
He bears her to the blessed Grove,
Where in his ancient and august abodes,
There dwells old Casypa, the Sire of Gods.

4.
The Father of the Immortals sat,
Where, underneath the Tree of Life,
The Fountains of the Sacred River sprung;
The Father of the Immortals smiled
Benignant on his son.
Knowest thou, he said, my child,
Ereenia, knowest thou whom thou bringest here,
A mortal to the holy atmosphere?

EREENIA.
I found her in the Groves of Earth,
Beneath a poison-tree,
Thus lifeless as thou seest her.
In pity have I brought her to these bowers,
Not erring, Father! by that smile—
By that benignant eye!

CASYAPA.

What if the Maid be sinful? if her ways
Were ways of darkness, and her death pre doom'd
To that black hour of midnight, when the Moon
Hath turn'd her face away,
Unwilling to behold
The unhappy end of guilt?

EREENIA.
Then what a lie, my Sire, were written here,
In these fair characters! and she had died,
Sure proof of purer life and happier doom,
Now in the moonlight, in the eye of Heaven,
If I had left so fair a flower to fade.
But thou,—all knowing as thou art,
Why askest thou of me?
O Father, eldest, holiest, wisest, best,
To whom all things are plain,
Why askest thou of me?

CASYAPA.

Knowest thou Kehama?

EREENIA.

The Almighty Man!
Who knows not him and his tremendous power?
The Tyrant of the Earth,
The Enemy of Heaven!

CASYAPA.

Fearest thou the Rajah?

EREENIA.

He is terrible!

CASYAPA.

Yea, he is terrible! such power hath he,
That hope hath entered Hell.
The Asuras and the spirits of the damn'd
Accalm their Hero; Yamen, with the might
Of Godhead, scarce can quell
The rebel race accurs'd:
Half from their beds of torture they arise,
And half uproot their chains.
Is there not fear in Heaven?
The souls that are in bliss suspend their joy;
The danger hath disturb'd
The calm of Deity,
And Brama fears, and Veshnu turns his face
In doubt toward Sceva's throne.

Ereenia.
I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers,
And at his dreadful penances turn pale.
They clam and wrest from Sceva power so vast,
That even Sceva's self,
The Highest, cannot grant and be secure.

Casyapa.
And darest thou, Ereenia, brave
The Almighty Tyrant's power?

Ereenia.
I brave him, Father! 1?

Casyapa.
Darest thou brave his vengeance? — For, if not,
Take her again to earth,
Cast her before the Tiger in his path,
Or where the death-dew-dropping tree
May work Kehama's will.

Ereenia.
Never!

Casyapa.
Then meet his wrath! for He, even He,
Hath set upon this worm his wanton foot.

Ereenia.
I knew her not, how wretched and how fair,
When here I wafted her — poor Child of Earth,
Shall I forsake thee, seeing thee so fair,
So wretched? O my Father, let the Maid
Dwell in the Sacred Grove!

Casyapa.
That must not be,
For Force and Evil then would enter here;
Ganges, the holy stream which cleanseth sin,
Would flow from hence polluted in its springs,
And they who gasp upon its banks in death,
Feel no salvation. Piety, and Peace,
And Wisdom, these are mine; but not the power
Which could protect her from the Almighty Man;
Nor when the Spirit of dead Arvalan
Should persecute her here to glut his rage,
To heap upon her yet more agony,
And ripen more damnation for himself.

Ereenia.
Dead Arvalan? 9

Casyapa.
All power to him, whereof
The disembodied spirit in its state
Of weakness could be made participant,
Kehama hath assign'd, until his days
Of wandering shall be number'd.

Ereenia.
Look! she drinks
The gale of healing from the blessed Groves.
She stirs, and lo! her hand
Hath touch'd the Holy River in its source,
Who would have shrunk if 'aught impure were nigh

Casyapa.
The Maiden, of a truth, is pure from sin.

5.
The waters of the Holy Spring
About the hand of Kailyal play;
They rise, they sparkle, and they sing,
Leaping where languidly she lay,
As if with that rejoicing stir
The Holy Spring would welcome her.
The Tree of Life, which o'er her spread,
Benignant how'd its sacred head,
And dropp'd its dews of healing;
And her heart-blood, at every breath
Recovering from the strife of death,
Drew in new strength and feeling.
Behold her beautiful in her repose,
A life-bloom reddening now her dark-brown cheek;
And lo! her eyes unclose,
Dark as the depth of Ganges' spring profound,
When night hangs over it;
Bright as the Moon's refulgent beam,
That quivers on its clear up-sparkling stream.

6.
Soon she let fall her lids,
As one who, from a blissful dream
Waking to thoughts of pain,
Fain would return to sleep, and dream again.
Distrustful of the sight,
She moves not; fearing to disturb
The deep and full delight.
In wonder fix'd, opening again her eye
She gazes silently,
Thinking her mortal pilgrimage was past,
That she had reach'd her heavenly home of rest,
And these were Gods before her,
Or spirits of the blest.

7.
Lo! at Ereenia's voice,
A Ship of Heaven comes sailing down the skies.
Where wouldst thou bear her? cries
The ancient Sire of Gods.
Straight to the Sverga, to my lover of bliss,
The Glendover replies,
To Indra's own abodes.
Foe of her foe, were it alone for this
Indra should guard her from his vengeance there;
But if the God forbear,
Unwilling yet the perilous strife to try,
Or shrinking from the dreadful Rajah's might,— Weak as I am, O Father, even I
Stand forth in Sceva's sight.
8.
Trust thou in him whate'er betide,
And stand forth fearlessly!
The Sire of Gods replied:
All that He wills is right; and doubt not thou,
Howe'er our feeble scope of sight
May fail us now,
His righteous will in all things must be done.
My blessing be upon thee, O my son!

VII.

THE SWERGA

1.
Then in the Ship of Heaven, Ereonia laid
The wak'ning, wondering Maid;
The Ship of Heaven, instinct with thought,
Displayed
Its living sail, and glides along the sky
On either side, in wavey tide;
The clouds of morn along its path divide;
The Winds, who swept in wild career on high,
Before its presence check their charmed course;
The Winds, that lacerate the ship's course,
Around the living Bark it enamor'd play,
Swell underneath the sail, and sing before its way.

2.
That Bark, in shape, was like the furrow'd shell
Wherein the Sea-Nymphs to their parent-King,
On festal day, their duteous offerings bring.
Its hue? — Go watch the last green light
Ere Evening yields the western sky to Night;
Or fix upon the Sun thy strenuous sight
Till thou hast reach'd its orb of chrysolite.
The sail, from end to end display'd,
Dent, like a rainbow, o'er the Maid.
An Angel's head, with visual eye,
Through trackless space, directs its chosen way;
Nor aid of wing, nor foot, nor fin,
Requires to voyage o'er the obedient sky.
Smooth as the swan, when not a breeze at even
Disturbs the surface of the silver stream,
Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven.

3.
Recumbent there the Maiden glides along
On her aerial way.
How swift she feels not, though the swiftest wind
Had flagged in flight behind.
Motionless as a sleeping babe she lay,
And all serene in mind,
Feeling no fear; for that celestial air
With such new life and joyance fill'd her heart,
Fear could not enter there;
For sure she deem'd her mortal part was o'er,
And she was sailing to the heavenly shore;
And that angelic form, who moved beside,
Was some good Spirit sent to be her guide.

4.
Daughter of Earth! therein thou dost'st aight,
And never yet did form more beautiful,
In dreams of night descending from on high,
Bless the religious Virgin's gifted sight,
Nor, like a vision of delight,
Rise on the raptured Poet's inward eye.
Of human form divine was he,
The immortal Youth of Heaven who floated by,
Even such as that divinest form shall be
In those blest stages of our onward race;
When no infirmity,
Low thought, nor base desire, nor wasting care,
Deface the semblance of our heavenly sire.

5.
The wings of Eagle or of Cherubin
Had seem'd unworthy him;
Angelic power, and dignity, and grace,
Wore in his glorious penmons; from the neck
Down to the ankle reach'd their swelling web,
Richer than robes of Tyrian dye, that deck
Imperial Majesty;
Their color like the winter's moonless sky,
When all the stars of midnight's canopy
Shine forth; or like the azure deep at noon,
Reflecting back to heaven a brighter blue.
Such was their tint when closed; but when outspread,
The permeating light
Shed through their substance thin a varying hue;
Now bright as when the rose,
Beautous as fragrant, gives to scent and sight
A like delight; now like the juice that flows
From Douro's generous vine;
Or ruby when with deepest red it glows;
Or as the morning clouds refultent shine,
When, at forthcoming of the Lord of Day,
The Orient, like a shrine,
Kindles as it receives the rising ray,
And heralding his way,
Proclaims the presence of the Power divine.

6.
Thus glorious were the wings
Of that celestial Spirit, as he went
Disporting through his native element.
Nor these alone
The gorgeous beauties that they gave to view;
Through the broad membrane branched a plant bone,
Spreading like fibres from their parent stem;
Its veins like interwoven silver shone,
Or as the cluster hue
Of pearls that grace some Sultan's diadem.
Now with slow stroke and strong behold him
Smite
The buoyant air, and now in gentler flight,
On motionless wing expanded, shoot along.

7.
Through air and sunshine sails the Ship of Heaven;
Far, far beneath them lies
The gross and heavy atmosphere of earth;
And with the Swerga gales,
The Maid of mortal birth
At every breath a new delight inhales.
And now toward its port the Ship of Heaven,
Swift as a falling meteor, shapes its flight,
Yet gently as the deus of night that gen,
And do not bend the hare-bell's slenderest stem.
Daughter of Earth, Ereucia cried, alight;
This is thy place of rest, the Swerga this;
Lo! here my Bower of Bliss!

2.
He furl'd his azure wings, which round him fold
Graceful as robes of Grecian chief of old.
The happy Kailyal knew not where to gaze;
Her eyes around in joyful wonder roam,
Now turn'd upon the lovely Glendover,
Now on his heavenly home.

ERENIA.
Here, Maiden, rest in peace,
And I will guard thee, feeble as I am.
The Almighty Rajah shall not harm thee here,
While Indra keeps his throne.

KAILYAL.
Alas, thou fearest him!
Immortal as thou art, thou fearest him!
I thought that death had saved me from his power;
Not even the dead are safe.

ERENIA.
Long years of life and happiness,
O Child of Earth, be thine!
From death I say'd thee, and from all thy foes
Will save thee, while the Swerga is secure.

KAILYAL.
Not me alone, O gentle Deveta!
I have a Father suffering upon earth,
A persecuted, wretched, poor, good man,
For whose strange misery
There is no human help;
And none but I dare comfort him
Beneath Kehama's Curse;
O gentle Deveta, protect him too!

ERENIA.
Come, plead thyself to Indra! Words like thine
May win their purpose, rouse his slumbering heart,
And make him yet put forth his arm to wield
The thunder, while the thunder is his own.

3.
Then to the Garden of the Deity
Ereucia led the Maid.
In the mid garden tower'd a giant Tree;
Rock-rooted on a mountain-top, it grew,
Rear'd its unrival'd head on high,
And stretch'd a thousand branches o'er the sky,
Drinking with all its leaves celestial dew.
Lo! where from these, as from a living well,
A thousand torrents flow!
For still in one perpetual shower,
Like diamond drops, ethereal waters fell
From every leaf of all its ample bower.
Rolling adown the steep
From that aerial height,
Through the deep shade of aromatic trees,
Half seen, the catareacts shoot their gleams of light,
And pour upon the breeze
Their thousand voices; far away the roar,
In modulations of delightful sound,
Half heard and ever varying, floats around.
Below, an ample Lake expanded lies,
Blue as the o'er-arching skies;
Forth issuing from that lovely Lake
A thousand rivers water Paradise.
Full to the brim, yet never overflowing,
They cool the amorous gales, which, ever blowing,
O'er their melodious surface love to strays;
Then, winging back their way,
Their vapors to the parent Tree repay;
And ending thus where they began,
And feeding thus the source from whence they came,
The eternal rivers of the Swerga ran,
Forever renovate, yet still the same.

10.
On that ethereal lake, whose waters lie
Blue and transpucious, like another sky,
The Elements had rear'd their King's abode.
A strong, controlling power their strife suspended.
And there their hostile essences they blended,
To form a Palace worthy of the God.
Built on the Lake, the waters were its floor;
And here its walls were water arch'd with fire;
And here were fire with water vaulted o'er;
And spires and pinnacles of fire
Round watery cupolas aspire,
And domes of rainbow rest on fiery towers,
And roofs of flame are turcuted around
With cloud, and shafts of cloud with flame are bound.
Here, too, the Elements forever vear,
Ranging around with endless interchanging;
Pursued in love, and so in love pursuing;
In endless revolutions here they roll;
Forever their mysterious work renewing;
The parts all shifting, still unchanged the whole
Even we on earth at intervals desery
Gleams of the glory, streaks of flowing light,
Openings of heaven, and streams that flash at night,
In fitful splendor, through the northern sky.

11.
Impatient of delay, Ereucia caught
The Maid aloft, and spread his wings abroad,
And bore her to the presence of the God.
There Indra sat upon his throne reclined,
Where Devetas adore him;
The lute of Nared, warbling on the wind,
All tones of magic harmony combined
To soothe his troubled mind,
While the dark-eyed Apsaras danced before him.
In vain the God-musician play'd,
In vain the dark-eyed nymphs of Heaven say'd
The Curse of Kehama. vii.

To charm him with their beauties in the dance;
And when he saw the mortal Maid appear,
Led by the heroic Glendoveer,
A deeper trouble fill’d his countenance.
What hast thou done, Erexenia, said the God,
Bringing a mortal here?
And while he spake, his eye was on the Maid;
The look he gave was solemn, not severe;
No hope to Kailyal it convey’d,
And yet it struck no fear;
There was a sad displeasure in his air,
But pity too was there.

EREKENA.
Hear me, O Indra! On the lower earth
I found this child of man, by what mishap
I know not, lying in the lap of death.
Aloft I bore her to our Father’s grove,
Not having other thought, than when the gates
Of bliss had heal’d her, upon earth again
To leave its lovely daughter. Other thoughts
Arose, when Casyapa declared her fate;
For she is one who groans beneath the power
Of the dread Rajah, terrible alike
To men and Gods. His son, dead Arvalan,
Arm’d with a portion, Indra, of thy power,
Already wrested from thee, persecutes
The Maid, the helpless one, the innocent.
What, then, behoved me but to waft her here
To my own Bower of Bliss? what other choice?
The spirit of foul Arvalan not yet
Hath power to enter here; here thou art yet
Supreme, and yet the Swarga is thine own.

INDRA.
No child of man, Erexenia, in the Bowers
Of Bliss may sojourn, till he hath put off
His mortal part; for on mortality
Time, and Infirnity, and Death attend,
Close followers they, and in their mournful train
Sorrow, and Pain, and Mutability.
Did these find entrance here, we should behold
Our joys, like earthly summers, pass away.
Those joys perchance may pass; a stronger hand
May wrest my sceptre, and unparadise
The Swarga;—but, Erexenia, if we fall,
Let it be Fate’s own arm that casts us down;
We will not rashly hasten and provoke
The blow, nor bring ourselves the ruin on.

EREKENA.
Fear courts the blow, Fear brings the ruin on.
Needs must the chariot-wheels of Destiny
Crush him who throws himself before their track,
Patient and prostrate.

INDRA.
All may yet be well.
Who knows but Veesnoo will descend and save,
Once more incarnate?
EREKENA.
Look not there for help,
Nor build on unsubstantial hope thy trust.
Our Father Casyapa hath said he turns
His doubtful eye to Sceva, even as thou
Dost look to him for aid. But thine own strength
Should for thine own salvation be put forth;
Then might the higher Powers approving see
And bless the brave resolve,—Oh that my arm
Could wield yeu lightnings which play idle there,
In inoffensive radiance, round thy head!
The Swarga should not need a champion now,
Nor Earth implore deliverance still in vain!

INDRA.
Thinkest thou I want the will? rash Son of Heaven;
What if my arm be feeble as thine own
Against the dread Kehama? He went on Conquering in irresistible career,
Till his triumphant car had measured o’er
The insufficient earth, and all the Kings
Of men received his yoke; then had he won
His will, to ride upon their necks elate,
And crown his conquests with the sacrifice
That should, to men and gods, proclaim him Lord
And Sovereign Master of the vassal World,
Sole Rajah, the Omnipotent below.
The steam of that portentous sacrifice
Arose to Heaven. Then was the hour to strike;
Then, in the consummation of his pride,
His height of glory, then the thunderbolt
Should have gone forth, and hurl’d him from his throne
Down to the fiery floor of Padalon,
To everlasting burnings, agony
Eternal, and remorse which knows no end.
That hour went by: grown impious in success,
By prayer and penances he wrested now
Such power from Fate, that soon, if Sceva turn not
His eyes on earth, and no Avatar save,
Soon will he seize the Swarga for his own,
Roll on through Padalon his chariot wheels,
Tear up the adamantine bolts which lock
The accurs’d Asuras to its burning floor,
And force the drink of Immortality
From Yamen’s charge. Vain were it now to strive;
My thunder cannot pierce the sphere of power
Wherewith, as with a girdle, he is bound.

KAILYAL.
Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta!
Take me again to earth! This is no place
Of rest for me!—My Father still must bear
His Curse,—he shall not bear it all alone;
Take me to earth, that I may follow him!
I do not fear the Almighty Man! the Gods
Are feeble here; but there are higher Powers,
Who will not turn their eyes from wrongs like ours;
Take me to earth, O gentle Deveta!—

12.
Saying thus, she knelt, and to his knees she clung,
And bow’d her head, in tears and silence praying.
Rising anon, around his neck she flung
Her arms, and there with folded hands she hung,
And fixing on the guardian Glendoveer
Her eyes, more eloquent than Angel’s tongue,
Again she cried, There is no comfort here!
I must be wit's my Father in his pain.
Take me to earth, O Deveta, again!

13.
Indra with admiration heard the Maid.
O Child of Earth, he cried,
Already in thy spirit thus divine,
Whatever weal or woe betide,
Be that high sense of duty still thy guide,
And all good Powers will aid a soul like thine.
Then turning to Erecnia, thus he said—
Take her where Ganges hath its second birth,
Below our sphere, and yet above the earth;
There may Ladurlad rest beyond the power
Of the dread Rajah, till the fated hour.

VIII.
THE SACRIFICE.

Dost thou tremble, O Indra, O God of the sky,
Why slumber those thunders of thine?
Dost thou tremble on high,—
Witt thou tamely the Swarga resign,—
Art thou smitten, O Indra, with dread?
Or seest thou not, seest thou not, Monarch divine,
How many a day to Seeva's shrine
Kehama his victim hath led?
Nine and ninety days are fled,
Nine and ninety deeds have bled;
One more, the rite will be complete—
One victim more, and this the dreadful day,
Then will the impious Rajah seize thy seat,
And wrest the thunder-sceptre from thy sway.
Along the mead the hallow'd Steed
Yet bends at liberty his way;
At noon his consummating blood will flow.
O day of woe! above, below,
That blood confirms the Almighty Tyrant's reign!
Thou tremblest, O Indra, O God of the Sky,
Thy thunder is vain;
Thou tremblest on high for thy power!
But where is Veeshnoo at this hour?
But where is Seeva's eye?
Is the Destroyer blind?
Is the Preserver careless for mankind?

2.
Along the mead the hallow'd Steed
Still wanders where'er he will,
O'er hill, or dale, or plain;
No human hand hath trick'd that man
From which he shakes the morning dew;
His mouth has never felt the rein;
His lips have never froth'd the chain;
For pure of blemish and of stain,
His neck unbrokèd to mortal yoke,
Like Nature free the Steed must be,
Fit offering for the Immortals he.
A year and day the Steed must stray
Wherever chance may guide his way,
Before he fall at Seeva's shrine;
The year and day have pass'd away,
Nor touch of man hath marr'd the rite divine
And now at noon the Steed must bleed,
The perfect rite to-day must force the meed
Which Fate reluctant shudders to bestow;
Then must the Swarga-God
Yield to the Tyrant of the World below;
Then must the Devetas obey
The Rajah's rod, and groan beneath his hateful sway.

3.
The Sun rides high; the hour is nigh;
The multitude, who long
Lest aught should mar the rite,
In circle wide on every side,
Have kept the Steed in sight,
Contract their circle now, and drive him on.
Drawn in long files before the Temple-court,
The Rajah's archers flank an ample space;
Here, moving onward still, they drive him near,
Then, opening, give him way to enter here.

4.
Behold him; how he starts and flings his head!
On either side in glittering order spread,
The archers ranged in narrowing lines appear;
The multitude behind close up the rear
With moon-like bend, and silently await
The awful end,
The rite that shall from Indra wrest his power.
In front, with far-stretched walls, and many a tower,
Turret, and dome, and pinnacle clate,
The huge Pagoda seems to load the land:
And there before the gate
The Bramin band expectant stand;
The axe is ready for Kehama's hand.

5.
Hark! at the Golden Palaces
The Bramin strikes the time!
One, two, three, four, a thrice-told chime,
And then again, one, two.
The bowl that in its vessel floats, anew
Must fill and sink again;
Then will the final stroke be due,
The Sun rides high, the noon is nigh,
And silently, as if spell-bound,
The multitude expect the sound.

6.
Lo! how the Steed, with sudden start,
Turns his quick head to every part!
Long files of men on every side appear.
The sight might well his heart aflight;
And yet the silence that is here
Inspires a stranger fear;
For not a murmur, not a sound
Of breath or motion rises round;
No stir is heard in all that mighty crowd;
He neighs, and from the temple-wall
The voice resounds loud,
Loud and distinct, as from a hill
Across a lonely vale, when all is still.
7. Within the temple, on his golden throne
Reclined, Kehama lies,
Watching with steady eyes
The perfumed light that, burning bright,
Metes out the passing hours.
On either hand his counsels stand,
Freshening with fans of peacock-plumes the air,
Which, redolent of all rich gums and flowers,
Seems, overcharged with sweets, to stagnate there.

Lo! the time-taper's flame, ascending slow,
Creeps up its coil toward the fated line;
Kehama rises and goes forth,
And from the altar, ready where it lies,
He takes the axe of sacrifice.

8. That instant, from the crowd, with sudden shout,
A Man sprang out
To lay upon the Steed his hand profane.
A thousand archers, with unerring eye,
At once let fly,
And with their hurling arrows fill the sky.
In vain they fall upon him fast as rain;
He bears a charmed life, which may defy
All weapons, — and the darts that whizz around,
As from an adamantine panoply
Repell'd, fall idly to the ground.
Kehama clasp'd his hands in agony,
And saw him grasp the hollow'd course'n's mane,
Spring up with sudden bound,
And with a frantic cry,
And madman's gesture, gallop round and round.

9. They seize, they drag him to the Rajah's feet.
What doom will now be his,— what vengeance meet?
Will he, who knows no mercy, now require?
The obsequious guards around, with blood-bound eye,
Look for the word, in slow-consuming fire,
By piecemeal death, to make the wretch expire,
Or hoist his living carcass, hook'd on high,
To feed the fowls and insects of the sky;
Or if aught worse inventive cruelty
To that remorseless heart of royalty
Might prompt, accursed instruments they stand
To work the wicked will with wicked hand.
Far other thoughts were in the multitude;
Pity, and human feelings, held them still;
And stifled sighs and grunts suppressed were there,
And many a secret curse and inward prayer
Call'd on the insulted Gods to save mankind.
Expecting some new crime, in fear they stood,
Some horror which would make the natural blood
Start, with cold shudderings thrill the sinking heart,
Whiten the lip, and make the abhorrent eye
Roll back and close, press'd in for agony.

10. How then fared he for whom the mighty crowd
Suffer'd in spirit thus,— how then fared he?
A ghastly smile was on his lip, his eye
Glared with a ghastly hope, as he drew nigh,
And cried aloud, Yes, Rajah! it is I!
And wilt thou kill me now?
The countenance of the Almighty Man
Fell when he knew Ladurlad, and his bow
Was clouded with despite, as one ashamed.
That wretch again! indignant he exclaim'd,
And smote his forehead, and stood silently
Awhile in wrath: then, with ferocious smile,
And eyes which seem'd to darken his dark cheek,
Let him go free! he cried; he hath his Curse;
And vengeance upon him can wreak no worse —
But ye who did not stop him— tremble ye!

11. He bade the archers pile their weapons there:
No manly courage fill'd the slavish band,
No sweetening vengeance roused a brave despair.
He call'd his horsemen then, and gave command
To hem the offenders in, and hew them down.
Ten thousand cimeters, at once uprear'd,
Flash up, like waters sparkling to the sun;
A second time the fatal brands appear'd
Lifted aloft,— they glitter'd then no more;
Their light was gone, their splendor quench'd in gore.

At noon the massacre begun,
And night closed in before the work of death was done.

IX.
THE HOME-SCENE.

1. The steam of slaughter from that place of blood
Spread o'er the tainted sky.
Vultures, for whom the Rajah's tyranny
So oft had furnish'd food, from far and nigh
Sped to the lure: aloft, with joyful cry,
Wheeled around, they hover'd overhead;
Or, on the temple perch'd with greedy eye,
Impatient watch'd the dead.
Far off the Tigers, in the imnest wood,
Heard the death shriek, and sniff'd the scent of blood;
They rose, and through the covert went their way,
Couch'd at the forest edge, and waited for their prey.

2. He who had sought for death went wandering on;
The hope which had inspired his heart was gone;
Yet a wild joyance still inflamed his face,
A smile of vengeance, a triumphant glow.
Where goes he?— Whither should Ladurlad go!
Unwittingly the wretch's footsteps trace
Their wonted path toward his dwelling-place;
And wandering on, unknowing where,
He starts like one surprised at finding he is there.

3. Behold his lovely home,
By yonder broad-bough'd plane o'ershaded:
There Marriataly's Image stands,
And there the garland twned by Kailyal's hands
Around its brow hath faded.
The peacocks, at their master's sight,
Quick from the leafy thatch alight,
And hurry round, and search the ground,
And veer their glancing necks from side to side
Expecting from his hand
Their daily dote which erst the Maid supplied,
Now all too long denied.

4.
But, as he gazed around,
How strange did all accusation's sights appear!
How differently did each familiar sound
Assail his alter'd ear!
Here stood the marriage bower,
Rear'd in that happy hour
When he, with festal joy and youthful pride,
Had brought Yedillian home, his beauteous bride.
Leaves not its own, and many a borrow'd flower,
Had then bedeck'd it, withering ere the night;
But who he look'd from that auspicious day
For years of long delight,
And would not see the marriage bower decay,
There planted and nurs'd up, with daily care,
The sweetest herbs that scent the ambient air,
And train'd them round to live and flourish there.
Nor when dread Yamen's will
Had call'd Yedillian from his arms away,
Ceased he to tend the marriage-bower, but still,
Sorrowing, had dress'd it like a pious rite
Due to the monument of past delight.

5.
He took his wonted seat before the door,—
Even as of yore,
When he was wont to view, with placid eyes,
His daughter at her evening sacrifice.
Here were the flowers which she so carefully
Did love to rear for Marriataly's brow;
Neglected now,
Their heavy heads were drooping, over-blow'n;
All else appear'd the same as heretofore,
All—save himself alone;
How happy them,—and now a wretch for ever-more!

6.
The market-flag, which, hoisted high,
From far and nigh,
Above yon cocoa grove is seen,
Hangs motionless amid the sultry sky.
Loud sounds the village drum; a happy crowd
Is there; Ladurlad hears their distant voices,
But with their joy no more his heart rejoices;
And how their old companion now may fare
Little they know, and less they care;
The torment he is doom'd to bear
Was but to them the wonder of a day,
A burden of sad thoughts soon put away.

7.
They knew not that the wretched man was near;
And yet it seem'd, to his discompter'd ear,
As if they wrong'd him with their merriment.
Resentfully he turn'd away his eyes,
Yet turn'd them but to find
Sights that enraged his mind
With envious grief more wild and overpowering.
The tank which fed his fields was there, and there
The large-leaved lotus on the waters flowering.
There, from the intolerable heat
The buffaloes retreat;
Only their nostrils raised to meet the air,
Amid the sheltering element they rest.
Impatient of the sight, he closed his eyes,
And bow'd his burning head, and in despair
Calling on Indra,—Thunder-God! he said,
Thou owest to me alone this day thy throne;
Be grateful, and in mercy strike me dead.

8.
Despair had roused him to that hopeless prayer;
Yet thinking on the heavenly Powers, his mind
Drew comfort; and he rose and gather'd flowers,
And twined a crown for Marriataly's brow;
And taking then her wither'd garland down,
Replaced it with the blooming coronal.
Not for myself, the unhappy Father cried,
Not for myself, O Mighty One! I pray,
Accursed as I am beyond thy aid!
But, oh! be gracious still to that dear Maid
Who crown'd thee with these garlands day by day,
And danced before thee aye at even-tide
In beauty and in pride.
O Marriataly, where'so'er she strayed
Forlorn and wretched, still be thou her guide!

9.
A loud and fiendish laugh replied,
Scolding his prayer. Aloft, as from the air,
The sound of insult came: he look'd, and there
The visage of dead Arvalan came forth,
Only his face amid the clear blue sky,
With long-drawn lips of insolent mockery,
And eyes whose lurid glare
Was like a sulphur fire,
Mingling with darkness ere its flames expire.

10.
Ladurlad knew him well; enraged to see
The cause of all his misery,
He stoop'd and lifted from the ground
A stake, whose fatal point was black with blood;
The same wherewith his hand had dealt the wound,
When Arvalan, in hour with evil fraught,
For violation seized the shrieking Maid.
Thus arm'd, in act again to strike he stood,
And twice with inefficient wrath essay'd
To smite the impassive shade.
The lips of scorn their mockery-laugh renew'd,
And Arvalan put forth a hand, and caught
The sunbeam, and condensing there its light,
Upon Ladurlad turn'd the Burning stream.
Vain cruelty! the stake
Fell in white ashes from his hold, but he Endured no added pain; his agony
Was full, and at the height;
The burning stream of radiance nothing harm'd
him;
A fire was in his heart and brain,
And from all other flame
Kehama's Curse had charmed him.

11.
Anon the Spirit waved a second hand;
Down rush'd the obedient whirlwind from the sky,
Scoop'd up the sand like smoke, and from on high
Slept the hot shower upon Ladurlad's head.
Where'er he turns, the accursed Hand is there;
East, West, and North, and South, on every side
The hand accursed waves in air to guide
The dizzying storm; ears, nostrils, eyes, and mouth
It fills and chokes, and clogging every pore,
Taught him new torments might be yet in store.
Where shall he turn to fly? behold his house
In flames! uprooted lies the marriage-bower,
The Goddess buried by the sandy shower.
Blindly, with staggering step, he reels about,
And still the accursed Hand pursues,
And still the lips of scorn their mockery-laugh renew'd.

12.
What, Arvalan! hast thou so soon forgot
The grasp of Polica? Wilt thou still defy
The righteous Powers of heaven? or know'st thou not
That there are yet superior Powers on high,
Son of the Wicked? — Lo, in rapid flight,
Erezenia hastens from the ethereal height;
Bright is the sword celestial in his hand;
Like lightning in its path afar the sky,
He comes and drives, with angel-arm, the blow.
Oft have the Asuras, in the wars of Heaven,
Felt that keen sword by arm angelic driven,
And fled before it from the fields of light.
 Thrice through the vulnerable shade
The Glendoover impels the grinding blade;
The wicked Shade flies howling from his foe.
So let that Spirit fail,
Fly, and, for impotence of anger, howl,
Writhing with anguish, and his wounds deplore;
Worse punishment hath Arvalan deserved,
And righteous Fate hath heavier doom in store.

13.
Not now the Glendoover pursues his flight;
He bade the Ship of Heaven alight,
And gently there he laid
The astonish'd Father by the happy Maid,
The Maid now shedding tears of deep delight.
Beholding all things with incredible eyes,
Still dizzy with the sand-storm, there he lay,
While, sailing up the skies, the living Bark
Through air and sunshine held its heavenly way.

X.

MOUNT MERU.

1.
Swift through the sky the vessel of the Suras
Sails up the fields of ether like an Angel.

Rich is the freight, O Vessel, that thou bearest!
Beauty and Virtue,
Fatherly cares and filial veneration,
Hearts which are proved and strengthen'd by affliction,
Manly resentment, fortitude, and action,
Womanly goodness;
All with which Nature halloweth her daughters,
Tenderness, truth, and purity, and meekness,
Piety, patience, faith, and resignation,
Love and devotion.
Ship of the Gods, how richly art thou laden!
Proud of the charge, thou voyaged rejoicing;
Clouds float around to honor thee, and Evening
Lingers in heaven.

2.
A Stream descends on Meru Mountain;
None hath seen its secret fountain;
It had its birth, so Sages say,
Upon the memorable day
When Parvati presumed to lay,
In wanton play,
Her hands, too venturesome Goddess, in her mirth,
On Seeca's eyes, the light and life of Earth.
Thereat the heart of the Universe stood still;
The Elements ceased their influences;
The Hours Stopp'd on the eternal round; Motion, and Breath,
Time, Change, and Life, and Death,
In sudden trance oppress'd, forgot their powers.
A moment and the dread eclipse was ended;
But, at the thought of Nature thus suspended,
The sweat on Seeca's forehead stood,
And Ganges thence upon the world descended,
The Holy River, the Redeeming Flood.

3.
None hath seen its secret fountain;
But on the top of Meru Mountain,
Which rises o'er the hills of earth,
In light and clouds, it hath its mortal birth.
Earth seems that pinnacle to rear
Sublime above this worldly sphere,
Its cradle, and its altar, and its throne;
And there the new-born River lies
Outspread beneath its native skies,
As if it there would love to dwell
Alone and unapproachable.
Soon flowing forward, and resign'd
To the will of the Creating Mind,
It springs at once, with sudden leap,
Down from the immeasurable steep.
From rock to rock, with shivering force rebounding,
The mighty cataract rushes; Heaven around,
Like thunder, with the incessant roar resounding,
And Meru's summit shaking with the sound.
Wide spreads the snowy foam, the sparkling spray
Dances aloft; and ever there, at morning,
The earliest sunbeams haste to wing their way,
With rainbow wreaths the holy stream adorning;
And duly the adoring Moon at night
Sheds her white glory there,
And in the watery air
Suspends her halo-crowns of silver light.
4. A mountain-valley in its blessed breast
Receives the stream, which there delights to lie,
Untroubled and at rest,
Beneath the untainted sky.
There, in a lovely lake, it seems to sleep,
And thence, through many a channel dark and deep,
Their secret way the holy Waters wind,
Till, rising underneath the root
Of the Tree of Life on Hemakoot,
Majestic forth they flow to purify mankind.

5. Towards this Lake, above the nether sphere,
The living Bark, with angel eye,
Directs its course along the obedient sky.
Kehama hath not yet dominion here;
And till the dreaded hour,
When Indra by the Rajah shall be driven
Dethroned from Heaven,
Here may Ladurlad rest beyond his power.

6. The living Bark alights; the Glendoover
Then lays Ladurlad by the blessed Lake; —
O happy Sire, and yet more happy Daughter! —
The eternal gales his agony abate,
His daughter's tears are on his cheek,
His hand is in the water;
The innocent man, the man oppress'd, —
Oh joy! — hath found a place of rest
Beyond Kehama's sway; — away.
The Curse extends not here; his pains have past.

7. O happy Sire, and happy Daughter!
Ye on the banks of that celestial water
Your resting-place and sanctuary have found.
What! hath not then their mortal taint defiled
The sacred, solitary ground?
Vain thought! the Holy Valley smiled,
Receiving such a Sire and Child;
Ganges, who seem'd asleep to lie,
Beheld them with benignant eye,
And rippled round melodiously,
And roll'd her little waves, to meet
And welcome their beloved feet.
The gales of Swarga thither fled,
And heavenly odors there were shed
About, below, and overhead;
And Earth, rejoicing in their tread,
Hath built them up a blooming Bower,
Where every amaranthine flower
Its deathless blossom interweaves
With bright and undecaying leaves.

8. Three happy beings are there here —
The Sire, the Maid, the Glendoover.
A fourth approaches, — who is this
That enters in the Bower of Bliss?
No form so fair might painter find
Among the daughters of mankind;
For death her beauties hath refined,
And unto her a form hath given
Framed of the elements of Heaven;
Pure dwelling-place for perfect mind.
She stood and gazed on Sire and Child;
Her tongue not yet had power to speak;
The tears were streaming down her cheek;
And when these tears her sight beguiled,
And still her faltering accents fail'd,
The Spirit, mute and motionless,
Spread out her arms for the caress,
Made still and silent with excess
Of love and painful happiness.

9. The Maid that lovely form survey'd;
Wistful she gazed, and knew not,
But Nature to her heart convey'd
A sudden thrill, a startling thought,
A feeling many a year forgot,
Now like a dream anew recurring;
As if again in every vein
Her mother's milk was stirring,
With straining neck and earnest eye
She stretch'd her hands imploringly,
As if she fain would have her nigh,
Yet fear'd to meet the wish'd embrace,
At once with love and awe oppress'd.
Not so Ladurlad; he could trace,
Though brighten'd with angelic grace,
His own Yedillian's earthly face;
He ran and held her to his breast!
Oh joy above all joys of Heaven,
By Death alone to others given,
This moment hath to him restored
The early-born, the long-deplored.

10. They sin who tell us Love can die.
With life all other passions fly,
All others are but vanity.
In Heaven Ambition cannot dwell,
Nor Avarice in the vaults of Hell;
Earthly these passions of the Earth,
They perish where they have their birth;
But Love is indestructible.
Its holy flame forever burneth;
From Heaven it came, to Heaven returneth;
Too oft on Earth a troubled guest,
At times deceived, at times oppress'd,
It here is tried and purified,
Then hath in Heaven its perfect rest:
It soweth here with toil and care,
But the harvest-time of Love is there.

11. Oh! when a Mother meets on high
The Babe she lost in infancy,
Hath she not then, for pains and fears,
The day of woe, the watchful night,
For all her sorrow, all her tears,
An over-payment of delight?

12. A blessed family is this,
Assembled in the Bower of Bliss!
Strange woe, Ladurlad, hath been thine,
And pangs beyond all human measure,
And thy reward is now divine,
A foretaste of eternal pleasure.
He knew indeed there was a day
When all these joys would pass away,
And he must quit this blest abode,
And, taking up again the spell,
Great beneath the baleful load,
And wander o'er the world again,
Most wretched of the sons of men:
Yet was this brief repose, as when
A traveller in the Arabian sands,
Half fainting on his sultry road,
Hath reach'd the water-place at last;
And resting there beside the well,
Thinks of the perils he has past,
And gazes o'er the unbounded plain,
The plain which must be traversed still,
And drinks,—yet cannot drink his fill;
Then girds his patient loins again.
So to Ladurlad now was given
New strength, and confidence in Heaven,
And hope, and faith invincible.

13.
For often would Erecnia tell
Of what in elder days befell,
When other Tyrants, in their might,
Usur'd dominion o'er the earth;
And Vesshnoo took a human birth,
Deliverer of the Sons of men,
And slew the huge Ermaccasen,
And piecemeal rent, with lion force,
Errenia's accursed corse,
And humbled Baly in his pride;
And when the Giant Ravana
Had borne triumphant from his side
Sita, the earth-born God's beloved bride,
Then from his island-kingdom, laugh'd to scorn
The insulted husband, and his power defied;
How, to revenge the wrong, in wrath he lied,
Bridging the sea before his dreadful way,
And met the hundred-headed foe,
And dealt him the unerring blow;
By Brana's hand the righteous lance was given,
And by that arm immortal driven,
It laid the mighty Tyrant low;
And Earth, and Ocean, and high Heaven,
Rejoiced to see his overthrow.
Oh! doubt not thou, Yeillian cried,
Such fate Kehama will betide;
For there are Gods who look below,—
Sceva, the Avenger, is not blind,
Nor Veeshnoo careless for mankind.

14.
Thus was Ladurlad's soul imbued
With hope and holy fortitude;
And Child and Sire, with pious mind,
Alike resolved, alike resign'd,
Look'd onward to the evil day:
Faith was their comfort, Faith their stay;
They trusted Woe would pass away,
And Tyranny would sink subdued,
And Evil yield to Good.

15. Lovely wert thou, O Flower of Earth!
   Above all flowers of mortal birth;
   But foster'd in this Blissful Bower,
   From day to day, and hour to hour,
   Lovelier grew the lovely flower.
   O blessed, blessed company!
   When men and heavenly spirits greet,
   And they whom Death had sever'd meet,
   And hold again communion sweet;—
   O blessed, blessed company!

16. The Sun, careering round the sky,
   Beheld them with rejoicing eye,
   And bade his willing Charioteer
   Relax his speed as they drew near;
   Around check'd the rainbow reins,
The seven green coursers shook their manes,
   And brighter rays around them threw;
   The Car of Glory in their view
   More radiant, more resplendent grew;
   And Surya, through his veil of light,
   Beheld the Bower, and blest the sight.

17. The Lord of Night, as he sail'd by,
   Stay'd his pearly boat on high;
   And while around the Blissful Bower,
   He bade the softest moonlight flow,
   Linger'd to see that earthy flower,
   Forgetful of his Dragon foe,
   Who, mindful of their ancient feud,
   With open jaws of rage pursu'd.

18. There all good Spirits of the air,
   Suras and Devetas, repair;
   Aloft they love to hover there,
   And view the Flower of mortal birth,
   Here for her innocence and worth,
   Transplanted from the fields of earth;
   And him, who, on the dreadful day
   When Heaven was fill'd with consternation
   And Indra trembled with dismay,
   And for the sounds of joy and mirth,
   Woe was heard and lamentation,
   Defied the Rajah in his pride,
   Though all in Heaven and Earth beside Stood mute in dolorous expectation;
   And, rushing forward in that hour,
   Saved the Swarga from his power.
   Grateful for this they hover nigh,
   And bless that blessed Company.

19. One God alone, with wanton eye,
   Beheld them in their Bower;
   O ye, he cried, who have defied
   The Rajah, will ye mock my power?
   'Twas Camdeo riding on his lory,
   'Twas the immortal Youth of Love;
   If men below and Gods above,
   Subject alike, quest he, have felt these darts,
   Shall ye alone, of all in story,
Boast impenetrable hearts?
Hover here, my gentle lory,
Gently hover, while I see
To whom hath Fate decreed the glory,
To the Glendoveer or me.

20.
Then, in the dewy evening sky,
The bird of gorgeous plumery
Poised his wings, and hover'd nigh.
It chanced at that delightful hour
Kailyal sat before the Bower,
On the green bank with amaranth sweet,
Where Ganges warbled at her feet.
Ereenia there, before the Maid,
His sails of ocean blue display'd;
And sportive in her sight
Moved slowly o'er the lake with gliding flight;
Anon, with sudden stroke and strong,
In rapid course career'd, swept along;
Now shooting downward from his heavenly height,
Plung'd in the deep below,
Then rising, soar'd again,
And shook the sparkling waters off like rain,
And hovering o'er the silver surface hung,
At him young Camdeo bent the bow;
With living bees the bow was strung,
The fatal bow of sugar-cane,
And flowers which would inflame the heart
With their petels barb'd the dart.

21.
The shaft, unerringly address'd,
Unerring flew, and smote Ereenia's breast.
Ah, Wanton! cried the Glendoveer,
Go aim at idler hearts;
Thy skill is baffled here!
A deeper love I bear that Maid divine,
A love that springeth from a higher will,
A holier power than thine!

22.
A second shaft, while thus Ereenia cried,
Had Camdeo aim'd at Kailyal's side;
But, lo! the Bees which strung his bow
Broke off, and took their flight.
To that sweet Flower of earth they wing their way,
Around her raven tresses play,
And buzz aboue her with delight,
As if with that melodious sound
They strove to pay their willing duty
To mortal purity and beauty.

23.
Ah! Wanton! cried the Glendoveer,
No power hast thou for mischief here!
Choose thou some idler breast,
For these are proof, by nobler thoughts possess'd.
Go, to thy plains of Matra go,
And string again thy broken bow!

21.
Rightly Ereenia spake; and ill had thoughts
Of earthly love beseeching the sanctuary
Where Kailyal had been wafted, that the Soul

Of her dead Mother there might strengthen her,
Feeding her with the milk of heavenly lore,
And influces of Heaven imbue her heart
With hope, and faith, and holy fortitude,
Against the evil day. Here rest a while
In peace, O father! mark'd for misery
Above all sons of men; O daughter! doom'sd
For sufferings and for trials above all
Of women; — yet both flavor'd, both beloved
By all good Powers, rest here a while in peace.

XI.
THE ENCHANTRESS.

1.
When from the sword, by arm angelic driven,
Foul Arvalan fled howling, wild in pain,
His thin, essential spirit, rent and riven
With wounds, united soon and heal'd again;
Backward the accursed turned his eye in flight,
Remindful of revengeful thoughts ever then,
And saw where, gliding through the evening light,
The Ship of Heaven sail'd upward through the sky,
Then, like a meteor, vanish'd from his sight.
Where should he follow? vainly might he try
To trace through trackless air its rapid course;
Nor dared he that angelic arm defy,
Still sore and writhing from its dreadful force.

2.
Should be the lust of vengeance lay aside?
Too long had Arvalan in ill been train'd;
Nurs'd up in power, and tyranny, and pride,
His soul the ignominious thought disdain'd.
Or to his mighty Father should he go,
Complaining of defeature twice sustain'd,
And ask new powers to meet the immortal foe? —
Repulse he fear'd not, but he fear'd rebuke,
And shamed to tell him of his overthrow.
There dwelt a dread Enchantress in a nook
Obscure; old helperate she to him had been,
Lending her aid in many a secret sin;
And there, for counsel, now his way he took.

3.
She was a woman whose unlovely youth,
Even like a canker'd rose which none will call,
Had wither'd on the stalk; her heart was full
Of passions which had found no natural scope,
Feelings which there had grown, but riper'd not,
Desires unsatisfied, abortive hope,
Repinings which provoked vindictive thought:
These restless elements forever wrought,
Fermenting in her with perpetual stir,
And thus, her spirit to all evil moved,
She hated men because they loved not her,
And hated women because they lov'd her.
And thus, in wrath, and hatred, and despair,
She tempted Hell to tempt her, and resign'd
Her body to the Demons of the Air;
Wicked and wanton fiends, who where they will
Wander abroad, still seeking to do ill,
And take whatever vacant form they find,
Carcass of man or beast that life hath left,
Foul instrument for them of fouler mind.
To these the Witch her wretched body gave,
So they would wreak her vengeance on mankind;
She thus at once their mistress and their slave;
And they, to do such service nothing loath,
Obey'd her bidding, slaves and masters both.

4.
So from this cursed intercourse she caught
Contagious power of mischief, and was taught
Such secrets as are damnable to guess.
Is there a child whose little lovely ways
Might win all hearts,—on whom his parents gaze
Till they shed tears of joy and tenderness?
Oh! hide him from that Witch's withering sight!
Oh! hide him from the eye of Lorrinite!
Her look hath crippling in it, and her curse
All plagues which on mortality can light;
Death is his doom if she behold,—or worse,—
Diseases loathsome and incurable,
And inward sufferings that no tongue can tell.

5.
Woe was to him on whom that eye of hate
Was bent; for, certain as the stroke of Fate,
It did its mortal work, nor human arts
Could save the unhappy wretch, her chosen prey;
For gazing, she consumed his vital parts,
Eating his very core of life away.
The wine which from yeon wounded palm on high
Fills yonder gourd, as slowly it distills,
Grows sons at once if Lorrinite pass by.
The deadliest worm from which all creatures fly,
Fled from the deadlier venom of her eye;
The babe unborn, within its mother's womb,
Started and trembled when the Witch came nigh;
And in the silent chambers of the tomb,
Death shudder'd her unloly tread to hear,
And from the dry and mouldering bones did fear
Force a cold sweat, when Lorrinite was near.

6.
Power made her haughty: by ambition fired,
Erelong to mightier mischiefs she aspired.
The Calis, who o'er cities rule unseen,
Each in her own domain a Demon Queen,
And there adored with blood and human life,
They knew her, and in their accurs'd employ
She stirr'd up neighboring states to mortal strife.
Sani, the dreadful God, who rides abroad
Upon the King of the Ravens, to destroy
The offending sons of men, when his four hands
Were weary with their toil, would let her do
His work of vengeance upon guilty lands;
And Lorrinite, at his commandment, knew
When the ripe earthquake should be loosed, and where
To point its course. And in the baneful air
The pregnant seeds of death he bade her sowed,
All deadly plagues and pestilence to brewe.
The Locusts were her army, and their bands,
Where'er she turn'd her skinny finger, flew.
The floods in ruin roll'd at her commands;
And when, in time of drought, the husbandman
Beheld the gathered rain about to fall,
Her breath would drive it to the desert sands,
While in the marshes' parch'd and gaping soil
The rice-roots by the searching Sun were dried;
And in lean groups, assembled at the side
Of the empty tank, the cattle dropp'd and died;
And Famine, at her bidding, wasted wide
The wretched land, till, in the public way,
Promiscuous where the dead and dying lay,
Dogs fed on human bones in the open light of day.

7.
Her secret cell the accused Arvalan,
In quest of vengeance, sought, and thus began:—
Mighty mother! mother wise!
Revenge me on my enemies.

Lorrinite.
Conest thou, son, for aid to me?
Tell me who have injured thee,
Where they are, and who they be;
Of the Earth, or of the Sea,
Or of the aerial company?
Earth, nor Sea, nor Air is free
From the powers who wait on me,
And my tremendous witchery.

Arvalan.
She for whom so ill I sped,
Whom my father deemeth dead,
Lives, for Marritata's aid
From the water saved the Maid.
In hatred I desire her still,
And in revenge would have my will.
A Deveto, with wings of blue,
And sword whose edge even now I rue,
In a Ship of Heaven on high,
Pilots her along the sky.
Where they voyage thou canst tell,
Mistress of the mighty spell.

8.
At this the Witch, through shrivell'd lips and thin
Sent forth a sound half whistle and half hiss.
Two winged Hands came in,
Armless and bodiless,
Bearing a globe of liquid crystal, set
In frame as diamond bright, yet black as jet.
A thousand eyes were quench'd in endless night
To form that magic globe; for Lorrinite
Had, from their sockets, drawn the liquid sight,
And kneaded it, with re-creating skill,
Into this organ of her mighty will.
Look in yonder orb, she cried;
Tell me what is there desceri'd.

9.
Arvalan.
A mountain top, in clouds of light
Enveloped, rises on my sight;
Thence a cataract rushes down,
Hung with many a rainbow crown;
Light and clouds conceal its head;
Below, a silver lake is spread;
Upon its shores a Bower I see
Fit home for blessed company.
See, they come forward,—one, two, three,—
The last a Maiden,—it is she!
The foremost shakes his wings of blue;
'Tis he whose sword even yet I rue;
And in that other one I know
The visage of my deadliest foe.
Mother, let thy magic might
Arm me for the mortal fight;
Helm, and shield, and mail afford,
Proof against his dreaded sword.
Then will I invade their seat;
Then shall vengeance be complete.

10.
LORRINITE.
Spirits, who obey my will,
Hear him, and his wish fulfill!

So spake the mighty Witch, nor further spell
Needed; anon a sound, like smother'd thunder,
Was heard, slow rolling under;
The solid pavement of the cell
Quaked, heaved, and cleft asunder,
And at the feet of Arvalan display'd,
Helmet and mail, and shield and cimeter, were laid.

11.
The Asuras, often put to flight
And scatter'd in the fields of light
By their foes' celestial might,
Forfed this enchanted armor for the fight.
'Mid fires intense did they animate,
In mountain furnaces, the quivering steel,
Till, trembling through each deepening hue,
It settled in a midnight blue;
Last they cast it, to aslave,
In the penial icy lake.
Then they consigned it to the Giant brood;
And while they forged the impenetrable arms,
The Evil Powers, to oversee them, stood,
And there imbued
The work of Giant strength with magic charms.
Foul Arvalan, with joy, survey'd
The crescent sabre's cloudy blade,
With deeper joy the impervious mail,
The shield and helmet of avail.
Soon did he himself array,
And bade his speed him on his way.

12.
Then she led him to the den,
Where her chariot, night and day,
Stood harness'd ready for the way.
Two Dragons, yoked in adamant, convey
The magic car; from either collar sprung
An adamantine rib, which met in air,
O'erarch'd, and cross'd, and bent, diverging there,
And firmly in its are ubope,
Upon their brazen necks, the seat of power.
Arvalan mounts the car, and in his hand
Receives the magic reins from Lorrinite;
The Dragons, long obedient to command,
Their ample sails expand;
Like steeds well-broken to fair lady's hand
They feel the reins of might;
And up the northern sky begin their flight.

13.
Son of the Wicked, doth thy soul delight
To think its hour of vengeance now is nigh?
Lo! where the far-off light
Of Indra's palace flashes on his sight,
And Meru's heavenly summit shines on high,
With clouds of glory bright,
Amid the dark-blue sky.
Already, in his hope, doth he espy,
Himself secure in mail of tenfold charms,
Ereenia writhing from the magic blade.
The Father sent to bear his Curse,—the Maid
Resisting vainly in his impsous arms.

14.
Ah, Sinner! whose anticipating soul
Incurrs the guilt even when the crime is spared!
Joyous toward Meru's summit on he fared,
While the twin Dragons, rising as he guides,
With steady flight, steer northward for the pole.
Anon, with irresistible control,
Force mightier far than his arrests their course;
It wrought as though a Power unseen had caught
Their adamantine yokes to drag them on.
Straight on they bend their way, and now, in vain,
Upward doth Arvalan direct the rein;
The rein of magic might avails no more;
Bootless its strength against that unseen Power,
That, in their mid career,
Hath seized the Chariot and the Charioteer.
With hands resisting, and down-pressing feet
Upon their hold insisting,
He struggles to maintain his difficult seat.
Seeking in vain with that strange Power to vie,
Their doubled speed the affrighted Dragons try.
Forced in a stream from whence was no retreat,
Strong as they are, behold them whirled along,
Headlong, with useless pennons, through the sky.

15.
What Power was that, which, with resistless might,
Foil'd the dread magic thus of Lorrinite?
'Twas all commanding Nature.—They were here
Within the sphere of the adamantine rocks
Which gird Mount Meru round, as far below
That heavenly height where Ganges hath its birth
Involv'd in clouds and light,
So far above its roots of ice and snow.

16.
On—on they roll,—rapt headlong they roll on,—
The lost canoe, less rapidly than this,
Down the precipitous stream is whirl'd along
To the brink of Niagara's dread abyss.
On—on they roll, and now, with shivering shock,
Are dash'd against the rock that girds the Pole.
Down from his shatter'd mail the unhappy Soul
Is dropp'd, —ten thousand thousand fathoms down,—
Till in an ice-riift, 'mid the eternal snow,
Foul Arvalan is stopp’d. There let him howl,
Groan there,—and there, with unavailing mean,
For aid on his Almighty Father call.

17.
All human sounds are lost
Amid those deserts of perpetual frost,
Old Winter’s drear domain,
Beyond the limits of the living World,
Beyond Kehama’s reign.
Of utterance and of motion soon bereft,
Frozen to the ice-rock, there behold him lie,
Only the painful sense of Being left,
A Spirit who must feel, and cannot die,
Bleaching and bare beneath the polar sky.

XII.

THE SACRIFICE COMPLETED.

1.
O ye who, by the Lake
On Meru Mount, partake
The joys which Heaven hath destin’d for the blest,
Swift, swift the moments fly,
The silent hours go by,
And ye must leave your dear abode of rest;
O wretched Man, prepare
Again thy Curse to bear!
Prepare, O wretched Maid, for further woe!

The fatal hour draws near,
When Indra’s heavenly sphere
Must own the Tyrant of the World below.

To-day the hundredth Steed
At Sceva’s shrine must bleed;
The dreadful sacrifice is full to-day;
Nor man nor God hath power,
At this momentous hour,
Again to save the Sverga from his sway.

Fresh woes, O Maid divine,
Fresh trials must be thine:
And what must thou, Ladurlad, yet endure!
But let your hearts be strong,
And rise against all wrong,
For Providence is just, and virtue is secure.

2.
They, little deeming that the fatal day
Was come, beheld, where through the morning sky
A Ship of Heaven drew nigh.
Onward they watch it steer its steady flight;
Till, wondering, they espied
Old Casyapa, the Sire of Gods, alight.

But when Ereneia saw the Sire appear,
At that unwonted and unwelcome sight
His heart received a sudden shock of fear.
Thy presence doth its doleful tidings tell,
O Father! cried the startled Glendoveer!
The dreadful hour is near! I know it well!
Not for less import would the Sire of Gods
Forsake his ancient and august abodes.

3.
Even so, serene the immortal Sire replies;
Soon like an earthquake will ye feel the blow
Which consummates the mighty sacrifice:
And this World, and its Heaven, and all therein,
Are then Kehama’s. To the second ring
Of these seven Spheres, the Swarga King,
Even now, prepares for flight,
Beyond the circle of the conquer’d world,
Beyond the Rajah’s might.

Ocean, that clips this inmost of the Spheres,
And girds it round with everlasting roar,
Set like a gem appears
Within that bending shore.
Thither fly all the Sons of heavenly race:
1, too, forsake mine ancient dwelling-place.
And now, O Child and Father, ye must go,
Take up the burden of your woe,
And wander once again below.
With piteous heart hold onward to the end:
Be true unto yourselves, and bear in mind
That every God is still the good Man’s friend;
And when the Wicked have their day assign’d,
Then they who suffer bravely save mankind.

4.
Oh, tell me, cried Ereneia,—for from thee
Nought can be hidden,—when the end will be.

Seek not to know, old Casyapa replied,
What pleaseth Heaven to hide.
Dark is the abyss of Time,
But light enough to guide your steps is given;
Whatever weal or woe betide,
Turn never from the way of truth aside.
And leave the event, in holy hope, to Heaven.
The moment is at hand; no more delay;
Ascend the ethereal bark, and go your way;
And Ye, of heavenly nature, follow me.

5.
The will of Heaven be done, Ladurlad cried;
Nor more the man replied,
But placed his daughter in the ethereal bark,
Then took his seat beside.

There was no word at parting, no adieu.
Down from that empyreal height they flew:
One groan Ladurlad breathed, yet utter’d not,
When, to his heart and brain,
The fiery Curse again like lightning shot.
And now on earth the Sire and Child alight;
Up soar’d the Ship of Heaven, and sail’d away from sight.

6.
O ye immortal Bowers,
Where hitherto the Hours
Have led their dance of happiness for aye,
With what a sense of woe
Do ye expect the blow,
And see your heavenly dwellers driven away?
Lo! where the annay-birds of graceful mien,
Whose milk-white forms were seen,
Lovely as Nymphs, your ancient trees between,
XIII.

THE CURSE OF KELAMA.

1.

And by your silent springs,
With melancholy cry,
Now spread unwilling wings;
Their stately necks reluctant they pretend,
And through the sullen sky,
To other worlds, their mournful progress bend.

2.

The afflicted gales to-day
O'er their beloved streams no longer play;
The streams of Paradise have ceased to flow;
The Fountain-Tree withholds its diamond-shower
In this portentous hour,—
This dolorous hour,—this universal woe.
Where is the Palace, whose far-flashing beams,
With streaks and streams of ever-varying light,
Brighten'd the polar night
Around the frozen North's extremest shore?
Gone like a morning rainbow,—like a dream,—
A star that shoots and falls, and then is seen no more.

3.

Now! now!—Before the Golden Palaces,
The Bramin strikes the inevitable hour.
The fatal blow is given,
That over Earth and Heaven
Confirms the Almighty Rajah in his power.
All evil Spirits then,
That roam the World about,
Or wander through the sky,
Set up a joyful shout.
The Asuras and the Giants join the cry;
The damn'd in Padalon acclaim
Their hoped Deliverer's name:
Heaven trembles with the thunder-drowning sound;
Back starts affrighted Ocean from the shore,
And the adamantine vaults and brazen floor
Of Hell are shaken with the roar.
Up rose the Rajah through the conquer'd sky,
To seize the Swerga for his proud abode;
Myriads of evil Genii round him fly,
As royally on wings of winds he rode,
And sealed high Heaven, triumphant like a God.

4.

The Maiden, at those welcome words, impress'd
A passionate kiss upon her Father's cheek:
They look'd around them then, as if to seek
Where they should turn, North, South, or East, or West,
Wherever to their vagrant feet seem'd best.
But, turning from the view her mournful eyes,
Oh, whither should we wander? Kailyal cries,
Or wherefore seek in vain a place of rest?
Have we not here the Earth beneath our tread,
Heaven overhead,
A brook that winds through this sequester'd glade,
And yonder woods, to yield us fruit and shade?
The little all our wants require is nigh;
Hope we have none;—why travel on in fear?
We cannot fly from Fate, and Fate will find us here.

5.

'Twas a fair scene wherein they stood,
A green and sunny glade amid the wood,
And in the midst an aged Bannian grew.
It was a goodly sight to see
That venerable tree,
For o'er the lawn, irregularly spread,
Fifty straight columns prop'd its lofty head;
And many a long, depending shoot,
Seeking to strike its root,
Straight like a plummet, grew towards the ground.
Some on the lower boughs which cross'd their way,
Fixing their bearded boughs, round and round,
With many a ring and wild contention wound;
Some to the passing wind, at times, with sway
Of gentle motion swung;
Others, of younger growth, unmov'd, were hung
Like stone-drops from the cavern's fretted height;

Upward the lengthening pageanties aspire,
Leaving from Earth to Heaven a widening wake of fire.
THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

Beneath was smooth and fair to sight,
Nor weeds nor briers deform’d the natural floor,
And through the leafy cope which bower’d it o’er
Came gleams of checker’d light.

So like a temple did it seem, that there
A pious heart’s first impulse would be prayer.

6.
A brook, with easy current, murmur’d near;
Water so cool and clear
The peasants drink not from the humble well,
Which they, with sacrifice of rural pride,
Have wedded to the cocoa-grove beside;
Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense
To those in towns who dwell,
The work of Kings, in their beneficence.
Fed by perpetual springs, a small lagoon,
Pellucid, deep, and still, in silence join’d,
And swell’d the passing stream. Like burnish’d steel
Glowing, it lay beneath the eye of noon;
And when the breezes, in their play,
Ruffled the darkening surface, then, with gleam
Of sudden light, around the lotus stem
It rippled, and the sacred flowers, that crown
The lakelet with their roseate beauty, ride,
In easy waving rock’d, from side to side;
And as the wind upheaves
Their broad and buoyant weight, the glossy leaves
Flap on the twinkling waters, up and down.

7.
They built them here a bower, of jointed cane,
Strong for the needful use; and light and long
Was the slight framework rear’d, with little pain;
Lilie creepers, then, the wicker sides supply,
And the tall jungle-grass fit roofing gave
Beneath the genial sky.
And here did Kailyal, each returning day,
Pour forth libations from the brook to pay
The Spirits of her Sires their grateful rite;
In such libations pour’d in open glades,
Beside clear streams and solitary shades,
The Spirits of the virtuous dead delight.
And duly here, to Marriataly’s praise,
The Maid, as with an angel’s voice of song,
Pour’d her melodious lays
Upon the gales of even,
And gliding in religious dance along,
Moved graceful as the dark-eyed Nymphs of Heaven;
Such harmony to all her steps was given.

8.
Thus ever, in her Father’s doting eye,
Kailyal perform’d the customary rite;
He, patient of his burning pain the while,
Beheld her, and approved her pious toil;
And sometimes, at the sight,
A melancholy smile
Would gleam upon his awful countenance.
He, too, by day and night, and every hour,
Paid to a higher Power his sacrifice;
An offering, not of glue, or fruit, and rice,
Flow’r-crown, or blood; but of a heart subdued,

A resolute, unconquer’d fortune,
An agony repress’d, a will resign’d,
To her, who, on her secret throne reclin’d,
Amid the Sea of Milk, by Veeshnoo’s side,
Looks with an eye of mercy on mankind.
By the Preserver, with his power endued,
There Voomdavee beholds this lower clime,
And marks the silent sufferings of the good,
To recompense them in her own good time.

9.
O force of faith! O strength of virtuous will!
Behold him in his endless martyrdom,
Triumphant still!
The Curse still burning in his heart and brain;
And yet doth he remain
Patient the while, and tranquil, and content!
The pious soul hath framed unto itself
A second nature, to exist in pain
As in its own allotted element.

10.
Such strength the will reveal’d had given
This holy pair, such influxes of grace,
That to their solitary resting-place
They brought the peace of Heaven.
Yea, all around was hallow’d! Danger, Fear,
Nor thought of evil ever enter’d here.
A charm was on the Leopard when he came
Within the circle of that mystic glade;
Submit he crouch’d before the heavenly Maid,
And offer’d to her touch his speckled side;
Or, with arch’d back erect, and bending head,
And eyes half-closed for pleasure, would he stand,
Counting the pressure of her gentle hand.

11.
Trampling his path through wood and brake,
And canes which crackling fall before his way,
And tassel-grass, whose silvery feathers play,
O’er topping the young trees,
On comes the Elephant, to slake
His thirst at noon in yon pelucid springs.
Lo! from his trunk upturn’d, aloft he flings
The grateful shower; and now
Plucking the broad-leaved bough
Of yonder plane, with wavy motion slow,
Fanning the languid air,
He moves it to and fro.
But when that form of beauty meets his sight,
The trunk its undulating motion stops,
From his forgetful hold the plane-branch drops,
Reverent he kneels, and lifts his rational eyes
To her as if in prayer;
And when she pours her angel voice in song,
Intranced he listens to the thrilling notes,
Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden dew,
Their fragrance of delight and love diffuse.

12.
Lo! as the voice melodious floats around,
The Antelope draws near,
The Tigress leaves her toothless cubs to hear;
The Snake comes gliding from the secret brake,
Himself in fascination forced along
Days after days unvarying come and go,
And neither friend nor foe
Approaches them in their sequester’d bower.
Maid of strange destiny! but think not thou
Thou art forgotten now,
And hast no cause for further hope or fear;
High-fated Maid, thou dost not know
What eyes watch over thee for weal and woe!
Even at this hour,
Searching the dark decrees divine,
Kehama, in the fulness of his power,
Perceives his thread of fate entwine with thine.
The Glendover, from his far sphere,
With love that never sleeps, beholds thee here,
And in the hour permitted will be near.
Dark Lorrinate on thee hath fixed her sight,
And laid her wiles, to aid
Foul Arvalan when he shall next appear;
For well she wenc’d his Spirit would renew
Old vengeance now, with unremitting hate;
The Enchantress well that evil nature knew;
The accursed Spirit hath his prey in view;
And thus, while all their separate hopes pursue,
All work, unconsciously, the will of Fate.

16.
Fate work’d its own the while. A band
Of Yogueses, as they roam’d the land,
Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut, their God,
Stray’d to this solitary glade,
And reach’d the bower wherein the Maid abode
Wondering at form so fair, they deem’d the Power
Divine had led them to his chosen bride,
And seized and bore her from her Father’s side.

XIV.
JAGA-NAUT.

1.
Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut!
Joy in the seven-headed Idol’s shrine!
A Virgin-bride his ministers have brought,
A mortal Maid, in form and face divine,
Peerless among all daughters of mankind;
Search’d they the world again from East to West,
In endless quest,
Seeking the fairest and the best,
No maid so lovely might they hope to find;—
For she hath breathed celestial air,
And heavenly food hath been her fare,
And heavenly thoughts and feelings give her face
That heavenly grace.
Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut,
Joy in the seven-headed Idol’s shrine!
The fairest Maid his Yogueses sought;
A fairer than the fairest have they brought,
A Maid of charms surpassing human thought,
A Maid divine.

2.
Now bring ye forth the Chariot of the God!
Bring him abroad,
That through the swarming City he may ride;
And by his side
Place ye the Maid of more than mortal grace,
The Maid of perfect form and heavenly face;
Set her aloft in triumph, like a bride
Upon the Bridal Car,
And spread the joyful tidings wide and far,—
Spread it with trump and voice,
That all may hear, and all who hear rejoice,—
Great Jaga-Naut hath found his mate! the God
Will ride abroad!
To-night will he go forth from his abode!
Ye myriads who adore him,
Prepare the way before him!

3.
Uprèar'd on twenty wheels elate,
Huge as a Ship, the Bridal Car appear'd;
Loud creak its ponderous wheels, as through the gate
A thousand Bramins drag the enormous load.
There throned aloft in state,
The Image of the seven-headed God
Came forth from his abode; and at his side
Sat Kaliyal like a bride.
A bridal statue rather might she seem,
For she regarded all things, like a dream,
Having no thought, nor fear, nor will, nor aught
Save hope and faith, that lived within her still.

4.
O silent Night, how have they startled thee
With the brazen trumpet's blare!
And thou, O Moon! whose quiet light serene
Filleth wide heaven, and bathing hill and wood,
Spreads o'er the peaceful valley like a flood,
How have they dimm'd thee with the torches' glare,
Which round you moving pageant flame and flare,
As the wild rout, with deafening song and shout,
Fling their long flashes out,
That, like infernal lightnings, fire the air.

5.
A thousand pilgrims strain
Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,
To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
Prone fall the frantic votaries in its road,
And calling on the God,
Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot-way.
On Jaga-Naut they call;
The ponderous Car rolls on, and crushes all.
Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.
Groans rise unheard; the dying cry,
And death and agony
Are trodden under foot by you mad throng,
Who follow close, and thrust the deadly wheels along.

6.
Pale grows the Maid at this accursed sight;
The yells which round her rise
Have roused her with affright,
And fear hath given to her dilated eyes
A wilder light.
Where shall those eyes be turn'd? she knows not where!
Downward they dare not look, for there
Is death, and horror, and despair!
Nor can her patient looks to Heaven repair,
For the huge Idol over her, in air,
Spreads his seven hideous heads, and wide
Extends their snaky necks on every side;
And all around, behind, before
The Bridal Car is the raging rout,
With frantic shout and deafening roar,
Tossing the torches' flames about.
And the double double peaks of the drum are there,
And the startling burst of the trumpet's blare;
And the gong, that seems, with its thunders dread,
To astound the living, and waken the dead.
The car-strings throb as if they were rent,
And the eyelids drop as stunned and spent.
Fain would the Maid have kept them fast;
But open they start at the crack of the blast.

7.
Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereonia! where,
In this dread hour of horror and despair?
Thinking on him, she strove her fear to quell —
If he be near me, then will all be well;
And, if he reck not for my misery,
Let come the worst; it matters not to me.
Repell that wrongful thought,
O Maid! thou feelest, but believ'st it not;
It is thine own imperfect nature's fault
That lets one doubt of him arise within;
And this the Virgin knew; and like a sin
Repell'd the thought, and still believed him true,
And summon'd up her spirit to endure
All forms of fear, in that firm trust secure.

8.
She needs that faith, she needs that consolation,
For now the Car hath measured back its track
Of death, and hath reentered now its station.
There, in the Temple-courts, with song and dance,
A harlot-band, to meet the Maid, advance.
The drum hath ceased its peals: the trumpet and gong
Are still; the frantic crowd forbear their yells;
And sweet it was to hear the voice of song,
And the sweet music of their girdle-bells,
Armlets and anklets, that, with cheerful sound,
Symphonious tumbled as they wheel'd around.

9.
They sung a bridal measure,
A song of pleasure,
A hymn of joyance and of gratulation.
Go, chosen One, they cried,
Go, happy bride!
For thee the God descends in expectation!
For thy dear sake
He leaves his Heaven, O Maid of matchless charms!
Go, happy One, the bed divine partake,
And fill his longing arms!
Thus to the inner fane,
With circling dance and hymneal strain,
The astonish'd Maid they led,
And there they laid her on the bridal bed.
Then forth they go, and close the Temple-gate,
And leave the wretched Kailyal to her fate.

10.
Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where?
From the leathed bed she starts, and in the air
Looks up, as if she thought to find him there;
Then, in despair,
Anguish, and agony, and hopeless prayer,
Prostrate she laid herself upon the floor.

There trembling as she lay,
The Bramid of the fane advanced,
And came to seize his prey.

But as the abominable Priest drew nigh,
A power invisible opposed his way;
Starting, he utter'd wildly a death-cry,
And fell.
At that the Maid all eagerly
Lifted in hope her head;
She thought her own deliverer had been near;
When lo! with other life reanimate,
She saw the dead arise,
And in the fiendish joy within his eyes,
She knew the hateful Spirit who look'd through
Their specular orbs,—clothed in the flesh of man,
She knew the accursed soul of Arvalan.

11.
Where art thou, Son of Heaven, Ereenia, where?
But not in vain, with sudden shriek of fear,
She calls Ereenia now; the Glendoveer
Is here!
Upon the guilty sight he burst
Like lightning from a cloud, and caught the accurs'd,
Bore him to the roof aloft, and on the floor
With vengeance dash'd him, quivering there in gore.
Lo! from the pregnant air—heart-withering
sight—
There issued forth the dreadful Lorrinite.
Seize him!
The Enchantress cried;
A host of Demons at her word appear,
And, like tornado winds, from every side
At once they rush upon the Glendoveer.

Alone against a legion, little here
Avails his single might,
Nor that celestial falchion, which in fight
So oft had put the rebel race to flight.
There are no Gods on earth to give him aid;
Hem'n'd round, he is overpower'd, beat down, and bound,
And at the feet of Lorrinite is laid.

12.
Meantime the scatter'd members of the slain,
Obedient to her mighty voice, assumed
Their vital form again,
And that foul Spirit, upon vengeance bent,
Fled to the fleshy tenement.
Lo! here, quoth Lorrinite, thou seest thy foe!
Him in the Ancient Sepulchres, below
The billows of the Ocean, will I lay;
Gods are there none to help him now, and there
For Man there is no way.
To that dread scene of durance and despair,

Asuras, hear your enemy! I go
To chain him in the Tombs.  Meantime do thou,
Freed from thy foe, and now secure from fear,
Son of Kehama, take thy pleasure here.

13.
Her words the accursed race obey'd;
Forth with a sound like rushing winds they fled;
And of all aid from Earth or Heaven bereft,
Alone with Arvalan the Maid was left.

But in that hour of agony, the Maid
Deserted not herself; her very dread
Had calm'd her; and her heart
Knew the whole horror, and its only part.
Yemen, receive me undefiled! she said,
And seized a torch, and fired the bridal bed.
Up ran the rapid flames; on every side
They find their fuel wherever they spread;
Thin hangings, fragrant gums, and odorous wood,
That piled like sacrificial altars stood.
Around they run, and upward they aspire,
And, lo! the huge Pagoda lined with fire.

14.
The wicked Soul, who had assumed again
A form of sensible flesh for his foul will,
Still bent on base revenge, and baffled still,
Felt that corporeal shape alike to pain
Obnoxious as to pleasure: forth he flew,
Howling and search'd by the devouring flame;
Accursed Spirit! Still condemnd to rue,
The act of sin and punishment the same.
Freed from his loathsome touch, a natural dread
Came on the self-devoted, and she drew
Back from the flames, which now toward her spread,
And, like a living monster, seem'd to dart
Their hungry tongues toward their shrinking prey.

Soon she subdued her heart;
"O Father!" she exclaim'd, "there was no way
But this! And thou, Ereenia, who for me
Suffrest, my soul shall bear thee company."

15.
So having said, she knit
Her body up to work her soul's desire,
And rush at once among the thickest fire.
A sudden cry withheld her,—"Kailyal, stay!
Child! daughter! I am here!" the voice exclaims,
And from the gate, unhar'm'd, through smoke and flames,
Like as a God, Ladurlad made his way;
Wrapp'd his preserving arms around, and bore
His Child, uninjured, o'er the burning floor.

XV.
THE CITY OF BALY.

1.
KAILYAL.
Ereenia!
LADURLAD.
Nay, let no reproachful thought
Wrong his heroic heart!  The Evil Powers
Have the dominion o'er this wretched World,
And no good Spirit now can venture here

KAILYAL.
Alas, my Father! he hath ventured here,
And saved me from one horror. But the Powers
Of Evil beat him down, and bore away
To some dread scene of durance and despair;
The Ancient Tombs, methought their mistress said,
Beneath the ocean waves; no way for Man
Is there; and Gods, she boasted, there are none
On Earth to help him now.

LADURLAD.
Is that her boast?
And hath she laid him in the Ancient Tombs,
Relying that the Waves will guard him there?
Short-sighted are the eyes of Wickedness,
And all its craft but folly. Oh my child!
The Curses of the Wicked are upon me,
And the immortal Deities, who see
And suffer all things for their own wise end,
Have made them blessings to us!

KAILYAL.
Then thou knowest
Where they have borne him?

LADURLAD.
To the Sepulchres
Of the Ancient Kings, which Baly, in his power,
Made in primeval times; and built above them
A City, like the Cities of the Gods,
Being like a God himself. For many an age
Hath Ocean warr'd against his Palaces,
Till, overwhelm'd, they lie beneath the waves,
Not overthrown, so well the awful Chief
Had laid their deep foundations. Rightly said
The Accursed, that no way for man was there;
But not like man am I!

2.
Up from the ground the Maid exultant sprung,
And clapp'd her happy hands in attitude
Of thanks to Heaven, and flung
Her arms around her Father's neck, and stood
Struggling awhile for utterance, with excess
Of hope and pious thankfulness.
Come—come! she cried. Oh let us not delay,—
He is in torments there,—away!—away!

3.
Long time they travell'd on; at dawn of day
Still setting forward with the earliest light,
Nor ceasing from their way
Till darkness closed the night.
Short refuge from the noon tide heat,
Reluctantly compell'd, the Maiden took,
And ill her indefatigable feet
Could that brief respite brook.
Hope kept her up, and her intense desire
Supports that heart which ne'er at danger quails,
Those feet which never tire,
That frame which never fails.

4.
Their talk was of the City of the days
Of old, Earth's wonder once, and of the fame
Of Baly, its great founder,—he whose name,
In ancient story and in poet's praise,
Liveth and flourisheth for endless glory,
Because his might
Put down the wrong, and aye upheld the right.
Till for ambition, as old sages tell,
At length the universal Monarch fell:
For he too, having made the World his own,
Then in his pride, had driven
The Devatas from Heaven,
And seized triumphantly the Swerga throne.
The Incarnate came before the Mighty One,
In dwarfish stature, and in mien obscure;
The sacred cord he bore,
And ask'd, for Brahma's sake, a little boon,
Three steps of Baly's ample reign, no more.
Poor was the boon required, and poor was he
Who begg'd, a little wretch it seem'd to be;
But Baly ne'er refused a suppliant's prayer.
He on the Dwarf cast down
A glance of pity in contemplous mood,
And bade him take the boon,
And measure where he would.

5.
Lo, Son of giant birth,
I take my grant! the Incarnate Power replies.
With his first step he measured o'er the Earth;
The second spann'd the skies.
Three paces thou hast granted;
Twice have I set my footstep, Veeshnou cries,
Where shall the third be planted?

6.
Then Baly knew the God, and at his feet,
In homage due, he laid his humbled head.
Mighty art thou, O Lord of Earth and Heaven,
Mighty art thou! he said;
Be merciful, and let me be forgiven.
He ask'd for mercy of the Merciful,
And mercy for his virtue's sake was shown.
For though he was cast down to Padalou,
Yet there, by Yamen's throne,
Doth Baly sit in majesty and might,
To judge the dead, and sentence them aribit.
And forasmuch as he was still the friend
Of righteousness, it is permitted him,
Yearly, from those drear regions to ascend
And walk the Earth, that he may hear his name
Still hyman'd and honor'd by the grateful voice
Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice.

7.
Such was the talk they held upon their way,
Of him to whose old City they were bound;
And now, upon their journey, many a day
Had risen and closed, and many a week gone round,
And many a realm and region had they pass'd,
When now the Ancient Towers appear'd at last.
8.

Their golden summits, in the noon-day light,
Shone o'er the dark-green deep that roll'd between;
For domes, and pinnacles, and spires were seen
Peering above the sea—a mournful sight!
Well might the sad beholder ween from thence
What works of wonder the devouring wave
Had swallow'd there, when monuments so brace
Bore record of their old magnificence.

And on the sandy shore, beside the verge
Of Ocean, here and there, a rock-hewn fane
Resisted in its strength the surf and surge
That on their deep foundations beat in vain.
In solitude the Ancient Temples stood,
Once resonant with instrument and song,
And solemn dance of festive multitude;
Now, as the weary ages pass along,
Hearing no voice save of the Ocean flood,
Which roars forever on the restless shores;
Or visiting their solitary caves,
The lonely sound of winds, that moan around
Accordant to the melancholy waves.

9.

With reverence did the travellers see
The works of ancient days, and silently
Approach the shore. Now on the yellow sand,
Where round their feet the rising surges part,
They stand. Ladurlad's heart
Exulted in his wondrous destiny.
To Heaven he raised his hand
In attitude of stern, heroic pride;
Oh what a Power, he cried,
Thou dreadful Rajah, doth thy curse impart!
I thank thee now!—Then turning to the Maid,
Thou seest how far and wide
Yon Towers extend, he said;
My search must needs be long. Meantime the flood
Will cast thee up thy food,—
And in the Chambers of the Rock, by night,
Take thou thy safe abode.
No prowling beast to harm thee, or affright,
Can enter there; but wrap thyself with care
From the foul Birds obscene that thirst for blood;
For in such caverns doth the Bat delight
To have its haunts. Do thou, with stone and shout,
Ere thou liest down at evening, scare them out,
And in this robe of mine involve thy feet.
Duly commend us both to Heaven in prayer;
Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet!

10.

So saying, he put back his arm, and gave
The cloth which girt his loins, and press'd her hand
With fervent love, then from the sand
Advanced into the sea; the coming Wave
Which knew Kehama's curse, before his way
Started, and on he went as on dry land;
And still around his path the waters parted.
She stands upon the shore, where sea-weeds play,
Lashing her polish'd ankles, and the spray
Which off her Father, like a rainbow, fled,
Falls on her like a shower; there Kailyal stands,
And sees the billows rise above his head.
She, at the startling sight, forgot the power
The Curse had given him, and held forth her hands
Imploringly,—her voice was on the wind,
And the deaf Ocean o'er Ladurlad closed.
Soon she recall'd his destiny to mind,
And, shaking off that natural fear, composed
Her soul with prayer, to wait the event resign'd

11.

Alone, upon the solitary strand,
The lovely one is left; behold her go,
Facing with patient footsteps, to and fro,
Along the bending sand.

Save her, ye Gods! from Evil Powers, and here
From man she need not fear:
For never Traveller comes near
These awful ruins of the days of yore,
Nor fisher's bark, nor venturous mariner,
Approach the sacred shore.
All day she walk'd the beach; at night she sought
The chamber of the Rock; with stone and shorn
Assail'd the Bats obscene, and scared them out;
Then in her Father's robe involved her feet,
And wrap'd her mantle round to guard her head,
And laid her down: the rock was Kailyal's bed;
Her chamber-lamps were in the starry sky;
The winds and waters were her lullaby.

12.

Be of good heart, and may thy sleep be sweet,
Ladurlad said. — Alas! that cannot be
To one whose days are days of misery.
How often did she stretch her hands to greet
Ereonia, rescued in the dreams of night!
How oft, amid the vision of delight,
Fear in her heart all is not as it seems!
Then from unsettled slumber start, and hear
The Winds that moan above, the Waves below!
Thou hast been call'd, O Sleep! the friend of Woe;
But 'tis the happy who have call'd thee so.

13.

Another day, another night are gone;
A second passes, and a third wanes on.
So long she paced the shore,
So often on the beach she took her stand,
That the wild Sea-Birds knew her, and no more
Fled, when she past beside them on the strand.
Bright shine the golden summits in the light
Of the noon-sun, and lovelier far by night
Their moonlight glories o'er the sea they shed:
Fair is the dark-green deep: by night and day,
Unvex'd with storms, the peaceful billows play,
As when they closed upon Ladurlad's head;
The firmament above is bright and clear;
The sea-fowl, lords of water, air, and land,
Joyous alike upon the wing appear,
Or when they ride the waves, or walk the sand;
Beauty, and light, and joy are every where;
There is no sadness and no sorrow here,
Save what that single human breast contains;
But oh! what hopes, and fears, and pains are there!
14.
Seven miserable days the expectant Maid,
From earliest dawn till evening, watch’d the shore;
Hope left her then; and in her heart she said,
Never should she behold her Father more.

XVI.
THE ANCIENT SEPULCHRES.

1.
When the broad Ocean on Ladurlad’s head
Had closed and arch’d him o’er,
With steady tread he held his way
Adown the sloping shore.
The dark-green waves with emerald hue
Imbue the beams of day,
And on the wrinkled sand below,
Rolling their maze network to and fro,
Light shadows shift and play.
The hungry Shark, at scent of prey,
Toward Ladurlad darted;
Beholding then that human form erect,
How like a God the depths he trod,
Appall’d the monster started,
And in his fear departed.
Onward Ladurlad went with heart elate,
And now hath reach’d the Ancient City’s gate.

2.
Wondering he stood awhile to gaze
Upon the works of older days.
The brazen portals open stood,
Even as the fearful multitude
Had left them, when they fled
Before the rising flood.
High overhead, sublime,
The mighty gateway’s storied roof was spread,
Dwarfing the puny piles of younger time.
With the deeds of days of yore
That ample roof was sculptured o’er,
And many a godlike form there met his eye,
And many an emblem dark of mystery.
Through these wide portals oft had Baly rode Triumphant from his proud abode,
When, in his greatness, he bestrode
The Aullay, hugest of four-footed kind,
The Aullay-Horse, that in his force,
With elephantine trunk, could bind
And lift the elephant, and on the wind
Whirl him away, with sway and swing,
Even like a pebble from the practis’d sling.

3.
Those streets which never, since the days of yore,
By human footstep had been visited,
Those streets which never more
A human foot shall tread,
Ladurlad trod. In sun-light and sea-green,
The thousand Palaces were seen
Of that proud City, whose superb abodes
Seem’d rear’d by Giants for the immortal Gods.
How silent and how beautiful they stand,

Like things of Nature! the eternal rocks
Themselves not firmer. Neither hath the sand
Drifted within their gates and closed their doors;
Nor slime defiled their pavements and their floors.
Did then the Ocean wage
His war for love and envy, not in rage,
O than fair City, that he spared thee thus?
Art than Varoumin’s capital and court,
Where all the Sea Gods for delight resort,
A place too godlike to be held by us,
The poor degenerate children of the earth?
So thought Ladurlad, as he look’d around,
Weening to hear the sound
Of Mermaid’s shell, and song,
Of choral throng from some imperial hall,
Wherein the Immortal Powers, at festival,
Their high carousals keep;
But all is silence dread,
Silence profound and dead,
The everlasting stillness of the Deep.

4.
Through many a solitary street,
And silent market-place, and lonely square,
Arm’d with the mighty Curse, behold him fare.
And now his feet attain that royal fane
Where Baly held of old his awful reign.
What once had been the Gardens spread around,
Fair Gardens, once which wore perpetual green,
Where all sweet flowers through all the year were found,
And all fair fruits were through all seasons seen;
A place of Paradise, where each device
Of emulous Art with Nature strove to vie;
And Nature, on her part,
Call’d forth new powers wherewith to vanquish
Art.
The Swerga-God himself, with envious eye,
Survey’d those peerless gardens in their prime;
Nor ever did the Lord of Light,
Who circles Earth and Heaven upon his way,
Behold from eldest time a goodlier sight
Than were the groves which Baly, in his might,
Made for his chosen place of solace and delight.

5.
It was a Garden still beyond all price;
Even yet it was a place of Paradise;
For where the mighty Ocean could not spare,
There had he, with his own creation,
Sought to repair his work of devastation.
And here were coral bowers,
And grots of madrepores,
And banks of sponge, as soft and fair to eye
As e’er was mossy bed
Whereon the Wood Nymphs lie,
With languid limbs, in summer’s sultry hours
Here, too, were living flowers
Which, like a bed compacted,
Their purple cups contracted,
And now, in open blossom spread,
Stretch’d like green anthers many a seeking head
And arborets of jointed stone were there,
And plants of fibres fine, as silkworm’s thread,
Yea, beautiful as Mermaid’s golden hair
Upon the waves dispread.
Others that, like the broad banana growing,
Raised their long, wrinkled leaves of purple hue,
Like streamers wide outflowing.
And whatso'er the depths of Ocean hide
From human eyes, Ladurldad spied—
Trees of the deep, and shrubs, and fruits, and flowers,
As fair as ours,
Wherewith the Sea Nymphs love their locks to braid,
When to their father’s hall, at festival
Repairing, they, in emulous array,
Their charms display,
To grace the banquet and the solemn day.

The golden fountains had not ceased to flow;
And where they mingled with the briny Sea,
There was a sight of wonder and delight,
To see the fish, like birds in air,
Above Ladurldad flying.
Round those strange waters they repair,
Their scarlet fins outspread and plying;
They float with gentle hovering there;
And now, upon those little wings,
As if to dare forbidden things,
With wilful purpose bent,
Swift as an arrow from a bow,
They shoot across, and to and fro,
In rapid glance, like lightning go
Through that unwonted element.

Almost in scenes so wondrous fair,
Ladurldad had forgot
The mighty cause which led him there;
His busy eye was everywhere;
His mind had lost all thought;
His heart, surrender’d to the joys
Of sight, was happy as a boy’s.
But soon the awakening thought recurs
Of him who in the Sopuleches,
Hopeless of human aid, in chains is laid;
And her who, on the solitary shore,
By night and day, her weary watch will keep,
Till she shall see them issuing from the deep.

Now hath Ladurldad reach’d the Court
Of the great Palace of the King: its floor
Was of the marble rock; and there, before
The imperial door,
A mighty Image on the steps was seen,
Of stature huge, of countenance serene.
A crown and sceptre at his feet were laid;
One hand a scroll display’d;
The other pointed there, that all might see;—
My name is Death, it said;
In mercy have the Gods appointed me.
Two brazen gates beneath him, night and day,
Stood open; and within them you behold
Descending steps, which in the living stone
Were hewn, a spacious way
Down to the Chambers of the Kings of old.

Trembling with hope, the adventurous man descend’d.
The sea-green light of day
Not far along the vault extended;
But where the slant reflection ended,
Another light was seen
Of red and fiery hue,
That with the water blended,
And gave the secrets of the Tombs to view.

Deep in the marble rock, the Hall
Of Death was hollow’d out, a chamber wide,
Low-roof’d, and long; on either side,
Each in his own alcove, and on his throne,
The Kings of old were seated: in his hand
Each held the sceptre of command,
From whence, across that scene of endless night,
A carbuncle diffused its everlasting light.

So well had the Einbaliners done their part
With spice and precious ungents to imbue
The perfect corpse, that each had still the hue
Of living man, and every limb was still
Supple, and firm, and full, as when of yore
Its motion answered to the moving will.
The robes of royalty, which once they wore,
Long since had moulder’d off, and left them bare:
Naked upon their thrones behold them there,
Statues of actual flesh—a fearful sight!
Their large and rayless eyes,
Dimly reflecting to that gem-born light,
Glazed, fix’d, and meaningless,—yet, open wide,
Their ghastly balls belied
The mockery of life in all beside.

But if, amid these chambers drear,
Death were a sight of shuddering and of fear,
Life was a thing of stranger horror here.
For at the farther end, in yon alcove,
Where Baly should have lain, had he obey’d
Man’s common lot, behold Ereonia laid.
Strong fetters link him to the rock; his eye
Now rolls and widens, as with effort vain
He strives to break the chain,
Now seems to brood upon his misery.
Before him couch’d there lay
One of the mighty monsters of the deep,
Whom Lorrimite, encountering on the way,
There station’d, his perpetual guard to keep;
In the sport of wanton power, she enam’d him there,
As if to mock the Glendoveer’s despair.

Upward his form was human, save that here
The skin was cover’d o’er with scale on scale
Compact, a panoply of natural mail.
His mouth, from ear to ear,
Weapon’d with triple teeth, extended wide,
And tusks on either side;
A double snake below, he roll'd
His supple length behind in many a sinuous fold.

14
With red and kindling eye, the Beast beholds
A living man draw nigh,
And rising on his folds,
In hungry joy awaits the expected feast,
His mouth half open, and his teeth unsealed.
Then on he sprang, and in his scaly arms
Seized him, and fasten'd on his neck, to suck,
With greedy lips, the warm life-blood: and sure
But for the mighty power of magic charms,
As easily as, in the blithesome hour
Of spring, a child doth crop the meadow-flower,
Piece-meal those claws
Had rent their victim, and those armed jaws
Snapp'd him in twain. Naked Ladurlad stood,
Yet fearless and un alarm'd in this dread strife,
So well Kehama's Curse had charm'd his fated life.

15.
He too,—for anger, rising at the sight
Of him he sought, in such strange thrall confin'd,
With desperate courage fired Ladurlad's mind,—
He too unto the fight himself address'd,
And grappling breast to breast,
With foot firm-planted stands,
And seized the monster's throat with both his hands.
Vainly, with throttling grasp, he press'd
The impenetrable scales;
And lo! the Guard rose up, and round his foe,
With gliding motion, wreath'd his lengthening coils,
Then tighten'd all their folds with stress and strain.
Nought would the raging Tiger's strength avail,
If once involved within those mighty toils;
The arm'd Rhinoceros, so clasp'd, in vain
Had trusted to his hide of rugged mail,
His bones all broken, and the breath of life
Crush'd from the lungs, in that unequal strife.
Again, and yet again, he sought to break
The impassive limbs; but when the Monster found
His utmost power was vain,
A moment he relax'd in every round,
Then knelt his coils again with closer strain,
And, bearing forward, forced him to the ground.

16.
Ereonia groan'd in anguish at the sight
Of this dread fight: once more the Glendoveer
Essay'd to break his bonds, and fear
For that brave father who had sought him here,
Stung him to wilder strugglings. From the rock
He raised himself half up, with might and main,
Pluck'd at the adamantine chain,
And now, with long and unremitting strain,
In obstinate effort of ignomious strength,
Labor'd and strove in vain;
Till his immortal sinews fail'd at length;
And yielding, with an inward groan, to fate,
Despairing, he let himself again
Fall prostrate on his prison-bed of stone,
Body and chain alike with lifeless weight.

17.
Struggling they lay in mortal fray
All day, while day was in our upper sphere;
For light of day
And natural darkness never entered here;
All night, with unabated might,
They waged the unremitting fight.
A second day, a second night,
With furious will they wrestled still.
The third came on, the fourth is gone;
Another comes, another goes;
And yet no respite, no repose!
But day and night, and night and day,
Involv'd in mortal strife they lay;
Six days and nights have pass'd away,
And still they wage, with mutual rage,
The unremitting fray.
With mutual rage their war they wage,
But not with mutual will;
For when the seventh morning came,
The monster's worn and wearied frame
In this strange contest fails;
And weaker, weaker, every hour,
He yields beneath strong Nature's power,
For now the Curse prevails.

18.
Sometimes the Beast sprang up to bear
His foe aloft; and trusting there
To shake him from his hold,
Relax'd the rings that wreath'd him round;
But on his throat Ladurlad hung,
And weigh'd him to the ground;
And if they sink, or if they float,
Alike with stubborn chesp he clung,
Tenacious of his grasp;
For well he knew with what a power,
Exempt from Nature's laws,
The Curse had arm'd him for this hour;
And in the monster's gasping jaws,
And in his hollow eye,
Well could Ladurlad now descry
The certain signs of victory.

19.
And now the Beast no more can keep
His painful watch; his eyes, oppress'd,
Are fainting for their natural sleep;
His living flesh and blood must rest;
The Beast must sleep or die.
Then he, full faint and languidly,
Unwreathes his rings and strives to fly,
And still retreating, slowly trudges
His stiff and heavy length of scales.
But that unweariable foe,
With will relentless follows still;
No breathing-time, no pause of flight
He gives, but presses on his flight;
Along the vaulted chambers, and the ascent
Up to the emerald-tinted light of day,
He harasses his way,
Till lifeless, underneath his grasp,
The huge Sea Monster lay.
20.
That obstinate work is done; Ladurbad cried,
One labor yet remains!
And thoughtfully he eyed
Ereemia’s ponderous chains;
And with faint effort, half-despairing, tried
The rivets deep in-driven. Instinctively,
As if in search of aid, he look’d around:
Oh, then how gladly, in the near above,
Fell’n on the ground its lifeless Lord beside,
The crimson cimeter he spied,
Whose cloudy blade, with potent spells imbued,
Had lain so many an untold in solitude!

21.
Joyfully springing there,
He seized the weapon, and with eager stroke
Hew’d at the chain; the force was dealt in vain,
For not as if through yielding air
Pass’d the descending cimeter,
Its deaden’d way the heavy water broke;
Yet it bit deep. Again, with both his hands,
He wields the blade, and dealt a surer blow.
The baser metal yields
To that fine edge, and lo! the Glendover
Rises and snaps the half-sever’d links, and stands
Freed from his broken bands.

XVII.

BALY.

1.
Thus is the appointed night,
The night of joy and consecrated mirth,
When from his judgment-seat in Padaelon,
By Yamen’s throne, Baly goes forth, that he may walk the Earth
Unseen, and hear his name
Still hymn’d and honor’d by the grateful voice
Of human-kind, and in his fame rejoice.
Therefore, from door to door, and street to street,
With willing feet,
Shaking their firebands, the glad children run;
Baly! great Baly! they acclaim;
Where’er they run they bear the mighty name;
Where’er they meet,
Baly! great Baly! still their chorall tongues repeat.
Therefore at every door the votive flame
Through pendent lanterns sheds its painted light,
And rockets, hissing upward through the sky,
Fall like a shower of stars
From Heaven’s black canopy.
Therefore, on yonder mountain’s tempied height,
The brazen caldron blazes through the night.
Huge as a Ship that travels the main sea
Is that capacious brass; its Wick as tall
As is the mast of some great admiral.
Ten thousand votaries bring
Camphor and glue to feed the sacred flame.
And while, through regions round, the nations see
Its fiery pillar curling high in heaven,
Baly! great Baly! they exclaim,

Forever hallowed be his blessed name!
Honor and praise to him for evermore be given.

2.
Why art not thou among the festive throng,
Baly, O righteous Judge! to hear thy fame?
Still, as of yore, with pageantry and song,
The glowing streets along,
They celebrate thy name;
Baly! great Baly! still
The grateful habitants of Earth acclaim,
Baly! great Baly! still
The ringing walls and echoing towers proclaim.
From yonder mountain the portentous flame
Still blazes to the nations, as before;
All things appear to human eyes the same,
As perfect as of yore;
To human eyes,—but how unlike to thine!
Thine, which were wont to see
The Company divine,
That with their presence came to honor thee!
For all the blessed ones of mortal birth
Who have been clothed with immortality,
From the eight corners of the Earth,
From the Seven Worlds assembling, all
Wont to attend thy solemn festival.
Then did thine eyes behold
The wide air peopled with that glorious train;
Now mayst thou seek the blessed ones in vain,
For Earth and Air are now beneath the Rajah’s reign.

3.
Therefore the righteous Judge walk’d the Earth
In sorrow and in solitude to-night
The sound of human mirth
To him is no delight;
He turns away from that ungrateful sight,
Hallowed not now by visitants divine,
And there he bends his melancholy way,
Where, in yon full-o’er’d Moon’s refulgent light,
The Golden Towers of his old City shine
Above the silver sea. The ancient Chief
There bent his way in grief,
As if sad thoughts indulged would work their own relief.

4.
There he beholds, upon the sand,
A lovely Maiden in the moonlight stand.
The land-breeze lifts her locks of jet;
The waves around her polish’d ankles play,
Her bosom with the salt sea-spray is wet;
Her arms are cross’d, unconsciously, to fold
That bosom from the cold,
While, statue-like, she seems her watch to keep,
Gazing intently on the restless deep.

5.
Seven miserable days had Kailyal there,
From earliest dawn till-evening, watch’d the deep;
Six nights, within the chamber of the rock,
Had laid her down, and found in prayer
That comfort which she sought in vain from sleep
But when the seventh night came,
Never should she behold her father more, The wretched Maiden said, in her despair; Yet would not quit the shore, Nor turn her eyes one moment from the sea: Never before Had Kailyal watch’d it so impatiently, Never so eagerly had hoped before, As now, when she believed, and said, all hope was o’er.

6. Beholding her, how beautiful she stood, In that wild solitude, Baly from his invisibility Had issued then, to know her cause of woe; But that in the air beside her, he espied Two Powers of Evil for her hurt allied, Foul Arvalan and dreadful Lorrinite. Walking in darkness him they could not see, And marking with what demon-like delight They kept their innocent prey in sight, He waits, expecting what the end may be.

7. She starts; for lo! where, floating many a roof, A Monster, hugest of the Ocean brood, Weltering and lifeless, drifts toward the shore. Backward she starts in fear before the flood, And, when the waves retreat, They leave their hideous burden at her feet.

8. She ventures to approach with timid tread; She starts, and half draws back in fear, Then stops, and stretches out her head, To see if that huge Beast indeed be dead. Now, growing bold, the Maid advances near, Even to the margin of the ocean-flood. Rightly she reads her Father’s victory, And lifts her joyous hands exultingly To Heaven in gratitude. Then, spreading them toward the Sea, While pious tears bedim her streaming eyes, Come! come! my Father, come to me; Erencia, come! she cries; Lo! from the opening deep they rise, And to Ladurlad’s arms the happy Kailyal flies.

9. She turn’d from him, to meet, with beating heart, The Glendover’s embrace. Now turn to me, for mine thou art! Foul Arvalan exclaim’d; his loathsome face Came forth, and from the air, In fleshy form, he burst. Always in horror and despair, Had Kailyal seen that form and face accurs’d; But yet so sharp a pang had ne’er Shot with a thrill like death through all her frame, As now when on her hour of joy the Spectre came.

10. Vain is resistance now; The fiendish laugh of Lorrinite is heard; And at her dreadful word,

The Asuras once again appear, And seize Ladurlad and the Glendover.

11. Hold your accursed hands! A voice exclaim’d, whose dread commands Were fear’d through all the vaults of Padalou; And there among them, in the midnight air, The presence of the mighty Baly shone. He, making manifest his mightiness, Put forth on every side a hundred arms, And seized the Sorceress; mangre all her charms, Her and her fiendish ministers he caught With force as uncontrollable as fate, And that unhappy Soul, to whom The Almighty Rajah’s power availed not Living to avert, nor dead to mitigate, His righteous doom.

12. Help, help, Kehama! Father, help! he cried; But Baly tarried not to abide That mightier Power; with irresistible foot He stamp’d and cleft the Earth; it open’d wide, And gave him way to his own Judgment-seat. Down, like a plummet, to the World below He sunk, and bore his prey To punishment deserved, and endless woe.

XVIII.

KEHAMA’S DESCENT.

1. The Earth, by Baly’s feet divided, Closed o’er his way as to the Judgment-seat He plunged and bore his prey. Searce had the shock subsided, When, darting from the Swerga’s heavenly heights, Kehama, like a thunderbolt, alights. In wrath he came; a bickering flame Flash’d from his eyes, which made the moonlight dim, And passion foreing way from every limb, Like furnace-smoke, with terror wrath him round. Furious he smote the ground; Earth trembled underneath the dreadful stroke, Again in sunder riven; He hurl’d in rage his whirring weapon down. But lo! the fiery sheekra to his feet Return’d, as if by equal force re-driven, And from the abyss the voice of Baly came. Not yet, O Rajah, hast thou won The realms of Padalou! Earth and the Swerga are thine own; But, till Kehama shall subdue the throne Of Hell, in torments Yamen holds his son

2. Fool that he is! — in torments let him lie! Kehama, wrathful at his son, replied. But what am I,
That thou shouldst brave me?—kindling in his pride
The dreadful Rajah cried.
Hark! Yamen! hear me. God of Padalon,
Prepare thy throne,
And let the Amnecia cup
Be ready for my lips, when I anon
Triumphantly shall take my seat thereon,
And plant upon thy neck my royal feet.

3.
In voice like thunder thus the Rajah cried,
Impending o'er the abyss, with menacing hand
Put forth, as in the action of command,
And eyes that darted their red anger down.
Then, drawing back, he let the earth subside,
And, as his wrath relax'd, survey'd,
Thoughtfully and silently, the mortal Maid.
Her eye the while was on the farthest sky,
Where up the ethereal height
Erenia rose and pass'd away from sight.
Never had she so joyfully
Beheld the coming of the Glendover,
Dear as he was and he deserved to be,
As now she saw him rise and disappear.
Come now what will, within her heart said she;
For thou art safe, and what have I to fear?

4.
Meantime the Almighty Rajah, late
In power, and majesty, and wrath array'd,
Had laid his terrors by,
And gazed upon the Maid.
Pride could not quit his eye,
Nor that remorseless nature from his front
Depart; yet whoso had beheld him then,
Had felt some admiration mix'd with dread,
And might have said,
That sure he seem'd to be the King of Men!
Less than the greatest that he could not be,
Who carried in his port such might and majesty.

5.
In fear no longer for the Glendover,
Now toward the Rajah Kailyal turn'd her eyes,
As if to ask what doom awaited her.
But then surprise,
Even as with fascination, held them there;
So strange a thing it seem'd to see the change
Of purport in that all-commanding brow,
Which thoughtfully was bent upon her now.
Wondering she gazed, the while her Father's eye
Was fix'd upon Kehama haughtily;
It spake defiance to him, high disdain,
Stern patience unsubdual by pain,
And pride triumphant over agony.

6.
Ladurlad, said the Rajah, thou and I
Alike have done the work of Destiny,
Unknowing each to what the impulse tended;
But now that over Earth and Heaven my reign
Is stablish'd, and the ways of Fate are plain
Before me; here our enmity is ended,
I take away thy Curse. — As thus he said,

The fire which in Ladurlad's heart and brain
Was burning, fled, and left him free from pain.
So rapidly his torments were departed,
That at the sudden case he started,
As with a shock, and to his head
His hands up-fled,
As if he felt through every failing limb
The power and sense of life forsaking him.

7.
Then turning to the Maid, the Rajah cried,
O Virgin, above all of mortal birth
Favor'd alike in beauty and in worth,
And in the glories of thy destiny,
Now let thy happy heart exult with pride,
For Fate hath chosen thee
To be Kehama's bride,
To be the Queen of Heaven and Earth,
And of whatever Worlds beside Infinity may hide; for I can see
The writing which, at thy nativity,
All-knowing Nature wrought upon thy brain,
In branching veins, which to the gifted eye
Map out the mazes of futurity.
There is it written, Maid, that thou and I,
Alone of human kind a deathless pair,
Are doom'd to share
The Amnecia-drink divine
Of immortality. Come, Maiden name!
High-fated One, ascend the subject sky,
And by Kehama's side
Sit on the Swerga throne, his equal bride.

8.
Oh never, — never, — Father! Kailyal cried;
It is not as he saith, — it cannot be!
I! — I his bride!
Nature is never false; he wrongeth her!
My heart belies such lines of destiny.
There is no other true interpreter!

9.
At that reply, Kehama's darkening brow
Bewray'd the anger which he yet suppress'd;
Counsel thy daughter! tell her thou art now
Free from thy Curse, he said, and bid her bow
In thankfulness to Fate's benign behest.
Bid her her stubborn will restrain,—
For Destiny at last must be obey'd,—
And tell her, while obedience is delay'd,
Thy Curse will burn again.

10.
She needeth not my counsel, he replied,
And idly, Rajah, dost thou reason thus
Of Destiny! for though all other things
Were subject to the starry influencings,
And bow'd submissive to thy tyranny,
The virtuous heart and resolute mind are free.
Thus in their wisdom did the Gods decree
When they created man. Let come what will
This is our rock of strength; in every ill,
Sorrow, oppression, pain, and agony,
The spirit of the good is unsubdued,
And, suffer as they may, they triumph still.
11.
Obstinate fools! exclaimed the Mighty One;
Fate and my pleasure must be done,
And ye resist in vain!
Take your fit guardon till we meet again!
So saying, his vindictive hand he flung
Towards them, fill’d with curses; then on high
Aloft he sprung, and vanish’d through the Sky.

XIX.

MOUNT CALASAY.

1.
The Rajah, scattering curses as he rose,
Soar’d to the Swerga, and resumed his throne.
Not for his own redoubled agony,
Which now, through heart and brain,
With renovateed pain,
Rush’d to its seat, Ladurlad breathes that groan.
That groan is for his child; he groan’d to see
That she was stricken now with leprosy,
Which, as the enemy vindictive fled,
O’er all her frame with quick contagion spread. She, wondering at events so passing strange,
And fill’d with hope and fear,
And joy to see the Tyrant disappear,
And glad, expectance of her Glendoveer,
Perceived not in herself the hideous change.
His burning pain, she thought, had forc’d the groan
Her father breathed; his agonies alone
Were present to her mind; she clasp’d his knees,
Wept for his Curse, and did not feel her own.

2.
Nor, when she saw her plague, did her good heart,
True to itself, even for a moment fail.
Ha, Rajah! with disdainful smile she cries,
Mighty, and wise, and wicked as thou art,
Still thy blind vengeance acts a friendly part.
Shall I not thank thee for this scour’f and scale
Of dire deformity, whose loathsome ness,
Surer than panoply of strongest mail,
Arms me against all foes? Oh, better so,
Better such foul disgrace,
That this innocent face
Should tempt thy woeing! That I need not dread
Nor ever impious foe
Will offer outrage now, nor further woe
Will beauty draw on my unhappy head;
Safe through the unholy world may Kailyal go.

3.
Her face, in virtuous pride,
Was lifted to the skies,
As him and his poor vengeance she defied;
But earthward, when she ceased, she turn’d her eyes,
As if she sought to hide
The tear which in her own despite would rise.
Did then the thought of her own Glendoveer
Call forth that natural tear?
Was it a woman’s fear,
A thought of earthly love which troubled her?
Like yon thin cloud, amid the moonlight sky,
That fits before the wind,
And leaves no trace behind,
The womanly pain pass’d over Kailyal’s mind.
This is a loathsome sight to human eye,
Half shrinking at herself, the maiden thought;
Will it be so to him? Oh, surely not!
The immortal Powers, who see
Through the poor wrappings of mortality,
Behold the soul, the beautiful soul, within,
Except from age and wasting maladies,
And undeform’d, while pure and free from sin.
This is a loathsome sight to human eyes,
But not to eyes divine,
Ereenia, Son of Heaven, oh, not to thine!

4.
The wrongful thought of fear, the womanly pain
Had pass’d away; her heart was calm again.
She raised her head, expecting now to see
The Glendoveer appear;
Where hath he fled, quoth she,
That he should tarry now? Oh! had she known
Whither the adventurous Son of Heaven was flown,
Strong as her spirit was, it had not borne
The appalling thought, nor dared to hope for his return.

5.
For he in search of Seeva’s throne was gone,
To tell his tale of wrong;
In search of Seeva’s own abode
The Glendoveer began his heavenly road.
O wild emprise! above the farthest skies
He hoped to rise!

Him who is throne beyond the reach of thought,
The Alone, the Inaccessible, he sought.
O wild emprise! for when, in days of yore,
For proud preeminence of power,
Branna and Veeshnoo, wild with rage, contended,
And Seeva, in his might,
Their dread contention ended,
Before their sight
In form a fiery column did he tower,
Whose head above the highest height extended,
Whose base below the deepest depth descended.
Downward, its depth to sound,
Veeshnoo a thousand years explored
The fathomless profound,
And yet no base he found:
Upward, to reach its head,
Ten myriad years the aspiring Branna soar’d,
And still, as up he fled,
Above him still the Immeasurable spread.
The rivals own’d their Lord,
And trembled and adored.
How shall the Glendoveer attain
What Branna and what Veeshnoo sought in vain?

6.
Ne’er did such thought of lofty daring enter
Celestial Spirit’s mind. O wild adventure
That throne to find, for he must leave behind
This World, that in the centre,
Within its salt-sea girdle, lies confined;
Yea, the Seven Earths that, each with its own
Ocean, ring clasping ring, compose the mighty round.
What power of motion,
In less than endless years shall bear him there,
Along the limitless extent,
To the utmost bound of the remotest spheres?
What strength of wing
Suffice to pierce the Golden Firmament
That closes all within?
Yet he hath pass’d the measureless extent,
And pierced the Golden Firmament;
For Faith hath given him power, and Space and Time
Vanish before that energy sublime.
Noe doth eternal Night
And outer Darkness check his resolute flight;
By strong desire through all he makes his way,
Till Seeva’s Seat appears,— behold Mount Calasay!

Behold the Silver Mountain! round about
Seven ladders stand, so high, the aching eye,
Seeking their tops in vain amid the sky,
Mighty deen they led from earth to highest Heaven.
Ages would pass away,
And worlds with age decay,
Ere one, whose patient feet, from ring to ring,
Must win their upward way,
Could reach the summit of Mount Calasay.
But that strong power that nerved his wing,
That all-surmounting will,
Integrity and holiest love,
Sustain’d Ereemin still;
And he hath gain’d the plain, the sanctuary above.

Lo, there the Silver Bell,
That, self-sustained, hangs buoyant in the air!
Lo! the broad Table there, too bright
For mortal sight,
From whose four sides the bordering gems unite
Their harmonizing rays,
In one mid fount of many-color’d light.
The stream of splendor, flashing as it flows,
Plays round, and feeds the stem of your celestial Rose!
Where is the Sage whose wisdom can declare
The hidden things of that mysterious flower,
That flower which serves all mysteries to bear?
The sacred Triangle is there,
Holding the Emblem which no tongue may tell;
Is this the Heaven of Heavens, where Seeva’s self doth dwell?

Here first the Glendoveer
Felt his wing flag, and paused upon his flight.
Was it that fear came over him, when here
He saw the imagined throne appear?
Not so, for his immortal sight
Endured the Table’s light;
Distinctly he beheld all things around,
And doubt and wonder rose within his mind
That this was all he found.
Howbeit he lifted up his voice, and spake.
There is oppression in the World below;
Earth groans beneath the yoke; yea, in her woe
She asks if the Avenger’s eye is blind?
Awake, O Lord, awake!
Too long thy vengeance sleepeth. Holiest One!
Put thou thy terrors on for mercy’s sake,
And strike the blow, in justice to mankind!

So, as he pray’d, intenser faith he felt;
His spirit seem’d to melt.
With ardent yearnings of increasing love;
Upward he turn’d his eyes,
As if there should be something yet above;
Let me not, Seeva! seek in vain! he cries;
Thou art not here,— for how should these contain thee?
Thou art not here,— for how should I sustain thee?
But thou, where’er thou art,
Canst hear the voice of prayer,
Canst read the righteous heart.
Thy dwelling who can tell?
Or who, O Lord, hath seen thy secret throne?
But Thou art not alone,
Not unapproachable!
O all-containing Mind,
Thou who art everywhere,
Whom all who seek shall find,
Hear me, O Seeva! hear the suppliant’s prayer!

So saying, up he sprung,
And struck the Bell, which self-suspended hung
Before the mystic Rose
From side to side the silver tongue
Melodious swung, and far and wide
Soul-thrilling tones of heavenly music rung.
Ahash’d, confounded
It left the Glendoveer; yea, all astounded
In overpowering fear and deep dismay;
For when that Bell had sounded,
The Rose, with all the mysteries it surrounded,
The Bell, the Table, and Mount Calasay,
The holy Hill itself, with all thereon,
Even as a morning dream, before the day,
Dissolves away, they faded and were gone.

Where shall he rest his wing? where turn for flight?
For all around is Light,
Primal, essential, all-pervading Light!
Heart cannot think, nor tongue declare,
Nor eyes of Angel bear
That Glory unimaginably bright;
The Sun himself had seem’d
A speck of darkness there,
Amid that Light of Light!

Down fell the Glendoveer;
Down through all regions, to our mundane sphere
THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

XX.

THE EMBARKATION.

1.
Dows from the Heaven of Heavens Ereenia fell
Precipitate, yet imperceptible
His fall; nor had he cause nor thought of fear;
And when he came within this mundane sphere,
And felt that Earth was near,
The Glendoveer his azure wings expanded,
And, sloping down the sky
Toward the spot from whence he sprung on high,
There on the shore he landed.

2.
Kailyal advance'd to meet him,
Not moving now as she was wont to greet him,
Joy in her eye and in her eager pace;
With a calm smile of melancholy pride
She met him now, and, turning half aside,
Her warning hand repell'd the dear embrace.

3.
Strange things, Ereenia, have befallen us here,
The Virgin said; the Almighty Man hath read
The lines which, traced by Nature on my brain,
There to the gifted eye
Make all my fortunes plain,
Mapping the mazes of futurity.
He sued for peace, for it is written there
That I with him the Amreeta must share;
Wherefore he bade me come, and by his side
Sit on the Sworga-throne, his equal bride.
I need not tell thee what reply was given;
My heart, the sure interpreter of Heaven,
His impious words belied.
Thou seest his poor revenge! So having said,
One look she glanced upon her leprous stain
Indignantly, and shook
Her head in calm disdain.

4.
O Maid of soul divine!
O more than ever dear,
And more than ever mine,
Replied the Glendoveer;
He hath not read, be sure, the mystic ways
Of Fate; almighty as he is, that maze
Hath mock'd his fullible sight.
Said he the Anreeta cup? So far aight
The Evil One may see; for Fate displays
Her hidden things in part, and part conceals,
Baffling the wicked eye
Alike with what she hides, and what reveals,
When with unholly purpose it would pray
Into the secrets of futurity.
So may it be permitted him to see
Dimly the inscrutable decree;
For to the world below,
Where Yamen guards the Amreeta, we must go;
Thus Sceva hath express'd his will; even he,
The holiest, hath ordain'd it; there, he saith,
All wrongs shall be redress'd
By Yamen, by the righteous Power of Death.

5.
Forthwith the Father and the fated Maid,
And that heroic Spirit, who for them
Such flight had late essay'd,
The will of Heaven obey'd.
They went their way along the road
That leads to Yamen's dread abode.

6.
Many a day hath pass'd away
Since they began their arduous way,
Their way of toil and pain;
And now their weary feet attain
The Earth's remotest bound,
Where outer Ocean girds it round.
But not like other Oceans this;
Rather it seem'd a drear abyss,
Upon whose brink they stood.
Oh! scene of fear! the travellers hear
The raging of the flood;
They hear how fearfully it roars,
But clouds of darker shade than night
Forever hovering round those shores
Hide all things from their sight;
The Sun upon that darkness pours
His unwavailing light,
Nor ever Moon nor Stars display,
Through the thick shade, one guiding ray
To show the perils of the way.

7.
There, in a creak, a vessel lay;
Just on the confines of the day,
It rode at anchor in its bay,
These venturous pilgrims to convey
Across that outer Sea.
Strange vessel sure it seem'd to be,
And all unfit for such wild sea!
For through its yawning side the wave
Was cooing in; the mast was frail,
And old and torn its only sail.
How may that crazy vessel brave
The billows that in wild commotion
Forever roar and rave?
How hope to cross the dreadful Ocean
O'er which eternal shadows dwell,
Whose secrets none return to tell!

8.
Well might the travellers fear to enter!
But summon'd once on that adventure,
For them was no retreat.
Nor boots it with reluctant feet
To linger on the strand;
Aboard! aboard!
An awful voice, that left no choice,
Sent forth its stern command,
Aboard! aboard!
The travellers hear that voice in fear,
And breathe to Heaven an inward prayer,
And take their seats in silence there.

9.
Self-hoisted then, behold the sail
Expands itself before the gale;
Hands which they cannot see, let slip
The cable of that fated Ship;
The land breeze sends her on her way,
And lo! they leave the living light of day!

XXI.
THE WORLD'S END.

1.
Swift as an arrow in its flight
The Ship shot through the incumbent night;
And they have left behind
The raging billows and the roaring wind,
The storm, the darkness, and all mortal fears;
And lo! another light
To guide their way appears,
The light of other spheres.

2.
That instant from Ladurlad's heart and brain
The Curse was gone; he feels again
Fresh as in youth's fair morning, and the Maid
Hath lost her leprous stain.
The Tyrant then hath no dominion here,
Starting, she cried; O happy, happy hour!
We are beyond his power!
Then, raising to the Glendower,
With heavenly beauty bright, her angel face,
Turn'd not reluctant now, and met his dear embrace.

3.
Swift glides the Ship with gentle motion
Across that calm and quiet ocean,
That glassy sea, which seem'd to be
The mirror of tranquillity.
Their pleasant passage soon was o'er;
The Ship hath reach'd its destined shore —
A level belt of ice, which bound,
As with an admantine mound.
The waters of the sleeping Ocean round.
Strange forms were on the strand
Of earth-born spirits slain before their time;
Who, wandering over sea, and sky, and land,
Had so fulfill'd their term; and now were met
Upon this icy belt, a motley band,
Waiting their summons at the appointed hour,
When each before the Judgment-seat must stand,
And hear his doom from Baly's righteous power.

4.
Foul with habitual crimes, a hideous crew
Were there, the race of rapine and of blood.
Now, having overpass'd the mortal flood,
Their own deformity they knew,
And knew the need that to their deeds was due.
Therefore in fear and agony they stood,
Expecting when the Evil Messenger
Among them should appear. But with their fear
A hope was mingled now;
O'er the dark shade of guilt a deeper hue
It threw, and gave a fiercer character
To the wild eye, and lip, and sinful brow.
They hoped that soon Kehama would subdue
The inexorable God, and seize his throne,
Reduce the infernal World to his command,
And, with his irresistible right hand,
Redeem them from the vaults of Padalon.

5.
Apart from these, a milder company,
The victims of offences not their own,
Look'd when the appointed Messenger should come;
Gather'd together some, and some alone
Brooding in silence on their future doom.
Widows whom, to their husbands' funeral fire,
Force or strong error led, to share the pyre,
As to their everlasting marriage-bed;
And babes, by sin unstain'd,
Whom erring parents vow'd
To Gauges, and the holy stream profaned
With that strange sacrifice, rite unordain'd
By Law, by sacred Nature unallow'd;
Others more hapless in their destiny,
Scarce having first inhale their vital breath,
Whose cradles from some tree
Unnatural hands suspended,
Then left, till gentle Death,
Coming like Sleep, their feeble meanings ended;
Or for his prey the ravenous Kite descended;
Or marching like an army from their caves,
The Pismires blacken'd o'er, then, bleach'd and bare,
Left their unharden'd bones to fall asunder there.

Innocent Souls! thus set so early free
From sin, and sorrow, and mortality,
Their spotless spirits all-creating Love
Received into its universal breast.
Yon blue serene above
Was their domain; clouds pillow'd them to rest;
The Elements on them like nurses tend'd,
And with their growth ethereal substance blended.
Less pure than these is that strange Indian bird,
Who never dips in earthly streams her bill,
But, when the sound of coming showers is heard,
Looks up, and from the clouds receives her fill.
Less pure the footless fowl of Heaven, that never Rest upon earth, but on the wing forever
Hovering o'er flowers, their fragrant food inhale,
Drink the descending dew upon its way,
And sleep aloft while floating on the gale.
7.
And thus these innocents, in yonder sky,
Grow and are strengthen'd, while the allotted years
Perform their course; then hitherward they fly,
Being free from moral taint, so free from fears,
A joyous band, expecting soon to soar
To Indra's happy spheres,
And mingle with the blessed company
Of heavenly spirits there for evermore.

8.
A Gulf profound surrounded
This icy belt; the opposite side
With highest rocks was bounded,
But where their heads they hide,
Or where their base is founded,
None could espy. Above all reach of sight
They rose; the second Earth was on their height;
Their feet were fix'd in everlasting night.

9.
So deep the Gulf, no eye
Could plumb its dark profundity,
Yet all its depth must try; for this the road
To Padalon, and Yamen's dread abode.
And from below continually
Ministrant Demons rose and caught
The Souls whose hour was come;
Then, with their burden fraught,
Plunged down, and bore them to receive their doom.

10.
Then might be seen who went in hope, and who Trembled to meet the meed
Of many a foul misdeed, as wild they threw
Their arms retorted from the Demons' grasp,
And look'd around, all eagerly, to seek
For help, where help was none; and strove for aid
To clasp the nearest shade;
Yea, with imploring looks and horrent shrill,
Even from one Demon to another bending,
With hands extending,
Their mercy they essay'd.
Still from the verge they strain,
And from the dreadful Gulf avert their eyes,
In vain; down plunge the Demons, and their cries
Feeble, as down they sink, from that profound arise.

11.
What heart of living man could undisturb'd
Bear sight so sad as this! What wonder there
If Kailyal's lip were blanch'd with immost dread!
The chill which from that icy belt
Struck through her, was less keen than what she felt
With her heart's blood through every limb dispread.
Close to the Glendoveer she clung,
And clasping round his neck her trembling hands,
She closed her eyes, and there in silence hung.

12.
Then to Ladurlad said the Glendoveer,
These Demons, whom thou seest, the ministers
Of Yamen, wonder to behold us here;
But for the dead they come, and not for us;
Therefore, albeit they gaze upon thee thus,
Have thou no fear.
A little while thou must be left alone,
Till I have borne thy daughter down,
And placed her safely by the throne
Of him who keeps the Gate of Padalon.

13.
Then, taking Kailyal in his arms, he said,
Be of good heart, Beloved! it is I
Who bear thee. Saying this, his wings he spread,
Sprung upward in the sky, and poised his flight,
Then plunged into the Gulf, and sought the World of Night.

XXII.

THE GATE OF PADALON.

1.
The strong foundations of this inmost Earth
Rest upon Padalon. That icy Mound,
Which girt the mortal Ocean round,
Reach'd the profound,—
Ice in the regions of the upper air,
Crystal midway, and adamant below,
Whose strength sufficed to bear
The weight of all this upper World of ours,
And with its rampart closed the Realm of Woe.
Eight gates hath Padalon; eight heavenly Powers
Have them in charge, each alway at his post,
Lest from their penal caves the accursed host,
Maugre the might of Baly and the God,
Should break, and carry ruin all abroad.

2.
Those gates stand ever open, night and day,
And Souls of mortal men
Forever throng the way.
Some from the dolorous den,
Children of sin and wrath, return no more:
They, fit companions of the Spirits accurs'd,
Are doom'd, like them in baths of fire immers'd,
Or wertering upon beds of molten ore,
Or stretch'd upon the brazen floor,
Are fasten'd down with adamantine chains;
While on their substance, inconsumable
Leccheis of fire forever lang and pull,
And worms of fire forever gnaw their food,
That, still renew'd,
Freshens forever their perpetual pains.

3.
Others there were whom Baly's voice condemn'd
By long and painful penance, to atone
Their fleshly deeds. Them from the Judgment Throne,
Dread Azyorcura, where she sat involved
In darkness as a tent, received, and dealt
To each the measure of his punishment;
Till, in the central springs of fire, the Will
Impure is purged away; and the freed soul,
Thus fitted to receive a second birth,
Imbodied once again, revisits Earth.

4.
But they whom Baly’s righteous voice absoluted,
And Yamen, viewing with benignant eye,
Dismiss’d to seek their herbage on high,
How joyfully they leave this gloomy bourn,
The dread sojourn
Of Guilt and twin-born Punishment and Woe,
And wild Remorse, here link’d with worse Despair!
They to the eastern Gate rejoicing go:
The Ship of Heaven awaits their coming there;
And on they sail, greeting the blessed light
Through realms of upper air,
Bound for the Swarga once; but now no more
Their voyage rests upon that happy shore,
Since Indra, by the dreadful Rajah’s might Compell’d, hath taken flight;
On to the second World their way they wend,
And there, in trembling hope, await the doubtful end.

5.
For still in them dath hope predominate,
Faith’s precious privilege, when higher Powers
Give way to fear in these portentous hours.
Behold the Wardens eight
Each silent at his gate
Expectant stands; they turn their anxious eyes
Within, and listening to the dizer din
Of mutinous uproar, each in all his hands
Holds all his weapons, ready for the fight.
For, bash! what clamorous cries
Upon Kehama, for deliverance, call!
Come, Rajah! they exclaim; too long we groan
In torments. Come, Deliverer! yonder throne
Awaits thee. Now, Kehama! Rajah, now!
Earthly Almighty, whereforearest thou then?
Such were the sounds that rung, in wild uproar,
O’er all the echoing vaults of Padalon;
And as the Asuras from the brazen floor,
Struggling against their fetters, strove to rise,
Their clashing chains were heard, and shrieks and cries,
With curses mix’d, against the Fiends who urge,
Fierce on their rebel limbs, the avenging scourge.

6.
These were the sounds which, at the southern Gate,
Assail’d Erecnia’s car; alighting here,
He laid before Nerroodi’s feet the Maid,
Who, pale and cold with fear,
Hung on his neck, well nigh a lifeless weight.

7.
Who and what art thou? cried the Guardian Power,
Sight so unwonted wondering to behold,—
O Son of Light!
Who comest here at this portentous hour,
When Yamen’s throne
Trembles, and all our might can scarce keep down
The rebel race from seizing Padalon,—
Who and what art thou? and what wild despair,

Or wilder hope, from realms of upper air,
Tempts thee to bear
This mortal Maid to our forlorn abodes?
Fitter for her, I ween, the Swerga bowers,
And sweet society of heavenly Powers,
Then this,— a doleful scene,
Even in securest hours.
And whither would ye go?
Alas! can human or celestial ear
Unmadden’d hear
The shrieks and yellings of internal woe?
Can living flesh and blood
Endure the passage of the fiery flood!

8.
Lord of the Gate, replied the Glendoverer,
We come obedient to the will of Fate;
And haply doom’d to bring
Hope and salvation to the Infernal King;
For Seeva sends us here;
Even He to whom futurity is known,
The Holiest, bade us go to Yamen’s throne.
Thou seest my precious charge;
Under thy care, secure from harm, I leave her,
While I ascend to bear her Father down.
Beneath the shelter of thine arm receive her!

9.
Then quoth he to the Maid,
Be of good cheer, my Kailyal! dearest dear,
In faith subdued thy dread;
Anon I shall be here.— So having said,
Aloft, with vigorous bound, the Glendoverer
Sprung in celestial might,
And soaring up, in spiral circles, wound
His indefatigable flight.

10.
But as he thus departed,
The Maid, who at Nerroodi’s feet was lying,
Like one intranced or dying,
Recovering strength from sudden terror, started;
And, gazing after him, with straining sight
And straining arms, she stood,
As if in attitude
To win him back from flight.
Yea, she had shaped his name
For utterance, to recall and bid him stay,
Nor leave her thus alone; but virtuous shame
Repress’d the unbidden sounds upon their way;
And calling faith to aid,
Even in this fearful hour, the pious Maid
Collected courage, till she seem’d to be
Calm and in hope; such power hath piety.
Before the Giant Keeper of the Gate
She cross’d her patient arms, and at his feet
Prepar’d to meet
The awful will of Fate with equal mind,
She took her seat resign’d.

11.
Even the stern trouble of Nerroodi’s brow
Relax’d as he beheld the valiant Maid.
Hope, long unfelt till now,
Rose in his heart reviving, and a smile
Dawn'd in his brightening countenance, the while
He gazea on her with wonder and delight.
The blessing of the Powers of Padalon,
Virgin, be on thee! said the adorning God;
And cause ye the hour that gave thee birth,
Daughter of Earth!
For thou to this forborn abode hast brought
Hope, who too long hath been a stranger here.
And surely for no lamentable lot,
Nature, that erst not,
To thee that heart of fortitude hath given,
Those eyes of purity, that face of love: —
If thou be'st not the inheritrix of Heaven,
There is no truth above.

12.
Thus as Neroodi spake, his brow severe
Shone with an inward joy; for sure he thought,
When Seeva sent so fair a creature here,
In this momentous hour,
Erelong the World's deliverance would be wrought,
And Padalon escape the Rajah's power.
With pious mind the Maid, in humble guise
Inclined, received his blessing silently,
And raised her grateful eyes
A moment, then again
Abased them at his presence. Hark! on high
The sound of coming wings! — her anxious ears
Have caught the distant sound. Erenica brings
His burden down! Upstarting from her seat,
How joyfully she rears
Her eager head! and scarce upon the ground
Ladurâd's giddy feet their footing found,
When with her trembling arms she clasp'd him round.
No word of greeting,
No other sign of joy at that strange meeting;
Expectant of their fate,
Silent, and hand in hand,
Before the Infernal Gate,
The Father and his pious Daughter stand.

13.
Then to Neroodi said the Glendoveer,
No Heaven-born Spirit e'er hath visited
This region drear and dread, but I, the first
Who tread your World accur'd.
Lord of the Gate, to whom these realms are known,
Direct our fated way to Yamen's throne.

14.
Bring forth my Chariot, Carmala! quoth then
The Keeper of the way.
It was the Car wherein,
On Yamen's festal day,
When all the Powers of Hell attend their King,
Yearly to Yamencpur did he repair
To pay his homage there.
Poised on a single wheel, it mov'd along,
Instinct with motion; by what wondrous skill
Compact, no human tongue could tell,
Nor human wit devise; but on that wheel,
Moving or still,
As if with life indined,
The Car miraculously supported stood.

15.
Then Carmala brought forth two mantles, white
As the swan's breast, and bright as mountain snow,
When from the wintry sky
The sun, late rising, shined upon the height,
And rolling vapors fill the vale below.
Not without pain the unaccustomed'sight
That brightness could sustain;
For neither mortal stain,
Nor parts corruptible, remain,
Nor aught that time could touch, or force destroy,
In that pure web whereof the robes were wrought;
So long had it in tenfold fires been tried,
And blanch'd, and to that brightness purified.
Apparel'd thus, alone,
Children of Earth, Neroodi cried,
In safety may ye pass to Yamen's throne.
Thus only can your living flesh and blood
Endure the passage of the fiery flood.

16.
Of other frame, O son of Heaven, art thou!
Yet hast thou now to go
Through regions which thy heavenly mould will try.
Glories unutterably bright, I know,
And beams intense of empyreal light,
Thine eye divine can bear; but fires of woe,
The sight of torments, and the cry
Of absolute despair,—
Might not these things dismay thee on thy flight,
And thy strong pennons flag and fail thee there?
Trust not thy wings, celestial though thou art,
Nor thy good heart, which horror might assail,
And pity quail,
Pity in these shades of no avail;
But take thy seat this mortal pair beside,
And Carmala the infernal Car will guide.
Go, and may happy e'er thy way betide!
So, as he spake, the self-moved Car roll'd on;
And lo! they pass the Gate of Padalon.

XXIII.
PADALON.

1.
Who'er hath loved, with venturous step, to tread
The chambers dread
Of some deep cave, and seen his taper's beam
Lost in the arch of darkness overhead,
And mark'd its gleam,
Playing afar upon the sunless stream,
Wherefrom their secret bed,
And course unknown and inaccessible,
The silent waters well,—
Who'er hath trod such caves of endless night,
He knows, when measuring back the gloomy way,
With what delight refresh'd, his eye
Perceives the shadow of the light of day,
Through the far portal slanting, where it falls
Dully reflected on the watery walls;
How heavenly seems the sky;
And how, with quicker'd feet, he hastens up,
Eager again to greet
The living World and blessed sunshine there,
And drink, as from a cup
Of joy, with thirsty lips, the open air.

2.
Far other light than that of day there shone
Upon the travellers, entering Padalon.
They too in darkness enter'd on their way,
 But far before the Car,
A glow, as of a fiery furnace light,
Fill'd all before them. 'Twas a light which made
Darkness itself appear
A thing of comfort, and the sight, dismay'd,
Shrunk inward from the molten atmosphere.
Their way was through the adamantine rock
Which girt the World of Woe; on either side
Its massive walls arose, and overhead
Arch'd the long passage; onward as they ride,
With stronger glare the light around them spread,
And lo! the regions dread,
The World of Woe before them, opening wide.

3.
There rolls the fiery flood,
Girding the realms of Padalon around.
A sea of flame it seem'd to be,
Sea without bound;
For neither mortal nor immortal sight
Could pierce across through that intensest light.
A single rib of steel,
Keen as the edge of keenest cimeter,
Spann'd this wide gulf of fire. The informal
Car
Roll'd to the Gulf, and, on its single wheel
Self-balanced, rose upon that edge of steel.
Red-quivering float the vapors overhead;
The fiery gulf, beneath them spread,
Tosses its billowing blaze with rush and roar;
Steady and swift the self-moved Chariot went,
Winning the long ascent,
Then, downward rolling, gains the farther shore.

4.
But, oh! what sounds and sights of woe
What sights and sounds of fear,
Assail the mortal travellers here!
Their way was on a causey straight and wide,
Where penal vaults on either side were seen,
Ranged like the cells wherein
Those wondrous winged alchemists infold
Their stores of liquid gold.
Thick walls of adamant divide
The dungeons; and from yonder circling flood,
Off-streams of fire through secret channels glide,
And wind among them, and in each provide
An everlasting foot
Of rightful torments for the accused brood.

5.
These were the rebel race, who, in their might Confiding impossibly, would fain have driven
The deities supreme from highest Heaven;
But by the Surs, in celestial fight,
Opposed and put to flight,
Here, in their penal dens, the accused crew,
Not for its crime, but for its failure, rue
Their wild ambition. Yet again they long
The contest to renew,
And wield their arms again in happier hour;
And with united power,
Following Kehama's triumph, to press on
From World to World, and Heaven to Heaven,
And Sphere
To Sphere, till Hemakost shall be their own,
And Meru Mount, and Indra's Swarga-Bowers,
And Brama's region, where the heavenly Hours
Weave the vast circle of his age-long day.
Even over Veschnoo's empyreal seat
They trust the Rajah shall extend their sway,
And that the seven-headed Snake, whereon
The strong Preserver sets his conquering feet,
Will rise and shake him headlong from his throne,
When, in their irresistible array,
Amid the Milky Sea they force their way.
Even higher yet their frantic thoughts aspire;
Yea, on their beds of torment as they lie,
The highest, holiest Seeva, they defy,
And tell him they shall have anon their day,
When they will storm his realm, and seize Mount Calasay.

6.
Such impious hopes torment
Their raging hearts, impious and impotent;
And now, with unendurable desire
And lust of vengeance, that, like inward fire,
Doth aggravate their punishment, they rave
Upon Kehama; him the accused rout
Acclaim; with furious cries and maddening shout
They call on him to save;
Kehama! they exclaim;
Thundering the dreadful echo rolls about,
And Hell's whole vault repeats Kehama's name.

7.
Over these dens of punishment, the host
Of Padalon maintain eternal guard,
Keeping upon the walls their vigilant ward.
At every angle stood
A watch-tower, the deciouron Demon's post,
Where raised on high he view'd with sleepless eye
His trust, that all was well. And over these, —
Such was the perfect discipline of Hell,—
Captains of fifties and of hundreds held
Authority, each in his loftier tower;
And chiefs of regiments over them had power;
And thus all Hell with towers was girt around.
Aboft the brazen turrets shone
The red light of Padalon;
And on the walls between,
Dark moving, the infernal Guards were seen,
Gigantic Demons, pacing to and fro;
Who, ever and anon
Spreading their crimson pennons, plunged below,
Faster to rivet down the Asuras’ chains,
And with the snaky scourge and fiercer pains,
Repress their rage rebellious. Loud around,
In mingled sound, the echoing lash, the clash
Of chains, the ponderous hammer’s iron stroke,
With exactions, groans, and shrieks, and cries,
Combined, in one wild dissonance, arise;
And through the din there broke,
Like thunder heard through all the warring winds,
The dreadful name. Kehama, still they rave,
Hasten and save!
Now, now, Deliverer! now, Kehama, now!
Earthly Almighty, wherefore tarriest thou?

8.
Oh, if that name abhor’d,
Thus utter’d, could well nigh
Dismay the Powers of Hell, and daunt their Lord,
How fearfully to Kailyal’s ear it came!
She, as the car roll’d on its rapid way,
Bent down her head, and closed her eyes for dread;
And deafening, with strong effort from within,
Her ears against the din,
Cover’d and press’d them close with both her hands.
Sure, if the mortal Maiden had not fed
On heavenly food, and long been strengthened
With heavenly converse for such end vouchsafed,
Her human heart had fail’d, and she had die’d
Beneath the horrors of this awful hour.
But Heaven supplied a power
Beyond her earthly nature, to the measure
Of need infusing strength;
And Fate, whose secret and unerring pleasure
Appointed all, decreed
An ample need and recompense at length.
High-fled Maid, the righteous hour is nigh!
The all-embracing eye
Of Retribution still beholdest thee;
Bear onward to the end, O Maid, courageously!

9.
On roll’d the car, and lo! afar
Upon its height the towers of Yamenpur
Rise on the astonished sight.
Behold the infernal City, Yamen’s seat
Of empire, in the midst of Padalon,
Where the eight causeys meet.
There, on a rock of adamant, it stood,
Resplendent far and wide,
Itself of solid diamond edific’d,
And all around it roll’d the fiery flood.
Eight bridges arch’d the stream; huge piles of brass
Magnificent, such structures as beseeem
The Seat and Capital of such great God,
Worthy of Yamen’s own august abode.
A brazen tower and gateway at each end
Of each was raised, where Giant Wardens stood,
Station’d in arms the passage to defend,
That never foe might cross the fiery flood.

10.
Oh, what a gorgeous sight it was to see
The Diamond City blazing on its height
With more than mid-sun splendor, by the light
Of its own fiery river!
Its towers, and domes, and pinnacles, and spires,
Turrets and battlements, that flash and quiver
Through the red, restless atmosphere forever;
And hovering overhead,
The smoke and vapors of all Padalon,
Fit firmament for such a world, were spread,
With surge, and swell, and everlasting motion,
Heaving and opening like tumultuous ocean.

11.
Nor were there wanting there
Such glories as beseeem’d such region well;
For though with our blue heaven and genial air
The firmament of Hell might not compare,
As little might our earthly tempests vie
With the dread storms of that infernal sky,
Whose clouds of all metallic elements
Sublimed were full. For, when its thunder broke,
Not all the united World’s artillery,
In one discharge, could equal that loud stroke;
And though the Diamond Towers and Battlements
Stood firm upon their adamantine rock,
Yet while it volleyed round the vault of Hell,
Earth’s solid arch was shaken with the shock,
And Cities in one mighty ruin fell.
Through the red sky terrific meteors scour;
Huge stones come hailing down; or sulphur-shower,
Floating amid the lurid air like snow,
Kindles in its descent,
And with blue fire-drops rains on all below.
At times the whole supernal element,
Ignoting, burst in one vast sheet of flame,
And roar’d as with the sound
Of rushing winds, above, below, around;
Anon the flame was spent, and overhead
A heavy cloud of moving darkness spread.

12.
Straight to the brazen bridge and gate
The self-moved Chariot bears its mortal load.
At sight of Carmala,
On either side the Giant Guards divide,
And give the chariot way.
Up yonder winding road it rolls along,
Swift as the bittern soars on spiral wing,
And lo! the Palace of the Infernal King!

13.
Two forms inseparable in unity
Hath Yamen; even as with hope or fear
The Soul regardeth him doth he appear;
For hope and fear,
At that dread hour, from ominous conscience spring,
And err not in their bodings. Therefore some,
They who polluted with offences come,
Behold him as the King
Of Terrors, black of aspect, red of eye,
Reflecting back upon the sinful mind,
Heighten'd with vengeance, and with wrath divine,
Its own inherent deformity.
But to the righteous Spirit how benign
His awful countenance,
Where, tempering justice with parental love,
Goodness, and heavenly grace,
And sweetest mercy shine! Yet is he still Himself the same, one form, one face, one will;
And these his twofold aspects are but one;
And change is none
In him for change in Yamen could not be;
The Immutable is he.

14.
He sat upon a marble sepulchre,
Massive and huge, where, at the Monarch's feet,
The righteous Baly had his Judgment-seat.
A Golden Throne before them vacant stood;
Three human forms sustain'd its ponderous weight,
With lifted hands outspread, and shoulders bow'd
Bending beneath the load.
A fourth was wanting. They were of the hue
Of coals of fire; yet were they flesh and blood,
And living breath they drew;
And their red eyeballs roll'd with ghastly stare,
As thus, for their misdeeds, they stood torment'd there.

15.
On steps of gold those living Statues stood,
Who bore the Golden Throne. A cloud behind
Immovable was spread; not all the light
Of all the flames and fires of Padalon
Could pierce its depth of night.
There Azyoraca veil'd her awful form
In those eternal shadows: there she sat,
And as the trembling Souls, who crowd around
The Judgment-seat, received the doom of fate,
Her giant arms, extending from the cloud,
Drew them within the darkness. Moving out
To grasp and bear away the innumerable rout,
Forever and forever thus were seen
The thousand mighty arms of that dread Queen.

16.
Here, issuing from the Car, the Glendoyer
Did homage to the God, then raised his head.
Suppliants we come, he said,
I need not tell thee by what wrongs oppress'd,
For nought can pass on earth to thee unknown;
Sufferers from tyranny we seek for rest,
And Seera bade us go to Yamen's throne;
Here, he hath said, all wrongs shall be redress'd.
Yamen replied, Even now the hour draws near,
When Fate its hidden ways will manifest
Not for light purpose would the Wiseest send
His suppliants here, when we, in doubt and fear,
The awful issue of the hour attend.
Wait ye in patience and in faith the end!

XXIV.
THE AMREETA.

1.
So spake the King of Padalon, when, lo!
The voice of lamentation ceas'd in Hell,
And sudden silence all around them fell,
Silence more wild and terrible
Than all the infernal dissonance before.
Through that portentous stillness, far away,
Unwonted sounds were heard, advancing on
And deepening on their way;
For now the inexorable hour
Was come, and, in the fulness of his power,
Now that the dreadful rites had all been done,
Kehama from the Swerga hastened down
To seize upon the throne of Padalon.

2.
He came in all his might and majesty,
With all his terrors clad, and all his pride;
And, by the attribute of Deity,
Which he had won from Heaven, self-multiplied,
The Almighty Man appear'd on every side.
In the same indivisible point of time,
At the eight Gates he stood at once, and beat
The Warden-Gods of Hell beneath his feet;
Then, in his brazen Cars of triumph, straight,
At the same moment, drove through every gate.
By Aullays, hugest of created kind,
Fiercest, and fleeter than the viewless wind,
His Cars were drawn, ten yokes of ten abreast,—
What less sufficed for such almighty weight?
Eight bridges from the fiery flood arose,
Growing before his way; and on he goes,
And drives the thundering Chariot-wheels along,
At once o'er all the roads of Padalon.

3.
Silent and motionless remain
The Asuras on their bed of pain,
Waiting, with breathless hope, the great event.
All Hell was hush'd in dread,
Such awe that omnipresent coming spread;
Nor had its voice been heard, though all its rout
Innumerable had lifted up one shout;
Nor, if the infernal firmament
Had in one unimaginable burst
Spent its collected thunders, had the sound
Been audible, such louder terrors went Before its forms substantial. Round about
The presence scattered lightnings far and wide,
That quench'd on every side,
With their intensest blaze, the feeble fire
Of Padalon, even as the stars go out,
When, with prodigious light,
Some blazing meteor fills the astonish'd night.

4.
The Diamond City shakes!
The adamantine Rock
Is loosen'd with the shock!
From its foundation moved, it heaves and quakes,
The brazen portals, crumbling, fall to dust;
Prone fall the Giant Guards
Beneath the Aulhays crush'd;
On, on, through Yamenpar, their thundering feet
Speed from all points to Yamen's Judgment-seat.
And lo! where multiplied,
Behind, before him, and on every side,
Wielding all weapons in his countless hands,
Around the Lord of Hell Kehama stands!
Then, too, the Lord of Hell put forth his might:
Thick darkness, blacker than the blackest night,
Rose from their wrath, and veil'd
The unutterable fight.
The power of Fate and Sacrifice prevail'd,
And soon the strife was done.
Then did the Man-God resume
His unity, absorbing into one
The consubstantiate shapes; and as the gloom
Opened, fallen Yamen on the ground was seen,
His neck beneath the conquering Rajah's feet,
Who on the marble tomb
Had his triumphal seat.

5. Silent the Man-Almighty sat; a smile
Gleam'd on his dreadful lips, the while,
Dallying with power, he paused from following up
His conquest, as a man in social hour
Sips of the grateful cup,
Again and yet again, with curious taste,
Searching its subtle flavor ere he drink;
Even so Kehama now forborne his haste,
Having within his reach whate'er he sought.
On his own haughty power he seem'd to muse,
Pampering his arrogant heart with silent thought.
Before him stood the Golden Throne in sight,
Right opposite; he could not choose but see,
Nor seeing choose but wonder. Who are ye
Who bear the Golden Throne terrified there?
He cried; for whom doth Destiny prepare
The Imperial Seat? and why are ye but Three?

6. First Statue.
I of the Children of Mankind was first,
Me miserable! who, adding store to store,
Heap'd up superfluous wealth; and now accrues'd,
Forever I the frantic crime deplore.

Second Statue.
I o'er my Brethren of Mankind the first
Usurping power, set up a throne sublime,
A King and Conqueror; therefore thus accurst,
Forever I in vain repeat the crime.

Third Statue.
I of the Children of Mankind the first,
In God's most holy name, imposed a tale
Of impious falsehood; therefore thus accurst,
Forever I in vain the crime bewail.

7. Even as thou here beholdest us,
Here we have stood, tormented thus,
Such countless ages, that they seem to be Long as eternity;
And still we are but Three.
A Fourth will come to share
Our pain, at yonder vacant corner bear
His portion of the burden, and complete
The Golden Throne for Yamen's Judgment-seat.
Thus hath it been appointed: he must be Equal in guilt to us, the guilty Three.
Kehama, come! too long we wait for thee!

8. Thereat, with one accord,
The Three took up the word, like choral song,
Come, Rajah! Man-God! Earth's Almighty Lord!
Kehama, come! we wait for thee too long.

9. A short and sudden laugh of wondering pride
Burst from him in his triumphs: to reply
Scornful he deign'd not; but with alter'd eye,
Wherein some doubtful meaning seem'd to lie,
He turn'd to Kailyal.
Maiden, thus he cried,
I need not bid thee see
How vain it is to strive with Fate's decree,
When lieth thou hast fled to fly from me,
And lo! even here thou find'st me at thy side.
Mine thou must be, being doom'd with me to share
The Amreeta cup of immortality;
Yea, by Myself I swear,
It hath been thus appointed. Joyfully
Join then thy hand, and heart, and will with mine;
Nor at such glorious destiny repine,
Nor in thy folly more provoke my wrath divine.

10. She answer'd, I have said. It must not be!
Almighty as thou art,
Thou hast put all things underneath thy feet;
But still the resolute heart
And virtuous will are free.
Never, oh! never,—never—can there be
Communion, Rajah, between thee and me.

11. Once more, quoth he, I urge, and once alone.
Thou seest yon Golden Throne,
Where I anon shall set thee by my side;
Take thou thy seat thereon,
Kehama's willing bride,
And I will place the Kingdoms of the World
Beneath thy Father's feet,
Appointing him the King of mortal men:
Else underneath that Throne,
The Fourth supporter he shall stand and groan;
Prayers will be vain to move my mercy then.

12. Again the Virgin answer'd, I have said!
Ladurlad caught her in his proud embrace,
While on his neck she hid
In agony her face.

13. Bring forth the Amreeta-cup! Kehama cried
To Yamen, rising sternly in his pride.
It is within the Marble Sepulchre,
The vant quis’d Lord of Padalon replied;
Bid it be open’d. Give thy treasure up!
Exclam’d the Man-Almighty to the Tomb.
And at his voice and look
The massy fabric shook, and open’d wide.
A huge Anatomy was seen reclined
Within its marble womb. Give me the Cup!
Again Kehama cried; no other charm
Was needed than that voice of stern command.
From his repose the ghastly form arose,
Put forth his bony and gigantic arm,
And gave the Amreeta to the Rajah’s hand.
Take, drink! with accents dreadful the Spectre said;
For thee and Kailyal hath it been assign’d,
Ye only of the Children of Mankind.

14.
Then was the Man-Almighty’s heart elate;
This is the consummation! he exclam’d;
Thus have I triumphed over Death and Fate.
Now, Seeva! look to thine abode!
Henceforth, on equal footing we engage,
Alike immortal now; and we shall wage
Our warfare, God to God!
Joy fill’d his impious soul,
And to his lips he raised the fatal bowl.

15.
Thus long the Glendower had stood
Watching the wonders of the eventful hour,
Amazed, but undismay’d; for in his heart
Faith, overcoming fear, maintain’d its power.
Nor had that faith abated, when the God
Of Padalon was beaten down in fight;
For then he look’d to see the heavenly might
Of Seeva break upon them. But when now
He saw the Amreeta in Kehama’s hand,
An impulse which defied all self-command
In that extremity
Stung him, and he resolved to seize the cup,
And dare the Rajah’s force in Seeva’s sight.
Forward he sprung to temp the unequal fray,
When, lo! the Anatomy
With warning arm, withstood his desperate way,
And from the Golden Throne the Fiery Three
Again, in one accord, renew’d their song—
Kehama, come! we wait for thee too long.

16.
O fool of drunken hope and frantic vice!
Madman! to seek for power beyond thy scope
Of knowledge, and to deem
Less than Omnipotence could suffice
To wield Omnipotence! O fool, to dream
That immortality could be
The meed of evil! — yea, thou hast it now,
Victim of thine own wicked heart’s device;
Thou hast thine object now, and now must pay the price.

17.
He did not know the holy mystery
Of that divinest cup, that as the lips
Which touch it, even such its quality,
Good or malignant: Madman! and he thinks
The blessed prize is won, and joyfully he drinks.

18.
Then Seeva open’d on the Accursed One
His Eye of Anger: upon him alone
The wrath-beam fell. He shudders—but too late;
The deed is done;
The dreadful liquor works the will of Fate.
Immortal he would be,
Immortal he is made; but through his veins
Torture at once and immortality,
A stream of poison doth the Amreeta run,
And while within the burning anguish flows,
His outward body glows,
Like molten ore, beneath the avenging Eye,
Doom’d thus to live and burn eternally.

19.
The Fiery Three,
Beholding him, set up a fiendish cry,
A song of jubilee!
Come, Brother, come! they sang; too long
Have we expected thee?
Henceforth we bear no more
The unequal weight. Come, Brother, we are Four!

20.
Vain his almightiness, for mightier pain
Subdued all power; pain ruled supreme alone;
And yielding to the bony hand
The unempted cup, he moved toward the Throne,
And at the vacant corner took his stand.
Behold the Golden Throne at length complete,
And Yamen silently ascends the Judgment-seat.

21.
For two alone, of all mankind, to me
The Amreeta Cup was given,
Then said the Anatomy;
The Man hath drank, the Woman’s turn is next.
Come, Kailyal, come, receive thy doom,
And do the Will of Heaven! —
Wonder, and Fear, and Awe at once perplex’d
The mortal Maiden’s heart; but over all
Hope rose triumphant. With a trembling hand,
Obedient to his call,
She took the fated Cup; and, lifting up
Her eyes, where holy tears began to swell,
Is it not your command,
Ye heavenly Powers? as on her knees she fell,
The pious Virgin cried;
Ye know my innocent will, my heart sincere;
Ye govern all things still,
And wherefore should I fear?

22.
She said, and drank. The Eye of Mercy beam’d
Upon the Maid: a cloud of fragrance steam’d
Like incense-smoke as all her mortal frame
Dissolved beneath the potent agency
Of that mysterious draught; such quality
From her pure touch the fated Cup partook.
Like one entranced she kneel’d,
Feeling her body melt
the unadulterated cleverness that appeared in her countenance, the resolution with which she matched, washed herself, spoke to the people; the confidence with which she looked upon us, viewed her little cabin, made up of very dry millet-straw and small wood, went into this cabin, and sat down upon the pile, and took her husband's head into her lap, and a torch into her own hand, and kindled the cabin, while I know not how many Brabuans were busy in kindling the fire round about. To represent to you, I say, all this as it ought, is not possible for me; I can at present scarce believe it myself, though it be but a few days since I saw it."

They strip her ornaments away. — I. 11, p. 569.

When the time for consummating the marriage is come, they light the fire Homan with the wood of Ravason. The Branim blesses the former, which, being done, the bridegroom takes three handfuls of rice, and throws it on the bride's head, who does the same to him. Afterwards the bride's father clothes her in a dress according to his condition, and washes the bridegroom's feet; the bride's mother observing to pour out the water. This being done, the father puts his daughter's hand in his own, puts water into it, some pieces of money, and, giving it to the bridegroom, says, at the same time, I have no longer anything to do with you, and I give you up to the power of another. The Tati, which is a ribbon with a golden head hanging at it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck. This knot is what particularly secures his possession of her; for before he had had the Tati on, all the rest of the ceremonies might have been made to no purpose; for it has sometimes happened that when the bridegroom was going to fix it on, the bride's father has discovered his not being satisfied with the bridegroom's gift, when another, offering more, has carried off the bride with her father's consent. But, when once the Tati is put on, the marriage is indissoluble; and whenever the husband dies, the Tati is burnt along with him, to show that the marriage bands are broke. Besides these particular ceremonies, the people have notice of the purchase by a Fundul, which is raised before the bride's door some days before. The whole concludes with an entertainment which the bride's father gives to the common friends; and during this festivity, which continues five days, ams are given to the poor, and the fire Homan is kept in. The seventh day, the new-married couple set out for the bridegroom's house, whither they frequently go by torchlight. The bride and bridegroom are carried in a sedan, pass through the chief streets of the city, and are accompanied by their friends, who are either on horseback or mounted on elephants. — A. Boges.

They force her on, they bind her to the dead. — I. 12, p. 569.

'Tis true, says Bernier, that I have seen some of them, which, at the sight of the pile and the fire, appeared to have some apprehension, and that perhaps would have gone back. These demurs the Bramins that are there with their great sticks, astonish them, and hearten them up, or even thrust them in; and I have seen it done to a young woman, that re-treated five or six paces from the pile, and to another, that was much disturbed when she saw the fire take hold of her clothes, these executioners thrusting her in with their long poles.

At Lahor, I saw a very handsome and a very young woman burnt; I believe she was not above twelve years of age. This poor unhappy creature appeared rather dead than alive when she came near the pile; she shook and went bitterly. Meanwhile, three or four of these executioners, the Brumais, together with an old bag that held her under the arm, thrust her on, and made her sit down upon the wood; and lest she should run away, they tied her legs and hands; and so they burnt her alive. I had enough to do to contain myself for inquiry. — BERNIER.

Pietro della Valle conversed with a widow, who was about to burn herself by her own choice. She told him, that generally speaking, women were not forced to burn themselves; but sometimes, among people of rank, when a young woman, who was handsome, was left a widow, and in danger of marrying again, (which is never practised among them, because of the confusion and disgrace which is inseparable from such a thing,) or of falling into other irregularities, then indeed the relations of the husband, if they are at all anxious of the honor of the family, compel her to burn herself, whether she likes it or not, merely to prevent the inconveniences which might take place.

Della also, whom I consider as one of the best travellers in the East, expressly asserts, that widows are burnt there "of grief, or of force." "L'on en croit que troy qui après avoir déserté et demanoit la barre, ou un courage extrême, et aprés avoir obtenu et achité la permission de se bruler, est trouvé à la croix du bateau, se sont repentus, mais troy tard, de leur imprudence, et ont fait d'autant efforts pour se retracter. Mais lorsque cela arriver, bien loin que les Brumais soient touchés d'horreur, ils se lamente et les leurs lamente aussi, et les brûlent par force, nous ne savons ayeur dit à leurs plaintes, à leurs cris." — Tom. i. p. 138.

It would be easy to multiply authorities upon this point. Let it suffice to mention one important historical fact: When the Mogul government had established itself at Delhi, it forbade these accursed sacrifices; the women exalted for him for this as their benefactor and deliverer, (Commentaries de Bib. ii. 23,) and no European in India was ever so popular, or so revered by the natives. Yet, if we are to believe the anti-national writers, it is likely that flanneux, and pretenders to humanity, would wish to deprive the Hindoos of this right of burning themselves! "It may be useful (says Colonel Mark Wilks) to examine the reasonableness of interfering with the most exceptionable of all their institutions. It has been thought an abomination not to be tolerated, that a widow should immolate herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband. But what judgment should we form of the Hindoos, who (if any of our institutions admitted the parallel) should forcibly prevent to stand between a Christian and the hope of eternal salvation? And shall we not hold him to be a driveller in human understanding, a conceited man, and a pretender to humanity, who would forcibly wrest this hope from the Hindoo widow?" — Historical Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 499.

Such opinions, and such language, may safely be left to the indignation and pity which they cannot fail to excite. I shall only express my astonishment, that any thing so monstrous, and so miserably futile, should have proceeded from a man of learning, great good sense, and general good feelings, as Colonel Wilks evidently appears to be.

Our drops, another plagues etc. — 1. H. p. 509.

When Bernier was passing from Amnl-Avar to Agra, there came news to him in a borough, where the caravan rested under the shade, (staying for the cool of the evening to march on their journey,) that a woman was then upon the point of burning herself with the body of her husband. I presently rode, says he, and hastened to this man, who had been engaged in the service of the Mogul government, which was a great pit, with a pile of wood raised in it, whereon I saw laid a dead corpse and a woman, which, at a distance, seemed to me pretty fair, sitting near it on the same pile, beside four or five Brumais putting the fire to it from all sides. Five women, of middle age, and well enough dressed, holding one another by the hand, and dancing about the pit, and a great crowd of people, men and women, looking on. The pile of wood was presently all on fire, because store of oil and butter had been thrown upon it; and I saw, at the same time, through the flames, that the fire took hold of the clothes of the woman, that were imbued with well-scented oils, mingled with powerful poisons. The fire, as it spread, entangled the body of the woman, and the fire of wood, and that there remained but two more for perfection; as if she had that time this remembrance, or some other preternatural coincidence, that here had time this remembrance, or some other preternatural coincidence.

But here ended not this inhuman tragedy: I thought it was only by way of ceremony that these five women sung and danced about the pit; but I was altogether surprised when I saw that the flame, having taken hold of the body of the woman, that there remained but two more for perfection; as if she had time this remembrance, or some other preternatural coincidence, that here had time this remembrance, or some other preternatural coincidence.

This excellent author relates an even extraordinary circumstance which occurred at one of these sacrifices. A woman was engaged in some love-intimacies with a young Mahommedan, her neighbor, who was a tailor, and could play finely upon the tabor. This woman, in the hopes she had of marrying this young man, poisoned him, and led him on to a long journey, to talk to the tailor, that it was time to be gone together, as he had projected, or else she should be obliged to burn herself. The young man, fearing lest he might be entangled in a mischievous business, hastily refused her. The woman, not satisfied at all surprised at her refusal, and let her own husband be the cause of the sudden death of her husband, and openly protested that she would not survive him, but burn herself with him. Her kindred, well satisfied with so generous a resolution, and the great honor she did to the whole family, presently had a pit made and filled with wood, exposing the corpse upon it, and kindling the fire. All being prepared, the woman goes to embrace and bid farewell to all her kindred that were there about the pit, among whom was also the tailor, who had been invited to play upon the tabor that day, with many others of that sort of men, according to the custom of the country. This fury of a woman, being overheated with long anger, made sign as she would bid him farewell with the rest; but, instead of gently embracing him, she takes him with all her force about his collar, pulls him to the pit, and quenches him, together with herself, into the ditch, where they both were soon dispatched. — BERNIER.

The Hindoos sometimes erect a chapel on the spot where one of these sacrifices has been performed, both on account of the soul of the deceased, and as a trophy of her virtue. I have reason to have seen one of these places, where the spot on which the funeral pile had been erected, was enclosed with wooded hedges, formed into a kind of bowier, planted with flowering creepers. The inside was set round with flowers, and at one end there was an image. — CRAWFORD.

Some of the Yogees, who smear themselves with ashes, use none but what they collect from funeral piles, — human ashes! — PIETRO DELLA VALLE.

From a late investigation, it appears, that the number of women who sacrifice themselves within thirty miles round Calcutta every year, is, on an average, upwards of two hundred. The Pundits, in order to secure the lives of the women, have put the sanction of their Shasters for this custom. The passages exhibited are vague and general in their meaning, and differently interpreted by the same authors. Some sacred verses command the practice; but none command it; and the Pundits relate her once more to be injurious to the holy women. It is presumed that if government will pass a regulation, annulling by fine every Brahmin who attends a burning, or every Zemindar who permits him to attend it, the practice cannot possibly long continue; for that the ceremony, unattended by the presence of the priests, will lose its dignity and consequence in the eye of the pious.
NOTES TO THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

The civilized world may expect soon to hear of the abolition of this oppression of a Christian administration, the female sacrifice; which has subsisted, to our certain knowledge, since the time of Alexander the Great. — Claudius Echannan.

This practice, however, was manifestly unknown when the Institutes of Justinian were written. The functions are there given for the conduct of a widow: "Let her," it is said, "emanate her body, by living voluntarily on pure flowers, roots, and fruit; but let her not, when her lord is deceased, even pronounce the name of another man. Let her continue till death forgiving all injuries, performing hard duties, avoiding every sensual pleasure, and cheerfully practising the incomparable rules of virtue, which have been followed by such women as were devoted to one only husband. Many thousands of Brahmins, having avoided sensuality from their early youth, and having left no issue in their families, have ascended nevertheless to heaven; and, like those abstruse men, a virtuous wife ascends to heaven, though she have no child, if, after the decease of her lord, she devote herself to pious austerity; but a widow, who, from a wish to bear children, slights her deceased husband by marrying again, brings disgrace on herself here below, and shall be excluded from the seat of her lord." — Inst. of Menus, ch. 5, 157—161.

Second marriages were permitted to men. — Ibid., 167, 8, 9.

1st.到来on appears. — II. 1, p. 569.

Many believe that some souls are sent back to the spot where their bodies were burnt, or where their ashes are preserved, to wait there until the new bodies they are destined to occupy he ready for their reception. This appears to correspond with an opinion of Plato, which, with many other tenets of that philosopher, was adopted by the early Christians; and an ordinance of the Roman church is still extant, prohibiting having lights or making merriment in church-yards at night, lest those should disturb the souls that might come thither. — Crawford.

According to the Danish missionaries, the souls of those who are untimely slain wander about as diabolical spirits, doing evil to mankind, and possessing those whom they pervert. — Niescu, i. 10, § 14.

The inhabitants of the hills near Rajmahall believe that when God sends a messenger to summon a person to his presence, if the messenger should mistake his object, and carry off another, he is desired by the Deity to take him away; but as the earthy mansion of this soul must be destroyed, it is destined to remain mid way between heaven and earth, and never can return to the presence of God. Whoever commits homicide without a divine order, and whosoever is killed by a snare, as a punishment for some concealed crime, will be doomed to the same state of wandering; and whosoever hangs himself will wander eternally with a rope about his neck. — Asiatic Researches.

Pope Benedict XII. drew up a list of 117 heretical opinions held by the Armenian Christians, which he sent to the king of Armenia; instead of any other assistance, when that prince applied to him for aid against the Mahometans. This paper was first published by Bernini, and exhibits a curious mixture of mythologies. One of their opinions was, that the souls of the adult wander about in the air till the day of judgment; neither hell, nor the heavenly, nor the terrestrial paradise, being open to them till that day shall have passed. Davenant, in one of his plays, speculates upon such a state of wandering as the lot of the soul after death: —

"I must to darkness go, hover in clouds,
In remote untroubled air, silent
As thought, or what is uncreated yet;
Or I must rest in some cold shade, and shall
Perhaps ne'er see that everlasting spring
Of which philosophy so long has dreamt,
And seems rather to wish than understand." — Love and Honor.

I know no other author who has so often expressed to those who could understand him, his doubts respecting a future state, and how haphazard he felt them.

The Soul is not a thing of which a man may say, it hath been, it is about to be, or is to be hereafter; for it is a thing without birth; it is ancient, constant, and eternal, and is not to be destroyed in this its mortal frame. How can the man who believeth that this thing is incorruptible, eternal, inexhaustible, and supreme? — For it is indivisible, incomprehensible, and is not to be dried away — it is eternal, universal, permanent, immovable; it is invisible, inconceivable, and unutterable. — Bhagat Geeta.

It was my hour of folly. — II. 5, p. 570.

Among the qualities required for the proper execution of public business, mention is made, "That a man must be able to keep in subjection his lust, his anger, his averseness, his folly, and his pride." The folly then specified is not to be understood in the usual sense of the word in an European idiom, as a negative quality, or the mere want of sense, but as a kind of obstinately stupid lethargy, or perverse absence of mind, in which the will is not altogether passive: it seems to be a weakness peculiar to Asia, for we cannot find a term by which to express the precise idea in the European languages. It operates somewhat like the violent impulse of fear, under which men will utter falsehoods totally incompatible with each other, and utterly contrary to their own opinion, knowledge, and reason; and, it may be added, also, their inclination and intention.

"A very remarkable instance of this temporary frenzy happened lately in the supreme Court of Judicature at Calcutta, where a man (not an idiot) swore, upon a trial, that he was no kind of relation to his brother, who had been in Court, and who had constantly supported him from his infancy; and that he lived in a house by himself, for which he paid the rent from his own pocket, when it was proved that he was not worth a rupee, and when the person, in whose house he had always resided, stood at the bar close to him.

Another conjecture, and that exceedingly acute and ingenious, has been started upon this folly, that it may mean the deception which a man permits to be imposed on his judgment by his passions; as acts of rapacity and avarice are often committed by men who ascribe them to providence and a just renovation; malevolence and cowardice, for justice, and brutality for spirit. This opinion, when thoroughly examined, will very nearly tally with the former; for all the passions, as well as fear, have an equal efficacy to disturb and distort the mind: but, to account for the folly here spoken of as being the offspring of the passions, instead of drawing a parallel between it and the impulses of those passions, we must suppose the impulses to act with infinitely more violence upon an Asiatic mind than we can ever have seen exemplified in Europe. It is, however, something like the madness so inimitably delineated in the Hero of Cervantes, sensible enough upon some occasions, and at the same time completely wild, and unconscious of itself upon others, and that, too, originally produced by an effort of the will, though, in the end, overpowering and superseding its functions." — Halhed.

But I, all naked feeling and raw life. — II. 5, p. 570.

By the vital souls of those men who have committed sin in the body, another body, composed of seven spirits or formations, in order to be susceptible of torment, shall certainly be assumed after death; and being intimately united with those minute nervous particles, according to their distribution, they shall feel in that new body the pangs inflicted in each case by the injuries of Yama. — Ibid., § 5.

Henry More, the Platonist, has no applicable stanza in his Song of the Soul: —

Like to a light fast lock'd in lantern dark, Whereby night our wayes we guide
In shady streets, and dirty channels mark,
Some weaver says through the black top do glide,
And flasher streams, perhaps, fromutory side;
But when we've past the peril of the way,
Arrived at a corner, thus can a song—
The naked light how clearly doth it ray,
And spread its joyful beams as bright as summer's day.

Even so the soul, in this contracted state,
Confused to these straight limits, as sense.
More dull and narrow, doth operate;
At this hole hears,— the sight must ray from thence,
Here tastes, there smells;— but when she's gone from hence.
Like naked lamp she is one shining sphere,
And round about has perfect cognoscesse;
What'er in her horizon doth appear,
She is one orb of sense, all eye, all airy ear.

Amid the unutterable, and more unutterable language of this strange series of poems, a few passages are to be found of exceeding beauty. Milton, who was the author's friend, had evidently sent them.

Marrasthly. — H. 8, p. 570.

Marrastale, as Sonnerat spells the name, was wife of the potent Chamadaguini, and mother of Parassouroma. who was, in part, an incarnation of Ysohkna. This goddess, says Sonnerat, commanded the elements, but could not preserve that empire longer than her heart was pure. One day, while she was collecting water out of a tank, and, according to her custom, was making a bowl of earth to carry it to the house, she saw on the surface of the water some figures of Grindovers, (Glendovers,) which were flying over her head. Struck with their beauty, her heart admitted an impure thought, and the earth of the bowl dissolved. From that time she was obliged to make use of an ordinary vessel. This discovery to Chamadaguini that his wife had deviated from purity; and in the excess of his rage, he ordered his son to drag her to the place where criminals were executed, and to behead her. The order was executed; but Parassouroma was so much afflicted for the loss of her mother, that Chamadaguini told him to take up the body, and fasten the head upon it, and repeat a prayer (which he taught him for that purpose) in her ear, and then his mother would come to life again. The son eagerly to perform what he was ordered, but, by a very singular blunder, he joined the head of his mother to the body of a Parichi, who had been executed for her crimes; a monstrous union, which gave to this woman the virtuous of fifty, and to her husband the of a criminal. The goddes, becoming impure by such a mixture, was driven from her house, and committed all kinds of cruelties. The Deverkels, perceiving the destruction she made, appeased her by giving her power to cure the small-pox, and promising that she should be implied for that disorder. Mariaste is the great goddess of the Perinis;—to honor her, they have a custom of dancing with several pots of water on their heads, placed one above the other; these pots are adorned with the leaves of the Margosiles, a tree consecrated to her.

The little songsters of the sky
Sit silent in the sultry hour. — IV. 2, p. 572.

The tufted lark, fixed to this fruitful land, says Sonnini, speaking of Egypt, never forsakes it; it seems, however, that the excessive heat annoys him. You may see these birds, as well as sparrows, in the middle of the day, with their bills half open, and the muscles of their breasts agitated, breathing with difficulty, and as if they panted for respiration. The instinct which induces them to prefer those means of subsistence which are easily obtained, and in abundance, although attended with some suffering, resembles the mind of man, whom a thirst for riches engages to brave calamities and dangers without number.

The watchmen. — V. 1, p. 574.

The watchmen are provided with no offensive weapons excepting a sling; on the contrary, they continue the whole day and night in one singed position, upon a pillar of clay raised about ten feet, where they remain bellowing continually, that they may terrify, without hurting, the birds which feed upon the crop. Every considerable field contains several such semihumans, stationed at different corners, who repeat the call from one to another so incessently, that the latter have hardly any opportunity of making a good livelihood in the field.

The Golden Palaces. — V. 1, p. 574.

Every thing belonging to the Sovereign of Ay has the addition of shine, or golden, annexed to it; even his majesty's person is never mentioned but in conjunction with this precious metal. When a subject means to affirm that the king has heard any thing, he says, "It has reached the golden ears," he who obtained admission to the royal presence has been at the "golden feet." The perfume of otta of roses, a nobleman observed one day, "was an odor grateful to the golden nose." — hymn.

A cloud, ascending in the eastern sky,
Sails slowly over the vale.
And darkness round, and closes in the night. — V. 3, p. 574.

At this season of the year, it is not uncommon, towards the evening, to see a small black cloud rising in the eastern part of the horizon, and afterwards spreading itself to the northwest. This phenomenon is always attended with a violent storm of wind, and flashes of the strongest and most vivid lightning and heavy thunder, which is followed by rain. These storms sometimes last for half an hour or more; and, when they disperse, they leave the air greatly freshened, and the sky of a deep, clear and transparent blue. When they occur near the full moon, the whole atmosphere is illuminated by a soft but brilliant silver light, attended with gentle airs. — HODGES.

A white flag, flapping to the winds of night,
Marks where the tiger seized a human prey. — V. 4, p. 574.

It is usual to place a small, white, triangular flag, fixed to a bamboo staff, or ten or twelve feet long, at the place where a tiger has destroyed a man. It is common for the passengers, also, each to throw a stone or brick near the spot, so that, in the course of a little time, a pile, equal to a good wagon-load, is collected. This custom, as well as the fixing a rag or any particular thorn-bush, near the fatal spot, is in use, likewise, on various accounts. Many brambles may be seen in a day's journey, completely covered with this motley assemblage of remains. The sight of the flags and piles of stones impairs a certain melancholy, not perhaps altogether devoid of apprehension. They may be said to be of service in pointing out the places most frequented by tigers. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 22.

Gently he steals away with silent tread. — V. 9, p. 575.

This part of the poem has been censured, upon the ground that Ludurad's conduct in thus forsaking his daughter is inconsistent with his affection for her. There is a passage in Mr. Milman's version of Nala and Damayanti so curiously resembling it in the situation of the two persons, that any one might suppose I had imitated the Sennert, if Kehama had not been published five-and-twenty years before Mr. Milman's most characteristic specimen of Indian poetry. Indeed, it is to him that I am obliged for pointing out the very singular coincidence.

Mighty is thy father's kingdom — once was mine as mighty, too;

Never will I there seek refuge — in my base extremity.
There I once appeared in glory — to the exulting of thy pride;
Shall I now appear in misery — to the increasing of thy shame?"
Nala thus to Damayanti — spake again, and yet again,
Comforting the noble lady — scant in half a garment clad.
Both together, by one garment — covered, rommed they here and there;
Weared out by heat and famine — to a cabin drew they near,
When they reached that lowly cabin — then did great Nishadha’s king

With the princess of Vidarbha — on the hard earth seat them down;
Naked, with no mat to rest on — wet with mire and stained with dust.
Weary then with Damayanti — on the earth he fell asleep.
Sank the lovely Damayanti — by his side sleep oppress’d,
She thus plunged in sudden misery — she the tender, the devout.

But while on the cold earth slumbered — Damayanti, all distraught,
Nala in his mind by sorrow — might no longer calmly sleep;
For the losing of his kingdom — the desertion of his friends,
And his weary forest wanderings — painful on his thought arose;
"If I do it, what may follow? — what if I refuse to do?
Were my instant death the better — or to abandon her I love.
But to me too deep devoted — suffers she distress and shame;
Reft of me, she home may wander — to her royal father’s house;
Faithful wandering ever with me — certain sorrow will she bear,
But if separated from me — chance of solace may be here."
Long within his heart he pondered — and again, again weighed over.
Best he thought it Damayanti — to desert, that wretched king.
From her virtue none dare harm her — in the lonely forest way.
Her the fortunate, the noble, my devoted wedded wife.
Thus his mind on Damayanti — dwelt in its perverted thought,
Wrought by Kali’s evil influence — to desert his lovely wife.
Of himself without a garment — and of her with only one
As he thought, approached he near her — to divide that single robe
"How shall I divide the garment — by my loved one unperceived?"
Pondering this within his spirit — round the cabin Nala went;
In that narrow cabin’s circuit — Nala wandered here and there,
There till he found another — a scabbard — shining, a well-tempered sword.
Then when half that only garment — he had severed and put on,
In her sleep Vidarbha’s princess — with wilder’d mind he doled.
Yet, his cruel heart relenting — to the cabin turns he back;
On the slumbering Damayanti — gazing, sadly wept the king;
"Thou that sun nor wind hath ever — roughly visited, my love.
On the hard earth in a cabin — sleepiest with thy guardian gone.
Thus attired in half a garment — she that eye so sweetly smiled,
Like to one distracted, Beaumont — how at length will she awake?
How will’t fare with Bhima’s daughter — lone, abandoned by her lord,
Wandering in the savage forest — where wild beasts and serpents dwell!
May the sun and the winds of heaven — may the genius of the woods,
Noblest, may they all protect thee — thine own virtue thy best guard."
To his wife of peerless beauty — on the earth, twas thus he spoke.
Then of sense bereft by Kali — Nala hastily set forth;
And departing, still departing — he returned again, again;
Dragged away by that bad demon — ever by his love drawn back.

Nala, thus his heart divided — into two conflicting parts,
Like a swing goes backward, forward — from the cabin, to and fro.
Torn away at length by Kali — flies afar the frantic king,
Leaving there his wife in slumber — making miserable moans.
Reft of sense, possessed by Kali — thinking still on her he left,
Passed he in the lonely forest — leaving his deserted wife.

Pullee. — V. 14, p. 575.

The first and greatest of the sons of Sevee is Pullee; he promises on marriage: the Indians build no house without having first erected Pullee on the temple’s height, where they sprinkle with oil, and throw flowers on it every day. If they do not invoke it before they undertake any enterprise, they believe that God will make them forget what they wanted to undertake, and that their labor will be in vain. He is represented with an elephant’s head, and mounted on a rat; but in the pagodas they place him on a pedestal, with his legs almost crossed. A rat is always put before the door of his chapel. This rat was a giant, called Gudja-mouga-chourin, on whom the gods had bestowed immortality, as well as great powers, with the house and land, and did much harm to mankind. Pullee, entreated by the sages and penitents to deliver them, pulled out one of his tasks, and threw it against Gudja-mouga-chourin; the tooth entered the giant’s stomach, and overthrew him, who immediately changed himself into a rat as large as a mountain, and came to attack Pullee, who sprang on his back, telling him, that henceforth he should ever be his carrier.

The Indians, in their admiration of this god, cross their arms, shut the fist, and in this manner give themselves several blows on the temple’s height, then, but always with the arms crossed, they take hold of their ears, and make three inclinations, bending the knee; after which, with their hands joined, they address their prayers to him, and strike their forehead. They have a great veneration for this deity, whose image they place in all temples, streets, highways, and in the country, at the foot of some tree; and all the world may have an opportunity of invoking him before they undertake any concern; and that travellers may make their adorations and offerings to him before they pursue their journey. — Sonnerat.

This word is altered from the Griechsers of Somner, who describes these celestial children of Cansaya as famons for their beauty; they have wings, they can fly, and fly in the air with their wives. I do not know whether they are the Gondharaa of the English Orientalists. The wings with which they are attired in the poem are borrowed from the neglected story of Peter Williams. At a recent sale of manuscripts, the author’s assignment of this book to Dodshay for ten guineas was brought to light, and it then appeared that his name, which till then had been unknown, was R. Pullock. Nothing more has been discovered concerning him. His book, however, is a work of great genius, and I know that both Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Cudor of thought as highly of it as I do. His winged people are the most beautiful creatures of imagination that ever were devised. I copy his minute description of the grannlec, as he calls it; — Stothard has made some delightful drawings of it in the Novellist’s Magazine. —

She first threw up two long branches, or ribs, of the wholarcha, as I called it before, (and indeed for several of its properties, as toughness, elasticity, and pliancess, nothing I have ever seen can so justly be compared to it,) which were jointed behind to the upper bone of the spine, and which, when not extended, lie bent under the shoulders on each side of the neck forwards, from whence, by nearer and nearer approaches, they just meet at the lower rim of the belly in a sort of point; but, when extended, they stand their whole length above the shoulders, not perpendicularly, but spreading outward, with a web of the softest, and most pliable and spongy membrane that can be imagined in the interstices between them, reaching from their root or joint on the back up above the hinder part of the head, and near half way their own length; but, when closed, the membrane falls down in the middle upon the neck, like a handkerchief. There are also two other ribs, rising, as it were, from the same root, which, when open, run horizontally, but not so long as the others. These are filled up in the interstice between them and the upper ones with the same membrane; and on the lower side of this is also a deep fold of the membrane, so that the arms can be either above or below it in flight, and are always above it when open. The two last ribs, when closed in, run horizontally over the upper one, and also fills down with it before the waist; but it is not joined to the ribs below. Along the whole spine-bone runs a strong, flat, broad, glistening cartilage, to which are joined several other of these ribs, all which open horizontally, and are filled in the interstices between them, and are jointed to the ribs of the person just where the plane of the back begins to turn towards the breast and belly; and, when shut, wrap the body round to the joints on the contrary side, folding nearly one side over the other.

At the lower spine are two more ribs extended horizontally when open, jointed again to the hips, and long enough to meet the joint on the contrary side across the belly: and from the hip-joint, which is on the outermost edge of the hip-bone, runs a visible cartilage quite down the outside of the thigh and leg to the ankle; from which branch out divers other ribs, horizontally also when open, but, when closed, they encompass the whole thigh and leg, rolling inwards across the back of the leg and thigh, till they reach and just cover the cartilage. The interstices of these are filled up with the same membrane. From the lower spine-bone, there hangs down a sort of short apron, very full of pliats, from hip-joint to hip-joint, and reaches below the buttocks, half way or more to the hams. This has also several small linker ribs in it. Just upon the lower spine joint, and above the apron, as I call it, there are two other long branches, which when close, extend upon the back from the point they join at below to the shoulders, where each rib has a clasper, which reaching over the shoulders, just under the fold of the uppermost branch or ribs, hold up the two ribs flat to the back, like a Y, the interstices of which are filled up with the aforesaid membrane. This last piece, in flight, falls down almost to the ankles, where the two clasps, lapping under each leg within-side, hold it very fast; and then, also, the short apron is drawn up, by the strength of the ribs in it, between the thighs, forward and covers as far as the rim of the belly. The whole arms are covered also from the shoulders to the wrist with the same delicate membrane, fastened to ribs of proportionable dimensions, and jointed to a cartilage on the outside in the same manner as on the legs. It is very surprising to feel the difference of these ribs when open and when closed; this is as if a thin wall was put down for fear of wind, and, though the east is peremptorily under his care, yet his Olympus is Mero, or the North Pole, allegorically represented as a mountain of gold and gems. He is the Prince of the beneficent Genii.—Sir W. Jones.

A distinct idea of Indra, the King of Immortals, may be collected as a picture from a passage in the ninth section of the Gesta.

"These having, through virtue, reached the mansion of the king of Sema, feast on the exquisite heavenly food of the Gods; they who have enjoyed this lofty region of Swarga, but whose virtue is exhausted, revisit the habitations of mortals."

"He is the God of thunder and the five elements, with inferior Genii under his command; and is conceived to govern the eastern quarter of the world, but to preside, like the Genius or Agatidemon of the ancients, over the celestial lands, which are stationed on the summit of Mero, or the North Pole, where he solaces the Gods with nectar and heavenly music."

The Cossarcs are the male dancers in Swarga, or the Heaven of Indra, and the Aparas are his dancing girls, answering to the dancers called in the Koran khaari rgbh, or, with antelope's eyes.—Sir W. Jones.

I have seen Indra tremble at his prayers, and at his dreadful penances turn pale.—VI. 4, p. 577.

Of such penances Mr. Halhed has produced a curious specimen.

"In the wood Mihbo, which is on the confines of the kingdoms of Brego, Taraceo selected a pleasant and beautiful place for the successful devotion of the priests. There Casya, father of the immortals, ruler of men, son of Maricli, who spring from the self-existing and wise with his consort Amala, blessed in holy retirement.—We now enter the sanctuary of him who rules the world, and the groves which are watered by streams from celestial sources."

Dashmanta. I see the usual embonpoint both the pions and their awful retreat. It becomes, indeed, pure sport to feed on beholding a forest blossoming with trees of life; to bathe in its syed yellow with the golden dust of the lotus, and to fortify their virtue in the mysterious bath; to meditate in caves, the pebbles of which are unemblished gems; and to restrain their passions, even though nymphs of exquisite beauty frolick around them. In this grove alone is attained the summit of true piety, to which other hermits in vain aspire. —Saccartha.

spot, adorned with verdure and blossoms, and there exercised himself in penance and mortification, externally with the sincerest piety, but in reality, the most malignant intention, and with the determined purpose of oppressing the Devas; penances such as credulity itself was astonished to hear; and they are here recounted:—

1. For a hundred years, he held up his arms and one foot towards heaven, and fixed his eyes upon the sun the whole time.

2. For a hundred years, he remained standing on tip toe.

3. For a hundred years more, he nourished himself with melting but water.

4. For a hundred years more, he lived upon nothing but air.

5. For a hundred years more, he stood and made his adorations in the river.

6. For a hundred years more he made those adorations buried up to his neck in the earth.

7. For a hundred years more, he was enclosed with fire.

8. For a hundred years more, he stood upon his head with his feet towards heaven.

9. For a hundred years more, he stood upon the palm of one hand resting on the ground.

10. For a hundred years more, he hung by his hand from the branch of a tree.

11. For a hundred years more, he hung from a tree with his head downwards.

When he at length came to a respite from these severe mortifications, a radiant glory encircled the devotee, and a flame of fire, arising from his head, began to consume the whole world.—From the Siva Purana, Maurice's History of Hindustan.

You see a pious Yogi, motionless as a pillar, holding his thick, bushy hair, and fixing his eyes on the solar orb. Mark—his body is half covered with a white un's edifice made of raised clay; the skin of a snake supplies the place of his sacerdotal thread, and port of it girds his loins; a number of knotty plants encircle and wound his neck, and surrounding birds nest almost conceal his shoulders.

Duckwanta. I bow to a man of his austerer devotion.—Sacred.

That corn Sceva's self, The highest, cannot grant and be secure.—VI. 4, p. 577.

It will be seen from the following fable, that Sceva had once been reduced to a very humiliating employment by one of Kehama's predecessors:—

Roeana, by his power and infernal arts, had subjigated all objects, and dominion, and forced them to perform menial offices about his person and household. Indra guarded mandalas of flowers to adorn him with; Azini was his cook; Serya supplied light by day, and Chanora by night; Varana purveyed water for the palace; Kerna furnished wash. The wife was more graver than any other devoted; she arranged herself into a ladder, by which they served as steps, the tyrant ascended his throne. Brahma (for the great gods were there also; and I give this anecdote as I find it in my memoranda, without any improved arrangement)—Brahma was a herald, proclaiming the giant's titles, the day of the week, month, &c. daily in the palace,—a sort of speaking abacæ: Mahadeva, (i. e. Sceva,) in his Avatara of Ksva-

This Ksva-drava, performed the office of barber, and trimmed the giants' beards: Vishnu had the honorable occupation of instructing and drilling the barbarous fighting girls, and selecting the faircst for the royal family: Gworan had the care of the cows, goats, and herds: Voga swept the house; Uana washed the linen;—and in this manner were all the gods employed in the menial offices of Roeana, who relaxed and flagged them in default of industry and attention. Nor were the female divinities neglected for Bharavi, in her name and form of Satif, was head Ayu, or nurse, to Roeana's children; Lokshuti and Saraswuti were also among them, but it does not appear in what capacity.—Moore's Hindu Pantheon, p. 333.

Sceva was once in danger even of manslaughter. "In passing from the town of Silgut to Deonubly," says Colonel Wilks, "it became accidentally informed of a sect, peculiar, as I since understand, to the north-eastern parts of Myssur, the women of which universally undergo the amputation of the first joints of the third and fourth fingers of their right hand. On my arrival at Deonubly, after ascertaining that the requisite number had not yet given the required notice to the women, and that the operation had not been performed on these women; and, the same afternoon, seven of them attended at my tent. The sect is a subdivision of the Manjrao Reulk, and belongs to the fourth great class of the Hindus, viz. the Sauder. Every woman of the sect, previously to offering her eldest daughter, preparatory to her being betrothed in marriage, must necessarily undergo this mutilation, which is performed by the blacksmith of the village for a regulated fee, by a surgical process sufficiently rude. The finger to be amputated is placed on a block; the blacksmith makes a split over the articulation of the joint, and chops it off at a single blow. If the girl to be betrothed is motherless, and the mother of the boy have not been before subject to the operation, it is incumbent on her to perform the sacrifice. After satisfying myself with regard to the facts of the case, I inquired into the origin of so strange a practice, and one of the women related, with greatfacility, the following traditionary tale, which has since been repeated to me, with no material deviation, by several others of the sect.

A Rachas (or giant) named Price, and in after times Bra- man-oor, or the giant of the ashes, had, by a course of austerer devotion to Mahadev (Sceva,) obtained from him the promise of whatever boon he should ask. The Rachas accordingly demanded, that every person on whose head he should place his right hand might instantly be reduced to ashes; and Mahadev conferred the boon, without suspicion of the purpose for which it was bestowed. A Rachas, being one of the gods, was upon the ground, when a man arrived who reduced himself in the centre of a fruit, then called tunda pudoo, but since named linga tanda, from the resemblance which its kernel thereonforward assumed to the ling, the appropriate emblem of Mahadev.

The Rachas having lost sight of Mahadev, inquired of a husbandman, who was working in the adjoining field, whether he had seen the fugitive, and what direction he had taken. The husbandman, who had attentively observed the whole transaction, feared of the future resentment of Mahadev, and equally alarmed for the present vengeance of the giant, answered naively, that he had seen no fugitive, but pointed, at the same time, with the little finger of his right hand, to the place of Mahadev's concealment.

In this extremity, Vishnu descended, in the form of a beautiful damsel, to the rescue of Mahadev. The Rachas became all at once speechless with a great amazement, and might not be approached by the uncleen Rachas. By degrees she appeared to relent; and as a previous condition to further advances, enjoined the performance of his aubiums in a neighboring pool. After these were finished, the proceeding was repeated; and other purifications, the performance of the Samudr, a ceremony in which the right hand is successively applied to the breast, to the crown of the head, and to other parts of the body. The Rachas, thinking only of love, and forgetful of the powers of his right hand, performed the Samudr, and was himself reduced to ashes.

Mahadev now issued from the linga tanda, and, after the proper acknowledgments for his deliverance, proceeded to dismiss the guilt of the treacherous husbandman, and determined on the loss of the finger with which he had offended, as the proper punishment of his crime.

The wife of the husbandman, who had just arrived at the field with food for her husband, hearing this dreadful sentence, threw herself at the feet of Mahadev. She represented the certain ruin of her family, if her husband should be disabled for some months from performing the labors of the farm, and besought the Deity to accept two of her fingers, instead of one from her husband. Mahadev, pleased with so sincere a proof of conjugal affection, accepted the exchange, and ordained that her female posternity, in all future generations, should sacrifice two fingers at his temple, as a memorial of the transaction, and of their exclusive devotion to the God of the Ling.

NOTES TO THE CURSE OF KEHAMA.

The practice is, accordingly, confined to the supposed posterity of this single woman, and is not common to the whole stock of Bannana-Vulu. I ascertained the actual number of families who observed this practice in three successive districts through which I afterwards passed, and I conjecture that, within the limits of Myoor, they may amount to about two thousand and twelve.

The Hill of Sertes, in the talooj of Cedar, where the giant was destroyed, is (according to this tradition) formed of the ashes of Bannana-zoor. It is held in particular veneration by this sect, as the chief seat of their appropriate sacrifice; and the sect of its containing little or no moisture is held to be a miraculous proof that the ashes of the焚ned absorb the most violent and continued rain. This is a remarkable instance of easy credibility. I have examined the mountain, which is of a sloping form, and composed of coarse granite. — Hast, Sketches of the South of India, vol. i. p. 442.

The Ship of Heaven. — VII. i, p. 578.

I have converted the Vimnu, or self-moving Car of the Gods, into a Ship. Captain Wilford has given the history of its invention,—and, what is more curious, has attempted to settle the geography of the story.

"A most pious and venerable sage, named Rishi, was, being very far advanced in years, had resolved to visit, before he died, all the holy places of the earth. He having performed his resolution, he bathed at last in the sacred water of the Cali, where he observed some fishes engaged in amorous play, and reflecting on their numerous progeny, which would soon increase in the stream, he lamented the impropriety of leaving any children; but, since he might possibly be a father, even at his great age, he went immediately to the king of that country, Harayavarna, who had fifty daughters, and demanded one of them in marriage. So strange a demand gave the prince great uneasiness: yet he was unwilling to incur the displeasure of a saint who inspired him with holy deeds. He therefore, invited Ieri, or Viscon, to inspire him with a wise answer, and told the holy philosopher, that he should marry any one of his daughters, who, of her own accord, should fix on him as her bridegroom. The sage, The sage, relaxed, left the palace; but, calling to the two sons of Aswini, he hastened to their terrestrial abode, and requested that they would bestow on him both youth and beauty: they immediately conducted him to Abhimatada, which we suppose to be Apollis, in Upper Egypt; and, when he had bathed in the pool of Raptanyatna, he was restored to the flower of his age, and his hair assumed the form of Castra's.* On his return to the palace, he entered the secret apartments, called antah-par, where the fifty princesses were assembled; and they were all so transfigured with the vision of more abundant beauty, that they fell into an ecstasy, where the place was afterwards named Mahasthe, or Mahavana, and is, possibly, the same with Mahavan. They no sooner had recovered from their trance, than each of them exclaimed, that she would be his bride; and their altercation having brought Harayavarna into their apartment, he terminated the contest by giving them all in marriage to Rishi's sons, who became the father of a hundred sons; and, when he succeeded to the throne, built the city of Saccabkurabba, named vimdonas, or celestial, self-moving cars, in which he visited the gods, and made gardens, abounding in delights, which rivalled the bowers of Inora; but, having obtained the pleasure which he derived from Matoyanavguna, or the place where the fish were assembled, he resigned the kingdom to his eldest son Harayavirdhkh, and returned, in his former shape, to the banks of the Cali, where he chose his days in deviation." — WILFORD. Asiatic Researches.

Dushkanta. In what path of the winds are we now journeying?

Matsi. This is the way which leads along the triple river, heaven's brightest stream, and causes the luminaries to roll in a circle with diffused beams; it is the course of a gentle breeze which supports the floating forms of the gods; and this path was the second step of Vishnu when he confounded the proud Bali.

Dushkanta. The car itself instructs me that we are moving over clouds pregnant with showers; for the circumference of its wheels disperses a watery cloud.

Matsi. Such is the difference, O King! between the car and that of Indra. — SACNTALLA.

The Rainy Tree. — VII. p. 579

The island of Eire or is one of the most considerable of the Canaries; and I conceive that name to be given to it upon this account, that its soil, not affording so much as a drop of fresh water, seems to be from and, indeed, there is in this island neither river, nor rivulet, nor well, nor spring, save that only towards the sea-side, there are some wells; but they lie at such a distance from the city, that the inhabitants can make no use thereof. But the great Preserver and Sustainer of all remedied this inconvenience by a way so extraordinary, that a man will be forced to sit down and acknowledge that he gives in this an undeniable demonstration of his goodness and infinite providence.

For in the midst of the island, there is a tree, which is the only one of its kind, incometh as it hath no resemblance to other trees in this relation: the leaves of this tree are carried to us in Europe. The leaves of it are long and narrow, and continue a constant verdure, winter and summer; and its branches are covered with a cloud, which is never dispelled, but resolved into a moisture, which causes to fall from its leaves a very clear water, and that in such abundance, that the cisterns, which are placed at the foot of the tree to receive it, are never empty, but contain enough to supply both men and beasts. — Mandello.

Feyjoo denies the existence of any such tree, upon the authority of Pt. Tallois, the French Jesuit, (quoted in M. de Trevoux, 2713, art. 95,) who visited the island. "Ando au dedo," he adds, "que este Feix de las plantas es ten fagido como el de las aves." — Theat. Crit. Tom. ii. Disc. 2, § 60. What authority is due to the testimony of this French Jesuit I do not know, never having seen his book; but it appears, from the undoubted evidence of Glass, that the existence of such a tree is believed in the Canaries, and positively affirmed by the inhabitants of Eire or itself.

"There are," says this excellent author, "only three fountains of water in the whole island; one of them is called Ared, which, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, signifies river; a name, however, which does not seem to have been given it on account of its yielding much water, for in that respect it hardly deserves the name of a fountain. More to the northward is another called Hipio; and in the middle of the island is a spring, yielding a stream about a man's finger. This last was discovered in the year 1565, and is called the Fountain of Antonio Hernandez. On account of the scarcity of water, the sheep, goats, and swine here do not drink in the summer, but are taught to dig up the roots of fern, and chew them to quench their thirst. The great cattle are watered at these fountains, and at a place where water distils from the leaves of a tree. Many writers have made mention of this famous tree; some in such a manner as to make it appear miraculous; others again deny the existence of any such tree, or assign it among those in Father Feyjoo, a modern Spanish author, in his Teatro Critico. But he, and those who agree with him in this matter, are as much mistaken as they who would make it appear miraculous. This is the only island of all the Canaries which I have not been in; but I have sailed with natives of Eire or, who, when questioned about the existence of this tree, answered in the affirmative.

The author of the History of the Discovery and Conquest has given us a particular account of it, which I shall relate here at large. "The district in which this tree stands is called Figulae; near to which, and in the cliffs, or steep banks of the whole island, is a narrow gutter or gully, which commences at the sea, and continues to the summit of the cliff, where it joins or coincides with a valley, which is terminated by the steep front of a rock. On the top of this rock grows a tree, called, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, Garoe, i.e. Sacred or Holy Tree, which, for many years, has been preserved sound, entire, and fresh. Its leaves constantly distil such a quantity of water as is used, and filled with forenoon drinks for the living crew on the islands of Hierro; nature having provided this means for the draught of water from the island. It is situated about a league and a half from the sea. Nobody knows of what species it is, only that it is called Til. It is distinct from other trees, and stands by itself; the top of the trunk of the tree is about twelve spans, the diameter four, and in height, from the ground to the top of the highest branch, forty spans: The circumference of all the branches together is one hundred and twenty feet. The branches are thick and extended; the lowest commence about the height of an ell from the ground. Its fruit resembles those of the living crew like the kernel of a pine nut, but is softer and more aromatic. The leaves of this tree resemble those of the laurel, but are larger, wider, and more curved; they come forth in a perpetual succession, so that the tree always remains green. Near to it grows a thorn, which listens on many of its branches, and interweaves with them; and, at a small distance from the Garoe, are some beeche-trees, breses, and thorns. On the north side of the trunk are two large tanks, or cisterns, of rough stone, or rather one cistern divided, each half being twenty feet square, and sixteen feet deep. One of the cisterns is filled with water for the drinking of the inhabitants, and the other which they use for their cattle, washing, and such like purposes. Every morning, near this part of the island, a cloud or mist arises from the sea, which the south and easterly winds force against the steep cliffs, so that the cloud, having no vent but by the gutter, gradually ascends it, and from thence advances slowly to the extreme of the valley, where it is stopped and checked by the front of the rock which terminates the valley, and then rests upon the thick leaves and branches of the tree, so that during the summer, although it distills in drops during the remainder of the day, until it is at length exhausted, in the same manner that we see water drip from the leaves of trees after a heavy shower of rain. This distillation is not peculiar to the Garoe, or Til, for the beeche which grows near it likewise drops water; but their leaves being few and narrow, the quantity is so trifling, that, though the natives save some of it, yet they make little or no account of any but what distills from the Til; which, together with the water of some fountains, and what is saved in the winter season, is sufficient to serve them and their cattle. This tree yields most water when the Levan, or easterly winds have prevailed for a continuation; for by these winds only the clouds or mists are drawn higher from the sea. A person lives on the spot near which this tree grows, who is appointed by the Council to take care of it and its water, who removes a hose to a house to draw water, with a certain salary. He every day distributes to each family of the district seven pots or vessels full of water, besides what he gives to the principal people of the island. Whether the tree which yields water at this present time be the same as that mentioned in the above description, I cannot pretend to determine, but it is probable there has been a succession of them; for Pliny, describing the Fortunate Islands, says, "In the mountains of Osbrion are trees resembling the plant Furcula, from which water may be procured by placing a pot from the black kid is better, but that which the white yields is sweet and pleasant."—Glass's History of the Canary Islands.

Corderyo (Historia Insulana, lib. ii. c. 5) says, that this tree resembles what in other places is called the Til (Tilica) the Linden Tree; and he proceeds, from these three letters, to make it an emblem of the Trinity. The water, he says, was called the Agua Santa, and the tree itself the Santa Aurora,—appellations not ill bestowed. According to account the water was delivered out in stated portions.

It is a simile in Cockburn's Travels; but this I believe to be a work of fiction. Bernal Diaz, however, mentions one as growing at Nico, in Honduras, "Que en natal de la siesta, por revo sal que hispanes, parecia que la sombra d'el arbol refrescante al calor, cayendo del uno como revo muy dolgdo que confortase las cabezas."—

There may be some exaggerations like accounts of the Piereo Tree, but that the story has some foundation I have no doubt. The islanders of St. Thomas say, that they have a sort of tree whose leaves continually are distilling water. (Botch, in Churchle, 405.) It is certain that a dew falls in hot weather from the trees,—a fact of which any person may easily convince himself. The same property has been observed on the island of Crete under the following extract from the Monthly Magazine:

"In the beginning of August, after a sunny day, the air became suddenly misty about six o'clock. I walked, however, by the road-side from seven to eight, and observed, in many places, that a shower of big drops of water was falling under the large trees, although no rain fell elsewhere. The road and path continued dusty, and the fielt-gates showed no sign of being wetted by the mist. I have often noticed the like fact, but have not met with a satisfactory explanation of this power in trees, something like the heat in a piece of mist."

I am not the only poet who has availed himself of the Piereo Tree. It is thus introduced in the Columbus of Carrara,—a singular work, containing, amidst many extravagances, some passages of rare merit:—

"Nomine Carumiae, de quo tecqu insequi non rem. Virgo quia, ac in Cocehors Travee; sed hic fuit, account of a Piereo Tree, quam prorsum rara. Laude pudicitie, mirum quas pestose votum Couatuer, ut eac crem um genetrix et Virgo confest. At quia in Urbe autem futuro sortitu parentem Oetum rari Patrem, dicere maribus haurit Linse splig naturae, tenos hiber dah."

Nursed.—VII. 11, p. 579.

A very distinguished son of Brahma, named Nared, bears a strong resemblance to Hermes or Mercury; he was a wise legislator, great in arts and in arms, an eloquent messenger of the gods, either to one another or to favored mortals, and a musician of exquisite skill. His invention of the Vina, or instrument, which was the most admired in the poet entitled All the Best. "Nursed" watching from time to time his large Vina, which, by the impulse of the breeze, yielded notes that pierced successively the regions of his ear, and proceeded by musical intervals. — ABASTI BEHERDAES, Sir W. JONES.

The Vina is an Asiatic harp. The people of Ambayna have a different kind of Zedian instrument, which is thus described in the first account of D'Entrecasteaux's Voyage: "Being on the sea-shore, I heard some wind-instruments, the harmony of which, though, sometimes very correct, was intermixed with discordant notes that were by no means displeasing. These sounds, which were very musical, were introduced by two envoys, who, it seemed to come from such an island, that I for some time imagined the natives were having a concert beyond the roadstead, near a micrometer from the spot where I stood. My ear was greatly deceived respecting the distance, for I was not a hundred meters from the instrument. It was a harpous at least twenty meters in height, which had been fixed in a vertical situation by the sea-side. I remarked between each knot a slit about three centimeters long by a centimeter wide; these slits formed so many holes, which, when the wind introduced itself into them, gave agreeable and diversified sounds. As the knots of this long harpous were very numerous, care had been taken to make holes in different directions, in order that, on whatever side the wind blew, it might always meet with some of them. I cannot convey a better idea of the sound of this instrument, than by comparing them to those of the Harmonica." — LABILLARDIERE. Voyage de Starch of La Prours.

Nared, the mythological offspring of Sarasrati, patroness of music, is famed for his talents in that science. So great were they, that he became preeminent; and emulating the divine strains of Krishna, he was punished by having his Vina placed in the paws of a bear, whence it emitted sounds far sweeter than the minstrelsy of the mortified musician. I have a picture of this joke, in which Krishna is forcing his reluctant friend to attach to his rough-hewn rival, who is ridiculously touching the chords of the name Nareda's Vina, accompanied by a brother Braum on the cymbals. Krishna passed several practical jokes on his humble and affectionate friend: he metamorphosed him once into a woman, at another time into a bear. — MONUS's Hindu Poeticon, p. 364.

That should, to men and gods, proclaim him Lord
And Sovereign Master of the usual World. — VII. 11, p. 589.

The Raison Yug, or Feast of Rajshs, could only be performed by a monarch who had conquered all the other sovereigns of the world. — HALIRED. Note to the Life of Cressohn.

Sole Rajsh, the Omnipotent below. — VII. 11, p. 589.

No person has given so complete a sample of the absurdity of Oriental titles as the Dutch traveller Struys, in his enumeration of "the proud and blasphemous titles of the King of Simm,—they will hardly bear sense," says the translator, in what he calls, by a happy blunder, "the idiocies of our tongue." The Alliance, written with letters of fine gold, being full of godlike glory, and the grandeur of the East, is a treatise of all wise sciences. The most Happy, which is not in the world among men. The Rest and most Certain that is in Heaven, Earth, and Hell. The greatest Sweet, and friendly Royal Word; whose powerful sounding properties and glorious fame range through the world, as if the deed were raised by a godlike power, and wondrously partur’d from grossly and corporal corruption. At this both spiritual and sensual men admire, with a special joy, whereas no dignity may be herewith compared. Proceeding from a friendly, illustrious, incomparable, most mighty, and high Lord; and adorned with nine sorts of precious stones. The greatest, clearest, and most godlike of Lord unamulable: Souls. The most holy, seeing every where, and protecting Sovereign of the city Jesus, whose many streets and open gates are thereunto. And, is that third metropolis, which is the whole world, the royal throne of the earth, that is adorned with nine sorts of stones and most pleasant valleys. He who guides the rails of the world, and has a house more than the Gods of fine gold and of precious stones; they the godlike Lord, adorned and of fine gold; and the White, Red, and Sundry Elephant, — which excellent creatures are the chiefest of the nine sorts of Gods. To none hath the divine Lord given, in whose hand is the victorious sword; who is the forty-armed God of Battails, to the most illustrious.

The second is as blaphemous as the first, though hardly so far out of sense.

The highest Presbyter Sulivan, Naelmon Wellgaca, Nemochadin Magavitha, Jocken der Kauten Allaula Ylana, King of the whole world; who makes the water rise and flow. A King that is like a God, and shines like the sun at noon-day. A King that gives a glance like the Moon when it is set full. Elected of God to be worthy as the North Star, being of the race and offspring of the great Alexander; with a great understanding; as a round orb, that tumbles hither and thither, able to grasp at the depth of the great sea; and having ascended over the heavens, and parted Saints, and is as righteous as God, and of such power, that all the world may come and shelter under his wings. A King that doth right in all things, as the Kings of old have done. A King more liberal than all Kings. A King that hath many mines of gold, and God hath been to him; who hath built temples half gold and half brass; sitting upon a throne of pure gold, and of all sorts of precious stones. A King of the white Elephant, which Elephant is the King of all Elephants, before whom many thousands of other Elephants must bow and fall upon their knees. He whose eyes shine like the morning-star. A King that hath Elephants with four teeth, red, purple, and pied. Elephants, ag, and a Hymenaphex Elephant; for which God has given him many and divers sorts of apparel wrought with most fine gold, adorned with many precious stones; and, besides these, so many Elephants used in battle, having harnesses of iron, their teeth tippet with steel, and their harnesses laid over with shining brass. A King that has many hundred horses, whose trappings are wrought with fine gold, and adorned with precious stones of every sort that are found in the universal world round about him; which, besides so many hundred horses that are used in war of every kind. A King who has all Empires, Kings, Princes, and Sovereigns in the whole world from the rising to the going down of the sun, under subjection: — and such as can obtain his favor are by him promoted to great honor; but, on the contrary, such as revolts, he burns with fire. A King who can show the power of God, and whatever God has made.

And so, by this time, I hope you have heard enough of a King of Elephants and Horses, though not a word of his Asses. — Strut.

The Sacrifice. — VIII. p. 581.

The Aṣarnamasha, or sacrifice of a horse. Considerable difficulties usually attended that ceremony; for the consecrated horse was to be set at liberty for a certain time, and followeth at a distance by the owner, or his champion, who was usually one of his near kinsman; and, if any person should attempt to stop it in its rambles, a battle must inevitably ensue; besides, as the performer of a hundred Aṣarnamasha became exceedingly fat, the frequent looking at the watch, and generally carried off the sacred animal by force or by fraud. — Wilmot. A. S. Res. Mr. Halhed gives a very curious account of this remarkable sacrifice:

"The Assum-need-Jugg does not merely consist in the performance of that ceremony which is open to the inspection of the world, namely, bringing a horse and sacrificing him; but Assum-need is to be taken in a mystic signification, as implying that the sacrificer must look upon himself to be typified in that horse, such as he shall be described, because the true signification comprehends all those other religious duties, to the performance of which all the wise and holy direct all their actions, and by which all the sincere professors of every different faith aim at perfection: the mystic signification thereof is as follows:

1. The head of that unbroken horse is the symbol of the morning; his eyes are the sun; his breath the wind; his wide-opening mouth is the light-house, or that innate warmth which inures all the world; his body typifies one entire age; his back parades, his belly the plains; his hoofs this world; his four quarters of the heavens; the bones thereof the intermediate spaces between all the rest of his limbs represent all distinct matter; the places where those limbs meet, in his joints, imply the months and halves of the months, which are called peake (or fortnights); his feet signify night and day; and night and day is of four kinds.

2. The night and day of Bitham, 3. The night and day of angels. 4. The night and day of the world of the spirits of deceased ancestors. 4. The night and day of mortals; these four kinds are typified in his four feet. The rest of his bones are the constellations of the fixed stars, which are the twenty-eight signs in the Zodiac.

3. The body is as follows: and the history of this is most charming. The body is like Copper; the head is like gold; the flesh is like the clouds; his food the sand; his tenuity the river; his spleen and his liver the mountains; the hair of his body the vegetables, and his long hair the trees, the fore part of his body typifies the first half of the day, and the hinder part the latter half; the front part of his body the morning, the other part the evening; his turning himself is the thunder of the cloud; his urine represents the rain, and his mental reflection is his only speech.

The golden vessels, which are prepared before the horse is put, are the light of the day, and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the West; these golden vessels which are prepared after the horse is let loose, are the light of the night; and the place where those vessels are kept is a type of the Ocean of the East; these vessels are always before and after the horse. The Arabic horse, which, on account of his swiftness, is called the Fly, is the performer of the journeys of angels; the Tujee, which is of the race of Persian horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Knudherps (or good spirits); the Wazha, which is of the race of the formidable Zorves horses, is the performer of the journeys of the Juns (or demons); and the Asoo, which is of the race of Turkish horses, is the performer of the journeys of mankind. This one horse, which performs these several services, on account of his four different sorts of riders, obtains the four different appellations. The place where this horse remains, is kept a type of the Ocean of the West, at that place is called Petra-Atna, or the Universal Soul, which proceeds also from that Petra-Atna, and is comprehended in the same Petra-Atna. The intent of this sacrifice is, that a man should consider himself to be in the place of that horse, and look upon all those articles as typified in himself, and, conceiving Petra-Atna (or divine soul) to be an ocean, should let all thought of self be absorbed in that Atma." — Halhed, from Darul Shekhah.

Compare this specimen of Eastern sublimity with the description of the sacrifices in Job: Compare also the account of the Bengal horses, in the very amusing work of Captain Williamson, — "which said horses," he says, "have generally Roman noses, and sharp, narrow foreheads, much white in their eyes, ill shaped ears, square heads, thin necks, narrow cheeks, shallow girths, lack bellies, cat knees, rose rumps, and tails, &c." — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 216.

The honor that in its vessel floats. — VIII. 5. p. 581.

The day and night are here divided into four quarters, each of six hours, and these again into fifteen parts, of twenty-four minutes each. For a chronometer they use a kind of dish of thin brass, at the bottom of which there is a little hole: this is put into a vessel with water, and it runs full in a certain time. They begin their first quarter at six in the morning. They strike the quarters and subdivisions of time with a

The marriage boxes. — IX. 4, p. 583

The Pandal is a kind of arbor or lower raised before the doors of young married women. They set up two or three poles, seven or eight feet in length, at an equal distance but the chief men of a district are allowed to leave a garural, and still they may not strike the first division of the first quarter, which is a privilege reserved to the nabob alone. Those who attend at these checks must be of the Brahm cast. — STAVRONIKETIS.

The market-flag. — IX. 6, p. 583.

Many villages have markets on particular days, when not only fruits, grains, and the common necessities of life are sold, but occasionally manufactures of various descriptions. These markets are well known to all the neighboring country, being on appointed days of the week, or of the lunar month; but, to remind those, who may be travelling, of their vicinity to the means of supply, a Nagaran, or large bell-drum, is beaten during the forenoon, and a small flag, usually of white linen, with some symbolical figures in colors, or with a colored border, is hoisted on a very long bamboo, kept upright by means of ropes fastened to pins driven into the ground. The huts of Hindoo villages are generally square and plain; those of the Mussalmans' towns are ordinarily triangular, and bear the type of their religion, viz. a double-bladed cimeter. — Oriental Sports, vol. 1. p. 109.

There, from the intolerable heat,

The buffaloe retreat. — IX. 7, p. 583.

About noon, in hot weather, the buffaloe throws herself into the water at noon of a tank, if there be one accessible at a convenient distance; and leaving nothing above water but her nose, continues there for five or six hours, or until the heat abates. — Buchanan.

In the hot season, when water becomes very scarce, the buffaloeavail themselves of any pond they may find among the cover, wherein they roll and rub themselves, so as in a very short time to change what was at first a shallow thin, into a deep pit, sufficient to conceal their own bulk. The humidity of the soil, even when the water may have evaporated, is particularly grateful to these animals, in the extreme heat, and which, if not indulged in a free access to the water, never thrive. — Oriental Sports, vol. 1. p. 259.

The buffaloe not only delights in the water, but will not thrive unless it have a swamp to wallow in. There, rolling themselves, they daily work deep holes and hollows, wherein they lay immersed. No place seems to delight the buffaloe more than the deep verdure on the confines of jiles and marshes, especially if surrounded by tall grass, so as to afford concealment and shade, while the body is covered by the water. In such situations they seem to enjoy a perfect ecstasy, having, in general, nothing above the surface but their eyes and nostrils, the horns being kept low down, and, consequently, entirely hidden from view. — Oriental Sports, vol. ii. p. 49.

Captain Bevan describes these animals as to be found during the heat of the day in the crevasses and on the shores of the Island of Bahama, almost totally immersed in water, little more than their heads appearing above it.

Mount Meru. — X. p. 584.

According to the orthodox Hindus, the globe is divided into two hemispheres, both called Meru; but the superior hemisphere is distinguished by the name of Sauver, which implies beauty and excellence, in opposition to the lower hemisphere, or Ouvver, which signifies the reverse: by Meru, without any adjunct, they generally mean the higher or northern hemisphere, which they describe, with a profusion of poetic imagery, as the seat of deities; while they represent Cauver as the habitation of demons, in some parts of it expanded and intensely cold, and in others so hot that the waters are continually boiling. In strict propriety, Meru denotes the pole and the polar regions; but it is the celestial north pole round which they place the gardens and metropolises of India, while Yuma holds his court in the opposite polar circles, or the station of Arun, who warred with the Saras, or gods of the floating islands, in the ocean, or sacrificial Beima.

In the Vaga Parshu, we are told, that the water or Ogha of the ocean, coming down from heaven like a stream of Arunta upon Meru, encircles it through seven channels, for the space of 81,000 Yajamas, and then divides into four vast streams, from the immense height of Mount Rishyabhar, rest themselves in four lakes, from which they spring over the mountains through the air, just brushing the summits. This wild account was not known in the west; for this passage is translated almost verbally, by Pliny and Q. Curtius, in several works.

The Swargara, or Mandacini, rises from under the feet of Yeeshna, at the polar star, and passing through the circle of the moon, it falls upon the summit of Meru; where it divides into four streams, flowing towards the four cardinal points. These four branches pass through four rocks, carved into the shape of the heads of different animals. The Ganges, running towards the south, passes through a cow's head; to the west is a horse's head, from which flows the Chasu or Oxus; towards the east, is the head of an elephant, from which flows the river Sita; and to the north, is a lion's head, from which flows the Bhadranusa.—Wilford. Az. Res. vol. viii. p. 317. Calc. edition.

The mountains through which the Ganges flows at Hardwar, present the spectator with the view of a grand natural amphitheatre; their appearance is ragged, and destitute of verdure; they run in ridges and bluff points, in a direction east and west; at the back of the largest range rise, towering to the clouds, the lofty mountains of Himaluahya, whose tops are covered with perpetual snow, which, on clear days, present a most sublime prospect. Their large jagged masses, broken into numerous India shapes, add to their stupendous height, impress the mind with an idea of antiquity and grandeur, coeval with the creation; and the eternal frost with which they are incrusted, appears to preclude the possibility of mortals ever attaining their summit.

In viewing this grand spectacle of nature, the traveller may easily yield his ascent to, and pardon the superstitions veneratiion of the, Hindoo votary, who, in the fervor of his imagina- tion, assigns the summit of these icy regions as the abode of the great Mahadeo, or First Cause, where, seated on his throne of ice, he is supposed to receive the homage of the surrounding universe.—Franklin's Life of George Thomas, p. 41.

At Gangottara, three small streams fall down from impassable snowy precipices, and unite into a small basin below, which is considered by the Hindus as the source of the Ganges, over which, at that place, a man can run. This is one of the five Tirthas, or stations, more eminently sacred than the rest upon this sacred river. Narayana Shastri, who gave this account, had visited it.—Bechana.

The mountain, called Cauless Cauver, is exceedingly lofty. On its summit there is a Bhujputj tree, from the root of which sprouts or pushes a small stream, which the people say is the source of the Ganges, and that it comes from Yeeshna, or Heaven, as is also related in the Puranas; although this source appears to the sight to flow from the spot where grows this new spring, quite, as it were, at an ascent of some miles; and yet above this there is a still loftier summit, where no one goes; but I have heard that, on that uppermost pinnacle, there is a fountain or cavity, to which a Jogii somehow penetrated, who, having immersed his little finger in it, it became poisoned with the poison of the Poolis. Hence it is called as Pooles, and condemned by the sectarians to the Brahmans.

Respecting the true source of the Ganges much uncertainty still prevails. In vain one of the most powerful sover- eigns of Indostan, the emperor Achar, at the close of the sixteenth century, sent a number of men, an army of disc- essers, armed with every necessary recommendation, to explore the course of the mighty river which adorned and fertilized the vast extent of his dominions. They were not able to penetrate beyond the famous Month of the Cow. This is an immense aperture, in a ridge of the mountains of Thibet, to which the natives of India have given this appellation, from the fancied or real resemblance of the rocks which form the summit of this stupendous chain, to the mouth of an animal esteemed sacred throughout Indostan from the remotest antiquity. From this opening, the Ganges, precipitating itself into a large and deep basin at the foot of the mountains, forms a cañaract, which is called Gangotri. The impracticability of exploring this formidabie pass, has prevented the tracing whence this rushing mass of water takes its primary rise.—Wilcocke. Nota et Sacrariums.

I am indebted to Sir William Jones's Hymns to Gange, for this fable:—

"Above the stretch of mortal ken, On bless'd Cauless Cauver's top, where every stem Glow'd with a vegetable gem, Mahus' stood, the dread and joy of men; While Pârvati, to gain a boon, Fix'd on his locks a beauteous moon. And his frankt eye in jocund play, With reluctant sweet delay. All nature straight was lock'd in dim eclipse, Till Bhagavan pure, wv, with hollow lips, And warbled prayers, restored the day; When Ganga from his brow, by heavenly fingers presc'd, Sprang radiant, and,descending, grasped the eavens of the west."

The descent of the Ganges is related in the Ramayana, one of the most celebrated of the sacred books of the Brahmans. This work the excellent and learned Baptist missionaries at Serampore are at this time employed in printing and translating; one volume has arrived in Europe, and from it I am tempted here to insert an extract of considerable length. The reader will be less disposed to condemn the fictions of Hinduism as extravagant, when he compares them with this genuine specimen of Hindu fable. He will perceive, too, that no undue importance has been attributed to the Horse of the Sacrifice in the Poem.

The son of Kushaka having, in mellifluous anecdotes, re- lated these things to Rama, again addressed the descendent of Kakoodtha. Formerly, O hero! there was a king of heaven, named Sugara, the Sovereign of Men, virtuous, desirous of children, but childless; O Rama! the daughter of Vidur- bahakeshine, virtuous, attached to truth, was his chief con- sort, and the daughter of Udrishthana, Soomuni, unequalled in beauty, his second spouse. With these two consorts, the great king, going to Himavat, engaged in sacred mysteries on the mountain in whose sacred stream Bhirgo was constantly bathed. A hundred years being completed, the sage Bhirgo, clothed with truth, rendered propitious by his virtues, granted him this blessing: O staid One! thou shalt obtain a most numerous progeny; thy fame, O chief of men! will be unparalleled in the universe. From one of thy consorts, O sire! shall spring the founder of thy race, and, from the other, sixty thousand sons.

The queen, pleased, approached the chief of men who was thus speaking, and, with hands respectfully joined, asked, O Brahman! who shall be the son, and who shall produce the multitude? We, O Brahman! desire to hear. May thy words be verified. Hearing their request, the most virtuous Bhirgo replied in these admirable words: Freely say which of these favors ye desire, whether the one, founder of the family, or the multitude of valiant, renowned, energetic sons. O Rama! son of Kughoa, Keshine hearing the words of the sage, in the presence of the king accepted the one, competed for by his consorts; and Soomuni, sister of Soopurna, accepted the sixty thousand sons, active and renowned. The king, O son of Kughoa! having respectfully circumambulated the sage, bowing the head, returned with his spouses to his own city.

After some time had elapsed, his eldest spouse Keshine bore to Sugura a son, named Usnuma; and Soomuni, O chief of men! brought forth a gourd, from which, on its being opened, came forth sixty thousand sons. These, carefully hough up by their nurses, in jars filled with clarified butter, in process of time attained the state of youth; * and, after a long period, the sixty thousand sons of Sugura, possessed of youth and power, were born. The earliest offspring of Sugura, O son of Rughoog; I chief of men, seizing children; would throw them into the waters of the Suruggyo, and sport himself with their drowning page. This evil person, the distresser of good men, devoted to the injury of the citizens, was by his father expelled from the city. The son of Umu-munja, the heroic Ungsoosuma, in conversation courteous and affectuosely, was esteemed by all.

"After a long time, O chief of men! Sugura formed the steady resolve, 'I will perform a sacrifice.' Versed in the Veda, the king, sitting by his instructors, having determined the things relating to the sacrificial work, began to prepare the sacrifice.

"Hearing the words of Vishua-mitra, the son of Rughoog, highly gratified in the midst of the story, addressed the sage, bright as the ardent flame, Bee to the Three: I desire, O Brahman, to hear this story at large, how my predecessors performed the sacrifice. Hearing his words, Vishuua-mitra, smiling, pleasantly replied to Rama: 'Attend then, O Rama! to the story of Sugura, repeated at full length. Where the great mountain Himunarat, the happy father-in-law of Shunkura, and the mountain Rughoog, erecting the country around, proudly vie with each other, there was the sacrifice of the great Sugura performed. That land, sacred and renowned, is the habitation of Rakshus. At the command of Sugura, the hero Ungsoosuma, O Rama! eminent in archery, a mighty charioteer, was thrown into (of the house.) While the king was performing the sacrifice, a serpent, assuming the form of Umuta, rose from the earth, and seized the sacrificial horse. The sacrificial victim being stolen, all the prisoners, O son of Rughoog! going to the king, said, Thy consecrated horse has been stolen by some one in the form of a serpent. Kill the thief, and bring back the sacred horse. This interruption in the sacrifice portends evil to us all. Take these steps, O king! which may lead to the completion of the sacrifice. Having heard the advice of his instructors, the king, calling his sixty thousand sons into the assembly, said, I perceive that the Rakshusas have not been to this great sacrifice. A sacrifice of the Naga is now performing by the sages, and some god, in the form of a serpent, has stolen the devoted horse. Whoever be, who, at the time of the Deeksha, has been the cause of this accollective circumstance, this unhappy event, whether he be gone to Patala, or whether he remain in the waters, kill him, O sons! and bring back my victim. May success attend you, O my sons! At my command, you traverse the sea-girt earth, digging with mighty labor, till you obtain a sight of the prisoner; each one piercing the earth to the depth of a yojana, so you in search of him who stole the sacred horse. Being consecreated by the Deeksha, I, with my grandsons, and my teachers, will remain with the sacrifice unfinished, till I again behold my devoted horse."

"Thus instructed by their father Sugura, they, in obedience to him, went with cheerful mind, O Rama! to the bottom of the earth. The strong ones, having gone over the earth without obtaining a sight of the horse, each of these mighty ones pierced the earth to the depth of a yojana, with their mighty arm, the stroke of which resembled the thunderbolt. Pierced by Kooddhasa, by Purighas, by Shoudas, by Mouseh, and Zoutkhas, * the earth cried out as in darkness. Then arose, O Rughoog! a dreadful cry of the serpents, the Gooras, the Rakshus, and other creatures, as beings suffering death. These angry youths, O son of Rughoog! I dig the earth's even to Patala, to the extent of sixty thousand yojana. Thus, O prince! the sons of the sovereign of men traversed Jambudweepa, enclosed with mountains, digging wherever they came. The gods now, with the Guhurwus and the great serpents, struck with astonishment, went all of them to Brumha, and, having even to the foot of the great spirit, they, full of terror, with dejected countenance, addressed him thus: 'O lord! the earth, covered with mountains and woods, with rivers and continents, the sons of Sugura are now digging up. At this diggmg, O Brumha! the mightiest beings are killed. This is the stracer of our conseqnerated victims; by this (our) fellow our horse was taken away. Thus saying, the sons of Sugura destroy all creatures. O most powerful! having heard this, it becomes thee to interpose, before these horse-seekers destroy all thy creatures ended with life.'"

Thus for the thirty-second Section, describing the digging of earth.

SECTION THIRTY-THREE.

"Hearing the words of the gods, the divine Brumha replied to those afflicted ones reproved with the Yama-like power of these youths: The wise Yama-deva, the great Madhava, who claims the earth for his spouse, that divine one, residing in the form of Kupila, supports the earth. By the fire of his wrath he will destroy the sons of the king. This piercing of the earth must, I suppose, he perceived by him, and he will (offset) the destruction of the long-existing earth. The thirty-three gods, enemy subduing, having heard the words of Brumha, returned home full of joy. The sons of Sugura highly renowned, thus digging the earth, a sound was produced resembling that of conflicting elements. Having encompassed and penetrated the whole earth, the sons of Sugura, returning to their father, said, The whole earth has been traversed by us; and all the powerful gods, the Danuvas, the Rakshusas, the Vishalakhas, the serpents, and hydras are killed; but we have not seen thy horse, nor the thief. What shall we do? Success be to this evil to be pleased to determine what more is proper. The virtuous king, having heard the words of his sons, O son of Rughoog! angrily replied, Again commence digging. Having penetrated the earth, and found the stealer of the horse, having accomplished your intention, return again. Attentive to the words of their father, the great Sugura, the sixty thousand descended to Patala, and there renounced their digging. There, O chief of men! they saw the elephant of that quarter of the globe, in size resembling a mountain, with distorted eyes, supporting with his head this earth, with all its mountains and woods, covered with various countries, and adorned with numerous cities. Where, for the sake of rest, O Kakootshu! the great elephant, through distress, refreshes himself by moving his head, an earthquake is produced."

Hearing respectively, the circumambulated this mighty elephant, guardian of the quarter, they, O Rama! praising him, penetrated into Patala. After they had thus penetrated the cast quarter, they opened their way to the south. Here they saw that great elephant Muha-pulma, equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with his head. Reckoning him, they were filled with surprise; and, after the usual circumambulation, the sixty thousand sons of the great Sugura perforated the west quarter. In this thirty-nineteenth one the elephant Deeksha, of equal size. Having respectfully saluted him, and inquired respecting his appearance, the eminent ones digging, arrived at the north. This quarter, O chief of Rughoog! they saw the snow-white elephant Bhandara, supporting this earth with his beautiful body. Circumambulating him, they again penetrated the earth, and proceeding north-east to that returned quarter; all the sons of Sugura, through anger, pierced the earth again. There all those magnificent ones, tergible in swiftness, and of mighty prowess, saw Kupila, Vasodeva the eternal, and near him the horse feeding. Filled, O son of Rughoog! with unparalleled joy, they all, knowing him to be their horse, and crying aloud, Each of the horse, with eyes starting with rage, seeing their spauls and their ungulates, and even

Each of these has several names; to each there is often attached a period of time. For instance, Vasooma, one year, Vasooma, three years, and so on.

trees and stones, ran towards him full of wrath, calling out, Stop, stop! thou art the stealer of our sacrificial horse! Thou stupid one, know that we who have found thee are the sons of Rugho! Kupila, filled with excessive anger, uttered from his nostrils a loud sound, and instantly, O Kacorasñtha! by Kupila's information, all the twenty sons of Rugho were all the sons of Sugura turned to a heap of ashes."

Thus far the thirty-third Section, describing the interview with Kupila.

SECTION THIRTY-FOUR.

"O son of Rugho! Sugura, perceiving that his sons had been absent a long time, thus addressed his grandson, intentions by his own might: Thou art a hero, possessed of science, in proven conduct, a controller of the fate of thy paternal relatives, and the person by whom the horse was stolen, that we may arrange ourselves on these unstrategic beings, powerful and great. Take thy chariot and bow, O beloved one! and finding out thy deceased paternal relatives, destroy my adversary. The proposed end being thus accomplished, return. Bring me happily through this sacrifice.

"Thus particularly addressed by the great Sugura, Unghooman, swift and powerful, taking his bow and chariot, departed. Urged by the king, the chief men traversed the subterranean regions, and were round about the mighty mountain. One saw the elephant of the quarter, adored by the gods, the Damurs and Rukshuses, the Pishchus, the birds and the serpents. Having circumambulated him, and asked concerning his welfare, Unghooman inquired for his paternal relatives, and the elephant having given the works of the quarter hearing, replied, O son of Ummamûn! thou wilt accomplish thine intention, and speedily return with the horse. Having heard this, he, with due respect, inquired, in regular succession, of all the elephants of the quarters. Honored by all the quarters, on the eighth sides of the earth, acquainted with speech, and eminent in eloquence, he was told, Thou wilt return with the horse. Upon this encouraging declaration, he swiftly went to the place where lay his paternal relatives, the sons of Sugura, reduced to a heap of ashes. [At this sight] the sons of Ummamûn, overwhelmed with sorrow on account of their death, cried out with excess of grief. In this state of grief, the chief of men beheld, grasping near, the sacrificial horse. The illustrious one, desirous of performing the funeral obsequies of these sons of the king, looked around for a receptacle of water, but in vain. Extending his eager view, he saw, O Rugho! the sovereign of all lands, the uncle of his paternal relatives, Soopurna, in size resembling a mountain. Vinuteya, of mighty prowess, addressed him thus: Grieve not, O chief of men! this slaughter is approved by the universe. These great ones were reduced to ashes by Kupila of immovable nature. This is not proper for thee, O Rugho! for four common water upon these ashes. Gunga, O chief of men! is the eldest daughter of Himuvat. With her sacred stream, O valiant one! perform the funeral ceremonies for these ancestors. If the purifier of the world flow on them, reduced to a heap of ashes, these ashes being wettet by Gunga, the illuminator of the world, the sixty thousand sons of thy grandfather will be received into heaven. May success attend thee! Bring Gunga to the earth from the residence of the gods. If thou art able, O chief of men! possessor of the ample share, let the descent of Gunga be accomplished by thee. Take the horse, and go forth. It is thine, O hero! for to complete the great paternal sacrifice.

"Having heard these words of Soopurna, Unghooman, the heroic, speedily seizing the horse, returned. Then, O son of Rugho! being come to the king, who was still performing the initiatory ceremonies, he related to him the whole affair, and the advice of Soopurna.

"After hearing the terror-inspiring relation of Unghooman, the king finished the sacrifice, in exact conformity to the tenor and spirit of the ordinance; having finished his sacrifice, the sovereign of the earth returned to his palace. The king, however, was unable to devise any way for the descent of Gunga from heaven: after a long time, unable to fix upon any method, he departed to heaven, having reigned thirty thousand years. And Rugho, I paid the debt of nature, the people chose Unghooman, the pious, for their sovereign. Unghooman, O son of Rugho! was a very great monarch.

His son was called Bhugee-rutha. Having placed him on the throne, he, O Ragura! retiring to the pleasant top of Mount Himuvat, performed the most severe austerities. This excellent sovereign of men, as the immortals, was exceedingly desirous of the descent of Gunga; but not obtaining his wish, he, the mighty monarch, thus proceeded to heaven, after having abode in the forest sacred to austerities thirty-two thousand years. Bhugee-rutha, the highly energetic, being made acquainted with the slaughter of his paternal great uncles, was overwhelmed with grief; but was still unable to fix upon a way of deliverance. How shall I accomplish the descent of Gunga? How shall I perform the funeral oblations of these relatives? How shall I deliver them? In such cogitations was his mind constantly engaged. While these ideas filled the mind of the king, thoroughly acquainted with sacrifice, Bhugee-rutha, the most virtuous son, called Bhugee-rutha. The illustrious king Bhugee-rutha performed many sacrifices, and governed the kingdom for thirty thousand years; but, O chief of men! no way of obtaining the deliverance of his ancestors appearing, he, by a disease, discharged the debt of nature. Having installed his own son Bhugee-rutha in the kingdom, the lord of men departed to the paradise of Indra, through the merits of his own virtuous deeds.

"The prince, the royal sage, Bhugee-rutha, O son of Rugho! was childless. Desirous of offspring, yet childless, the great monarch intrusted the kingdom to the care of his counsellors; and, having his heart set on obtaining the descent of Gunga, engaged in a long course of sacred austerities upon the mountain Gokurna. With hands erected, he, O son of Rugho! called, O Bhugee-rutha! according to the prescribed ordinance in the cold season lying in water; and in the rainy season exposed to the descending clouds, feeding on fallen leaves, with his mind restrained, and his sensual feelings subdued, this valiant and great king continued a thousand years in the practice of the most severe austerities. The magnificent monarch of mighty arm having finished this period, the divine Brahman, the lord of creatures, the supreme governor, was highly pleased; and with the gods, going near to the great Bhugee-rutha, employed in sacred austerities, said to him, I am propitious, O performer of sacred vows! seek a blessing. The mighty, the illustrious Bhugee-rutha, with hands respectfully joined, replied to the sire of all, O divine one! if thou art pleased with me, if the fruit of my austerities may be granted, let all the sons of Sugura obtain water for their funeral rites. The ashes of the great ones being wettet by the water of Gunga, let all my ancestors ascend to the eternal heaven. Let a child, O divine one! be granted to us, that our family become not extinct. O God! let this great blessing be granted to the family of Ibshwako. The venerable sire of all replied to the king thus respecting in the presence of the monarchs: Bhugee-rutha, thou mighty charioteer, this great wise of thine heart acquainted. Let prosperity attend thee, thou increaser of the family of Ibshwako! Engage Hura, O king! to receive (in her descent) Gunga the eldest daughter of the mountain Himuvat. The earth, O king! cannot sustain the descent of Gunga, nor beside Shooder do I behold any one, O king! able to receive her. The creator having thus replied to the king, and spoke to Gunga, returned to heaven with Marroots and all the gods.

Thus far the thirty-fourth Section, describing the gift of the blessing to Bhugee-rutha.

SECTION THIRTY-FIVE.

"Prusa-puti being gone, Bhugee-rutha, O Ruma! with uplifted arm, without support, without a helper, immovable as a dry tree, and feeding on air, remained day and night on the tip of his great toe upon the afflicted earth. A full year having now elapsed, Bhugee-rutha, the lord of animals, who is reverenced by all worlds, said to the king, I am propitious to thee, O chief of men! I will accomplish thy utmost desire. To him the sovereign replied, O Huna, receive Gongua! Blurga,* thus addressed, replied, I will perform thy desire; I will receive her on my head, the daughter of the mountain. Maheswara then, mounting on the summit of Huma, soared to the air, followed by the ever-lowering Gonga, the river flowing in the valley, saying, Descend, O Gongua! The eldest son of Blauga was adored by the universe, having heard the words of the lord of Oona, was filled with anger, and assuming, O Rama! a form of amazing size, with an incomparable efficacy, fell from the air upon the auspicious head of Shiva. The goddess Gongua, irresistible, thought within herself, I will bear down Shanka with my stream, and enter Putali. The divine Huma, the three-eyed God, was aware of her proud resolution, and, being angry, determined to prevent her design. The purifier, fallen upon the sacred head of Koodra, was obtained, O Rama! in the recesses of the orchard of his Jata, resembling Himavat, and was unable, by the greatest efforts, to descend to the earth. From the borders of the orb of his Jata, the goddess could not obtain regress, but wandered there for many series of ages. Thus situated, Blaugenee-ratha beheld her wandering there, and again engaged in severe austerities.

With these mysteries, O son of Raghu! Huna being greatly pleased, discharged Gongua towards the Like Vindoe. In her flowing forth seven streams were produced. Three of these streams, beautiful, filled with water conveying happiness, well-armed, direct the course eastward, while Soochukhoos,** and Sindhoo,** three perilous mighty rivers, flowed to the west. The seventh of these streams followed king Blaugenee-ratha. The royal sage, the illustrious Blaugenee-ratha, seated on a resplendent car, led the other four streams following pouring down from the sky upon the head of Shanka, and afterwards upon the earth, her streams rolled along with a shrill sound. The earth was willingly chosen by the fallen fishes, the turtles, the porpoises, and the birds. The royal sages, the Gondhuvas, Vakhus and the Brahma, beheld her fall down the one, and the other to the earth; yea, the gods, immovable in power, filled with surprise, came thither with chariots resembling a city, horses, and elephants, and litters, desirous of seeing the wonderful and unparalleled descent of Gongua into the world. Irritated by the descending gods, and the splendor of their ornaments, the cloudless atmosphere shone with the splendor of a hundred suns, while, by the uneasy porpoises, the serpents, and the fishes, the air was coruscated as with lightning. Through the whole form of the waters, spreading in a thousand dimensions, and the depths of the cloud, the atmosphere appeared filled with autumnal clouds. Gongua, with the descending effulgence, falling from the head of Shanka, and thence to the earth, ran in some places with a rapid stream, in others in a tortuous current; here widely spreading, there descending into caverns, and again spouting upward; in some places it moved slowly, stimulating all that beheld it; in others, it rose upwards, and again fell to the earth. Knowing its purity, the sages, the Gondhuvas, and the inhabitants of the earth, touched the water fallen from the body of Blurga.*** Those who, through a curse, had fallen from heaven to earth, having performed ablation in this stream, became free from sin; cleansed from sin by this water, and restored to happiness, they entered the sky, and returned again to heaven. By this illustrious stream was the world rejoiced, and by performing ablution in Gongua, became free from impurity.

The royal sage, Blaugenee-ratha, seated on a resplendent car, while Gongua followed after the gods, O Rama! with the sages, the Dityas, the Divas, the Kshiras, the chief Gondhuvas, and Vakhus, with the Kikurvas, the chief sages, and all the Upajivas, together, with aquatic animals, following the chariot of Blaugenee-ratha, attended Gongua. Whither king Blaugenee-ratha went, thither went the renowned Gongua, the chief of streams, the destroyer of all sin.

After this, Gongua, in her course, inundated this sacrificial ground of the great Juhnoo of ascending deities, who was then offering sacrifice. Juhnoo, O Blaugenee-ratha! perceiving her pride enraged, drank up the whole of the water of Gongua—a most astounding deed! At this the gods, the Gondhuvas, and the sages, exceedingly surprised, adored the great Juhnoo, the most excellent of men, and named Gongua the daughter of this great sage.

The illustrious chief of men, pleased, discharged Gongua from his ears. Having liberated her, he, recognizing the great Blaugenee-ratha, the chief of kings, then present, duly honored him, and returned to the place of sacrifice. From the deed Gongua, the daughter of Juhnoo, obtained the name Juhnowee.

Gongua now went forward again, following the chariot of Blaugenee-ratha. Having reached the sea, the chief of streams proceeded to Patala, to accomplish the work of Blaugenee-ratha. The wise and royal sage, having, with great labor, conducted Gongua thither, he befell his ancestors reduced to ashes. Then, O chief of Raghubar's race, that heap of ashes, bathed by the excellent waters of Gongua, and purified from sin, the sons of the king obtained heaven. Having arrived at the sea, the king, followed by Gongua, entered the subterraneous regions, where lay the sacred ashes. After these, O Rama! had been laved by the water of Gongua, Brahma, the lord of all, thus addressed the king: O chief of men! thy protectors, the sixty charmed sons of the great Sugra, are all delivered by thee; and the great and perennial receptacle of water, called by Sugra's name, shall henceforth be universally known by the appellation of Sugra.* As long, O king! as the waters of the sea continue in the earth, so long shall the sons of Sugra remain in heaven, in all the splendor of gods.

This Gongua, O king! shall be thy cherished daughter, known throughout the three worlds (by the name) Blaugenee-ratha; and because she passed through the earth, the chief of rivers shall be called Gongua throughout the universe. (She shall also be) called Tripura, on account of her entrance forward in three different directions, watering the three worlds. Thus she is named by the gods and sages. She is called Gongua, O sovereign of the Vashyas! on account of her flowing through Gongua,* and her third name, O thou observer of cows! is Blaugenee-ratha. O, accomplished one! through the affection to thee, and regard to me, these names will remain; as long as Gongua, the great river, shall remain in the world, so long shall this yeathless fame live throughout the universe. O lord of men! O king! perform here the funeral rites of all! and, being possessed of merit of thelike, who wishes of theirs was not obtained by thine ancestors highly renowned, chief among the priests! not by Unghoosoo, unpaired in the universe, so earnestly desiring the descent of Gongua, O beloved one! I was this object of desire obtained. Nor, O possessed of a steady mind, that by this (Gongua) (obtained) by thine illustrious father Dwipeevas, the Rajputi eminently accomplished, whose energy was equal to that of a Muhueshe, and who, established in all the virtues of the Kshetras, in sacred austerities equalled myself. This great design has been fully accomplished by thee, O chief of men! Thy fame, the blessing so much desired, will spread throughout the world. O subject of enemies! this descent of Gongua has been effected by thee. This Gongua is the great abode of virtue; by this deed thou art become possessed of the divinity itself. In this thou art constantly here by thyself. O chief of men! Purified, O most excellent of mortals, on a pustaker of the fruit of holiness; perform the funeral ceremonies of all thy ancestors. May blessings attend thee, O chief of men! I return to heaven.

The renowned one, the sovereign of the gods, the sire of the universe, having thus spoken, returned to heaven.

King Blaugenee-ratha, the royal sage, having performed the funeral ceremonies of the descendants of Sugra, in proper order of succession, according to the ordinance; the renowned one having also, O chief of men! performed the customary ceremonies, and purified himself, returned to his own city, where he governed the kingdom. Having (again,) O Rug- kara! possessed of abundant wealth, obtained their king, his people rejoiced; their sorrow was completely removed; they increased in wealth and prosperity, and were freed from disease.

"Thus, O Rama! has the story of Ganga been related at large by me. May prosperity attend thee; may every good be the lot of this Earth; may East receive him who causes this relation, securing wealth, fame, longevity, posti2city, and heaven, to be heard among the Brahmanas, the Kshatriyas, or the other tribes of men, his ancestors rejoice, and to him are the gods propitious; and he who hears this admirable story of the descent of Ganga, ensuring long life, shall obtain Kaśyapa-deva! all the wishes of his heart. All his sins shall be destroyed, and his life and fame be abundantly prolonged."

End of the thirty-fifth Section, describing the descent of Ganga.

Parvati. — X. 2, p. 584.

A3 the Devatas, and other inhabitants of the celestial regions, being collected at the summits of Braçavat, to arrange the ceremonies of the marriage of Sceva and Parvati, first came Hanuman, mounted on his goose, with the Roysehes at his stirrup; next Veeshhu, riding on Garoot, his eagle, with the chank, the chakra, the club, and the pedive in his hands; Eesuna, also, and Yama, and Cvera, and Varuna, and the rivers Ganga and Jamna, and the seven Seas. The Gandavas also, and the Nymphs of the Yassowake, and other seigeants, in obedience to the commands of Sceva, all dressed in superb chains and habits of ceremony, were to be seen in order amidst the crowded and glittering cavalcade.

And now, Sceva, after the arrival of all the Devatas, and the completion of the preparations for the procession, set out, in the utmost pomp and splendor, from the mountain Kilas. His third eye flamed like the sun, and the crescent on his forehead assumed the form of a radiant diadem; his snakes were exchanged for chains and necklaces of pearls and rubies, his ashes for sandal and perfume, and his elephant's skin for a silken robe, so that none of the Devatas in brilliance came near his figure. The bridal attendants now spread wide abroad the carpet of congratulation, and arranged in order the banquets of bliss. Nature herself assumed the appearance of renovated youth, and the surrounding universe recalled its long forgotten happiness. The Gandavas and Aparnas began their melodious songs, and the Genes and Karcans displayed the magic of their various musical instruments. The earth and its inhabitants exulted with tongues of glorification and triumph; fresh moisture invigorated the withered victimes of time; a thousand happy and animating conceptions inspired the hearts of the intelligent, and enlightened the wisdom of the thoughtful: The kingdom of exterior forms obtained gladness; the world of intellect acquired brightness. The dwellers upon earth were exalted by the appearance of the personages of the universe; the jewels of the diadem, and the reverend pilgrims exchanged their beads for pearls. The joy of those on earth ascended up to heaven, and the Tree of the bliss of those in heaven extended its auspicious branches downwards to the earth. The eyes of the Devatas flamed like torches on beholding these scenes of rapture, and the hearts of the just kindled like torchwood on hearing these ravishing symphonies. Thus Sceva set off like a garden in full bloawe, and paradise was eclipsed by his motion. — MAHNI, from the Sceva-Purvan.

Then the heart of the Universe stood still. — X. 2, p. 584.

Long after these lines were written, I was amused at finding a parallel passage in a sermon:

Quando o Sol parou de vozes de Jósew, acontecerem no mundo todas aquellas conseqüencias, que para ele movimento celeste, consideram os Filósofos. As plantas por tudo aquello trampo nam ccrecem: as castanhas dos elecrnos, e dos miras, nam se alter- ram: a grageira e o depoimento que se conserva o mesmo: as artes e os exercícios de hum e outro Estoico estarem suspensos; as Antipodas nam trabalhem, porque, lhes falta a luz; os de eina consuntos de trem compósito de decidem o trabalho: estes passamem de verem o Sol que se nam movia:

Sura. — X. 16, p. 586.

Sura, the Sun. The poets and painters describe his car as drawn by seven green horses, preceded by Jeraun, or the Dawn who acts as his charioteer, and followed by thousands of genii, worshipping him, and modulating his praises. Surya is believed to have descended frequently from his car in a human shape, and to have left a race on earth, who are equally renowned in the Indian stories with the Heliod of Greece. It is very singular that his two sons, called Aswam of Aswamcaramer, in the Duhl, should be considered as twin brothers, and painted like Costor and Phoebus; but they each have the character of Acculletis among the gods, and are believed to have been born of a nymph, who, in the form of a Zara, was impregnated with sunbeams. — Sir W. Joves.

That sun, O daugher of Ganga! than which nothing is higher, to which nothing is equal, enlightens the summit of the sky, with the sky enlightens the earth — with the earth enlightens the lower worlds; enlightens the higher worlds, enlightens other worlds; — it enlightens the breasts, — enlightens all besides the breast. — Sir W. Jones, from the Vedas.

Forgetful of his Dragon foe. — X. 16, p. 586.

Rāhu was the son of Cusinya and Devi, according to some authorities; but others represent Sivakasi (perhaps the sphinx) as his natural mother. He had four arms; his lower ports ended in a tail like that of a dragon; and his aspect was grim and gloomy, like the darkness of the chase, whom he had also the name of Trasas. He was the adviser of all mischief among the Daityas, who had a regard for him; but among the Decetas it was his chief delight to sow dissolution; and when the gods had produced the amrit, by charging the ocean, he dis guised himself like one of them, and received a portion of it; but the Sun and Moon having discovered his fraud, Vishnu severed his head and two of his arms from the rest of his monstrous body. That part of the nectarous fluid which he had to swallow secured his immortality; his trunk and dragon-like tail fell on the mountain of Mount, where Mini, a Brahman, carefully preserved them by the name of Cetus; and, as if a complete body had been formed from them, like a dis membered polyhe, he is even said to have adopted Cetus as his own child. The head, being driven down to the sands of Barhara, where Prashna's was then walking with Sivashen, by some called his wife: They carried the Daitya to their palace, and adopted him as their son; whence he acquired the name of Prasen Vang. This extravagant fable is, no doubt, an astrological idea, since the lamps when the ascent of the Sun is rising, or the astrologers call the head and tail of the dragon. It is added, that they appeased Vishnu, and obtained re-admission to the firmament, but were no longer visible from the earth, their enlightened sides being turned from it; that Rāhu strives, during every rising and setting, in the Sun and Moon, who detected him; and that Cetus often appears as a comet, a whirlwind, a fiery meteor, a water-spout, or a column of sand. — WILFORD. Ancient Researches.

Suras. — X. 18, p. 586.

The word Sura, in Sanscrit, signifies both wine and true wealth; hence, in the first Chapter of the Rigavas of Vedic, it is expressly said that the Devarct, having received the Sura, acquired the title of Sura, and the Daityas that of Abara, from not having received it. The Vedas are represented as that wine and true wealth. — PATTESON. Ancient Researches.

Eternal Cam! or doth SMARU bright, Or proud Ananga, give the more delight? — Sir W. Joves.
He was the son of Max, or the general attracting power, and married to Retty, or Affection, and his bosom friend is Bees, or Spry. He is represented as a beautiful youth, sometimes emerging with his head from the mouth of a garry'se cup; sometimes riding by moonlight on a parrot or lary, and attended by dancing girls or nymphs, the foremost of whom bears his colors, which is a fish on a red ground. His favorite place of resort is a large tract of country round Ayra, and principally the plains of Mota, where Kenneth also, and the nine Gorga, who are clearly the Apollo and Mars of the Greeks, usually spend the night with music and dance. His bow of sugar cane or flowers, with a string of bees, and his fire arrows, each pointed with an Indian blossom of a heating quality, are altogether equally new and beautiful.

It is possible that the words Dipire and Cupid, which have the same signification, may have the same origin; since we know that the old Hebrews, from whom great part of the Roman language and religion was derived, and whose system had a near affinity with that of the Persians and Indians, used to write their lines alternately forwards and backwards, as arrows are made by the plough. — Sir W. Jones.

Mahadeva and Parvati were playing with dice at the ancient game of Chatarnaga, when they disputed, and parted in wrath; the dice were laid by the goddess upon the plough, properly belonging to Cashinadwip. They severely performed rigid acts of devotion to the Supreme Being; but the fires which they kindled blazed so venomously as to threaten a general conflagration. The Devas, in great alarm, hastened to Brahman, who held the fire of the universe in his hand, and supplicated him to come to Cashinadwip. He consented, and sent two thousand armed horses, but the crafty deity only answered, That she must come by her own free choice. They accordingly despatched Ganga, the river goddess, who prevailed on Parvati to return to him, on condition that his love for her should be restored. The celestial musketers then set out, and in a short time were rejoiced, a grove sprang up, which was named Cumavvans; and the receding god, in the character of Coimswan, consoled the afflicted Retti, the widow of Cam, by assuring her that she should rejoice her husband when he should be born again in the form of Pradyumna, son of Krishna, and should put Sambalm to death. This favorable prediction was in due time accomplished, and Pradyumna having sprung to life, he was instantly seized by the demon Sambala, who phrased him in a chest, which he threw into the ocean. His son and grand-daughter, a princess and a prince, were caught in a net, and carried to the palace of a tyrant, where the unfortunate Retti had been compelled to do menial service. It was her lot to open the fish, and seeing an infant in the fish, she nursed him in private, and educated him, till he had sufficient strength to destroy the malignant Sambala. He had before considered Retti as his mother; but the minds of them both being irradiated, the prophecy of Mahadeva was remembered, and the God of Love was again united with the Goddess of Pleasure. — Wilford. Asiatic Researches.

Eating his very core of life away. — XI. p. 582.

One of the wonders of this country is the Jeggerkarh, orLiver-eater. One of this class can steal away the liver of another by looks and incantations. Other accounts say, that, by looking at a person, he deprives him of his senses, and then steals from him something resembling the seed of a pomegranate, which he hides in the cuf of his leg. The Jeggerkarh brings the monsters then, and together with the cuf of his pants, for they are embroidered round with gold, are thrown over the neck of his victim. They often cut one cuf open on the magicians leg, extract the grain, and give it to the afflicted person to eat, he immediately recovers. These Jeggerkarhs are mostly women. It is said, moreover, that they can bring intelligence from a great distance in a short space of time; and if they are thrown into a river, with a stone tied to them, they nevertheless will not sink. In order to deprive any one of this wicked power, they bend the temple, and with every joint in his body, cramp his eyes with salt, suspend him for thirty days in a dark and cavern, and repeat over him certain incantations. In this state he is called Detche-rid. Although, after having undergone this discipline, he is not able to destroy the liver of any one, yet he retains the power of being discovered another Jeggerkarh, and is used for detecting those distant and insensible beings. They can also cure many diseases, by administering a potion, or by repeating an incantation. Many other marvelous stories are told of these people. — Aven Accery.

An Arabian old man named Abuk, was thrown in prison, on a charge of having bewitched, or being bewitched himself, or having bewitched another. He was the heart of a young native of Omrus, who had lately, from being a Christian, turned Mahomedan. The cause of offence was, that the young man, after keeping company some time with one of her daughters, had broken it: he himself, who was in a pitiable condition, and in danger of his life, was one of her accusers. This sort of witchcraft, which the Indians call eating the heart, and which is what we call bewitching as sorcerers do by their venemous and deadly looks, is not a new thing, nor unheard of elsewhere; for many persons practiced in the forest of Gauri, or wilders, especially among the country of the Tribals, as we learn from Orths, who took the account from Pliny, who, upon the report of Isigones, testifies, that this species of enchantment was much in use among these people, and many others whom he mentions, as it is at present here, and especially using them to inhabit the western hills of the Persian Gulf, where this art is common. The way in which they do it is only by the eyes and the mouth, keeping the eyes fixed steadily upon the person whose heart they desire to eat, and pronouncing, between their teeth, I know not what alphabetical words, and then they imagine they have possessed the whole body, and, by which, and by the operation of the devil, the person, how high and strong soever, falls immediately into an unknown and incurable disease, which makes him appear phthisical, consumes him little by little, and at last destroys him. And this takes place faster or more slowly, according to the size of the heart, and by which these persons or sorcerers can either eat the whole or a part only; that is, can consume it entirely and at once, or bit by bit, as they please. The vulgar give it this name, because they believe that the devil, acting upon the imagination of the witch when she mutters her wicked words, represents invisibly to her the heart and entrails of the patient, taken out of his body, and makes her devour them. In which these wretches find so delightful a task, that very often, to satisfy their appetite, without any impulse of resentment or envy, they will destroy human bodies, which are often the nearest relatives, as there is a report that our prisoner killed one of her own daughters in this manner.

This was confirmed to me by a similar story, which I heard at Jopahun, from the mouth of E. Sebastian de Jesus, a Portuguese-Augustinian, a man to be believed, and of singular virtue, who was prior of their convent when I departed. He assured me, that, in one of the places dependent upon Porto gal, on the confines of_Asia Felix, I know not whether it was at Mascate or at Omrus, an Arab having been taken up for a similar crime, and after he had confessed it, for he confessed all, for he confessed all, the captain, or governor of the place, who was a Portuguese, that he might better understand the truth of these black and devilish actions, of which there is no doubt in this country, made the sorcerer he brought before him before he was led to his punishment, and asked him, if he could cut the inside of a cucumber without opening it, as well as the heart of a man? The sorcerer said yes; and, in order to prove it, a cucumber was brought: he looked at it, never touching it, steadily for some time, with his usual enchantments, and then told the captain he had eaten that cucumber accordingly when it was opened, nothing was found but the rind. This is not impossible; for the devil, of whom they make use in these operations, having, in the order of nature, greater power than all inferior creatures, can, with God's permission, produce these effects, and others more marvelous.

The same father told me, that one of these sorcerers, whether it was the same or not I do not know, having been taken for a similar offence, was asked if he could eat the heart of the Portuguese captain? and he replied no; for the Franks had a certain thing upon the breast, which covered them like a cuirass, and was so impenetrable, that it was proof against all his charges. This can be nothing else but the virtue of baptism, the armor of the faith, and the privileges of the sons of the church, against which the gates of hell cannot prevail.

To return, however, to my first subject:—This witch of Combrou made some difficulty at first to confess her guilt; but seeing herself pressed with threats of death, and being hot, in fact, to the public square, where I saw her with the sick young man, she said, that though she had not been the cause of his complaint, perhaps she could cure it, if they would let her remain alone with him, in his house without incuba- tion; by which she tacitly confessed her witchcraft: for it is held certain in those countries, that these wicked women can remove the malady which they have caused, if he be not come to the last extremity. And of many remedies which they use to restore health to the sufferers, there is one very extraor-dinary, which is, that the witch cutes something out of her mouth, like the grain of a pomegranate, which is believed to be a part of the heart she had eaten. The patient picks it up immediately, as part of his own intestines, and greedily swal-lows it; and by this means, as if his heart was replaced in his body, he recovers by degrees his health. I dare not as-sure you of these things as certainly true, not having myself seen them, surpassing as they do the course of nature. If they are as is said, it can be only in appearance, by the illus-sions of the devil; and if the afflicted recover actually their health, it is because the same devil ceases to torment them. Without dwelling longer upon these curious speculations, the witch having given hopes that she would cure the patient, the officers promised that she should receive no injury, and they were both sent home; but an archer was set over her as a guard, that she might not escape. — Pietro Bella Valle.

The Calis.— XI. 6, p. 588.

The Calis and Pandaris are the protectresses of cities; each city has its own. They address prayers to these tutelary divinities, and build temples to them, offering to them blood in sacrifice, and sometimes human victims. These objects of worship are not immortal, and they take their name from the city over which they preside, or from the form in which they are represented. They are commonly framed of a gigantic stature, having several arms, and the head surrounded with flames; several fierce animals are also placed under their feet. — Somner.

Sati, the dreadful God, who rules abroad
Upon the King of the Ravers. — XI. 6, p. 588.

Major Moor has a curious remark upon this subject:—

"Sati being among the astrologers of India, as well as with their ancient brethren of Europe, a planet of unquiet as-pects, the ill-omened raven may be deemed a fit Vaban for such a dreaded being. But this is not, I think, a sufficient reason for the conspicuous introduction of the raven into the mythological machinery of the Hindu system, so accurate, so connected, and so complete in all its parts; although the investigations that it hath hitherto undergone have not fully developed or reached such points of perfection. Now let me ask the reason, why, both in England and in India, the raven is so rare a bird? It breeds every year, like the crow, and is much longer alive; and while the latter bird abounds every where, to a degree bordering on nuisance, a pair of ravens, for they are seldom seen singly or in trios, are scarcely found duplicated in any place. Perhaps, take England or India over, two pair of ravens will not be found, on an average, in the extent of five hundred or a thousand acres. I know not, for I write where I have no access to books, if our naturalists have sought the theory of this; or whether it may have first occurred to me, which it did while contemplating the char-acter and attributes of this bird, the raven destroys brahmins, and if this nation he well founded, and on no other can I ac-count for the rareness of the annual-breeding, long-lived raven, we shall at once see the propriety of symbolizing it with Saturn, or Kronus, or Time, devouring or destroying his own offspring." — Moote's Hindu Panchen, p. 311.

"It is remarked by Naturalists, that young ravens are for-saken before they are fledged; and therefore they would starve, if Providence had not appointed that the scraps of raw meat dropped round the nest should engender maggots and worms which serve to support them till they are in a condition to rove for food. And thus it is he feedeth the ravens." — From an old Magazine.

A thousand eyes were quenched in endless night
To form that magic globe. — XI. 8, p. 588.

A similar invention occurs in Dr. Beaumont's Psyche, one of the most extraordinary poems in our language. I am far from claiming any merit for such inventions, which no man can value more cheaply, — but such as it is, I am not be-holden for it to this forgotten writer, whose strange, long, but by no means uninteresting work I had never read till after two editions of Kehama were printed:—

A stately mirror's all-ennamelled case
The second was; no crystal ever yet
Smiled with such rapture; never ladies' glass
He ever owned did attempt to smooth a cheat.
Nor could Narcissus' fount with such delight
Into his fair destruction he invite.
For he in that and self-love being drown'd,
Agone from him pluck'd his doting eyes,
And, shuddled in her fragments, having found
Old Jezebels, he stoke the dog's due price.
Goliah's staring hairc too he got,
Which he with Pharoah's all together put.

But not content with these, from Phaeton,
From Jao, Icarus, Nebuchadnezzar,
From Philip and his world-devouring son,
From Sylla, Catiline, Tullly, Pompey, Caesar,
From Herod, Chosamur, and Scipions,
From Agrrippan and Domitianus.

And many sturdy states, theirs he pull'd;
Whose proudest humors having drain'd out,
He identified in a large and polished mould;
Which up he siff'd with what from heaven he brought,
In extract of those books of Lucifer,
In which against his God he breathed war.

Then to the North, that glassy kingdom, where Establish'd frost and ice forever reign,
He spid his course, and meeting Borea there,
Pray'd him this liquid mixture to restrain.
When lo! as Borea oped his mouth and blow
For his command, the slime all solid grew.

Thus was the mirror forg'd, and contain'd
The vigor of those self-admiring eyes
Agone's witchcraft into it had strain'd;
A dangerous juncture of proud fallacies;
Whose false looks so mesmer'd him, that he,
Thrice having kiss'd it, nam'd it Phialasty,

Inchant'd Psychic ravish'd was to see
The Glass herself upon herself reflect
With troubled majesty. The sun, when he
Is by Aurora's recent fingers deck'd,
Vews not his repercuss'd self so fair
Upon the eastern main, as she did here.

Be true unto yourselves. — XII. 3, p. 590.

The passage in which Moote exhorts a witness to speak the truth is one of the few sublime ones in his Institutes.

"The soul itself is its own witness; the soul itself is its own refuge; offend not thy conscious soul, the supreme internal witness of men! — The sinfull have said in their hearts, None see us. Yes, the gods distinctly see them, and so does the spirit within their breasts.—The guardian deities of the firmament, of the earth, of the waters, of the human heart, of the moon, of the sun, and of fire, of punishment after death, of the winds, of light, of both twilights, and of justice, perfectly know the state of all spirits clothed with bodies—O friend to virtue! that supreme Spirit, which thou believest one and the same with thyself, resides in thy bosom perpetually, and is an all-knowing inspector of thy goodness or thy wickedness.
If thou hast not at variance, by speaking falsely, with Yama, the southerner of all, with Vaivasa wata the punisher, with that great Divinity who dwells in thy breast, go not on a pil-gregiance to the river Ganges, nor to the plains of Cura, for thou hast no need of expiation.—Ca. viii. pp. 81, 85, 86, 91, 92.

The Annam Birds.—XII. 6, p. 500.

The Annamys act a considerable part in the history of the Nella Rajah, an amusing romance, for a translation of which we are indebted to Mr. Kindredley. They are milk-white, and remariable for the gracefulness of their walk.

The Bambus Tree.—XIII. 5, p. 591.

The Berghid, or Bannian, often measures from twenty-four to thirty feet in girth. It is distinguished from every other tree bithiery known, by the very peculiar circumstance of throwing out roots from all its branches. These, being pendi-ent, and perfectly lux, in time reach the ground, which they penetrate, and ultimately become substantial props to the very massy horizontal boughs, which, but for such a support, must either be stopped in their growth, or give way, from their own weight. Many of these quoadum roots, changing their outward appearance from a brown, rough rind to a regular bark, not unlike that of the beech, increase to a great diameter.
They may be often seen from four to five feet in circumfer-ce, and in a true perpendicular line. An observer, ignorant of their nature, might think them artificial, and that they had been placed for the purpose of sustaining the boughs from which they originated. They proceed from all the branches indiscriminately, whether near or far removed from the ground. They appear like new swags, such as are in use on board ships; however, few reach sufficiently low to take a hold of the soil, except those of the lower branches. I have seen some do so from a great height, but they were thin, and did not promise well. Many of the ramifications pendent from the higher branches are seen to turn round the lower branches, but without any obvious effect on either; possibly, however,
you may derive sustenance even from that partial mode of communication. The height of a full-grown Bannian may be from sixty to eighty feet; and many of them, I am fully condfident, cover at least two acres. Their leaves are similar to, but rather larger than those of the laurel. The wood of the trunk is used only for fuel; it is light and brittle; but the pillars formed by the roots are valuable, being extremely elastic and light, working with ease, and possessing great toughness; it resembles a good kind of ash.—Orlntal Field
Sports, voL ii. p. 112.

The Lotus.—XIII. 6, p. 592.

The lotus abounds in the numerous lakes and ponds of the province of Garh; and we had the pleasure of comparing several varieties; single and full white, and tinged with deep or with faint tints of red. To a near view, the simple ele-geance of the white lotus gains no necessity of beauty from the multiplication of its petals, nor from the tinge of gaudy hue;
but the richest tint is most pleasing, when a lake, covered with full-blown lotus, is contemplated.—Journey from Mysore to Nagpur.—Asiat. Annual Register, 1896.

They built them here a Boxer, &c.—XIII. 7, p. 592.

The materials of which these houses are made are always easy to be procured, and the structure is so simple, that a spacious, and by no means uncomfortable dwelling, suited to the climate, may be erected in one day. Our habitation, consisting of three small rooms, and a hall open to the north, in little more than four hours was in readiness for our reception;
fifty or sixty laborers completed it in that time, and on emergency could perform the work in much less. Bamboos, grass for thatching, and the ground rattan, are all the materials required; but no art is used in the whole, the strongest strong bamboos, from eight to ten feet high, are fixed firm in the ground, which describe the outline, and are the supporters of the building; smaller bamboo are then tied horizontally, by strips of the ground, to these upright posts; the walls, composed of bamboo mats, are fastened to the sides with similar ligatures: bamboo rafters are quickly raised, and a roof formed, over which thatch is spread in regular layers, and bound to the roof by filaments of ratan. A floor of bamboo pavement is next laid in the inside, elevated two or three feet above the ground; this flooring is supported on bamboo, and covered with mats and carpets. Thus ends the process, which is not more simple than effectual. When the workmen take pains, a house of this sort is proof against very inclement weather. We experienced, during our stay at Monday, a severe storm of wind and rain, but no water penetrated, nor thatch escaped: and if the tempest should blow down the house, the inhabitants would run no risk of having their brains knocked out, or their bones broken; the full of the whole fabric would not crush a lady's hip-dog. — Styer's Embassy to Asia.

Jungle-grass.—XIII. 7, p. 592.

In this district the long grass called jungle is more prevalent than I ever yet noticed. It rises to the height of seven or eight feet, and is topped with a beautiful white down, resembling a swan’s feather. It is the mantle with which nature here covers all the uncultivated ground, and at once vells the indolence of the people and the nakedness of their land. It has a fine showy appearance, as it undulates in the wind, like the waves of the sea. Nothing but the want of greater variety to its color prevents it from being one of the finest and most beautiful objects in that rich store of productions with which nature spontaneously supplies the imprisoning natives. — TENNANT.

In such libations, poured in open glades, beside clear streams and solitary shades, The Spirit of the virtuous debut delight. — XIII. 7, p. 592.

The Hindoos are enjoined by the Veda to offer a cake, which is called Pedana, to the ghosts of their ancestors, as far back as the third generation. This ceremony is performed on the day of the new moon in every month. The offering of water is in like manner enjoined to be performed daily; and this ceremony is called Turpan, to satisfy, to appease. The souls of such men as have left children to continue their generation, are supposed to be transported, immediately upon quitting their bodies, into a certain region called the Pitres Log, where they may continue in proportion to their former virtues, provided these ceremonies be not neglected; otherwise they are precipitated into Nisk, and doomed to be born again in the bodies of unclean beasts; and until, by repeated regeneration, all their sins are done away, and they attain such a degree of perfection as will entitle them to what is called Moksha, eternal salvation, by which is understood a release from future transmigration, and an absorption in the nature of the godhead, which is called Braham. — Willkins. The divine manes are always pleased with an oblation in empty glades, naturally clean, on the banks of rivers, and in solitary spots. — Inst. of Men.

Tassel-grass.—XIII. 11, p. 592.

The Surpat, or tassel-grass, which is much the same as the guinea-grass, grows to the height of twelve or fourteen feet. It's stem becomes so thick as to resemble in some measure a reed. It is very strong, and grows very luxuriantly: it is even used as a fence against cattle; for which purpose, it is often planted on banks excavated from ditches, to enclose fields of corn, &c. It grows wild in all the uncultivated parts of India, but especially in the lower provinces, in which it occupies immense tracts; sometimes mixing with, and rising above, coppices; affording an asylum for elephants, rhinoceroses, &c. They frequently is laid by high winds, of which breaking saws fail not to take advantage, by forming their nests, and concealing their young under the protrude grass. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 32.

Lo! from his trunk, upward, aloft he flights The grateful choicer; and saw Plucking the broad-leasted boughs.

Of yonder plane, he moves it to and fro. — XIII. 11, p. 592.

Nature has provided the elephant with means to cool its heated surface, by enabling it to draw from its throat, by the aid of its trunk, a copious supply of saliva, which the animal sports with force very frequently all over its skin. It also sucks up dust, and blows it over its back and sides, to keep off the flies, and may often be seen fanning itself with a large bough, which it uses with great ease and dexterity. — Oriental Sports, vol. i. p. 100.

Till his strong temples, bathed with sudden flows, Their fragrance of delight and love diffus was. — XIII. 11, p. 592.

The Hindoo poets frequently allude to the fragrant juice which exudes, in certain stones, from small ducts in the temples of the male elephant, and is useful in relieving him from the redundant moisture, with which he is oppressed; and they even describe the bees as altered by the scent, and mistaking it for that of the sweetest flowers. When Krishna visited Srezla-dvipa, and had destroyed the demons who infected that delightful country, he passed along the bank of a river, and was charmed with a delicious odor, which its waters diffused in their course. He was eager to view the source of so fragrant a stream, but was informed by the natives that it flowed from the temples of an elephant, immensely large, milk-white, and beautifully formed; that he governed a numerous race of elephants; and that the odorous fluid which exuded from his temples in the season of love had formed the river; that the Devas, or inferior gods, and the Apeans, or nymphs, bathed and sported in its waters, impassioned and intoxicated with the liquid perfume. — Wilford. Asiatic Researches.

The native Monkeys, whose wild gambols late Shook the whole wood. — XIII. 12, p. 593.

They are so numerous on the island of Balma, says Capt. Beever in his excellent book, that I have seen on a calm evening, when there was not an air sufficiently strong to agitate a leaf, the whole surrounding wood in so much motion, from their playful gambols among its branches, as if it had blown a strong wind.

Not that in earful skill that sworest bird Her rival strain would try. — XIII. 12, p. 593.

I have been assured by a credible eye-witness, that two wild antelopes used to often come from their woods to the place where a more savage beast, Sirajuddubba, entertained himself with concert, and that they listened to the strains with an appearance of pleasure till the monster, in whose soul there was no music, shot one of them, to display his art. A learned native of this country told me that he had frequently seen the most venomous and malignant snakes leave their holes, upon hearing tones on a flute, which, as he supposed, gave them peculiar delight. An intelligent Persian, who repeated his story again and again, and permitted me to write it down from his lips, declared, he had more than once been present when a celebrated lutanist, Nirza Mohammed, surkuned Balbali, was playing to a large company, in a grove near Shiraz, where he distinctly saw the nightingales trying to vie with the musician; sometimes waving on the trees, some-

The Hindoo Wife, in Sth William Jones’s poem, describes her own toilet tasks:—

Nor were my night thoughts, I confess,
Free from solicitude for dress;
How best to bind my flowing hair
With art, yet with an artless air,—
My hair, like musk in scent and hue,
Oh! blacker far, and sweeter too!
In what nice head, or glossy curl,
To fix a diamond or a pearl,
And where to smooth the love-spread braid
With cord or jasmine’s fragrant coil?
How to adjust the golden Tiara,
And most adorn my forehead sleek;
What could I Should emblaze my ears,
Like Selia’s | waves, or Selia’s | tears;
How elegantly to dispose
Bright circlets for my well-formed nose;
With strings of rubies how to deck,
Or emerald rows, my stately neck;
While some that ebon tower embraced,
Some pendant sought my slender waist;
How next my parted well to choose
From silken stores of varied hue,
Which would attract the roving view,
Pink, violet, purple, orange, blue;
The lovliest mantle to select,
Or unembellished’d or bedeck’d;
And how my twisted scarf to place
With most inimitable grace,
(Too thin its warp, too fine its woof,
For eyes of males not beauty-proof?)
What skirt the mantle best would suit,
Ornate, with stars, or tinted fruit;
The flower-embroider’d or the plain,
With silver or with golden vein;
The Cherry | bright, which gayly shows
Fair alpaca-embroidery;
How each smooth arm, and each soft wrist,
By richest Caun’s | might be kis’d,
While some my tapers ankles round,
With sunny radiance tinged the ground

See how he kisses the lip of my rival, and imprints on her forehead an ornament of pure musk, black as the young antelope on the lunar orb! Now, like the husband of Reti, he fixes white blossoms on her dark locks, where they gleam like flashes of lightning among the turban curls. On her breasts, like two tunicaments, he places a string of gems like a radiant constellation; he binds on her arms, graceful as the stalks of the water-lily, and adorned with hands glowing like the petals of its flower, a bracelet of sapphires, which resemble a cluster of beams. Ah! see how he ties round her waist a rich girtle illumined with golden bells, which seem to laugh as they tinkle, at the inferior brightness of the leafy garlands which javers hang on their brows, to propitiate the god of desire. He places her soft foot, as he reclines by her side, on her marble couch, and clasps it with the ruddy hue of Yavan. —

Sandal-streak. — XIII. 13, p. 593.

The Hindoos, especially after bathing, paint their faces with ochre and sandal-wood ground very fine into a pulp.

The custom is principally confined to the male sex, though the women occasionally wear a round spot, either of sandal, which is of a light dun color, or of saffron; that is, a preparation of vermillion, between the eyebrows, and a stripe of the same running up the front of the head, in the narrow made according to the general practice of dividing all the frontal hair equally to the right and left, where it is rendered smooth, and glazed by a thin varnish, made by steeping linseed for a while in water. When dry, the hair is all firmly matted together, and will retain its form for many days together. —

Nor arm nor ankling— XIII 13, p. 593.

Glass rings are universally worn by the women of the Deccan, as an ornament on the wrists; and their applying closely to the arm is considered as a mark of delicacy and beauty, for they must of course be passed over the hand. In doing this, a girl seldom escapes without drawing blood, and rubbing part of the skin from her hand; and as every well-dressed girl has a number of rings on each arm, and as these are frequently breaking, the poor creatures suffer much from their love of admiration. — Buchanam.

The dear retreat. — XIII. 13, p. 593.

There is a beautiful passage in Statius, which may be quoted here: it is in that poet’s best manner:—

Quae vicina valueris jam sedula partes,
Jamque timetas quod fuisse domum suspenderat inuenas,
Providet hic ventus, hic anniae modi ansus,
Hinc homines; tandem dulcis plantam umbra, novitque
Vitae stolat iuvant, et protunus arbore amat.

Achill. ii. 312.

Jaga-Newt. — XIV. p. 593.

This temple is to the Hindoos what Meeca is to the Mahomedans. It is resorted to by pilgrims from every quarter of India. It is the chief seat of Brahminical power, and a strong-hold of their superstition. At the annual festival of the Butt Jatta, seven hundred thousand persons (as has been computed by the Pundits in College) assemble at this place. The number of deaths in a single year, caused by voluntary devotion, by imprisonment for non-payment of the demands of the Brahmins, or by the scarcity of provisions for such a multitude, is incredible. The precincts of the place are covered with bones. — Claudius Buchanam.

Many thousands of people are employed in carrying water from Hardwar to Juggernaut, for the uses of that temple. It is there supposed to be peculiarly holy, as it issues from what is called the Cow’s Mouth. This superstitious notion is the cause of as much host labor as would long since have converted the largest province of Asia into a garden. The numbers thus employed are immense; they travel with two flasks of the water hung over the shoulder by means of an elastic piece of bamboo. The same quantity which employs perhaps, fifteen thousand persons, might easily be carried down the Ganges in a few boats annually. Princes and families of distinction have this water carried to them in all parts of Hindostan; it is drunk at feasts, as well as upon religious occasions. —

The near river near Kinsouge is held by some as even more efficacious in washing away moral defilement than the Ganges itself. Dr. Tennant says, that a person in Ceylon drinks daily of this water, though at the distance of, perhaps, three thousand miles, and at the expense of five thousand rupees per month.

No distinction of castes is made at this temple, but all, like a nation descended from one common stock, eat, drink, and make merry together. — Stavorinus.
The seven-headed Idol. — XIV. 1, p. 593.

The idol of Juggernaut is in shape like a serpent, with seven heads; and on the cheeks of each head it has the form of a wing, upon each cheek, which wings open, and shut, and flap, as it is moved by a specially chariot, and the idol in the midst of it; and one of the magsit sits behind it in the chariot, upon a convenient place, with a canopy, to keep the sun from injuring it.

When I, with horror, beheld these strange things, I called to mind the eighteenth chapter of the Revelations, and the first verse, and likewise the sixteenth and seventeenth verses of the said chapter, in which places there is a beast, and such idolatrous worship mentioned; and those sayings in that text are herein truly accomplished in the sixteenth verse; for the Brahmins are all marked in the forehead, and likewise all that come to worship the idol are marked also in their foreheads. — Bruton. Churchill's Collection.

The size of the chariot is not exaggerated. Speaking of another such, Niecnap says, Cerras tam horrenda conspicuus sunt ut vel aliae homines utrue trahisse videantur. — V. i. 16, § 18.

They have built a great chariot, that goeth on sixteen wheels of a side, and every wheel is five feet in height, and the chariot itself is about thirteen feet high. In this chariot, on their great festival days, at night, they place their wicked god Juggernaut; and all the Brahmins, being in number nine thousand, then attend this great idol, besides of women, and factotum some thousands, or more than a good many.

The chariot is most richly adorned with most rich and costly ornaments; and the auros wishes are placed very complete in a round circle, so artificiously that every wheel doth its proper office without any impediment; for the chariot is aloft, and in the centre between the wheels; they have also more than two thousand lights with them. And this chariot, with the idol, is also drawn with the greatest and best men of the town; and they are so eager and greedy to draw it, that whosoever, by shouldering, crowding, shoving, holding, thrusting, or any violent way, can but come to lay a hand upon the ropes, they think themselves blessed and happy; and when it is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves as a sacrifice to this idol, and desperately lie down on the ground, that the chariot-wheels may run over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken arms, some broken legs; so that many of them are destroyed, and by this means they think to merit heaven. — Bruton. Churchill's Collection.

These devils lie in the track of this machine a few hours before its arrival, and, taking a soporific draught, hope to meet death asleep. — Claudio Buchanan.

A harlot-band. — XIV. 8, p. 594.

There are in India common women, called Wives of the Idol. When a woman has made a vow to obtain children, if she brings into the world a beautiful daughter, she carries her to Bod, so their idol is called, with whom she leaves her. This girl, when she is arrived at a proper age, takes an apartment in the public place, hangs a curtain before the door, and waits for those who are passing, as well Indians as of other sects among whom this debauchery is permitted. She prostitutes herself for a certain price, and all she can thus acquire she carries to the priest of the idol, that he may apply it to the service of the temple. Let us say, the Mohammedan relater, bless the Almighty and glorious God, that he has chosen us, to exempt us from all the crimes into which men are led by their unbelief. — Arabicans Relatiohs.

Invited, commendably, says Mr. Serres, by the hieroglyphic emblem of vice so conspicuously elevated, and so strikingly pointed in the temples of Mahomed, the priests of that deity indiscriminately selected the most beautiful females that could be found, and, in their tenderest years, with great pomp and solemnity, consecrated them (as it is improperly called) to the service of the presiding divinity of the pagoda.

They were trained up in every art to debase and to delight; and to the fascination of external beauty, their artful betrayers added the attractions arising from mental accomplishments. Thus was an invariable rule of the Hindoos, that women have no concern with literatus; dispensed with upon this infamous occasion. The said voluptuous virgins, with a character of sanctity, they fell victims to the lust of the Brahmins. They were early taught to practise the most alluring blandishments, to roll the expressive eye of wanton pleasure, and to invite to criminal indulgence, by stealing upon the beholder the tender look of voluptuous languishing. They were instructed to mould their elegant and airy forms into the most exciting attitudes and the most lascivious gestures, while the rapid and graceful motion of their feet, adorned with golden bells, and glittering with jewels, kept unison with the exquisite melody of their voices. Every pagoda has a band of these young sirens, whose business, on great festival days to lead in public before the idol, to sing hymns in his honor, and in private to enrich the treasury of that pagoda with the wages of prostitution. These women are not, however, regarded in a dishonorable light; they are considered as exalted to the idol, and they partake of the venery paid to him. They are forbidden ever to desert the pagoda where they are educated, and are never permitted to marry; but the offspring, if any, of their criminal embraces are considered as sacred to the idol; furthermore the daughter was taught to play on the sacred instruments used at the festivals, devoted to the abandoned occupations of their mothers. — Indian Antiquities.

These impostors take a young maid, of the fairest they can meet with, to be the bride, (as they speak and bear the be- stowed people in hand,) of Juggernaut, and they leave her all night in the temple (whilst they have carried her) with the idol, making her believe that Juggernaut himself will come and embrace her, and appointing her to ask him, whether it will be a fruitful year, what kind of possessions, feasts, prayers, and alms he demands to be made for it. In the mean time one of these lustful priests enters at night by a little back door into the temple, destitute of this young maid, and makes her believe any thing he please; and the next day, being transported from this temple into another, with the same magnificence she was carried before upon the chariot of triumph, on the side of Juggernaut, her bridegroom; these Brahmins make her say adieu, before all the people, whatsoever she has been taught of these cheats, as if she had learnt it from the very mouth of Juggernaut. — Bernard.

The fifth incarnation was in a Bramin dwarf, under the name of Vamen; it was wrought to repress the pride of the giant Boly. The latter, after having conquered the gods, especially from Sorgen, was geneious, truthful, just, and word, compassionate, and charitable. Vickenom, under the form of a very little Bramin, presented himself before him while he was sacrificing, and asked him for three ponds of land to build a hut. Boly ridiculed the apparent imbecility of the dwarf, in telling him that he ought not to limit his demand to a request so trifling; that his generosity could bestow a much larger donation of land. Vamen answered, that being of so small a stature, what he asked was more than sufficient. The prince immediately granted his request, and, to ratify his donation, poured water into his right hand; which was no sooner done, than the dwarf grew so prodigiously, that his body filled the universe! He measured the earth with one pace, and the heavens with another, and then summoned Boly to give him his word for the third. The prince then recognized him as the second, and presented his hand to him; but the god, satisfied with his submission, sent him to govern the Padalon, and permitted him to return every year to the earth, the day of the full moon, in the month of November. — Senkerly's Voyages, vol. 1. p. 21.

The Sacred Cord. — XIV. 4, p. 506.

The Brahman who officiate at the temple generally go with their heads uncovered, and the upper part of the body naked. The Zenuor, or sacred string, is tied round the body from the left shoulder: a piece of white cotton cloth is wrapped round the loins, which descends under the knee, but lower on the left side than on the other. And in colder weather they sometimes cover their bodies with a shawl, and their heads with a red cap. The Zemnar is made of a particular kind of Jumal cotton, called fakri in it; it is composed of a certain number of threads of a fixed length. The Zemnar worn by the Khatri has fewer threads than that worn by the Brahman; and that worn by the Blysse fewer than that worn by the Khatri; but those of the Soutra caste are excluded from this distinction, none of them being permitted to wear it. —CRADFORD.

The city of Boly. — XV. 7, p. 598.
Ruins of Mahabalipour, the City of the great Boly.

A rock or rather hill of stone, is that which first engrosses the attention on approaching the place; for it rises abruptly out of a level plain of great extent, consists chiefly of one single stone, and is situated very near to the sea-beach, it is such a kind of object as an inquisitive traveller would naturally turn aside to examine. Its shape is also singular and romantic, and, from a distant view, has an appearance like some kind of party and holy edifice. On coming near to the foot of the rock from the north, works of ancient sculpture crowd so thick upon the eye, as might seem to favor the idea of a petrified town, like those that have been hewed in different parts of the world, by too curious travellers. Proceeding on to the foot of the hill, on the side facing the sea, there is a poga rising set out of the ground, of one solid stone, about sixteen or eighteen feet high, which seems to have been cut upon the spot, out of a detached rock, that has been found of a proper size for that purpose. The top is arched, and the style of architecture, according to which it is formed, different from any now used in parts of the world. A little farther on, there appears upon a huge surface of stone that just out a little from the side of the hill, a numerous group of human figures, in bas-relief, considerably larger than life, representing the most remarkable persons whose actions are celebrated in the Mahabalipour, each of them in an attitude, or with weapons, or other insignia, expressive of his character, or of some one of his most famous exploits. All these figures are doubtless much less distinct than they were at first; for upon comparing there and the rest of the sculptures that are exposed to the sea, it will be found that, though some are made like this, others have received from them protection from that element, the difference is striking — the former being everywhere much defaced, while the others are fresh as recently finished. An excavation in another part of the east side of the great rock appears to have been made to the same purpose. As a rock for the same purpose, the Chourens are usually built in that country, that is to say, for the accommodation of travellers. The rock is hollowed out to the size of a spacious room, and two or three rows of pillars are left, as a scaling support to the mountainous mines of stone which forms the rock.

The ascent of the hill on the north is, from its natural shape, gradual and easy at first, and in other parts rendered more so by very excellent steps, cut out in several places where the communication would be difficult or impracticable without them. This leading stait of this sort leads to a kind of temple cut out of the solid rock, with some figures of idols in high relief upon the walls, very well finished. From this temple there are flights of steps, that seem to have led to some edifice formerly standing upon the hill; nor does it seem absurd to suppose that this may have been a palace, to which this temple may have appartained; for besides the small detached rows of pillars that are here and there cut in the rock and seem as if they had once led to different parts of one great building, there appear in many places small water channels cut also into the rock, as in the floor of a house, and the whole top of the hill is strewn with small round pieces of brick, which may be supposed, from their appearance, to have been worn down to their present form during the lapse of many ages. On a plain surface of the rock, which may once have served as the floor of some apartment, there is a platform of stone, about eight or nine feet long, by three or four wide, in a situation rather elevated, with two or three steps leading up to it, perfectly resembling a couch or bed, and a man very well executed at the upper end of it, by way of pillow: the whole of one piece being part of the hill itself. Thus the Brahmin, inhabitants of the place, call the bed of Bhoomaraj, or Judithnar, the eldest of the five brothers, whose heads are also hewn out of the Mahbalipour.

Tell at a considerable distance from this, at such a distance, indeed, as the apartments of the women might be supposed to be from that of the men, is a bath, excavated also from the rock, with steps in the inside, which the Brahmins call the Bath of Drupedy, the wife of Judithnar and his brothers. How much credit is due to this tradition, and whether this stone couch may not have been anecdotically used as a kind of throne, rather than a bed, is matter for future inquiry. A circumstance, however, which may seem to favor this idea, is, that a throne, in the Sanscrit and other Hindoo languages, is called Saghkun, which is compounded of Sag, a lion, and koun, a seat.

But though these works may be deemed stupendous, they are surpassed by others that are to be seen at the distance of about a mile, or a mile and half, to the south of the hill. They consist of two pagodas, of about thirty feet long, by twenty feet wide, and about as much in height, cut out of the solid rock, and each consisting originally of one single stone. Their form is different from the style of architecture according to which idol temples are now built in that country. These sculptures approach more nearly to the Gothic taste, being surmounted by arched roofs or domes, but semicircular, but composed of two segments of circles meeting in a point at top. Near these also stand an elephant full as big as life, and a lion much larger than the natural size, both hewn also out of one stone.

The great rock is about fifty or one hundred yards from the sea; but close to the sea are the remains of a pagoda built of brick, and dedicated to Shiva, the greatest part of which has evidently been swallowed up by that element; for the door of the innermost apartment, in which the idol is placed, and before which there are always two or three spacious courts surrounded with walls, is now washed by the waves, and the pillar used to discover the meridian at the time of founding the pagoda, is seen standing at some distance in the sea. In the neighborhood of this building there are some detached rocks, washed also by the waves, on which appear sculptures, though now much worn and defaced. And the natives of the place declared to the writer of this account, that the more aged people among them remembered to have seen the tops of several pagodas far out to the sea, which, being covered with copper (probably gilt) were particularly visible at sunrise, as their shining surface used then to reflect the sun’s rays, but that now that effect was no longer produced, as the copper had since become incrusted with mould and mouldgris. — CHAMBERS. Thus hast been call’d, O Sleep! the friend of Woe,
But to the happy who have call’d thee so. — XV. 12, p. 597.

Daniel has a beautiful passage concerning Richard II. sufficiently resembling this part of the poem to be inserted here:

To Flint, from thence, into a restless bed,
That miserable night he comes conveyed;
Poorly provided, poorly followed,
Uncourted, unexpected, unloved;
Where, if uncertain Sleep but lowered
Over the drooping ears that heavy weigh’d,
Millions of figures Fantasy presents
Unto that sorrow waken’d grief augment.

His now misfortune makes deluded Sleep
Say ‘twas not so: — false dreams the truth deny.
Whencewith he starteth; feels waking cares do creep
Upon his soul, and give his dreams the lie,
Then sleeps again; — and then again as deep
Decrees of darkness mock his misery.

The Aulay. — XVI. 3, p. 598.

This monster of Hindoo imagination is a horse with the trunk of an elephant, but bearing about the same proportion to the elephant in size, that the elephant itself bears to a common sheep. In one of the prints to Mr. Kinderley's "Specimens of Hindoo Literature," an aulay is represented taking up an elephant with its trunk.

Malecheren, (which is probably another name for Baily,) in an excursion which he made one day alone, and in disguise, came to a garden in the environs of his city Mahaldilipor, where was a fountain so inviting, that two celestial nymphs had come down to bathe there. The Rejih because enamoured of one of them, who descended to allow of his attachment to her; and she and her sister nymph used them beforehand to have frequent interviews with him in that garden. On one of those occasions they brought with them a male inhabitant of the heavenly regions, to whom they introduced the Rejih, and between him and Malecheren a strict friendship ensued in consequence of which he agreed, at the Raja's earnest request, to carry him in disguise to see the court of the divine Indra — a favor never before granted to any mortal. The Raja returned from thence with new ideas of splendor and magnificence, which he immediately adopted in regulating his court and his retinue, and in beautifying his seat of government. By this means Mahaldilipor became soon celebrated beyond all the cities of the earth; and an account of its magnificence having been brought to the gods assembled at the court of Indra, their jealousy was so much excited at it, that they sent orders to the God of the Sea to loaf his billows, and overflow a place which improperly pretended to vie in splendor with their celestial mansions. This command he obeyed, and the city was at once overflown by that enormous element; nor has it ever since been able to resist its head. — Chambers Asiatice Researches.

The Seven Earths. — XIX. 6, p. 605.

The seas which surround these earths are, 1. of salt water, enclosing our loftiest earth; 2. of fresh water; 3. of tye, curdled milk; 4. of ghee, clarified butter; 5. of cauhs, a liquor drawn from the palus scept; 6. of liquid sugar; 7. of milk. The west system is enclosed in one broad circumference of pure gold, beyond which reigns impenetrable darkness. — KindcrscL

I know not whether the following fable was invented to account for the saltness of our sea; —

"Asvagasya had been very low in stature; and one day, previously to the rectifying the too oblique posture of the earth, walking with Vasuvma on the shore of the ocean, the insolent Deep asked the god who that dwarf was strutting by his side. Vasuvma replied, it was the patriarch Asvagaya going to restore the earth to its true balance. The sea, in utter contempt of his pygmy form, dashed him with his spray as he passed along; on which the sage, greatly incensed at the designed affront, scooped up some of the water in the hollow of his hand, and drank it off; he again and again repeated the draught nor disdained till he had drained the bed of the ocean of the entire volume of its waters. Ablamed at this effect of his holy indignation, and dreading an universal drought, the Devas made intercession with Asvagaya to relent from his anger, and again restore an element so necessary to the existence of nature, both animate and inanimate. Asvagaya, paria, granted their request, and discharged the lubelled liquid in a way becoming the histories of a gross physical people to relate, but by no means proper for this page; a way, however, that evinced his sovereign power, while it marked his infallibility for the vile fury of an element, contending with a being armed with the delegated power of the Creator of all things. After this miracle, the earth being, by the same power, restored to its just balance, Asvagaya and Vasuvmio separated; when the latter, to prevent any similar accident occurring, commanded the great serpent (that is, of the sphere) to wind its enormous form round the seven continents, of which, according to Sanscrit geography, the earth consists, and appointed, as perpetual guardians, to watch over and protect it, the eight powerful genii, so renowned in the Hindoo system of mythology, as presiding over the eight points of the world." — MAUNCE.

— XXI. 6, p. 607.

There is a bird that falls down out of the air dead, and is found sometimes in the Molucca islands, that has no feet at all. The bigness of her body and bill, as likewise the form of them, is much the same as a swallow’s; but the spreading out of her wings and tail has no less compass than an eagle’s. She lives and breeds in the air, comes near the earth but for her burial, for the largeness and lightness of her wings and tail sustain her without lassitude. And the laying of her eggs, and breeding of her young, is upon the back of the male, which is made hollow, as also the breast of the female, for the more easy incubations. Also two strings, like two shoemaker’s cords, come from the hinder parts of the male, wherewith it is conceived that he is fastened closer to the female, while she hatches her eggs on the hollow of his back. The dew of heaven is appointed her for food, her region being too far removed from the approach of flies and such like insects.

This is the entire story and philosophy of this miraculous bird in Caridan, who professes himself to have seen it no less than thrice, and to have described it accordingly. The contrivances whereof, if the matter were certainly true, are as evident arguments of a Divine Providence, as that copperring, with the Greek inscription upon it, was an undoubted monument of the artifice and finger of man.

But that the reproach of overmuch credulity may not lie upon Caridan alone, Stedinger, who lay at catch with him to take him tripping wherever he could, cavils not with anything in the whole narration but the bigness of wings and the littleness of the body; which he undertakes to correct from one of his own which he sent him by Oresamos from Java. Nay, he confirms what his antagonist has wrote, partly by history

"The inscription runs thus: Εἰς έκείνην ίδχα τάσση λήμνη προκοπεριστασθήσεται ὅλη γάρ τὸ κεφαλής τῆς ἑαυτοῦ τῆς χειρός εἰς τῇ ημέρᾳ τοῦ Οὐρανοῦ πάντας. a. e. l. This plate was taken about Haldieu, the imperial city of Syria, in the year 1477. — Gener.
and partly by reason: affixing, that himself, in his own garden, found two little birds with marvelous wings ut-turned their heads, and their front was that of a hut.
Nor is he deterrèd from the belief of the perpetual flight of the Manuculidz, by the gaping of the feathers of her wings, which seem thereby less fit to sustain her body, but further makes the narration probable by what he has observed in kite hawks: that they live, for a whole hour together, without flapping of her wings, or changing place. And he has found also how she may sleep in the air, from the example of fishes, which he has seen sleeping in the water without shaking themselves to the bottom, and without changing place, but with stock still, and, without fluttering any meditation, only wagging a little their fans, as heedlessly and unconcernedly as horses while they are asleep wag their ears to displace the flies that sit upon them. Wherever Scalleger admiring that the Manuculidz is perpetually on the wing in the air, he must of necessity admit also that manner of incubation that Cardan describes, else how could their generations continue?

Franciscus Hernandez affirms the same with Cardan expressly in every thing; as also Eusebius Niemenbergus, who is so taken with the story of this bird, that he could not abstain from celebrating her miraculous properties in a short but elegant copy of verses; and does after, though confidently assert, the main matter again in prose.

Such are the suffrages of Cardan, Scaliger, Hernenac,
Niembergus, Scaligerus, &c. Aldrovandus, in his last
Table of Birds, assigns feeding on the dew of heaven, and of her incubation on the back of the male, with much scorn and indignation. And as for the former, his reasons are no ways contemptible, he alleging that dew is a body not perfectly enough mixed, or homogeneously constituted; nor the hardhill of the bird made for such use, on account of the slaw soft moisture.

To which I know not what Cardan and the rest would answer, unless this, that they mean by dew the more unctuous moisture of the air, which as it may not be alike every where, so they may be sufficient, fitted with a natural efficacy to find it out whereabouts it is. That there is dew in this some day and night, (as well as in the morning) and in all seasons of the year; and therefore a constant supply of moisture and spirits for their perpetual flying, which they more copiously inhabit by reason of their exercise: That the thicker parts of this moisture stick and convert into flesh, and that the lightness of their feathers is so great, that their pains in sustaining themselves are not overmuch. That what is homogenetical and simple to our sight is fitted enough to be the rudiments of generations, all animals born of a kind, and clear crystalline liquors; and that, therefore, it may be also of nutrition; that seas and sea-like honours are nourished and grown, being hung in the air, and that dock-weed has its root no deeper than neather the upper parts of the water; and,Lastly, that the kids of these birds are for their own nourishment, and for better ordering, but not for the rectifying, also and composing of their feathers, while they swim in the air with as much ease as swans do in rivers.

To his great impiety against their manner of incubation, they would happily return this answer: That the way is not rudious; but it may be rather necessary from what Abro-vandus himself not only acknowledges but contends for, namely, that they have no feet at all. For hence it is manifest that they cannot light upon the ground, nor any where rest on their legs, and that they cannot creep out of holes of rocks, as swifts and such like short-footed birds can, they having no feet at all to creep with.

Besides, as Aristotle well argues concerning the long legs of certain water-fowl, that they were made so long, because they were to wade in the water and catch fish, adding that excellent sphæritis, Τα ἁμα διαγώνια πρὸς τὸ ἔλος ἡ of these water-fowl imply a design of their haunting the water, so want of legs in these imply a design to come down to the earth, because they can neither stand there nor get off again. And if they never come on the earth, or any other resting-place, where can their eggs be laid or hatched but on the back of the male?

Besides that Cardan pleases himself with that: Antipholus in nature, that as the Ostrich being a bird, yet never flies in the air, and never rests upon the earth. And as for Aldrovandus, his presumption from the five several Manuculidz that he and Aristotle, upon whom she has bestowed such large and strong wings, and a power of flying so long and swift, as in giving no legs at all to the Macaemmtata, who has still a greater power of winging and lightness of body.

And as for the cavities on the back of the male and in the bristles of the female, is it not a hope about the human heart, and body, that is not more certain and plain than in the genital parts of the male and female in all kinds of animals? What greater argument of counsel and purpose of fitting one thing for another can be there than that? And if we should make a more inward search into the contrivances of those sex, (for the human breeds are endued in this bow or by what force an egg so great a growth and bigness is transmitted from the ovarium through the infundibulum into the processes of the uteri,) the membranes bearing so thin and the passage so very small, to see the principle of that ministerial thought in this divine part.

And if you would compare the protruberant paps of teats in the females of beasts with that cavity in the breast of the che-Macaemmtata, whether of them, think you, is the plain plunger of a knowing and designing Providence.

And, lastly, for the strings that are conceived to hold together the male and female in their inculcation, what a toy is it, if compared with those invisible links and ties that engage ordinary birds to sit upon their eggs, they having no visible allurement to such a tedious service? — Heaven won't take His Feud against Abraham, Heber.

Yemen. — XXIV. 4, p. 699.

Yemen was a child of the Sun, and thence named Fatamastet; another of its titles was Dharmacaya, or King of Justice; and a third, Patipeti, or Lord of the Patriarchs; but he is chiefly distinguished as Judge of departed souls; for the Hindus believe that, when they lose its body, it immediately repairs to Yemures, or the city of Yemen, where it receives a just sentence from him, and thence either ascends to Surya, or the first Heaven; or is driven down to Nixona, the region of serpents; or assumes on earth the form of some animal, unless it has been such, in which case it is condemned to a vegetable, or even to a mineral prison. — Sir W. Jones.

There is a story concerning Yemen which will remind the reader, in its purport, of the fable of Love and Death. — A famous penitent, Moregaundamegraci, by name, having, during a long series of years, served the gods with uncommon and most exemplary piety. This very virtuous man, having no children, was extremely desirous of having one, and therefore daily besought the god Yemen, or (Senna,) to grant him one. At length the god heard his desire, but, before he fulfilled it, he asked him, whether he would have several children, who should be long-lived and wicked, or one virtuous and prudent, who should die in his sixteenth year. The penitent chose the latter: his wife conceived, and was happily delivered of the promised son, whom they named Marcemend. The boy, like his father, zealously devoted himself to the worship of Yemen; but as soon as he had attained his sixteenth year, the officers of Yemen, god of death, were sent on the earth, to remove him from this world.

Young Marcemend, being informed on what errand they were come, told them, with a resolute air, that he was resolved not to die, and that they might go back, if they pleased. They returned to their master, and told him the whole affair. Yemen immediately mounted his great baffle, and set out. Being come, he told the youth that he set very early in refusing to leave the world, and it was unjust in him, for Yemen had promised him a life only of sixteen years, and the term was expired. But this reason did not satisfy Marcemend, who persisted in his resolution not to die; and, fearing lest the god of death should attempt to take him away by force, he ran to his oratory, and taking the Lignum, chiseled it to his breast. Meanwhile Yemen came down from his baffle, threw the head of the god into the neck, and laid the body, which also, as the Lignum, which Marcemend grasped with all his strength, and was going to drug them both into hell, when Yemen issued out of the Lignum, drove back the head of the god, and gave him so furious a blow that he killed him on the spot.

"The god of death being thus slain, mankind multiplied so that the earth was no longer able to contain them. The gods represented this to Yemen, and he, at their entreaty, restored Yemen to life, and to all the power he had before enjoyed. Yemen immediately despatched a herald to all parts of the world, to summon all the old men. The herald got drunk before he set out, and, without staying till the times of the wine were discelled, mounted an elephant, and rode up and down the world, pursuant to his commission; and, instead of publishing this order, he declared, that it was the will and pleasure of Yemen that, from this day forward, all the leaves, fruits, and flowers, whether ripe or green, should fall to the ground. This proclamation was no sooner issued than men began to yield to death. But before Yemen was killed, only the old were deprived of life, and now people of all ages are summoned indiscriminately." — Picary.

And Brama's region, where the heavenly Hours Weave the vast circle of his age-long day.

XXIII. 5, p. 611.

They who are acquainted with day and night know that the day of Braham is as a thousand revolutions of the Yoga, and that his night extendeth for a thousand more. On the coming of that day all things proceed from invisibility to visibility; so, on the approach of night, they are all dissolved away in that which is called invisible. The universe, even, having existed, is again dissolved: and now again, on the approach of day, by divine necessity, it is reproduced. That which, upon the dissolution of all things else, is not destroyed, is superior and of another nature from that visibility: it is invisible and eternal. He who is thus called invisible and incorruptible is even he who is called the Supreme Abode; which men having once obtained, they never more return to earth: that is my opinion. — Karnapray, in the Digest of Gora.

The guess, that Brama and his wife Saraswati may be Abraham and Sarah, has more letters in its favor than are usually to be found in such guesses. — Niecamp, p. i. 10, § 2.

The true cause why there is no idol of Brama, (except the heel, which is his shoe in the Trimoutret,) is probably to be found in the conquest of his sect. A different reason, however, is implied in the Vedas: "Of Him, it says, whose glory is so great, there is no image: He is the incomprehensible Being which illumines all, delights all, whence all proceeded; — that by which they live when born, and that to which all must return." — Moon's Hindu Pantheon, p. 4.

Two forms inseparable in unity,

Hath Yemen. — XXV. 13, p. 612.

The Dharma-Reja, or king of justice, has two connotations; one is mild and full of benevolence; those alone who abound with virtue see it. He holds a court of justice, where are many assistants, among whom are many just and pious kings; Chaitragupta acts as chief secretary. These holy men determine what is dharma and adharma, just and unjust. His (Dharma-Reja's) servant is called Curema: he brings the righteous on celestial ears, which are of themselves, whenever holy men are to be brought in, according to the directions of the Dharma-Reja, who is the sovereign of the Pātrī. This he calls his divine counsellors, and the righteous alone do see it. His other counsellors, or form, is called Yemen; this the wicked alone can see. It is at home to the large body of the world. Yemen is the god of Patala; there he orders some to be beaten, some to be cut to pieces, some to be devoured by monsters, &c. His servant is called Cookendra, who, with ropes round their necks, drag the wicked over rugged paths, and throws them headlong into hell. He is unmerciful, and hard is his heart; every body trembles at the sight of him. — Wilford. Asiatic Researches.

Black of aspect, red of eye. — XXIII. 13, p. 613.

Punishment is the Magistrate; Punishment is the Inspirer of Terror; Punishment is the Defender from Calamity; Punishment is the Guardian of those that sleep; Punishment, with a black aspect and a red eye, tempts the guilty. — HALKA'S Gentoo Cole, ch. xxi. sect. 8.

Argyora. — XXIII. 13, p. 613.

In Patna (or the infernal regions) resides the sovereign Queen of the Nagain, (large snakes or dragons;) she is beautiful, and her name is Argyora. There, in a cave, she performed Tapasya with such rigorous austerity, that fire sprang from her body, and formed numerous agnimiti places of sacred fire) in Patna. These fires, forcing their way through the earth, waters, and mountains, formed various openings or mouths, called from thence the flaming mouths, or jaya mundi. By Soma, a daughter was united to her, called Rama-devi. She is most beautiful; she is La eshmi; and her name is Ayotserasha, or Ayotserishta. Like a jewel she remains concealed in the Ocean. — Wilford. Asiat. Res.

He came in all his might and majesty. — XXIV. 2, p. 613.

What is this to the coming of Sceva, as given by Mr. Macius, from the Sceva Pauana?

"In the place of the right wheel blazed the Sun, in the place of the left was the Moon; instead of the brazen nails and bolts, which firmly held the ponderous wheels, were distributed Brannias on the right hand, and Reysvigh on the left; in lieu of the canopy on the top of the chariot was over spread the vault of Heaven; the counterpart of the wheels was on the east and west, and the four Semoroids were instead of the cushions and hoisters; the four Vedas were placed as the horses of the chariot, and Sarasvati was for the bell; the piece of wood by which the horses are driven was the three-lettered Mantra, while Brahma himself was the charioteer, and the Naschatras and stars were distributed about it by way of ornaments. Samara was in the place of a bow, the serpent Seschaniga was stationed as the string, Veschum instead of an arrow, and fire was constituted its point. Ganges and other rivers were appointed as its processes; and the setting out of the chariot, with its appendages and furniture, one would affirm to be the year of twelve months gracefully moving forwards."

"When Sceva, with his numerous troops and prodigious army, was mounted, Brahma drove so furiously, that thought itself, which, in its rapid career,compasses Heaven and Earth, could not keep pace with it. By the motion of the chariot Heaven and Earth were put into a tempest; and, as the Earth was not able to bear up under this burden, the Cow of the Earth, Kam-deva, took upon itself to support the weight. So the Sceva went with intention to destroy Treepeor; and the multitude of Devatas, and Reysvighes, and Aparvas who waited on his stirrup, opening their mouths, in transports of joy and praise, exclaiming, Jaya! Jaya! so that Parvat, not being able to bear his absence, set out to accompany Sceva, and in an instant was up with him; while the light which brightened on his countenance, on the arrival of Parvat, surpassed all imagination and description. The Genii of the eight regions, armed with all kinds of weapons, but particularly with arrows, or fire darts, like moving mountains, advanced in front of the army; and Eendra and other Devatas, some of them mounted on elephants, some on horses, others on chariots, or on camels or buffalos, were stationed on each side, while all the other order of Devatas, to the amount of some haks, formed the centre. The Mussicahars, with long hair on their heads, like Sannasis, loosing their staves in their hands, danced as they went along; the Syddhbas, who revolve about the heavens, opening their mouths in praise of Sceva raised showers upon his head; and the vaulted heaven, which is like an inverted gilded, being appointed in the place of a drum, exalted his dignity by its majestic resounding."

Throughout the Hindoo fables there is the constant mistake of bulk for sublimity.

By the attribute of Dirty, self multiplied,

The Almighty Man appears on every side. — XXIV. 5, p. 613.

This more than polytop power was once exerted by Krishna on a curious occasion.

It happened in Devar, a splendid city built by Vivavarana, by command of Krishna, on the sea-shore, in the province of Gucrat, that his musical associate, Narela, had no wife or substitute; and he hinted to his friend the decency of sparing him one from his long catalogue of ladies. Krishna generously told him to win and wear any one he chose, not immediately in requisition for himself. Narela accordingly went wowing to one house, but found his master there; a second, he was again forestalled; a third, the same; to a fourth, fifth, the same: in fine, after the round of sixteen thousand of those domiciliary visits, he was still forced to sigh and keep alone. For Krishna was in every house, variously employed, and so domesticated, that each lady congratulated herself on her exclusive and uninterrupted possession of the ardent deity. — Moica's Hinda Punshon, p. 994.

"Eight of the chief gods have each their sitting, or energy, proceeding from them, differing from them in sox, but in every other respect exactly like them, with the same arms, the same deceptions, the same weapons, and the same vehicles. — Asiut. Res. Vof edit. vol. vii. pp. 68, 82.

The manner in which this divine power is displayed by Kehama, in his combat with Yamen, will give some reminder of the Irishman, who brought in four prisoners, and being asked how he had taken them, replied, he had surrounded them.

The Anucreta, or Drink of Immortality. — XXIV. 9, p. 614.

Mr. Wilkins has given the genuine history of this liquor, which was produced by chewing the sea with a mountain.

"There is a hill and stately mountain, and its name is Meroc, a most exalted name of glory, reflecting the sunny rays from the splendid surface of its gilded horns. It is clothed in gold, and is the respected haunt of Deves and Gandharvas. Its summit is never to be encompassed by sinful man, and it is guarded by dreadful serpents. Many celestial medicinal plants adorn its sides; and it stands, piercing the heaven with its aspiring summit, a mighty hill, inaccessible even by the human mind. It is adorned with trees and pleasant streams, and resoundeth with the delightful songs of various birds."

"The Savus, and all the glorious hosts of heaven, having ascended to the summit of this lofty mountain, sparkling with precious gems, and for eternal ages raised, were sitting in solemn assembly, meditating the discovery of the Anucreta, the Water of Immortality. The Dvac Nirayan being also there, spoke unto Brekaiva, whilst the Savus were thus consulting together, and said, 'Let the Ocean, as a pot of milk, be clarified by the united labor of the Savus and Anucretes; and when the mighty waters have been stirruped, the Anucreta shall be found. Let them collect together every medicinal herb, and every precious thing, and let them stir the Ocean, and they shall discover the Anucreta.'"

"There is also another mighty mountain, whose name is Mondor, and its rocky streams are like towering clouds. It is cloathed in a net of the entangled tendrils of the twining creeper, and resoundeth with the harmony of various birds. Innumerable savage beasts infest its borders; and it is the respected haunt of Kennaws, Deves, and Anucretes. It standeth eleven thousand steps above the earth, and eleven thousand more below its surface.

"As the united hands of Deves were unable to remove this mountain, they went before Vrekhana, who was sitting with Brahma, and they asked him, 'O master! Will you bestow upon us one of your utmost superior wisdom to remove the mountain and employ your utmost power for our good.'

Vrekhana and Brahma having said, 'It shall be according to your wish,' he with the lotus eye directed the King of Sesa to destroy the mountain. And after these words was produced from the unassailable mass the jewel Kavasvabh, that glorious sparkling gem worn by Narayan on his breast; and Parejati, the tree of plenty, and Jwaarabhi, the cow that granted every heart's desire.

The moon, Soors, the goddess of Ser, and the Horse, as swift as thought, instantly marched away towards the Dove, keeping in the path of the Sun.

Then the Dve Dokhunatar, in human shape, came forth, holding in his hand a white vessel filled with the immortal juice Ananta. When the Ananta beheld these wondrous things appear, they raised their tumultuous voices for the Ananta, and each of them charmanently explained, 'This of right is mine.'

In the mean time Tread, a mighty elephant, arose, now kept by the god of thunder; and as they continued to churn the ocean more than enough, that deadly poison issued from its bed, burning like a raging fire, whose dreadful flames in a moment spread throughout the world, confounding the three regions of the universe with the mortal stench, until Ser, at the word of Brahma, swallowed the fatal dung, to save mankind; which, remaining in the throat of that sovereign Dve of magic form, from that time he hath been called Rej-Karej, because his throat was stained blue.

When the Ananta beheld this miraculous deed, they became desolate, and the Ananta and the goddess Ser became the source of endless misery to all the world.

Then Narayan assumed the character and person of Vreekhana, the power of enchantment, in a female form of wonderful beauty, and stood before the Ananta, whose minds being fascinated by her presence, and deprived of reason, they seized the Ananta, and gave it unto her.

The Ananta now clothed themselves in costly raiment, and seizing their various weapons, rush on together to attack the Soors. In the mean time Narayan, in the female form, having obtained the Ananta from the hands of their leader, the hosts of Soors, during the tumult and confusion of the Ananta, drank of the living water.

And it so fell out, that whilst the Soors were quenching their thirst for immortality, Rahoo, an Ananta, assumed the form of a Soor, and began to drink also; and the water had not reached his throat, when the Sun and Moon, in friendship to the Soors, discovered the deceit; and instantly Narayan cut off his head as he was drinking, with his splendid weapon Chakra. And the gigantic head of the Ananta, emblem of a mountain's summit, being thus separated from his body by the Chakra's edge, fell on the Chandra's edge, and the Chandra's edge on the Sun's, and the Sun's on the Moon's, and the Moon's on the Earth's, and the Earth's on the fire's, and the fire's on the wind's, and the wind's on the water's, and the water's on the mountain's, and the mountain's on the earth's, and the earth's on the sky's, and the sky's on the universe's breast; and immediately the universe fell down into the brahman shower.

It was from this milk-like stream of juices, produced from those trees and plants and a mixture of melted gold, that the Soors obtained their immortality.

The waters of the Ocean now being assimilated with those of the Brahma, and from that milk a kind of butter was presently produced; when the heavenly bands went again into the presence of Brahma, the granter of boons, and addressed him, saying, 'Except Narayan, every other Soor and Ananta is fattiged with his labor, and still the Ananta doth not appear; wherefore the churning of the Ocean is at a stand.' Then Brahma said unto Narayan.

'Endue them with recruited strength, for thou art their support.' And Narayan answered and said, 'I will give fresh vigor to such as cooperate in the work. Let Manjire be whirled about, and the ocean be kept steady.'

When they heard the words of Narayan, they all returned again to the work, and began to stir about with great force that butter of the ocean, when there presently arose from out the troubled deep, first the Moon, with a pleasing countenance, shining with the beauty of the ocean; next followed Soors, the goddess of fortune, whose seat is the white of the waters; then Soors-Dveer, the goddess of wine, and the white horse called Obhicher. And after these there was produced from the unassailable mass the jewel Kavasvabh, that glorious sparkling gem worn by Narayan on his breast; and Parejati, the tree of plenty, and Suvarabhi, the cow that granted every heart's desire.

yet terrible to behold: and being arrived, glowing like the sacrificial flame, and spreading terror around, Nirejan, with his right arm armed like the elephantine trunk, hurled forth the ponderous arrow, the speedy messenger and glorious ruin of hostile towns; who, raging like the final all-destroying fire, shot bounding with desolating force, killing thousands of the Accords in his rapid flight, burning and involving, like the incandescent flames, and cutting down all that would oppose him. Amon he eludes the heavens, and now again descends into the field like a French, to feast in blood.

"Now the dauntless Accords strive, with repeated strength, to crush the Soors with rocks and mountains, which, hurled in vast numbers into the heavens, appeared like scattered clouds, and fell, with all the trees thereof, in millions of fear-exciting torrents, striking violently against each other with a mighty noise; and in their fill the earth, with all its fields and forests, is driven from its foundation: they thunder furiously at each other as they roll along the field, and spend their strength in mutual conflict.

"Now Amon, seeing the Soors overwhelmed with fear, filled up the path to Heaven with showers of golden-headed arrows, and split the mountain summits with his unerring shafts; and the Accords, finding themselves again sore pressed by the Soors, precipitately fly; some rush headlong into the briny waters of the ocean, and others hide themselves within the bowels of the earth.

"The rage of the glorious Chakan, Soudbaran, which for a while burst like the oil-fed fire, now grew cool, and he retired into the heavens from whence he came. And the Soors having obtained the victory, the mountain Mundar was carried back to its former station with great respect, whilst the waters also retired, filling the firmament and the heavens with their dreadful roarings.

"The Soors guarded the Aarreta with great care, and rejoiced exceedingly because of their success. And Eandra, with all his immortal bands, gave the water of life unto Nirejan, to keep it for their use." — Mahabharat.

Anrinit, or Immortal, is, according to Sir William Jones, the name which the mythologists of Tibet apply to a celestial tree, bearing ambrosial fruit, and adjoining to four vast rocks, from which as many sacred rivers derive their several streams.

Roderick, the Last of the Goths;
A TRAGIC POEM.

Tanto aceror apud majores, sicut virtutibus gloria, its flagitiis praestitit, fuit. Sed hoc aliqua, ex veteri memoria petita, quoties res luceaque exempla recti, aut solata mai, possit, haud absurde memorabilus.

Tacitus Hist. lib. 3, c. 51.

TO GROSVENOR CHARLES BEDFORD,
THIS POEM IS INSCRIBED,
IN LASTING MEMORIAL OF A LONG AND UNINTERRUPTED FRIENDSHIP, BY HIS OLD SCHOOLFELLOW,
ROBERT SOUTHEY.

As the ample Moon,
In the deep stillness of a summer even
Rising behind a thick and lofty Grove,
Burles like an uncomsuming fire of light
In the green trees; and kindling on all sides
Their leafy umbrae, turns the dusky veil
Into a substance glorious as her own,
Yea, with her own incorporated, by power
Capacious and serene;—like power abides
In Man's celestial Spirit; Virtue thus
Sets forth and magnifies herself; thus feeds
A calm, a beautiful and silent fire,
From the encumbrances of mortal life,
From error, disappointment,—may, from guilt;
And sometimes, so relenting Justice wilts,
From palpable oppressions of Despair.
Wordsworth.

PREFACE.
This poem was commenced at Keswick, Dec. 3, 1809, and finished there July 14, 1814.

A French translation, by M. B. de S., in three volumes 12mo., was published in 1820, and another by M. le Chevalier , in one volume 8vo., 1821. Both are in prose.

When the latest of these versions was nearly ready for publication, the publisher, who was also the printer, insisted upon having a life of the author prefixed. The French public, he said, knew nothing of M. Southey, and in order to make the book sell, it must be managed to interest them for the writer. The Chevalier represented as a conclusion for not attempting any thing of the kind, that he was not acquainted with M. Southey's private history. "Would you believe it?" says a friend of the translator's, from whose letter I transcribe what follows: "this was his answer verbatim: 'N'importe, écrivez toujours; brodez, brodez-la un peu; que ce soit vrai ou non ce ne fait rien; qui prendra la peine de s'informer?'" Accordingly a Notice sur M. Southey was composed, not exactly in conformity with the publisher's notions.
of biography, but from such materials as could be collected from magazines and other equally munau-thentic sources.
In one of these versions a notable mistake occurs, onocasioned by the French pronunciation of an English word. The whole passage indeed, in both versions, may be regarded as curiously exemplifying
the difference between French and English po1try.
"The lamps and tapers now grew pale,
And through the eastern windows slanting fell
The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls
Returning day restored no cheerful sounds
Or joyous motions of awakening life;
But in the stream of light the speckled motes
As if in mimicry of insect play,
Floated with many movement. Slipping down
Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam,
And rested on the sinful woman's grave
As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven.
So be it! cried Pelagio, even so!
As in a momentary interval,
When thought expelling thought, had left his mind
Open and passive to the influxes
Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there,—
So be it, Heavenly Father, even so!
Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed
Forgiveness there; for let not thou the grounds
Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers
Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain!
And thou, poor soul, who from the dolorous house
Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me
To shorten and assuage thy penal term,
Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts
And other duties than this garb, this night
Enjoin, should thus have past! Our mother-hand
Exacted of my heart the sacrifice;
And many a vigil must thy son perform
Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses,
And tented fields, outwatching for her sake
The starry host, and ready for the work
Of day, before the sun begins his course."

Il se tirait à toutes ces réflexions, quand la
lumière des lampes et des écrevisses commença à pâlir, et que les premières trêves de l'aurore se montèrent à travers les hautes croyances tourmentées vers l'orient.
Le retour du jour ne vameut point dans ces murs des sous joyeux ni les mouvements de la vie qui se réveillaient; les seuls papillons de nuit, agissant leurs ailes pesantes, bourdonnèrent encore sous les voûtes auréolées.
Bien tout le premier rayon du soleil
glissant obliquement par-dessus l'un tel, vint s'arro-er sur la tombe de la femme pécheresse, et la lumière du ciel assourdissait.
"Que ce présage s'accomplisse," s'écria Pelage, qui absorba dans ses médiditations, fixant en ce moment ses yeux sur le tombeau de sa mere; "Dieu de miséricorde, qu'il en soit ainsi! Puissat tu bonté vivifiante verser de même le pardon!
Que les sanglots de la pénitence expirante, et que mes prières unies ne montent point en vain devant le trône éternel. Et toi, pauvre âme, qui de ton soirωur douloureux de souffrances et de tourments, expireras en moi pour abréger et volonter ton supplice, temporairement, pardonne ma dureté, sans ces habitus et dans cette nuit, débouvrez mes pénétrées sur d'autres dérives.
Notre patrie commune a exigé de moi ce sacrifice, et ton fils doit donc parvenir accomplir plus d'une ville dans la profondeur des déserts sur la cime des monts, dans ces plaine couvertes de ténèbres, observant, pour l'amour de l'Espanique, la marche des astez de la nuit, et préparant l'auronage de sa journée avant que le soleil ne commence sa course."—T. i.
pp. 175—177.

In the other translation the motes are not converted into moths,—but the image is omitted.

Consumées dans des soins parmi les rapides heures s'écoulaient, les lampes et les torches commençaient
tà pâlir, et l'oblique rayon du matin dorait déjà
les vitres écumés qui regardaient vers l'Orient;
le retour du jour ne commençait point, dans cette sombre ceinture, les sous joyeux, ni le tableau mouvant de la vie qui se réveilla; mais, tombant d'un haut, le cléétait rayon, passant au-dessous de l'autel, vint frap-
per le tombeau de la femme pécheresse.
"Ainsi soit-il," s'écria Pelage; "ainsi soit-il, ô dieu Créateur! Puisse ta virginiante bonte verser ainsi le pardon en ce lieu! Que les génisences d'une mort pénitente, que mes âmes prières ne soient pas arrêtées en vain devant la tréne de miséricorde!
Et toi, qui, de ton séjour de souffrances et de tourments, regarde vers ton fils, pour abrégé et soulager tes pâmes, pardonne, si d'autres derouls ont rempli les heures que cette nuit et rejet habitoing de te consoullir! Notre patrie exigent ce sacrifice, deautres vigiles n'attendent dans les bois et les défilés de nos montagnes; et bientôt sous la lune, it me faudra veiller, le soir, avant que le ciel ne se couvre d'étoiles, être prê pour le travail de la journée, avant que le soleil ne commence sa course."—Pp.
89, 90.

A very good translation, in Dutch verse, was published in two volumes, 8vo, 1823—4, with this title:—"Rodrigo de Goth, Koning van Spanje.
Naar het Engelsch van Southey gevolgd, door
Vrouwe Katharina Wilhelmina Bilderdijk. Te
'S Gravenliage." It was sent to me with the following epistle from her husband, Mr. Willem Bilderdijk.

"Dabam Lugduni in Batavis. Ipsiis idib. Februarii, Cl.ioccccxiv."

I went to Leyden in 1825, for the purpose of seeing the writer of this epistle, and the lady who had translated my poem, and addressed it to me in some very affecting stanzas. It so happened, that on my arrival in that city, I was laid up under a surgeon's care; they took me into their house, and made the days of my confinement as pleasant as they were memorable. I have never been acquainted with a man of higher intellectual power, nor of greater learning, nor of more varied and extensive knowledge than Bilderdijck, confessedly the most distinguished man of letters in his own country. His wife was worthy of him. I paid them another visit the following year. They are now both gone to their rest, and I shall not look upon their like again.

Soon after the publication of Roderick, I received the following curious letter from the Ettrick Shepherd, (who had passed a few days with me in the preceding autumn,) giving me an account of his endeavors to procure a favorable notice of the poem in the Edinburgh Review.

"Edinburgh, Dec. 15, 1814.

"My dear Sir,

"I was very happy at seeing the post-mark of Keswick, and quite proud of the pleasure you make me believe you "Wake " has given to the beautiful and happy group at Greata Hall. Indeed, few things could give me more pleasure, for I left my heart a sojourner among them. I have had a higher opinion of patrimony since that period than ever I had before; and I desire that you will positively give my kindest respects to each of them individually.

"The Pilgrim of the Sun is published, as you will see by the Papers, and if I may believe some communications that I have got, the public opinion of it is high; but these communications to an author are not to be depended on.

"I have read Roderick over and over again, and am the more and more convinced that it is the noblest epic of the age. I have had some correspondence and a good deal of conversation with Mr. Jeffery about it, though he does not agree with me in every particular. He says it is too long, and wants elasticity, and will not, he fears, be generally read, though much may be said in its favor. I had even teased him to let me review it for him, on account, as I said, that he could not appreciate its merits. I copy one sentence out of the letter he sent in answer to mine: —

""For Southey I have, as well as you, great respect, and when he will let me, great admiration; but he is a most provoking fellow, and at least as conceited as his neighbor Wordsworth. I cannot just trust you with his Roderick; but I shall be extremely happy to talk over that and other kindred subjects with you; for I am every way disposed to give Southey a lavish allowance of praise; and few things would give me greater pleasure than to find he had afforded me a fair opportunity. But I must do my duty according to my own apprehensions of it."

"I stopped with him last night, but there was so many people that I got but little conversation with him; but what we had was solely about you and Wordsworth. I suppose you have heard what a crushing review he has given the latter. I still found him pursuing in his first asseveration, that it was heavy; but what was my pleasure to find that he had only got to the seventeenth division! I assured him he had the marrow of the thing to come at as yet, and in that I was joined by Mr. Alison. There was at the same time a Lady M—— joined us at the instant; short as her remark was, it seemed to make more impression on Jeffery than all our arguments: — "Oh, I do love Southey!" that was all.

"I have no room to tell you more. But I beg that you will not do any thing, nor publish any thing that will nettle Jeffery for the present, knowing, as you do, how omnipotent he is with the fashionable world, and seemingly so well disposed toward you.

"I am ever yours most truly,

"James Hogg."

"I wish the Notes may be safe enough. I never looked at them. I wish these large quartoes were all in hell burning."

The reader will be as much amused as I was with poor Hogg's earnest desire that I would not say any thing which might tend to frustrate his friendly intentions.

"but what success the Shepherd met, Is to the world a secret yet."

There can be no reason, however, for withholding what was said in my reply of the crushing review which had been given to Mr. Wordsworth's poem:—"He crush the Excursion!! Tell him he might as easily crush Skiddaw!"

Keswick, 15 June, 1838.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

The history of the Visigoths for some years before their overthrow is very imperfectly known. It is, however, apparent that the enmity between the royal families of Chindaswintho and Wamba was one main cause of the destruction of the kingdom, the latter party having assisted in betraying their country to the Moors for the gratification of their own revenge. Theodred and Favila were younger sons of King Chindaswintho; King Witiza, who was of Wamba's family, put out the eyes of Theodred, and murdered Favila, at the instigation of that Chieftain's wife, with whom he lived in adultery. Pelayo, the son of Favila, and afterwards the founder of the Spanish monarchy, was driven into exile. Roderick, the son of Theodred, recovered the throne, and put out Witiza's eyes in vengeance for his father; but he spared Orpas, the brother of the tyrant, as being a Priest, and Ebba and Sisibert, the two sons of Witiza, by Pelayo's mother. It may be convenient thus briefly to premise these circumstances of an obscure portion of history, with which few readers are supposed to be familiar; and a list of the principal persons who are introduced, or spoken of, may as properly be prefixed to a Poem as to a Play.

Witiza,............ King of the Visigoths; dethroned and blinded by Roderick.
Theodred,........ son of King Chindaswintho, blinded by King Witiza.
Favila,........... his brother; put to death by Witiza.
The Wife of Favila, Witiza's adulterous mistress.
(These four persons are dead before the action of the poem commences.)

Roderick,........ the last King of the Visigoths; son of Theodred.
Pelayo,........... the founder of the Spanish Monarchy; son of Favila.
Gaciosa,........... his wife.
Guthila,........... his sister.
Favila,........... his son.
Hernandes,........ his daughter.

ORDERIK, THE LAST OF THE GOTH.

I.

RODERICK AND ROMANO.

Long had the crimes of Spain cried out to Heaven:
At length the measure of offence was full.
Count Julian call'd the invaders; not because Inhuman priests with unoffending blood Had stain'd their country; not because a yoke Of iron servitude oppress'd and gall'd
The children of the soil: a private wrong Roused the remorseless Baron. Mad to wreak His vengeance, for his violated child,
On Roderick's head, in evil hour for Spain, For that unhappy daughter, and himself,— Desperate apostate!—on the Moors he call'd; And like a cloud of locusts, whom the South Wars from the plains of wasted Africa, The Mussulmen upon Iberia's shore Descend. A countless multitude they came; Syrian, Moor, Saracen, Greek renegade, Persian, and Copt, and Tatar, in one bond Of erring faith conjoin'd,—strong in the youth And heat of zeal,—a dreadful brotherhood, In whom all turbulent vices were let loose; While Conscience, with their impious creed accr's d
Drunk as with wine, had sanctified to them All bloody, all abominable things.

Thou, Calpe, saw'st their coming; ancient Rock Renn'd, no longer now shall thou be call'd From Gods and Heroes of the years of yore, Kronos, or hundred-handed Briareus, Bacchus, or Herocles; but doom'd to bear The name of thy new conqueror, and thenceforth To stand his everlasting monument. Thou saw'st the dark-blue waters flash before Their ominous way, and whiteen round their keels; Their swarthy myriads darkening o'er thy sands. There, on the beach, the Misbelievers spread Their banners, flaunting to the sun and breeze; Fair shone the sun upon their proud array, White turbans, glittering armor, shields engrav'd With gold, and cimeters of Syrian steel; And gently did the breezes, as in sport,
Curl their long flags outrolling, and display
The blazon’d scrolls of blasphemy. Too soon
The gales of Spain from that unhappy land
Waffled, as from an open charnel-house,
The taint of death; and that bright sun, from fields
Of slaughter, with the morning dew drew up
Corruption through the infected atmosphere.

Then fell the kingdom of the Goths; their hour
Was come, and Vengeance, long withheld, went loose.
Famine and Pestilence had wasted them,
And Treason, like an old and eating sore,
Consumed the bones and sinews of their strength;
And, worst of enemies, their Sins were arm’d
Against them. Yet the spectre from their hands
Pass’d not away inglorious, nor was shame
Left for their children’s lasting heritage;
Eight summer days, from morn till latest eve,
The fatal fight endured, till perfidy
Prevailing to their overthrow, they sunk
Defeated, not dishonor’d. On the banks
Of Chrysus, Roderick’s royal car was found,
His battle-horse Orelio, and that helm
Whose horns, amid the thickets of the fray
Eminent, had mark’d his presence. Did the stream
Receive him with the undistinguish’d dead,
Christian and Moor, who clogg’d its course that day?
So thought the Conqueror; and from that day forth,
Memorial of his perfect victory,
He bade the river bear the name of Joy.
So thought the Goths; they said no prayer for him,
For him no service sung, nor mourning made,
But charged their crimes upon his head, and cursed
His memory.

Bravely in that eight-days’ fight
The King had striven,—for victory first, while hope
Remain’d, then desperately in search of death.
The arrows pass’d him by to right and left;
The spear-point pierc’d him not; the cimeter
Glanc’d from his helmet. Is the shield of Heaven,
Wretch that I am, extended over me?
Cried Roderick; and he dropp’d Orelio’s reins,
And threw his hands aloft in frantic prayer,—
Death is the only mercy that I crave,
Death soon and short, death and forgetfulness!
Aloud he cried; but in his innest heart
There answer’d him a secret voice, that spake
Of righteousness and judgment after death,
And God’s redeeming love, which fain would save
The guilty soul alive. ‘Twas agony,
And yet ‘twas hope; — a momentary light,
That flash’d through utter darkness on the Cross
To point salvation, then left all within
Dark as before. Fear, never felt till then,
Sudden and irresistible as stroke
Of lightning, smote him. From his horse he dropp’d,
Whether with human impulse, or by Heaven
Struck down, he knew not; loose’nd from his wrist
The sword-claim, and let fall the sword, whose lilt
Clung to his palm a moment ere it fell,
Glued there with Moorish gore. His royal robe,
His horned helmet and enamell’d mail,
He cast aside, and taking from the dead
A peasant’s garment, in those weeds involved
Stole like a thief in darkness from the field.

Evening closed round to favor him. All night
He fled, the sound of battle in his ear
Ringing, and sights of death before his eyes,
With forms more horrible of eager fiends
That seem’d to hover round, and guls of fire
Opening beneath his feet. At times the groan
Of some poor fugitive, who, bearing with him
His mortal hurt, had fallen beside the way,
Roused him from these dread visions, and he call’d
In answering groans on his Redeemer’s name,
That word the only prayer that pass’d his lips,
Or rose within his heart. Then would he see
The Cross whereon a bleeding Savior hung,
Who call’d on him to come and cleanse his soul
In those all-healing streams, which from his wounds,
As from perpetual springs, forever flow’d.
No hart e’er panted for the water-brooks
As Roderick thirsted there to drink and live;
But Hell was interpos’d; and worse than Hell—
Yea, to his eyes more dreadful than the fiends
Who flock’d like hungry ravens round his head,—
Florinda stood between, and warn’d him off
With her abhorrent hands,— that agony
Still in her face, which, when the deed was done,
Inflicted on her ravisher the curse
That it invoked from Heaven. — Oh, what a night
Of waking horrors! Nor, when morning came,
Did the realities of light and day
Bring aught of comfort; whereasoe’er he went
The tidings of defeat had gone before;
And leaving their defenceless homes to seek
What shelter walls and battlements might yield,
Old men with feeble feet, and tottering babies,
And widows with their infants in their arms,
Hurdied along. Nor royal Festival,
Nor sacred pageant, with like multitudes
E’er fill’d the public way. All whom the sword
Had spared were heir to bed-rid infirmity
Alone was left behind; the cripple plied
His crutches; with her child of yesterday
The mother fled, and she whose hour was come
Fell by the road.

Less dreadful than this view
Of outward suffering which the day disclosed,
Had night and darkness seem’d to Roderick’s heart,
With all their dread creations. From the throned
He turn’d aside, unable to endure
This burden of the general woe; nor walls,
Nor towers, nor mountain fastnesses he sought;
A firmer hold his spirit yearn’d to find,
A rock of surer strength. Unknowing where,
Straight through the wild he hasten’d on all day,
And with unslacken’d speed was travelling still
When evening gather’d round. Seven days, from morn
Till night, he travell’d thus; the forest oaks,
The fig-grove by the fearful husbandman
Forsaken to the spoiler, and the vines,
Where fox and household dog together now
Fed on the vintage, gave him food; the hand
Of Heaven was on him, and the agony
Which wrought within, supplied a strength beyond
All natural force of man.

When the eighth eve
Was come, he found himself on Ana's banks,
Fast by the Cauilian Schools. It was the hour
Of vespers; but no vesper-bell was heard,
Nor other sound, than of the passing stream,
Or stork, who, flapping with wide wing the air,
Sought her broad nest upon the silent tower.
Brethren and pupils thence alike fled fast
To save themselves within the embattled walls
Of neighboring Merida. One aged Monk
Alone was left behind; he would not leave
The sacred spot beloved, for having served
There, from his childhood up to ripe old age,
God's holy altar, it became him now,
He thought, before that altar to await
The merciless misbelievers, and lay down
His life, a willing martyr. So he staid
When all were gone, and duly fed the lamps,
And kept devotedly the altar dress'd,
And duly offer'd up the sacrifice.

Four days and nights he thus had pass'd alone,
In such high mood of saintly fortitude,
That hope of Heaven became a heavenly joy;
And now at evening to the gate he went,
If he might spy the Moors,—for it seem'd long
To tarry for his crown.

Before the Cross
Roderick had thrown himself; his body raised,
Half kneeling, half at length he lay; his arms
Embraced its foot, and from his lifted face
Tears streaming down betray'd the senseless stone.
He had not wept till now; and at the gush
Of these first tears, it seem'd as if his heart,
From a long winter's icy thrill let loose,
Had open'd to the genial influences
Of Heaven. In attitude, but not in act
Of prayer he lay; an agony of tears
Was all his soul could offer. When the Monk
Beheld him suffering thus, he raised him up,
And took him by the arm, and led him in;
And there, before the altar, in the name
Of Him whose bleeding image there was hung,
Spake comfort, and adjured him in that name
There to lay down the burden of his sins.
Lo! said Romano, I am waiting here
The coming of the Moors, that from their hands
My spirit may receive the purple robe
Of martyrdom, and rise to claim its crown.
That God who willeth not the sinner's death
Hath led thee hither. Threescore years and five,
Even from the hour when I, a five-years' child,
Enter'd the schools, have I continued here,
And serv'd the altar: not in all those years
Hath such a contrite and a broken heart
Appear'd before me. O my brother, Heaven
Hath sent thee for thy comfort, and for mine,
That my last earthly act may reconcile
A sinner to his God.

Then Roderick knelt
Before the holy man, and strove to speak.
Thou seest, he cried,—thou seest,—but memory
And suffocating thoughts represst'd the word,
And shudderings like an ague-fit, from head
To foot convuls'd him; till at length, subduing
His nature to the effort, he explain'd,
Spreading his hands and lifting up his face,
As if resolved in penitence to bear
A human eye upon his shame,—Thou seest
Roderick the Goth! That name would have sufficed
To tell its whole abhorred history:
In the same posture motionless he knelt,
Arms straighten'd down, and hands outspread, and eyes
Raised to the Monk, like one from whom his voice
Awaited life or death.

All night the old man
Pray'd with his penitent, and minister'd
Unto the wounded soul, till he infused
A healing hope of mercy that allay'd
Its heat of anguish. But Romano saw
What strong temptations of despair beset,
And how he needed in this second birth,
Even like a yearling child, a fosterer's care.

Father in Heaven, he cried, thy will be done!
Surely I hoped that I this day should sing
Hosannahs at thy throne; but thou hast yet
Work for thy servant here. He girt his loins,
And from her altar took, with reverent hands,
Our Lady's image down: In this, quoth he,
We have our guide, and guard, and comforter,
The best provision for our perilous way.

Fear not but we shall find a resting-place;
The Almighty's hand is on us.

They went forth;
They cross'd the stream; and when Romano turn'd
For his last look toward the Cauilian towers,
Far off the Moorish standards in the light
Of morn were glittering, where the miscreant host
Toward the Lusitanian capital
To lay their siege advanced; the eastern breeze
Bore to the fearful travellers far away
The sound of horn and tambour o'er the plain.
All day they hasten'd, and when evening fell,
Sped toward the setting sun, as if its line
Of glory came from Heaven to point their course.

But feeble were the feet of that old man
For such a weary length of way; and now
Being pass'd the danger, (for in Merida
Sacaru long in resolute defence,
Withstood the tide of war,) with easier pace
The wanderers journey'd on; till having cross'd
Rich Tagus, and the rapid Zebre,
They from Albardos' hoary height beheld
Fine-forest, fruitful vale, and that fair lake
Where Alcmon mingled there with Baza's stream,
Rests on its passage to the western sea,
That sea the aim and boundary of their toil.

The fourth week of their painful pilgrimage
Was full, when they arrived where from the land
A rocky hill, rising with steep ascent,
O'erhung the glittering beach; there, on the top,
A little, lowly hermitage they found,
And a rude Cross, and at its foot a grave,
RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHs.

II.

RODERICK IN SOLITUDE.

Twelve months they sojourn’d in their solitude, And then beneath the burden of old age Romano sunk. No brethren were there here To spread the sackcloth, and with ashes straw That penitential bed, and gather round To sing his requiem, and with prayer and psalm Assist him in his hour of agony. He lay on the bare earth, which long had been His only couch; beside him Roderick knelt, Moisten’d from time to time his blacken’d lips, Received a blessing with his latest breath, Then closed his eyes, and by the nameless grave Of the fore-tenant of that holy place Consign’d him, earth to earth.

Two graves are here; And Roderick, transverse at their feet, began To break the third. In all his intervals Of prayer, save only when he search’d the woods And fill’d the water-cruise, he labor’d there; And when the work was done, and he had laid Himself at length within its narrow sides And measured it, he shook his head to think There was no other business now for him. Poor wretch, thy bed is ready, he exclaim’d, And would that night were come! — It was a task, All gloomy as it was, which had beguiled The sense of solitude; but now he felt The burden of the solitary hours: The silence of that lonely hermitage Lay on him like a spell; and at the voice Of his own prayers, he started, half aghast. Then, too, as on Romano’s grave he sat And porod upon his own, a natural thought Arose within him,— well might he have spared That useless toil; the sepulchre would be No hiding-place for him; no Christian hands Were here who should compose his decent corpse And cover it with earth. There he might drag His wretched body at its passing hour; But there the Sea-Birds of her heritage Would rob the worm, or peradventure seize, Ere death had done its work, their helpless prey. Even now they did not fear him: when he walk’d Beside them on the beach, regardlessly They saw his coming; and their whirring wings Upon the height had sometimes fam’d his cheek, As if, being thus alone, humanity Had lost its rank, and the prerogative Of man were done away. For his lost crown And sceptre never had he felt a thought. Of pain; repentance had no pangs to spare For trifles such as these, — the loss of these Was a cheap penalty; — that he had fallen Down to the lowest depth of wretchedness, His hope and consolation. But to lose His human station in the scale of things, — To see brute nature scorn him, and renounce Its homage to the human form divine; — Had then Almighty vengeance thus reveal’d His punishment, and was he fallen indeed Below fallen man, below redemption’s reach, — Made lower than the beasts, and like the beasts To perish! — Such temptations troubled him By day, and in the visions of the night; And even in sleep he struggled with the thought, And waking with the effort of his prayers, The dream assid’l him still.

A wilder form Sometimes his poignant penitence assumed, Starting with force revived from intervals Of calmer passion, or exhausted rest; When floating hack upon the tide of thought Remembrance to a self-excusing strain Beguiled him, and recall’d in long array The sorrows and the secret impulses Which to the abyss of wretchedness and guilt Led their unwary victim. The evil hour Return’d upon him, when reluctantly Yielding to worldly counsel his assent, In wedlock to an ill-assorted mate He gave his cold, unwilling hand: then came The disappointment of the barren bed, The hope deceived, the soul dissatisfied, Home without love, and privacy from which Delight was banish’d first, and peace too soon Departed. Was it strange that, when he met A heart attuned,— a spirit like his own, Of lofty pitch, yet in affection mild, And tender as a youthful mother’s joy,— Oh, was it strange if, at such sympathy, ’Tis the feelings, which within his breast repell’d And chill’d, had shrunk, should open forth like flowers After cold winds of night, when gentle gales Restore the genial sun? If all were known, Would it indeed be not to be forgiven?— (Thus would he lay the accusation to his soul,) If all were truly known, as Heaven knows all, Heaven, that is merciful as well as just,— A passion slow and mutual in its growth, Pure as fraternal love, long self-conceal’d, And when confess’d in silence, long-controll’d; Treacherous occasion, human frailty, fear Of endless separation, worse than death,— The purpose and the hope with which the Fiend Tempted, deceived, and madmen’d him; — but then As at a new temptation would he start, Shuddering beneath the intolerable shame,
And clinch in agony his matted hair;
While in his soul the perilous thought arose,
How easy ’twere to plunge where yonder waves
Invited him to rest.

Oh for a voice
Of comfort,—for a ray of hope from Heaven!
A hand that from these billows of despair
May reach and snatch him ere he sink ingull’d!
At length, as life, when it hath lain long time
Oppress’d beneath some grievous malady,
Seems to rouse up with re-collected strength,
And the sick man doth feel within himself
A second spring, so Roderick’s better mind
Arose to save him. Lo! the western sun
Fames o’er the broad Atlantic; on the verge
Of glowing ocean rests; retiring then
Draws with it all its rays, and sudden night
Fills the whole cope of heaven. The penitent
Knelt by Romano’s grave, and falling prone,
Clasp’d with extended arms the funeral mould.
Father! he cried; Companion! only friend,
When all beside was lost! thou too art gone,
And the poor sinner whom from utter death
Thy providential hand preserved, once more
Totters upon the gulf. I am too weak
For solitude,—too vile a wretch to hear
This everlasting commune with myself.
The Tempter hath assail’d me; my own heart
Is leagued with him; Despair hath laid the nets
To take my soul, and Memory, like a ghost,
Haunts me, and drives me to the toils. O Saint,
While I was bless’d with thee, the hermitage
Was my sure haven! Look upon me still,
For from thy heavenly mansion thou canst see
The suppliant; look upon thy child in Christ.
Is there no other way for penitence?
I ask not martyrdom; for what am I
That I should pray for triumphs, the fit meed
Of a long life of holy works like thine;
Or how should I presumptuously aspire
To wear the heavenly crown resign’d by thee,
For my poor sinful sake? Oh point me thou
Some humblest, painfullest, severest path,—
Some new austerity, unheard of yet
In Syrian fields of glory, or the sands
Of holiest Egypt. Let me bind my brow
With thorns, and barefoot seek Jerusalem,
Tracking the way with blood; thence, day by day,
Inflict upon this guilty flesh the scourge,
Drink vinegar and gall, and for my bed
Hang with extended limbs upon the Cross,
A nightly crucifixion:—any thing
Of action, difficulty, bodily pain,
Labor, and outward suffering,—any thing
But stillness and this dreadful solitude!
Romano! Father! let me hear thy voice
In dreams, O sainted Soul! or from the grave
Speak to thy penitent; even from the grave
Thine were a voice of comfort.

Thus he cried,
Easing the pressure of his burden’d heart
With passionate prayer; thus pour’d his spirit forth,
Till, with the long, impetuous effort spent,
His spirit fail’d, and, laying on the grave
His weary head as on a pillow, sleep
Fell on him. He had pray’d to hear a voice
Of consolation, and in dreams a voice
Of consolation came. Roderick, it said,—
Roderick, my poor, unhappy, sinful child,
Jesus have mercy on thee!—Not if Heaven
Had opened, and Romano, visible
In his beatitude, had breathed that prayer;—
Not if the grave had spoken, had it pierced
So deeply in his soul, nor wrung his heart
With such compunctious visitings, nor given
So quick, so keen a pang. It was that voice
Which sung his fretful infancy to sleep
So patiently; which soothed his childish griefs,
Counsell’d, with anguish and prophetic tears,
His headstrong youth. And lo! his Mother stood
Before him in the vision; in those weeds
Which never from the hour when to the grave
She follow’d her dear lord Theodofred
Rusilla laid aside; but in her face
A sorrow that bespake a heavier load
At heart, and more unmitigated woe,—
Yea, a more mortal wretchedness than when
Witiza’s ruffians and the red-hot brass
Had done their work, and in her arms she held
Her eyeless husband; wiped away the sweat
Which still his tortures forced from every pore;
Cool’d his scorch’d lids with medicinal herbs,
And pray’d the while for patience for herself
And him, and pray’d for vengeance too, and found
Best comfort in her curses. In his dream,
Groaning he kneelt before her to beseech
Her blessing, and she raised her hands to lay
A benediction on him. But those hands
Were chain’d, and casting a wild look around,
With thrilling voice she cried, Will no one break
These shameful fetters? Pedro, Thedemir,
Athanagild, where are ye? Roderick’s arm
Is wither’d,—Chiefs of Spain, but where are ye?
And thou, Pelayo, thou our surest hope,
Dost thou, too, sleep?—Awake, Pelayo!—up!—
Why tardiest thou, Deliverer?—But with that She broke her bonds, and, lo! her form was changed!
Radiant in arms she stood! a bloody Cross
Gleam’d on her breastplate; in her shield display’d,
Erect a lion ramp’d; her helmed head
Rose like the Bercyntian Goddess crown’d
With towers, and in her dreadful hand the sword
Red as a firebrand blazed. Anon the tramp
Of horsemen, and the din of multitudes
Moving to mortal conflict, rang around;
The battle-song, the clang of sword and shield,
War-eries, and tumult, strife, and hate, and rage,
Blaspheous prayers, confusion, agony,
Rout, and pursuit, and death; and over all
The shout of victory,—Spain and Victory!
Roderick, as the strong vision master’d him,
Rush’d to the fight rejoicing: starting then,
As his own effort burst the charm of sleep,
He found himself upon that lonely grave
In moonlight and in silence. But the dream
Wrought in him still; for still he felt his heart
Pant, and his wither’d arm was trembling still;
And still that voice was in his ear which call’d
On Jesus for his sake.
Oh, might he hear
That actual voice! and if Rusilka lived,—
If shame and anguish for his crimes not yet
Had brought her to the grave,—sure she would bless
Her penitent child, and pour'd into his heart
Prayers and forgiveness, which like precious balm
Would heal the wounded soul. Not to herself
Less precious, or less healing, would the voice
That spake forgiveness flow. She wept her son
Forever lost, cut off with all the weight
Of unrepented sin upon his head,
Sin which had weigh'd a nation down—what joy
To know that righteous Heaven had in its wrath
Remember'd mercy, and she yet might meet
The child whom she had borne, redeem'd, in bliss!
The sudden impulse of such thoughts confirm'd
That unacknowledged purpose, which till now
Vainly had sought its end. He girt his loins,
Laid holiest Mary's image in a cleft
Of the rock, where, shelter'd from the elements,
It might abide till happier days came on,
From all defilement safe; pour'd his last prayer
Upon Romano's grave, and kiss'd the earth
Which cover'd his remains, and wept as if
At long leave-taking, then began his way.

III.

ADOSINDA.

'Twas now the earliest morning; soon the Sun,
Rising above Alharbos, pour'd his light
Amid the forest, and with ray adant
Entering its depth, illum'd the branchless pines,
Brighten'd their bark, tinged with a redder hue
Its rusty stains, and cast along the floor
Long lines of shadow, where they rose erect
Like pillars of the temple. With slow foot
Roderick pursued his way; for penitence,
Remorse which gave no respite, and the long
And painful conflict of his troubled soul,
Had worn him down. Now, brighter thoughts arose,
And that triumphant vision floated still
Before his sight with all her blazonry,
Her casled helm, and the victorious sword
That flash'd like lightning o'er the field of blood.
Sustain'd by thoughts like these, from morn till eve
He journey'd, and drew near Leyria's walls.
'Twas even-song time, but not a bell was heard;
Instead thereof, on her polluted towers,
Bidding the Moors to their unhallow'd prayer,
The crier stood, and with his sohoreous voice
Fill'd the delicious vale where Lena winds
Through groves and pastoral meads. The sound, the sight
Of turban, girdle, robe, and cimeter,
And tawny skins, awoke contending thoughts
Of anger, shame, and anguish in the Goth;
The face of human-kind so long unseen
Confused him now, and through the streets he went
With hag'd mien, and countenance like one
Crazed or bewilder'd. All who met him turn'd,
And wonder'd as he pass'd. One stopp'd him short,
Put alms into his hand, and then desired,
In broken Gothic speech, the moon-struck man
To bless him. With a look of vacancy
Roderick received the alms; his wandering eye
Fell on the money; and the fallen King,
Seeing his own royal impress on the piece,
Broke out into a quick, convulsive voice,
That seem'd like laughter first, but ended soon
In hollow groans suppress'd; the Musulman
Shrunk at the ghastly sound, and magnified
The name of Allah as he hasten'd on.
A Christian woman, spinning at her door,
Beheld him, and, with sudden pity touch'd,
She laid her spindle by, and running in,
Took bread, and following after, call'd him back,
And placing in his passive hands the loaf,
She said, Christ Jesus for his mother's sake
Have mercy on thee! With a look that seem'd
Like idiotcy he heard her, and stood still,
Staring awhile; then, bursting into tears,
Wept like a child, and thus relieved his heart,
Full even to bursting else with swelling thoughts.
So through the streets, and through the northern gate,
Did Roderick, reckless of a resting-place,
With feeble yet with hurried step pursue
His agitated way; and when he reach'd
The open fields, and found himself alone
Beneath the stary canopy of Heaven,
The sense of solitude, so dreadful late,
Was then repose and comfort. There he stopp'd
Beside a little rill, and brake the leaf;
And shedding o'er that long untasted food,
Painful but quiet tears, with grateful soul
He breathed thanksgiving forth, then made his bed
On heath and myrtle. But when he arose
At day-break, and pursued his way, his heart
Felt lighten'd that the shock of mingling first
Among his fellow-kind was overpast;
And journeying on, he gread him whom he met
With such short interchange of benison
As each to other gentle travellers give,
Recovering thus the power of social speech
Which he had long disused. When hunger press'd,
He ask'd for alms: slight supplication served;
A countenance so pale and woe-begone
Moved all to pity; and the marks it bore
Of rigorous penance and austerest life,
With something, too, of majesty that still
Appear'd amid the wreck, inspired a sense
Of reverence too. The goat-herd on the hills
Open'd his scrip for him; the babe in arms,
Affrighted at his visage, turn'd away,
And clinging to the mother's neck in tears,
Would yet again look up, and then again
Shrink back, with cry renew'd. The bolder imps
Sporting beside the way, at his approach
Broke off their games for wonder, and stood still
In silence; some among them cried, A Saint!
The village matron, when she gave him food,
Besought his prayers; and one entreated him
To lay his healing hands upon her child.
For with a sore and hopeles.se malady
Wasting it long had lain,—and sure, she said
He was a man of God.

Thus travelling on,
He pass'd the vale where wild Arunca pours
Its wintry torrents; and the happier site
Of old Conimbrica, whose ruin'd towers
Bore record of the fierce Alani's wrath
Montego, too, he cross'd, not yet renown'd
In poet's amorous lay; and left behind
The walls at whose foundation pious hands
Of Priest, and Monk, and Bishop meekly toil'd,—
So had the insulting Arius given command.

Those stately palaces and rich domains
Were now the Moor's; and many a weary age
Must Coimbra wear the misbeliever's yoke,
Before Fernando's banner through her gate
Shall pass triumphant, and her hallow'd Mosque
Behold the hero of Biyar receive
The knighthood which he gloried so oft
In his victorious fields. Oh, if the years
To come might then have risen on Roderick's soul,
How had they kindled and consol'd his heart!—
What joy might Douro's haven then have given,
Whence Portugal, the faithful and the brave,
Shall take her name illustrious!—what, those walls
Where Mumadona one day will erect
Convent, and town, and towers, which shall become
The cradle of that famous monarchy!

What joy might these prophetic scenes have given,—
What ample vengeance on the Mussulman,
Driven out with foul defeat, and made to feel
In Africa the wrongs he wrought to Spain;
And still pursued by that relentless sword,
Even to the farthest Orient, where his power
Received its mortal wound!—Oh years of pride!
In undiscoverable futurity,
Yet unrevolved, your destined glories lay;
And all that Roderick in these fated scenes
Beheld, was grief and writhedness,—the waste
Of recast war, and that more meanful calm
Of joyless, helpless, hopeless servitude.
'Twas not the ruin'd walls of church or tower,
Cottage, or hall, or convent, black with smoke;
'Twas not the unburied bones, which, where the dogs
And crows had strown them, lay amid the field
Bleaching in sun or shower, that wrung his heart
With keener anguish; 'twas when he beheld
The terror's traitor show his shameless front
In the open eye of Heaven,—the renegade,
On whose base, brutal nature, unredem'd,
E'en black apostasy itself could stamp
No deeper reprobation at the hour
Assign'd fall prostrate; and unite the names
Of God and the Bishopsmer,—insipid prayer,—
Most insipid, when from unbelieving lips
The accursed utterance came. Then Roderick's heart
With indignation burst, and then he long'd
To be a King again, that so, for Spain
Betray'd and his Redeemer thus renounced,
He might inflict due punishment, and make
These wretches feel his wrath. But when he saw
The daughters of the land,—who, as they went
With cheerful step to church, were wont to show
Their innocent faces to all passers' eyes,
Freely, and free from sin as when they look'd
In adoration and in praise to Heaven,—
Now mask'd in Moorish mufflers, to the Mosque
Holding uncompanied their jealous way,
His spirit seem'd at that unhappy sight
To die away within him, and he, too,
Would fain have died, so death could bring with it
Entire oblivion.

Rent with thoughts like these.
He reach'd that city, once the seat renown'd
Of Suevi kings, where, in contempt of Rome
Degenerate long, the North's heroic race
Raised first a rival throne; now from its state
Of proud regality delaced and fallen.
Still benignant nature o'er the lovely vale,
Where like a Queen rose Bracara august,
Pour'd forth her gifts profound; yerennial springs
Flow'd for her habitants, and genial suns,
With kindly showers to bless the happy chime,
Combined in vain their gentle influences;
For patient servitude was there, who bow'd
His neck beneath the Moor, and silent grief
That cats into the soul. The walls and stones
Seem'd to reproach their dwellers; stately piles
Yet undecay'd, the mighty monuments
Of Roman pomp, Barbaric palaces,
And Gothic halls, where haughty Barons late
Gladien'd their faithful vassals with the feast
And flowing bowl, alike the spoiler's now.

Leaving these captive scenes behind, he cross'd
Cavado's silver current, and the banks
Of Lima, through whose groves, in after years,
Mournful yet sweet, Dogro's amorous love
Prolong'd its tuneful echoes. But when now,
Beyond Armoy's tributary tide,
He came where Minho roll'd its ample stream
By Auri's ancient walls, fresh horrors met
His startled view; for prostrate in the dust
Those walls were laid, and towers and temples stood
Tottering in frightful ruins, as the flame
Had left them black and bare; and through the streets
All with the recent wreck of war bestrown,
Helmet and turban, cinerar and sword,
Christian and Moor in death promiscuous lay,
Each where they fell; and blood-dales, parch'd
And crack'd
Like the dry slime of some receding flood;
And half-burnt bodies, which allured from far
The wolf and raven, and to impious food
Tempted the houseless dog.

A thrilling pang,
A sweat like death, a sickness of the soul,
Came over Roderick. Soon they pass'd away,
And admiration in their stead arose;
Stern joy and inextinguishable hope,
With wrath, and hate, and sacred vengeance now
Indissolubly link'd. O valiant race,
O people excellently brave, he cried,
True Goth’s ye fell, and faithful to the last;
Though over-power’d, triumphant, and in death
Unconquer’d! Holy be your memory!
Bless’d and glorious now and evermore
Be your heroic names!—Led by the sound,
As thus he cried aloud, a woman came Toward him from the ruins. For the love
Of Christ, she said, lend me a little while
Thy charitable help!—Her words, her voice,
Her look, more horror to his heart convey’d
Than all the havoc round; for though she spoke
With the calm utterance of despair, in tones
Deep breathed and low, yet never sweeter voice
Pour’d forth its hymns in ecstasy to Heaven.
Her hands were bloody, and her garments stain’d
With blood, her face with blood and dust defiled.
Beauty and youth, and grace and majesty,
Had every charm of form and feature given;
But now upon her rigid countenance
Severest anguish set a fixedness
Ghastlier than death.

She led him through the streets
A little way along, where four low walls,
Heap’d rudely from the ruins round, enclosed
A narrow space: and there upon the ground
Four bodies, decently composed, were laid,
Though horrid all with wounds and clotted gore:
A venerable ancient, by his side
A comely matron, for whose middle age,
(If ruthless slaughter had not intervened,)
Nature, it seem’d, and gentle Time, might well
Have many a calm declining year in store;
The third an armed warrior, on his breast
An infant, over whom his arms were cross’d.
There,—with firm eye and steady countenance,
Unfaltering, she address’d him,—there they lie,
Child, Husband, Parents,—Adosinda’s all!
I could not break the earth with these poor hands,
Nor other tomb provide,—but let that pass!
Auria itself is now but one wide tomb
For all its habitants:—What better grave?
What worthier monument?—Oh, cover not
Their blood, thou Earth! and ye, ye blessed Souls
Of Heroes and of murder’d Innocents,
Oh, never let your everlasting cries
Cease round the Eternal Throne, till the Most High
For all these unexampled wrongs hath given
Vull, overflowing vengeance!

While she spake,
She raised her lofty hands to Heaven, as if
Calling for justice on the Judgment-seat;
Then laid them on her eyes, and, leaning on,
Bent o’er the open sepulchre.

But soon,
With quiet mien-collectedly, like one
Who from intense devotion, and the act
Of ardent prayer, arising, girds himself
For this world’s daily business she arose,
And said to Roderick, Help me now to raise
The covering of the tomb.

With half-burnt planks,
Which she had gather’d for this funereal use,
They roof’d the vault; then, laying stones above,
They closed it down; last, rendering all secure,

Stones upon stones they piled, till all appear’d
A huge and shapeless heap. Enough, she cried;
And taking Roderick’s hands in both her own,
And wringing them with fervent thankfulness,
May God show mercy to thee, she exclaim’d,
When most thou needest mercy! Who thou art
I know not; not of Auria,—for of all
Her sons and daughters, save the one who stands
Before thee, not a soul is left alive.
But thou hast render’d to me, in my hour
Of need, the only help which man could give.
What else of consolation may be found
For one so utterly bereft, from Heaven
And from myself must come. For deem not thou
That I shall sink beneath calamity:
This visitation, like a lightning-stroke,
Hath scathed the fruit and blossom of my youth;
One hour hath orphan’d me, and widow’d me,
And made me childless. In this sepulchre
Lie buried all my earthward hopes and fears,
All human loves and natural charities;—
All womanly tenderness, all gentle thoughts,
All female weakness too, I bury here,
Yea, all my former nature. There remain
Revenge and death:—the bitterness of death
Is past, and Heaven already hath vouchsafed
A foretaste of revenge.

Look here! she cried,
And drawing back, held forth her bloody hands,—
’Tis Moorish!—In the day of massacre,
A captain of Alcanman’s murderous host
Reserved me from the slaughter. Not because
My rank and station tempted him with thoughts
Of ransom, for amid the general waste
Of ruin all was lost;—nor yet, be sure,
That pity mov’d him, —they who from this race
Accurs’d for pity look, such pity find
As ravenous wolves show the defenceless flock.
My husband at my feet had fallen; my babe,— Spare me that thought, O God!—and then—even then,
Amid the maddening throes of agony
Which rent my soul,—when, if this solid Earth
Had quench’d, and let out the central fire,
Before whose all-involving flames wide Heaven
Shall shrivel like a scroll, and be consumed,
The universal wreck had been to me
Relief and comfort;—even then this Moor
Turn’d on me his libidinous eyes, and bade
His men reserve me safely for an hour
Of daliance,—me!—me in my agonies!
But when I found for what this miscreant child
Of Hell had snatch’d me from the butchery,
The very horror of that monstrous thought
Saved me from madness; I was calm at once, —
Yet comforted and reconciled to life;
Hatred became to me the life of life,
Its purpose and its power.

The glutted Moors
At length broke up. This hell-dog turn’d aside
Toward his home; we travell’d fast and far,
Till by a forest edge at eve he pitched
His tents. I wash’d and ate at his command,
Forcing revolted nature; I compos’d
My garments, and bound up my scatter’d hair;
And when he took my hand, and to his couch
Would fain have drawn me, gently I retired
From that abominable touch, and said,
Forbear to-night; I pray thee, for this day
A widow, as thou seest me, am I made;
Therefore, according to our law, must watch
And pray to-night. The loathsome villain paused
Ere he assented, then laid down to rest;
While, at the door of the pavilion, I
Knelt on the ground, and bowed my face to earth;
But when the neighboring tents had ceased their stir,
The fires were out, and all were fast asleep,
Then I arose. The blessed Moon from Heaven
Lent me her holy light. I did not pray
For strength, for strength was given me as I drew
The cimeter, and standing o'er his couch,
Raised it in both my hands with steady aim,
And smote his neck. Upward, as from a spring
When newly open'd by the husbandman,
The villain's life-blood spouted. Twice I struck,
So making vengeance sure; then, praising God,
Retired amid the wood, and measured back
My patient way to Aura, to perform
This duty which thou seest
As thus she spake, Roderick, intently listening, had forgot
His crown, his kingdom, his calamities,
His crimes,—so like a spell upon the Goth
Her powerful words prevail'd. With open lips,
And eager ear, and eyes which, while they watch'd
Her features, caught the spirit that she breathed,
Mute and enwrapt he stood, and motionless;
The vision rose before him; and that shout,
Which, like a thunder-peal, victorious Spain
Sent through the welkin, rung within his soul
Its deep, prophetic echoes. On his brow
The pride and power of former majesty
Dawn'd once again, but changed and purified;
Duty and high heroic purposes
Now hallow'd it, and, as with inward light,
Illumed his meagre countenance austere.

Awhile in silence Adosinda stood,
Reading his alter'd visage and the thoughts
Which thus transfigured him. Ay, she exclaim'd,
My tale hath moved thee! it might move the dead,
Quicken captivity's dead soul, and rouse
This prostrate country from her mortal trance:
Therefore I live to tell it; and for this
Hath the Lord God Almighty given to me
A spirit not mine own and strength from Heaven;
Dealing with me as in the days of old
With that Bethulian Matron when she saved
His people from the spoiler. What remains
But that the life which he hath thus preserved
I consecrate to him? Not well'd and vow'd
To pass my days in holiness and peace;
Nor yet between sepulchral walls immersed,
Alive to penitence alone; my rule
He hath himself prescribed, and hath infused
A passion in this woman's breast, wherein
All passions and all virtues are combined;
Love, hatred, joy, and anguish, and despair,
And hope, and natural pity, and faith,

Make up the mighty feeling. Call it not
Revenge! thus sanctified, and thus sublimed,
'Tis duty, 'tis devotion. Like the grace
Of God, it came and saved me; and in it
Spain must have her salvation. In thy hands
Here, on the grave of all my family,
I make my vow.

She said, and, kneeling down,
Placed within Roderick's palms her folded hands.
This life, she cried, I dedicate to God,
Therewith to do him service in the way
Which he hath shown. To rouse the land against
This impious, this intolerable yoke,—
To offer up the invader's hateful blood,—
This shall be my employ, my rule and rite,
Observances and sacrifice of faith;
For this I hold the life which he hath given,
A sacred trust; for this, when it shall suit
His service, joyfully will I lay it down.
So deal with me as I fulfil the pledge,
O Lord my God, my Savior, and my Judge.

Then rising from the earth, she spread her arms,
And looking round with sweeping eyes exclaim'd,
Aura, and Spain, and Heaven receive the vow!

A YEAR.

THE MONASTERY OF ST. FELIX.

Tutus long had Roderick heard her powerful words
In silence, awed before her; but his heart
Was fill'd the while with swelling sympathy,
And now with impulse not to be restrain'd
The feeling overpower'd him. Hear me too,
Aura, and Spain, and Heaven! he cried; and thou
Who raisest thus above mortality,
Sufferer and patriot, saint and heroine,
The servant and the chosen of the Lord,—
For surely such thou art,—receive in me
The first-fruits of thy calling. Kneeling then,
And placing, as he spake, his hand in hers,
As thou hast sworn, the royal Goth pursued,
Even so I swear; my soul hath found at length
Her rest and refuge; in the invader's blood
She must efface her stains of mortal sin,
And in redeeming this lost land, work out
Redemption for herself. Herein I place
My penance for the past, my hope to come,
My faith and my good works; here offer up
All thoughts and passions of mine inmost heart,
My days and nights,—this flesh, this blood, this life,

Yea, this whole being, do I here devote
For Spain. Receive the vow, all Saints in Heaven,
And prosper good end! — Clap now your wings,
The Goth with louder utterance, as he rose,
Exclaim'd,—clap now your wings exultingly,
Ye ravenous fowl of Heaven; and in your dens
Set up, ye wolves of Spain, a yell of joy;
For, lo! a nation hath this day been sworn
To furnish forth your banquet; for a strife
Hath been commenced, the which, from this day forth,
Permits no breathing-time, and knows no end
Till in this land the last invader bow
His neck beneath the exterminating sword.

Said I not rightly? Adosinda cried;
The will which goads me on is not mine own;
'Tis from on high,—yea, verily of Heaven!
But who art thou who hast profess'd with me,
My first sworn brother in the appointed rule?
Tell me thy name.

Ask any thing but that!
The fallen King replied. My name was lost
When from the Gods the sceptre pass'd away.
The nation will arise regenerate;
Strong in her second youth, and beautiful,
And like a spirit which hath shaken off
The clog of dull mortality, shall Spain
Arise in glory. But for my good name
No resurrection is appointed here.
Let it be blotted out on earth; in Heaven
There shall be written with it penitence,
And grace, and saving faith, and such good deeds
Wrought in atonement as my soul this day
Hath sworn to offer up.
Then be thy name,
She answer'd, Maccabeus, from this day forth;
For this day art thou born again; and like
Those brethren of old times, whose holy names
Live in the memory of all noble hearts
For love and admiration, ever young,—
So for our native country, for her hearts
And altars, for her cradles and her graves,
Hast thou thyself devoted. Let us now
Each to our work,—among the neighboring hills,
I to the vassals of my father's house;
Thou to Visonia. Tell the Abbot there
What thou hast seen at Auria; and with him
Take counsel who, of all our Baroneage,
Is worthiest to lead on the sons of Spain,
And wear upon his brow the Spanish crown.
Now, brother, fare thee well! we part in hope,
And we shall meet again, be sure, in joy.

So saying, Adosinda left the King
Alone amid the ruins. There he stood,
As when Elisha, on the farther bank
Of Jordan, saw that elder prophet mont
The fiery chariot, and the steeds of fire,
Trampling the whirlwind, bear him up the sky:
Thus gazing after her did Roderick stand;
And as the immortal Tishbite left behind
His mantle and prophetic power, even so
Had her inspiring presence left infused
The spirit which she breathed. Gazing he stood,
As at a heavenly visitation there
Vouchsafed in mercy to himself and Spain;
And when the heroic mourner from his sight
Had pass'd away, still reverential awe
Held him suspended there and motionless.
Then turning from the ghastly scene of death
Up murmuring Lona, he began toward
The holy Hierzo his obedient way. [vale
Sil's ample stream he cross'd, where through the

Of Ornas, from that sacred land it bears
The whole collected waters; northward then,
Skirting the heights of Aguiar, he reach'd
That consecrate pile amid the wild,
Which sainted Fructuoso in his zeal
Rear'd to St. Felix, on Visonia's banks.

In commune with a priest of age mature,
Whose thoughtful visage and majestic mien
Bespeak authority and weight of care,
Odoar, the venerable Abbot, sat,
When ushering Roderick in, the Porter said,
A stranger came from Auria, and required
His private ear. From Auria? said the old man;
Commit thou from Auria, brother? I can spare
Thy painful errand then,—we know the worst.

Nay, answer'd Roderick, but thou hast not heard
My tale. Where that devoted city lies
In ashes, mid the ruins and the dead
I found a woman, whom the Moors had borne
Captive away; but she, by Heaven inspired
And her good heart, with her own arm had wrought
Her own deliverance, smiling in his tent
A lustful Moorish miscreant, as of yore
By Judith's holy deed the Assyrian fell.
And that same spirit which had strengthen'd her
Work'd in her still. Four walls with patient toil
She rear'd, wherein, as in a sepulchre,
With her own hands she laid her murder'd babe,
Her husband and her parents, side by side;
And when we cover'd in this shapeless tomb,
There, on the grave of all her family,
Did this courageous mourner dedicate
All thoughts and actions of her future life
To her poor country. For she said, that Heaven,
Supporting her, in mercy had vouchsafed
A foretaste of revenge; that, like the grace
Of God, revenge had saved her; that in it
Spain must have her salvation; and henceforth
That passion, thus sublimed and sanctified,
Must be to all the loyal sons of Spain
The pole-star of their faith, their rule and rite,
Observances and worthiest sacrifice.
I took the vow, unworthy as I am,
Her first sworn follower in the appointed rule;
And then we parted; she among the hills
To reunite the vassals of her father's house;
I at her bidding lutherward, to ask
Thy counsel, who, of our old Baronage,
Shall place upon his brow the Spanish crown.

The Lady Adosinda? Odoar cried.
Roderick made answer, So she call'd herself.

Oh, none but she! exclaim'd the good old man,
Clasping his hands, which trembled as he spoke,
In act of pious passion raised to Heaven,—
Oh, none but Adosinda!—none but she,—
None but that noble heart, which was the heart
Of Auria while it stood, its life and strength,
More than her father's presence, or the arm
Of her brave husband, valiant as he was.—
Hers was the spirit which inspired old age,
Ambitious boyhood, girls in timid youth,
IV. RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHES.

And virgins in the beauty of their spring,
And youthful mothers, doting, like herself,
With ever-anxious love. She breathed through all
That zeal and that devoted faithfulness.
Which to the invader's threats and promises
Turn'd a deaf ear alike; which in the head
And flood of prosperous fortune check'd his

Repe'd him from the walls, and when at length
His overpowering numbers forced their way,
Even in that uttermost extremity
Unyielding, still from street to street, from house
To house, from floor to floor, maintain'd the fight;
Till by their altars falling, in their doors,
And on their household hearths, and by their beds
And cradles, and their fathers' sepulchres,
This noble army, gloriously revenged,
Embraced their martyrdom. Heroic souls!
Well have ye done, and rightly discharged
Your arduous part! Your service is perform'd,
Your earthly warfare done! Ye have put on
The purple robe of everlasting peace!
Ye have received your crown! Ye bear the palm
Before the throne of Grace!

With that he paused,
Checking the strong emotions of his soul.
Then, with a solemn tone, addressing him,
Who shared his secret thoughts, Thou knowest,
he said,
O Urban, that they have not fallen in vain;
For by this virtuous sacrifice they shunn'd
Alcianum's thousands; and his broken force,
Exhausted by their dear-bought victory,
Turn'd back from Auria, leaving us to breathe
Among our mountains yet. We lack not here
Good hearts, nor valiant hands. What walls, or

Or battlements are like these fastnesses,
These rocks, and glens, and everlasting hills?
Give but that Aurian spirit, and the Moors
Will spend their force as idly on these holds
As round the rocky girdle of the land
The wild Cantabrian billows waste their rage.
Give but that spirit! — Heaven hath given it us,
If Adosinda thus, as from the dead,
Be granted to our prayers!

And who art thou,
Said Urban, who hast taken on thyself
This rule of warlike faith? Thy countenance
And those poor weeds bespeak a life ere this Devoted to austere observances.

Roderick replied, I am a sinful man,
One who in solitude hath long deplored
A life misspent; but never bound by vows,
Till Adosinda taught me where to find
Comfort, and how to work forgiveness out.
When that exalted woman took my vow,
She call'd me Maccabee; from this day forth
Be that my earthly name. But tell me now,
Whom shall we rouse to take upon his head
The crown of Spain? Where are the Gothic

Chiefs?
Sacaru, Theudemir, Athanagild,
All who survived that eight-days' obstinate fight,

When e'ggs'd with bodies, Chrysus scarce could force
Its bloody stream along? Witiza's sons,
Bad offspring of a stock accurs'd, I know,
Have put the furban on their reverent heads,
Where are your own Cantabrian Lords? I ween,
Eudon, and Pedro, and Pelayo now
Have ceased their rivalry. If Pelayo live,
His were the worthy heart and rightful hand
To wield the sceptre and the sword of Spain.

Odoar and Urban eyed him while he spake,
As if they wonder'd whose the tongue might be Familiar thus with Chiefs and thoughts of state.
They scan'd his countenance, but not a trace
Betray'd the Royal Goth: sunk was that eye
Of sovereignty, and on the eunacian cheek
Had penitence and anguish deeply drawn
Their furrows premature, — forestalling time,
And shedding upon thirty's brow more snows
Than three score winters in their natural course
Might else have sprinkleed there. It seems indeed
That thou hast pass'd thy days in solitude,
Replied the Abbot, or thou wouldst not ask
Of things so long gone by. Athanagild
And Thendemir have taken on their necks
The yoke. Sacaru play'd a nobler part.
Long within Merida did he withstand
The invader's hot assault; and when at length,
Hopeless of all relief, he yielded up
The gates, disdaining in his fathers' land
To breathe the air of bondage, with a few
Found faithful till the last, indignantly
Did he toward the ocean bend his way,
And shacking from his feet the dust of Spain,
Took ship, and hoisted sail through seas unknown:
To seek for freedom. Our Cantabrian Chiefs
All have submitted, but the wary Moor
Timidly not all alone. At his own Court
He holds Pelayo, as suspecting most
That calm and manly spirit; Pedro's son
There too is held as hostage, and secures
His father's faith; Count Eudon is despised,
And so lives unmolested. When he pays
His tribute, an uncomfortable thought
May then perhaps disturb him; — or more like
He meditates how profitable twere
To be a Moor; and if apostasy
Were all, and to be unbaptized might serve,—
But I waste breath upon a wretch like this;
Pelayo is the only hope of Spain,
Only Pelayo.

If, as we believe,
Said Urban then, the hand of Heaven is here,
And dreadful though they be, yet for wise end
Of good, these visitations do its work;
And dimly as our mortal sight may scan
The future, yet methinks my soul desires
How in Pelayo should the purposes
Of Heaven be best accomplish'd. All too long,
Here in their own inheritance, the sons
Of Spain have groan'd beneath a foreign yoke,
Punic and Roman, Keit, and Goth, and Greek:
This latter tempest comes to sweep away
All proud distinctions which conningling blood
And time's long course have fail'd to efface; and now
Perchance it is the will of Fate to rear
Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne,
Restoring in Pelayo's native line
The sceptre to the Spaniard.

Go thou, then,
And seek Pelayo at the Conqueror's Court.
Tell him the mountaineers are unsubdued;
The precious time they needed hath been gain'd
By Aura's sacrifice, and all they ask
Is him to guide them on. In Odoar's name
And Urban's, tell him that the hour is come.

Then, pausing for a moment, he pursued:—
The rule which thou hast taken on thyself
Toledo ratifies: 'tis meet for Spain,
And as the will divine, to be received,
Observed, and spread abroad. Come hither thou,
Who for thyself last chosen the good part:
Let me lay hands on thee, and consecrate
Thy life unto the Lord.

Me! Roderick cried;
Me! sinner that I am:—and while he spake
His with'er'd cheek grew paler, and his limbs
Shook. As thou goest among the infidels,
Pursued the Primate, many thou wilt find
Fallen from the faith; by weakness some betray'd,
Some led astray by baser hope of gain,
And haply, too, by ill example led
Of those in whom they trusted. Yet have these
Their lonely hours, when sorrow, or the touch
Of sickness, and that awful power divine
Which hath its dwelling in the heart of man,
Life of his soul, his monitor and judge,
Move them with silent impulse; but they look
For help, and finding none to succor them,
The irrevocable moment passeth by.
Therefore, my brother, in the name of Christ
Thus I lay hands on thee, that in His name
Thou with His gracious promises mayst raise
The fallen, and comfort those that are in need,
And bring salvation to the penitent.

Now, brother, go thy way: the peace of God
Be with thee, and his blessing prosper us!

And light discourse: the talk which now went round
Was of the grief that press'd on every heart;
Of Spain subdued; the sceptre of the Goths
Broken; their nation and their name effaced;
Slaughter and mourning, which had left no house
Unvisited; and shame, which set its mark
On every Spaniard's face. One who had seen
His sons fall bravely at his side, bewail'd
The unhappy chance which, rescuing him from death,
Left him the last of all his family;
Yet he rejoiced to think that none who drew
Their blood from him remain'd to wear the yoke,
Be at the miserable's beck, and propagate
A breed of slaves to serve them. Here sat one
Who told of fair possessions lost, and babes
To goodly fortunes born, of all bereft.
Another for a virgin daughter mourn'd,
The weal barbarian's spoil. A fourth had seen
His only child forsake him in his age,
And for a Moor renounce her hope in Christ.
His was the heaviest grief of all, he said;
And clinching, as he spake, his hoary locks,
He cursed King Roderick's soul.

Oh, curse him not! Roderick exclaim'd, all shuddering as he spake.
Oh, for the love of Jesus, curse him not!
Sufficient is the dreadful load of guilt
That lies upon his miserable soul!
O brother, do not curse that sinful soul,
Which Jesus suffer'd on the cross to save!

But then an old man, who had sat thus long
A silent listener, from his seat arose,
And moving round to Roderick, took his hand;
Christ bless thee, brother, for that Christian speech,
He said; and shame on me that any tongue
Reader than mine was found to utter it!
His own emotion fill'd him while he spake,
So that he did not feel how Roderick's hand
Shook like a palsied limb; and none could see
How, at his well-known voice, the countenance
Of that poor traveller suddenly was changed,
And sunk with deadlier paleness; for the flame
Was spent, and from behind him, on the wall
High hung, the lamp with fleecy glimmering play'd.

Oh, it is ever thus! the old man pursued;
The crimes and woes of universal Spain
Are charged on him; and curses, which should aim
At living heads, pursue beyond the grave
His poor unhappy soul! As if his sin
Had wrought the fall of our old monarchy!
As if the Mussulmen, in their career,
Would ne'er have overleap'd the gulf which parts
Iberia from the Mauritannian shore,
If Julian had not beckon'd them!—Alas!
The evils which drew on our overthrow,
Would soon by other means have wrought their end,
Though Julian's daughter should have lived and died
A virgin vow'd and veil'd.

Touch not on that,
Shrinking with inward shiverings at the thought,
The penitent exclain'd—Oh, if thou lovest
The soul of Roderick, touch not on that deed!
God, in his mercy, may forgive it him,
But human tongue must never speak his name
Without reproach and utter infancy,
For that abhorred act. Even thou—But here
Siverian taking up the word, brake off,
Unwittingly, the ineptious speech. Even I,
Quoth he, who nursed in his father's hall,—
Even I can only for that deed of shame
Offer in agony my secret prayers.
But Spain hath witness'd other crimes as foul:
Have we not seen Pavila's shameless wife,
Throned in Witiza's ivory car, parade
Our towns with regal pageantry, and bid
The murderous tyrant in her husband's blood
Dip his adulterous hand? Did we not see
Pelayo, by that bloody king's pursuit,
And that unnatural mother, from the land
With open outcry, like an outlaw'd thief,
Hunted? And saw ye not Theodofred,
As through the streets I guided his dark steps,
Roll mournfully toward the noon-day sun
His blank and senseless eyeballs? Spain saw this,
And suffered it!—I seek not to excuse
The sin of Roderick. Jesu, who beholds
The burning tears I shed in solitude,
Knows how I plead for him in midnight prayer.
But if, when he victoriously revenged
The wrongs of Chindsuntho's house, his sword
Had not for mercy turn'd aside its edge,
Oh what a day of glory had there been Upon the banks of Chrysus! Curse not him,
Who in that fatal conflict to the last
So valiantly maintain'd his country's cause;
But if your sorrow needs must have its vent
In curses, let your imprecations strike
The caiffls, who, when Roderick's horned helm
Rose eminent amid the thickest fight,
Betraying him who spared and trusted them,
Forsook their King, their Country, and their God,
And gave the Moor his conquest.
Ay! they said,
These were Witiza's hateful progeny;
And in an evil hour the unhappy King
Had spared the viperous brood. With that they talk'd
How Sinibert and Ebba through the land
Guided the foe; and Orpas, who had cast
The mitre from his renegado brow,
Went with the armies of the infidels;
And how in Hispalis, even where his hands
Had minister'd so oft the bread of life,
The circumcised apostate did not shame
To show in open day his turban'd head.
The Queen too, Egilona, one exclain'd;
Was she not married to the enemy,
The Moor, the Misbeliever? What a heart
Were hers, that she could pride and plume herself
To rank among his herd of concubines,
[say
Having been what she had been! And who could
How far domestic wrongs and discontent
Had wrought upon the King?—Hereat the old man,
Raising beneath the knit and curly brow
His mournful eyes, replied, This I can tell,
That that unquiet spirit and uncleast,
Though Roderick never told his sorrows, drove
Rusilla from the palace of her son.
She could not bear to see his generous mind
Wither beneath the unwholesome influence,
And cankering at the core. And I know well,
That oft, when she deplored his barren bed,
The thought of Egilona's qualities
Came like a bitter medicine for her grief,
And to the extinction of her husband's line,
Sad consolation, reconciled her heart.

But Roderick, while they communed thus, had ceased
To hear, such painfulest anxiety
The sight of that old, venerable man
Awoke. A sickening fear came over him:
The hope which led him from his hermitage
Now seem'd forever gone; for well he knew
Nothing but death could break the ties which bound
That faithful servant to his father's house.
She then for whose forgiveness he had yearn'd,
Who in her blessing would have given and found
The peace of Heaven,—she then was to the grave
Gone down disconsolate at last; in this,
Of all the woes of her unhappy life
Unhappiest, that she did not live to see
God had vouchsafed repentance to her child.
But then a hope arose that yet she lived;
The weighty cause which led Siverian here
Might draw him from her side; better to know
The worst than fear it. And with that he bent
Over the ambers, and with head half raised
Aslant, and shadow'd by his hand, he said,
Where is King Roderick's mother? lives she still?

God hath upheld her, the old man reply'd;
She bears this last and heaviest of her griefs,
Not as she bore her husband's wrongs, when hope
And her indignant heart supported her:
But patiently, like one who finds from Heaven
A comfort which the world can neither give
Nor take away. —Roderick inquired no more;
He breathed a silent prayer in gratitude,
Then wrapt his cloak around him, and lay down
Where he might weep unseen.

When morning came,
Earliest of all the travellers he went forth,
And linger'd for Siverian by the way,
Beside a fountain, where the constant fall
Of water its perpetual gurgling made,
To the wayfaring or the musing man
Sweetest of all sweet sounds. The Christian hand,
Whose general charity for man and beast
Built it in better times, had with a cross
Of well-hewn stone crested the pious work,
Which now the misbelievers had cast down,
And broken in the dust it lay defiled.
Roderick beheld it lying at his feet,
And gathering reverently the fragments up,
Placed them within the cistern, and restored
With careful collocation its dear form,—
So might the waters, like a crystal shrine,
Preserve it from pollution. Kneeling then,
O'er the memorial of redeeming love
He bent, and mingled with the fount his tears,
And pour'd his spirit to the Crucified.

A Moor came by, and seeing him, exclaimed, 'Ah, Kaffer! worshipper of wood and stone,
God's curse confound thee! And as Roderick turn'd
His face, the miscreant spurn'd him with his foot
Between the eyes. The indignant King arose,
And fell'd him to the ground. But then the Moor
Drew forth his dagger, rising as he cried,
What! darest thou, thou infidel and slave,
Strike a believer? and he smil'd a blow [arm,
At Roderick's breast. But Roderick caught his
And closed, and wrench'd the dagger from his hold,—
Such timely strength did those emaciate limbs
From indignation draw,—and in his neck
With mortal stroke he drove the avenging steel
Hilt deep. Then, as the thirsty sand drank in
The expiring miscreant's blood, he look'd around
In sudden apprehension, lest the Moors
Had seen them; but Siverian was in sight,
The only traveller, and he smote his mule,
And lasten'd up. Ah, brother! said the old man,
Thine is a spirit of the ancient mould!
And would to God a thousand men like thee
Had fought at Roderick's side on that last day
When treason overpower'd him! Now, alas!
A manly Gothic heart doth ill accord
With these unhappy times. Come, let us hide
This carrion, while the favoring hour permits.

So saying, he alighted. Soon they scoop'd
Amid loose-lying sand a hasty grave,
And level'd over it the easy soil.
Father, said Roderick, as they journey'd on,
Let this thing be a seal and sacrament
Of truth between us. Wherefore should there be Concealment between two right Gothic hearts
In evil days like ours? What thou hast seen
Is but the first fruit of the sacrifice,
Which on this injured and polluted soil,
As on a bloody altar, I have sworn
To offer to insulted Heaven for Spain,
Her vengeance and her expiation. This
Was but a hasty act, by sudden wrong
Provoked: but I am bound for Cordoba,
On weighty mission from Visonia sent,
To breathe into Pelayo's ear a voice
Of spirit-stirring power, which like the trump
Of the Archangel, shall awake dead Spain.
The northern mountaineers are unsubdued;
They call upon Pelayo for their chief;
Odoar and Urban tell him that the hour is come. Thou, too, I ween, old man, art charged,
With no light errand, or thou wouldst not now
Have left the ruins of thy master's house.

Who art thou? cried Siverian, as he search'd
The wan and wither'd features of the King.
Thy face is of a stranger; but thy voice
Disturbs me like a dream.

Roderick replied,
Thou seest me as I am,—a stranger; one
Whose fortunes in the general wreck were lost,
His name and lineage utterly extinct,
Himself in mercy spared, surviving all;—
In mercy, that the bitter cup might heal
A soul diseased. Now, having cast the slough
Of old offences, thou beholdest me
A man new-born; in second baptism named,
Like those who in Judea bravely raised
Against the Heathen's impious tyranny
The banner of Jehovah, Maccabee;
So call me. In that name hath Urban laid
His consecrating hands upon my head;
And in that name have I myself for Spain
Devoted. Tell me now why thou art sent
To Cordoba; for sure thou goest not
An idle gazer to the Conqueror's court.

Thou judgest well, the old man replied. I, too,
Seek the Cantabrian Prince, the hope of Spain,
With other tidings charged, for other end
Designed, yet such as well may work with thine.
My noble mistress sends me to avert
The shame that threatens his house. The renegade
Nunian, he who, for the infidels,
Oppresses Gegio, insolently woos
His sister. Moulded in a wicked womb,
The unworthy Guilda hath inherited
Her mother's leprous taint; and, willingly,
She to the circumcised and upstart slave,
Disdaining all admonishment, gives ear.
The Lady Gaudiosa sees in this,
With the quick foresight of maternal care,
The impending danger to her husband's house,
Knowing his generous spirit ne'er will brook
The base alliance. Guilda lewdly sets
His will at nought; but that vile renegade,
From hatred, and from avarice, and from fear,
Will seek the extinction of Pelayo's line.
This, too, my venerable mistress se's;
Wherefore these valiant and high-minded dames
Send me to Cordoba; that, if the Prince
Cannot, by timely interdiction, stop
The irrecoverable act of infamy,
He may, at least, to his own safety look,
Being timely warn'd.

Thy mistress sojourns then
With Gaudiosa, in Pelayo's hall?

With Siverian, in Pelayo's hall?

Said Roderick. 'Tis her natural home, rejo'in'd
Siverian: Chindasuintio's royal race
Have ever shared one lot of woe or woe;
And she who hath beheld her own fair shoot,
The goodly summit of that ancient tree,
Struck by Heaven's bolt, seeks shelter now beneath
The only branch of its majestic stem
That still survives the storm. Thus they pursued
Their journey, each from other gathering store
For thought, with many a silent interval
Of mournful meditation, till they saw
The temples and the towers of Cordoba
Shining majestic in the light of eve.

Before them, Betsol ride his glittering stream,
In many a silvery winding traced afar
Amid the ample plain. Behind the walls
And stately piles, which crown’d its margin, rich
With olives, and with sunny slope of vines,
And many a lovely hamlet interspersed,
Whose citron bower’s were once the abode of peace,
Height above height, reeding hills were seen
Imbued with evening hues; and over all
The summits of the dark sierra rose,
Lifting their heads amid the silent sky.
The traveller who, with a heart at ease,
Had seen the goodly vision, would have loved
To linger, seeking with insatiate sight
To treasure up its image, deep impress’d,
A joy for years to come. O Cordoba,
Exclaim’d the old man, how princely are thy towers,
How fair thy vales, thy hills how beautiful!
The sun who sheds on thee his parting smiles
Sees not in all his wide career a scene
Lovelier, nor more exuberantly blest
By bounteous earth and heaven. The very gales
Of Eden wait not from the immortal bower’s
Odors to sense more exquisite, than these
Which, breathing from thy groves and gardens, now
Recall in me such thoughts of bitterness.
The time has been when happy was their lot
Who had their birthright here; but happy now
Are they who to thy bosom are gone home,
Because they feel not in their graves the feet
That trample upon Spain. ‘Tis well that age
Hath made me like a child, that I can weep:
My heart would else have broken, overcharged,
And I, false servant, should lie down to rest
Before my work is done.

Hard by their path,
A little way without the walls, there stood
An edifice, whereeto, as by a spell,
Siverian’s heart was drawn. Brother, quoth he,
‘Tis like the urgency of our return
Will brook of no retardment; and this spot
It were a sin if I should pass, and leave
Unvisited. Beseech you turn with me,
The while I offer up one duteous prayer.

Roderick made no reply. He had not dared
To turn his face toward those walls; but now
He follow’d where the old man led the way.
Lord! in his heart the silent sufferer said,
Forgive my feeble soul, which would have shrunk
From this,—for what am I that I should put
The bitter cup aside? O let my shame
And anguish be accepted in thy sight?

VI.

RODERICK IN TIMES PAST.

The mansion whitherward they went, was one
Which in his youth Theodored had built:
Thither had he brought home, in happy hour,
His blooming bride; there fondled on his knee
The lovely boy she bore him. Close beside,

A temple to that Saint he rear’d, who first,
As old tradition tells, proclaims’d to Spain
The gospel-tidings; and in health and youth,
There mindful of mortality, he saw
His sepulchre prepared. Witiza took
For his adulterous kinsman and himself
The stately pile: but to that sepulchre,
When from captivity and darkness death
Enlarged him, was Theodred consigned;
For that unhappy woman, wasting then
Beneath a mortal malady, at heart
Was smitten, and the Tyrant at her prayer
This poor and tardy restitution made.
Soon the repentant sinner follow’d him;
And calling on Pelayo ere she died,
For his own wrongs, and for his father’s death,
Implored forgiveness of her absent child,—
If it were possible he could forgive
Crimes black as hers, she said. And by the pangs
Of her remorse,—by her last agonies,—
The unutterable horrors of her death,—
And by the blood of Jesus on the cross
For sinners given, did she beseech his prayers
In aid of her most miserable soul.
Thus mingling sad shrieks with hopeless vows,
And uttering frantically Pelayo’s name,
And crying out for mercy in despair,
Here had she made her dreadful end, and here
Her wretched body was deposited.
That presence seem’d to desecrate the place:
Thenceforth the usurper shunn’d it with the heart
Of conscious guilt; nor could Rusila bear
These groves and bower’s, which, like funereal shades,
Oppress’d her with their monumental forms:
One day of bitter and severe delight,
When Roderick came for vengeance, she endured,
And then forever left her bridal halls.

Oh, when I last beheld you princely pile,
Exclaim’d Siverian, with what other thoughts
Full, and elate of spirit, did I pass
Its joyous gates! The weedery which through
The interstices of those neglected courts
Uncheck’d had flourish’d long, and seeded there,
Was trampled then and bruised beneath the feet
Of thronging crowds. Here, drawn in fair array,
The faithful vassals of my master’s house,
Their javelins sparkling to the morning sun,
Spread their triumphant banners; high-plumed helms
Rose o’er the martial ranks, and prancing steeds
Made answer to the trumpet’s stirring voice;
While yonder towers shook the dull silence off
Which long to their deserted walls had clung,
And with redoubling echoes swell’d the shout
That hail’d victorious Roderick. Louder rose
The acclamation, when the dust was seen
Rising beneath his chariot-wheels far off;
But nearer as the youthful hero came,
All sounds of all the multitude were hush’d,
And from the thousands and ten thousands here,
Whom Cordoba and Hispalis sent forth,—
Yea, whom all Betica, all Spain pour’d out
To greet his triumph,—not a whisper rose
To Heaven, such awe and reverence master'd them;
Such expectation held them motionless.
Conqueror and King he came; but with no joy
Of conquest, and no pride of sovereignty
That day display'd; for at his father's grave
Did Roderick come to offer up his vow
Of vengeance well perform'd. Three coal-black steeds
Drew on his ivory charriot: by his side,
Still wrapt in mourning for the long-deceased,
Rusilla sat; a deeper paleness blanch'd
Her fad'd countenance, but in her eye
The light of her majestic nature shone.
Bound, and expecting at their hands the death
So well deserved, Witiza follow'd them;
Aghast and trembling, first he gazed around,
Wildly from side to side; then from the face
Of universal execration shrunk,
Hanging his wretched head abased; and poor
Of spirit, with unnanys tears deplored
His fortune, not his crimes. With bolder front,
Confiding in his priestly character,
Came Orpas next; and then the spurious race
Whom in unhappy hour Favilla's wife
Brought forth for Spain. O mercy ill bestow'd,
When Roderick, in compassion for their youth,
And for Pelayo's sake, forbore to crush
The brood of vipers!
Err perchance he might,
Replied the Goth, suppressing, as he spake,
All outward signs of pain, though every word
Went like a dagger to his bleeding heart;—
But sure, I ween, that error is not placed
Among his sins. Old man, thou mayst regret
The mercy ill deserved, and worse return'd,
But not for this wouldst thou reproach the King!
Reproach him? cried Siverian:— I reproach
My child,— my noble boy,— whom every tongue
Bless'd at that hour, — whose love fill'd every heart
With joy, and every eye with joyful tears!
My brave, my beautiful, my generous boy!
Brave, beautiful, and generous as he was,
Never so brave, so beautiful, so great
As then,— not even on that glorious day,
When on the field of victory, elevate
Amid the thousands who acclaim'd him King,
Firm on the shield above their heads upraised,
Erect he stood, and waved his bloody sword—
Why dost thou shake thy head as if in doubt?
I do not dream, nor fable! Ten short years
Have scarcely past away, since all within
The Pyrenean hills, and the three seas
Which girded Spain, echoed in one response
The acclamation from that field of light—
Or doth aught all thee, that thy body quakes
And shudders thus? — 'Tis but a chill, replied
The King, in passing from the open air
Under the shadow of this thick-set grove.

Oh! if this scene awake in thee such thoughts
As swell my bosom here, the old man pursued,
Sunshine, or shade, and all things from without,
Would be alike indifferent. Gracious God,
Only but ten short years,— and all so changed!
Ten little years since in yon court he check'd
His fiery steeds. The steeds obey'd his hand,
The whirling wheels stood still, and when he leapt
Upon the pavement, the whole people heard,
In their deep silence, open-ear'd, the sound.
With slower movement from the ivory seat
Rusilla rose, her arm, as down she stepp'd,
Extended to her son's supporting hand;
Not for default of firm or agile strength,
But that the feeling of that solemn hour
Subdued her then, and tears bedimm'd her sight.
Howbeit when to her husband's grave she came,
On the sepulchral stone she bow'd her head
Awhile; then rose collectedly, and fix'd
Upon the scene her calm and steady eye.
Roderick,— oh, when did valor wear a form
So beautiful, so noble, so august?
Or vengeance, when did it put on before
A character so awful, so divine?
Roderick stood up, and reaching to the tomb
His hands, my hero cried, Theodofred:
Father! I stand before thee once again,
According to thy prayer, when kneeling down
Between thy knees I took my last farewell;
And vow'd by all thy sufferings, all thy wrongs,
And by my mother's days and nights of woe,
Her silent anguish, and the grief which then
Even from thee she did not seek to hide,
That, if our cruel parting should avail
To save me from the Tyrant's jealous guilt,
Surely should my avenging sword suffice
Whate'er he omen'd. Oh that time, I cried,
Would give the strength of mankind to this arm,
Already would it find a manly heart
To guide it to its purpose! And I swore
Never again to see my father's face,
Nor ask my mother's blessing, till I brought,
Dead or in chains, the Tyrant to thy feet.
Boy as I was, before all Saints in Heaven,
And highest God, whose justice slumbereth not,
I made the vow. According to thy prayer,
In all things, O my father, is that vow
Perform'd, ahs, too well! for thou didst pray,
While, looking up, I felt the burning tears
Which from thy sightless sockets stream'd, drop down,—
That to thy grave, and not thy living feet,
The oppressor might be led. Behold him there,
Father! Theodofred! no longer now
In darkness, from thy heavenly seat look down,
And see before thy grave thine enemy
In bonds, awaiting judgment at my hand!

Thus while the hero spake, Witiza stood
Listening in agony, with open mouth,
And head, half-raised, toward his sentence turn'd;
His eyelids stiffen'd and pursed up,— his eyes
Rigid, and wild, and wide; and when the King
Had ceased, amidst the silence which ensued,
The dastard's chains were heard, link against link
Clinking. At length upon his knees he fell,
And lifting up his trembling hands, outstretch'd
In supplication,—Mercy! he exclaim’d,—
Chains, dungeons, darkness,—any thing but death! —
I did not touch his life.

Roderick replied,
His hour, whenever it had come, had found
A soul prepared: he lived in peace with Heaven;
And life prolong’d for him, was bliss delay’d.
But life, in pain, and darkness, and despair,
For thee, all leprous as thou art with crimes,
Is mercy. — Take him hence, and let him see
The light of day no more!

Such Roderick was
When last I saw these courts,—his theatre
Of glory;—such when last I visited
My master’s grave! Ten years have hardly held
Their course; ten little years,—break, break, old heart—
Oh, why art thou so tough?

As thus he spake,
They reach’d the church. The door before his hand
Gave way; both blinded with their tears, they went Straight to the tomb; and there Siverian knelt,
And bow’d his face upon the sepulchre,
Weeping aloud; while Roderick, overpower’d,
And calling upon earth to cover him,
Throw himself prostrate on his father’s grave.

Thus as they lay, an awful voice, in tones
Severe, address’d them. Who are ye, it said,
That with your passion thus, and on this night,
Disturb my prayers? Starting they rose; there stood
A man before them of majestic form
And stature, clad in sackcloth, bare of foot,
Pale and in tears, with ashes on his head.

VII.

RODERICK AND PELAYO.

’Twas not in vain that on her absent son,
Pelayo’s mother, from the bed of death,
Call’d for forgiveness, and in agony
Besought his prayers; all guilty as she was,
Sure he had not been human, if that cry
Had fail’d to pierce him. When he heard the tale,
He bless’d the messenger, even while his speech
Was faltering,—while from head to foot he shook
With icy feelings from his most heart
Effused. It changed the nature of his woe,
Making the burden more endurable:
The life-long sorrow that remain’d, became
A healing and a chastening grief, and brought
His soul, in close communion, nearer Heaven.
For he had been her first-born, and the love
Which at her breast he drew, and from her smiles,
And from her voice of tenderness imbued,
Gave such unnatural horror to her crimes,
That when the thought came over him, it seem’d
As if the milk which with his infant life
Had blended, thrill’d like poison through his frame.

It was a woe beyond all reach of hope,
Till with the dreadful tale of her remorse
Faith touch’d his heart; and ever from that day
Did he for her who bore him, night and morn,
Pour out the anguish of his soul in prayer:
But chiefly as the night return’d, which heard
Her last expiring groans of penitence,
Then through the long and painful hours, before
The altar, like a penitent himself,
He kept his vigil; and when Roderick’s sword
Subdued Witiza, and the land was free,
Duly upon her grave he offer’d up
His yearly sacrifice of agony
And prayer. This was the night, and he it was
Who now before Siverian and the King
Stood up in sackcloth.

The old man, from fear
Recovering and from wonder, knew him first,
It is the Prince! he cried, and bending down,
Embraced his knees. The action and the word
Awaken’d Roderick; he shook off the load
Of struggling thoughts, which, pressing on his heart,
Held him like one entranced; yet, all untaught
To bend before the face of man, confused
Awhile he stood, forgetful of his part.
But when Siverian cried, My Lord, my Lord,
Now God be praised that I have found thee thus,
My Lord and Prince, Spain’s only hope and mine!
Then Roderick, echoing him, exclaim’d, My Lord,
And Prince, Pelayo! — and approaching near,
He bent his knee obeisant: but his head
Earthward inclined; while the old man, looking up
From his low gesture to Pelayo’s face,
Wept at beholding him for grief and joy.

Siverian! cried the chief,—of whom hath Death
Bereaved me, that thou comest to Cordoba?
Children, or wife? — or hath the merciless scythe
Of this abbott’s and jealous tyranny
Made my house desolate at one wide sweep?

They are as thou couldst wish, the old man replied,
Wert thou but lord of thine own house again,
And Spain were Spain once more. A tale of ill
I bear, but one that touches not the heart
Like what thy tears forebode. The renegade
Numaician woes thy sister, and she lends
To the vile slave, unworthy, her car:
The Lady Gaudiosa hath in vain
Warn’d her of all the evils which await
A union thus accrues’d: she sets at nought
Her faith, her lineage, and thy certain wrath.

Pelayo, hearing him, remain’d awhile
Silent; then turning to his mother’s grave,—
O thou poor dust, hast then the infectious taint
Survived thy dread remorse, that it should run
In Guiula’s veins? he cried; — I should have heard
This shameful sorrow any where but here? —
Humble thyself, proud heart; thou, gracious
Heaven, —
Be merciful! — it is the original flaw,—
And what are we? — a weak, unhappy race,
Born to our sad inheritance of sin
And death! — He smote his forehead as he spake,
And from his head the ashes fell, like snow
Shaken from some dry beech-leaves, when a bird
Lights on the bending spray. A little while
In silence, rather than in thought, he stood
Passive beneath theorrow: turning then,
And what doth Gaudiosa counsel me?
He ask'd the old man; for she hath ever been
My wise and faithful counsellor.— He replied,
The Lady Gaudiosa bade me say
She sees the danger which on every part
Beats her husband's house.— Here she had ceased;
But when my noble Mistress gave in charge,
How I should tell thee that in evil times
The bravest counsels ever are the best,
Then that high-minded Lady thus join'd: —
Whatever be my Lord's resolve, he knows
I bear a mind prepared.

Brave spirits! cried
Pelayo, worthy to remove all stain
Of weakness from their sex! I should be less
Than man, if, drawing strength where others find
Their hearts most open to assault of fear,
I quail'd at danger. Never be it said
Of Spain, that in the hour of her distress
Her women were as heroes, but her men
Perform'd the woman's part.

Roderick at that
Look'd up, and taking up the word, exclaimed; —
O Prince, in better days the pride of Spain,
And prostrate as she lies, her surest hope,
Hear now my tale. The fire which seem'd extinct
Hath risen revigorate: a living spark
From Auria's ashes, by a woman's hand
Preserved and quenched, kindles far and wide
The beacon-flame o'er all the Asturian hills.
There hath a vow been offer'd up, which binds
Us and our children's children to the work
Of holy hatred. In the name of Spain
That vow hath been pronounced, and register'd
Above, to be the bond whereby we stand
For condemnation or acceptance. Heaven
Received the irrevocable vow, and Earth
Must witness its fulfilment; Earth and Heaven
Call upon thee, Pelayo! Upon thee
The spirits of thy royal ancestors
Look down expectant; unto thee, from fields
Laid waste, and hamlets burnt, and cities sack'd,
The blood of infancy and helpless age
Cries out; thy native mountains call for thee,
Echoing from all their armed sons thy name.
And doth not thou that hot impatient goads
Thy countrymen to counsels immature.
Odoar and Urban from Visonia's banks
Send me, their sworn and trusted messenger,
To summon thee, and tell thee in their name
That now the hour is come: For sure it seems,
Thus saith the Primate, Heaven's high will to rear
Upon the soil of Spain a Spanish throne,
Restoring in thy native line, O Prince,
The sceptre to the Spaniard. Worthy son
Of that most ancient and heroic race,
Which with unwearable endurance still
Hath striven against its mightier enemies,
Roman or Carthaginian, Greek or Goth;
So often by superior arms oppress'd,
More often by superior arts beguiled;
Yet, amid all its sufferings, all the waste
Of sword and fire remorselessly employ'd,
Unconquer'd and unconquerable still: —
Son of that injured and illustrious stock,
Stand forward thou, draw forth the sword of Spain,
Restore them to their rights, too long withheld,
And place upon thy brow the Spanish crown.

When Roderick ceased, the princely Mountaineer
Gazed on the passionate orator awhile,
With eyes intently fix'd, and thoughtful brow;
Then turning to the altar, he let fall
The suckcloth robe, which late, with folded arms,
Against his heart was press'd; and stretching forth
His hands toward the crucifix, exclaimed,
My God and my Redeemer! where but here,
Before thy awful presence, in this garb,
With penitential ashes thus bewrorn,
Could I so fitly answer to the call
Of Spain, and for her sake, and in thy name,
Accept the Crown of Thorns she proffers me?

And where but here, said Roderick in his heart,
Could I so properly, with humbled knee
And willing soul, confirm my forfeiture? —
The action follow'd on that secret thought:
He knelt, and took Pelayo's hand, and cried,
First of the Spaniards, let me with this kiss
Do homage to thee here, my Lord and King: —
With voice unchange'd and steady countenance
He spake; but when Siverian follow'd him,
The old man trembled as his lips pronounced
The faltering vow; and rising he exclaimed,
God grant thee, O my Prince, a better fate
Than thy poor kinman's, who in happier days
Received thy homage here! Grief choked his speech,
And, bursting into tears, he sobb'd aloud.
Tears too advow Pelayo's manly check
Roll'd silently. Roderick alone appear'd
Unmoved and calm; for now the royal Goth
Had offer'd his accepted sacrifice,
And therefore in his soul he felt that peace
Which follows painful duty well perform'd, —
Perfect and heavenly peace,— the peace of God.
Of all the Gothic baronage, the Moors
Watch'd with regard of wary policy,—
Knowing his powerful name, his noble mind,
And how in him the old Iberian blood,
Of royal and remotest ancestry,
From undisputed source flow'd undecifled;
His mother's after-guilt attainting not
The claim legitimate he derived from her,
Her first-born in her time of innocence.
He, too, of Chinadauzintho's regal line
Sole remainant now, drew after him the love
Of all true Gods, uniting in himself
Thus, by this double right, the general heart
Of Spain. For this the renegade crew,
Wretches in whom their conscious guilt and fear
Eugenator'd cruellest hatred, still advised
The extinction of Pelayo's house; but most
The apostate Prelate, in iniquity
Witiza's genuine brother as in blood,
Orpas, pursued his life. He never ceased
With busy zeal, true traitor, to infuse
His deadly rancor in the Moorish chief;
Their only danger, ever he observed,
Was from Pelayo; root his lineage out,
The Caliph's empire then would be secure,
And universal Spain, all hope of change
Being lost, receive the Prophet's conquering law.
Then did the Arch-villain urge the Moor at once
To cut off future peril, telling him
Death was a trusty keeper, and that none
E'er broke the prison of the grave. But here
Keen malice overshot its mark; the Moor,
Who from the plunder of their native land
Had bought the recreant crew that join'd his arms,
Or cheapheld with their own possessions bribed
Their sordid souls, saw through the flimsy show
Of policy wherewith they sought to cloak
Old enmity and selfish aims: he scorn'd
To let their private purposes incline
His counsels, and believing Spain subdued,
Smiled, in the pride of power and victory,
Disdainful at the thought of further strife.
Howbeit he held Pelayo at his court,
And told him that, until his countrymen
Submissively should lay their weapons down,
He from his children and paternal heart
Apart must dwell; nor hope to see again
His native mountains and their vales beloved,
Till all the Asturian and Cantabrian hills
Had bow'd before the Caliph; Cordoba
Must be his nightly prison till that hour
This night, by special favor from the Moor
Ask'd and vouchsafed he pass without the walls,
Keeping his yearly vigil: on this night,
Therefore, the princely Spaniard could not fly,
Being thus in strongest bonds by honor held;
Nor would he by his own escape expose
To stricter bondage, or be like to death,
Count Pedro's son. The ancient enmity
Of rival houses from Pelayo's heart
Had, like a thing forgotten, past away;
He pitied child and parent, separated
By the stern mandate of unfeeling power,
And almost with a father's eyes beheld
The boy, his fellow in captivity.

For young Alphonso was in truth an heir
Of nature's largest patrimony: rich
In form and feature, growing strength of limb,
A gentle heart, a soul affectionate,
A joyous spirit fill'd with generous thoughts,
And genius heightening and ennobling all;
The blossom of all manly virtues made
His boyhood beautiful. Shield, gracious Heaven,
In this ungenial season perilous,—
Thus would Pelayo sometimes breathe in prayer
The aspirations of prophetic hope,— [let Shield, gracious Heaven, the blooming tree! and
This goodly promise, for thy people's sake,
Yield its abundant fruitage. When the Prince,
With hope, and fear, and grief, and shame, disturb'd,
And sad remembrance, and the shadowy light
Of days before him, thronging as in dreams,
Whose quick succession fill'd and overpower'd
Awhile the unsuspecting faculty,
Could, in the calm of troubled thoughts subdued,
Seek in his heart for counsel, his first care
Was for the boy; how best they might evade
The Moor, and renegade's more watchful eye;
And leaving in some unsuspicious guise
The city, through what unfrequented track
Safrarist pursuit with speed their dangerous way,
Consumed in cares like these, the fleeting hours
Went by. The lamps and tapers now grew pale,
And through the eastern window slanting fell
The roseate ray of morn. Within those walls
Returning day restored no cheerful sounds
Or joyous motions of awakening life;
But in the stream of light the speckled motes,
As if in miniscule of insect play,
Float'd with many movement. Sloping down
Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam,
And rested on the sinful woman's grave
As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven.
So be it; cried Pelayo, even so!
As in a momentary interval,
When thought expelling thought, had left his mind
Open and passive to the influxes
Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there,—
So be it, Heavenly Father, even so!
Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed
Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans
Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers
Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain!
And thou, poor soul, who, from the dolorous house
Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me
To shorten and assuage thy penal term,
Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts
And other duties than this garb, this night
Enjoin, should thus have past! Our mother-land
Exacted of my heart the sacrifice;
And many a vigil must thy son perform
Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses,
And tented fields, outwatching for her sake
The starry host, and ready for the work
Of day, before the sun begins his course.

The noble Mountainier, concluding then
With silent prayer the service of the night,
Went forth. Without the porch, awaiting him,
He saw Alphonso, pacing to and fro
With patient step and eye reverted oft.
He, springing forward when he heard the door
Move on its heavy hinges, ran to him,
And welcomed him with smiles of youthful love.
I have been watching yonder moon, quoth he,
How it grew pale and paler as the sun
Scatter'd the flying shades; but woe is me,
For on the towers of Cordova the while
That balzaf crescent glitter'd in the morn,
And with its insolent triumph seem'd to mock
The moon that had found. — Last night I dream'd
That thou wert in the field in arms for Spain,
And I was at thy side: the infidels
Beset us round, but we with our good swords
Hew'd out a way. Methought I stabb'd a Moor
Who would have slain thee; but with that I woke
For joy, and wept to find it but a dream.

Thus, as he spake, a livelier glow o'erspread
His cheek, and starting tears again suffused
The brightening lustre of his eyes. The Prince
Regarded him a moment steadfastly,
As if in quick resolve; then, looking round
On every side with keen and rapid glance,
Drew him within the church. Alphonso's heart
Throb'd with a joyful boding as he mark'd
The calmness of Pelayo's countenance
Kindle with solemn thoughts, expressing now
High purposes of resolute hope. He gazed
All eagerly to hear what most he wish'd.
If, said the Prince, thy dream were verified,
And I indeed were in the field in arms
For Spain, wouldest thou be at Pelayo's side? —
If I should break these bonds, and fly to rear
Our country's banner on our native hills,
Wouldst thou, Alphonso, share my dangerous flight?
Dear boy, — and wilt thou take thy lot with me
For death, or for deliverance?

Shall I swear?
Replied the impatient boy; and laying hand
Upon the altar, on his knee he bent,
Looking towards Pelayo with such joy
Of reverential love, as if a God
Were present to receive the eager vow.
Nay, quoth Pelayo: what hast thou to do
With oaths? — Bright emanation as thou art,
It were a wrong to thy unsullied soul,
A sin to nature, were I to require
Promise or vow from thee! Enough for me
That thy heart answers to the stirring call.
Alphonso, follow thou in happy faith
Always the indwelling voice that counsels thee;
And then, let fall the issue as it may,
Shall all thy paths be in the light of Heaven,
The peace of Heaven be with thee in all hours.

How then, exclaim'd the boy, shall I discharge
The burden of this happiness, — how ease
My overflowing soul? — Oh gracious God,
Shall I behold my mother's face again, —
My father's hall, — my native hills and vales,
And hear the voices of their streams again,—
And free as I was born amid those scenes
Beloved, maintain my country's freedom there, —
Or, failing in the sacred enterprise,
Die as becomes a Spaniard? — Saying thus,
He lifted up his hands and eyes toward
The image of the Crucified, and cried,
O Thou who didst with thy most precious blood
Redeem us, Jesu: help us while we seek Earthly redemption from this yoke of shame,
And misbelief, and death.

The noble boy
Then rose, and would have knelt again to clasp
Pelayo's knees, and kiss his hand in act
Of homage; but the Prince, preventing this,
Bent over him in fatherly embrace,
And breathed a fervent blessing on his head.

IX.

FLORINDA.

There sat a woman like a suppliant,
Muffled and cloak'd, before Pelayo's gate,
Awaiting when he should return that morn.
She rose at his approach, and bow'd her head,
And, with a low and trembling utterance,
Besought him to vouchsafe her speech within
In privacy. And when they were alone,
And the doors closed, she knelt and clasp'd his knees,
Saying, A boon! a boon! This night, 0 Prince,
Hast thou kept vigil for thy mother's soul:
For her soul's sake, and for the soul of him
Whom once, in happier days, of all mankind
Thou heldest for thy chosen bosom friend,
Oh, for the sake of his poor suffering soul,
Refuse me not!

How should I dare refuse,
Being thus adjoined? he answer'd. Thy request
Is granted, woman, — be it what it may,
So it be lawful, and within the bounds
Of possible achievement: — aught unilf
Thou wouldst not with these adjurations seek.
But who then art, I marvel, that dost touch
Upon that string, and ask in Roderick's name! —
She bared her face, and, looking up, replied,
Florinda! — Shrinking then, with both her hands
She hid herself, and bow'd her head abused
Upon her knee, — as one who, if the grave
Had oped beneath her, would have thrown herself,
Even like a lover, in the arms of Death.

Pelayo stood confused: he had not seen
Count Julian's daughter since, in Roderick's court,
Glittering in beauty and in innocence,
A radiant vision, in her joy she moved;
More like a poet's dream, or form divine;
Heaven's prototype of perfect womanhood,
So lovely was the presence, — than a thing
Of earth and perishable elements.
Now had he seen her in her winding-sheet,
Less painful would that spectacle have proved;
For peace is with the dead, and piety
Bringeth a patient hope to those who mourn.
O'er the departed; but this alter'd face,
Bearing its deadly sorrow character'd,
Came to him like a ghost, which in the grave
Could find no rest. He, taking her cold hand,
Rais'd her, and would have spoken; but his tongue
Fail'd in its office, and could only speak
In under tones compassionate her name.

The voice of pity soothe'd and melted her;
And when the Prince bade her be comfort'd,
Foolering his zealous aid in whatsoever
Might please her to appoint, a feeble smile
Pass'd slowly over her pale countenance,
Like moonlight on a marble statue. Heaven
Requite thee, Prince! she answer'd. All I ask
Is but a quiet resting-place, wherein
A broken heart, in prayer and humble hope,
May wait for its deliverance. Even this
My most unhappy fate denies me here.
Griefs which are known too widely and too well
I need not now remember. I could bear
Privation of all Christian ordinances;
The woe which kills hath save'd me too, and made
A temple of this ruin'd tabernacle,
Wherein redeeming God doth not disdain.
To let his presence shine. And I could bear
To see the turban on my father's brow,—
Sorrow beyond all sorrows,—shame of shames,—
Yet to be borne, while I with tears of blood,
And throes of agony, in his behalf
Implore and wrestle with offend'd Heaven.
This I have borne resign'd: but other ills,
And worse, assail me now; the which to bear,
If to avoid be possible, would draw
Damnation down. Orpas, the perjured Priest,
The apostate Orpas, claims me for his bride.
Obdurate as he is, the wretch profanes
My sacred woe, and woe's me to his bed,
The thing I am,—the living death thou see'st!

Miscreant! exclaim'd Pelayo. Might I meet
That renegado, sword to cimeter,
In open field, never did man approach
The altar for the sacrifice in faith
More sure, than I should hew the villain down!
But how should Julian favor his demand? —
Julian, who hath so passionately loved
His child, so dreadfully revenged her wrongs!

Count Julian, she reply'd, hath none but me,
And it hath, therefore, been his heart's desire
To see his ancient line by me preserved.
This was their covenant when, in fatal hour
For Spain, and for themselves, in traitorous bond
Of union they combined. My father, stung
To madness, only thought of how to make
His vengeance sure; the Prelate, calm and cool,
When he renounced his outward faith in Christ,
Indulged at once his hatred of the King,
His inbred wickedness, and a naughty hope,
Versed as he was in treasons, to direct
The invaders by his secret policy,
And at their head, sild by Julian's power,
Reign as a Moor upon that throne to which
The priestly order else had bared his way.

The African hath conquer'd for himself;
But Orpas coveteth Count Julian's lands,
And claims to have the covenant perform'd.
Friendless, and worse than fatherless, I come
To thee for succor. Send me secretly,—
For well I know all faithful hearts must be
At thy devotion, —with a trusty guide
To guard me on the way, that I may reach
Some Christian land, where Christian rites are free,
And there discharge a vow, alas! too long,
Too fatally delay'd. Aid me in this
For Roderick's sake, Pelayo! and thy name
Shall be remember'd in my latest prayer.

Be comfort'd! the Prince reply'd; but when
He spake of comfort, twice did he break off
The idle words, feeling that earth had none
For grief so irremediable as hers.
At length he took her hand, and pressing it,
And forcing through involuntary tears
A mournful smile affectionate, he said,
Say not that thou art friendless while I live!
Thou couldst not to a reader ear have told
Thy sorrows, nor have ask'd in fitter hour
What for my country's honor, for my rank,
My faith, and sacred knighthood, I am bound
In duty to perform; which not to do
Would show me undeserving of the names
Of Goth, Prince, Christian, even of Man. This day,

Lady, prepare to take thy lot with me,
And soon as evening closes meet me here.
Duties bring blessings with them, and I hold
Thy coming for a happy anger,
In this most awful crisis of my fate.

X.

RODERICK AND FLORINDA.

With sword and breastplate, under rustic weeds
Conceal'd, at dusk Pelayo pass'd the gate,
Florinda following near, disguised alike.
Two peasants on their mules they seem'd, at eve
Returning from the town. Not distant far,
Alphonso by the appointed orange-grove,
With anxious eye and agitated heart,
Watch'd for the Prince's coming. Eagerly
At every foot-fall through the gloom he strain'd
His sight, nor did he recognize him when
The Chieftain thus accompanied drew nigh;
And when the expected signal called him on,
Doubting this female presence, half in fear
Obey'd the call. Pelayo too perceiv'd
The boy was not alone; he not for that Delay'd the summons, but lest need should be,
Laying hand upon his sword, toward him bent
In act soliciting speech, and low of voice
Inquired, if friend or foe. Forgive me, cried
Alphonso, that I did not tell thee this,
Full as I was of happiness, before.
'Tis Hoya, servant of my father's house,
Unto whose dutiful care and love, when sent
To this vile bondage, I was given in charge.
How could I look upon my father's face,
If I had in my joy deserted him,
Who was to me found faithful? — Right! replied
The Prince; and viewing him with silent joy,
Blessed the Mother, in his heart he said,
Who gave thee birth! but sure of woman-kind
Most blessed she whose hand her happy stars
Shall link with thine! and with that thought the form
Of Hermesind, his daughter, to his soul
Came in her beauty.

Soon, by devious tracks,
They turn'd aside. The favoring moon arose,
To guide them on their flight through upland paths
Remote from frequented, and dales retired,
Forest and mountain glen. Before their feet
The fire-flies, swarming in the woodland shade,
Sprung up like sparks, and twinkled round their way;
The timorous blackbird, starting at their step,
Fled from the thicket with shrill note of fear;
And far below them in the peopled dell,
When all the soothing sounds of eve had ceased,
The distant watch-dog's voice at times was heard,
Answering the nearer wolf. All through the night
Among the hills they travel'd silently;
Till when the stars were setting, at what hour
The breath of Heaven is coldest, they beheld
Within a lonely grove the expected fire,
Where Roderick and his comrade anxiously
Look'd for the appointed meeting. Halting there,
They from the burden and the bit relieved
Their patient bearers, and around the fire
Partook of needful food and grateful rest.

Bright rose the flame replenish'd; it illum'd
The cork-tree's furrow'd rind, its rifts, and swells,
And redder scars,— and where its aged boughs
O'erbower'd the travellers, cast upon the leaves
A floating, gray, unrealizing gleam.
Alphonso, light of heart, upon the heath
Lay carelessly dispers'd, in happy dreams
Of home; his faithful Hoya slept beside.
Years and fatigue to old Sivieran brought
Easy oblivion; and the Prince himself,
Yielding to weary nature's gentle will,
Forgot his cares awhile. Florinda sat
Beholding Roderick with fix'd eyes intent,
Yet unregardant of the countenance
Whereon they dwelt; in other thoughts absorb'd,
Collecting fortitude for what she yearn'd,
Yet trembled to perform. Her steady look
Disturb'd the Goth, albeit he little ween'd
What agony awaited him that hour.
Her face, well nigh as changed as his, was now
Half-hidden, and the lustre of her eye
Extinct; nor did her voice awaken in him
One startling recollection when she spake,
So altered were its tones.

Father, she said,
All thankful as I am to leave behind
The unhappy walls of Cordoba, not less
Of consolation doth my heart receive
At sight of one to whom I may disclose
The sins which trouble me, and at his feet
Lay down repentantly, in Jesu's name,
The burden of my spirit. In his name
Hear me, and pour into a wounded soul
The balm of pious counsel. — Saying thus,
She drew toward the minister ordain'd,
And kneeling by him, Father, dost thou know
The wretch who kneels beside thee? she inquired.
He answered, Surely we are each to each
Equally unknown.

Then said she, Here thou seest
One who is known too fatally for all,—
The daughter of Count Julian. — Well it was
For Roderick that no eye beheld him now;
From head to foot a sharper pang than death
Thrill'd him; his heart, as at a mortal stroke,
Ceased from its functions: his breath fail'd, and when
The power of life, recovering, set its springs
Again in action, cold and clammy sweat
Starting at every pore suffus'd his frame.
Their presence help'd him to subdue himself;
For else, had none been nigh, he would have fallen
Before Florinda prostrate on the earth,
And in that mutual agony belike
Both souls had taken flight. She mark'd him not,
For having told her name, she bow'd her head,
Breathing a short and silent prayer to Heaven,
While, as a penitent, she wrought herself
To open to his eye her hidden wounds.

Father, at length she said, all tongues amid
This general ruin shed their bitterness
On Roderick, load his memory with reproach,
And with their curses persecute his soul.—
Why shouldst thou tell me this? explain'd the Goth,
From his cold forehead wiping, as he spake,
The death-like moisture; — why of Roderick's guilt
Tell me? or think'st thou I know it not?
Ah! who hath not heard the hideous tale
Of Roderick's shame! Babes learn it from their nurses,
And children, by their mothers unapproved,
Link their first excursions to his name.
Oh, it hath caught a tint of infancy,
That, like Iscariot's, through all time shall last,
Reeking and fresh forever!

There! she cried,
Drawing her body backward where she knelt,
And stretching forth her arms with head upraised,—
There! it pursues me still! — I came to thee,
Father, for comfort, and thou heapest fire
Upon my head. But hear me patiently,
And let me undeceive thee; self-loved,
Not to arraign another, do I come;— I come a self-accuser, self-condemn'd
To take upon myself the pain deserved;
For I have drank the cup of bitterness,
And having drank therein of heavenly grace,
I must not put away the cup of shame.
Thus as she spake she falter'd at the close,
And in that dying fall her voice sent forth
Somewhat of its original sweetness. Thou! —
Thou self-abused! exclaimed the astonish'd King; —
Thou self-condemn'd! — The cup of shame for thee!
Thee — thee, Florida! — But the very excess
Of passion check'd his speech, restraining thus
From further transport, which had haply else
Master'd him; and he sat like one entranced,
Gazing upon that countenance so fallen,
So changed: her face, raised from its muffer now,
Was turn'd toward him, and the fire-light shone
Full on its mortal paleness; but the shade
Conceal'd the King.

She roused him from the spell
Which held him like a statue motionless.
Thou, too, quoth she, dost join the general curse,
Like one, who, when he sees a felon's grave,
Casting a stone there as he passes by,
Adds to the heap of shame. Oh, what are we,
Frail creatures as we are, that we should sit
In judgment, man on man! and what were we,
If the All-merciful should mete to us
With the same rigorous measure wherewithal
Sinner to sinner metes? But God beholds
The secrets of the heart,—therefore his name
Is Merciful. Servant of God, see thou
The hidden things of mine, and judge thou then
In charity thy brother who hath fallen. —
Nay, hear me to the end! I loved the King,—
 Tenderly, passionately, madly loved him.
Sinful it was to love a child of earth
With such entire devotion as I loved
Roderick, the heroic Prince, the glorious Goth!
And yet methought this was its only crime,
The imaginative passion scendi'd so pure;
Quiet and calm like duty, hope nor fear
Disturb'd the deep contentment of that love;
He was the sunshine of my soul, and like
A flower, I lived and flourish'd in his light.
Oh, hear me not with me thus impatiently!
No tale of weakness this, that in the act
Of penitence, indulgent to itself,
With garrulous palliation half repeats
The sin it ill repeats. I will be brief;
And shrink not from confessing how the love
Which thus began in innocence, betray'd
My unsuspecting heart; nor me alone,
But him, before whom, shining as he shone
With whatsoe'er is noble, whatsoe'er
Is lovely, whatsoever good and great,
I was as dust and ashes,—him, alas!
This glorious being, this exalted Prince,
Even him, with all his royalty of soul,
Did this ill-omen'd, this accursed love,
To his most lamentable fall betray
And utter ruin. Thus it was: The King,
By persons of cold statesmen ill-advis'd,
To an unworthy mate had bound himself
In politic wedlock. Wherefore should I tell
How Nature upon Egilona's form,
Profuse of beauty, lavishing her gifts,
Left, like a statue from the graver's hands,
Deformity and hollowness beneath
The rich external? For the love of pomp
And emptiest vanity, hath she not incur'd
The grief and wonder of good men, the jibes
Of vulgar ribaldry, the reproach of all;
Profaning the most holy sacrament
Of marriage, to become chief of the wives
Of Abdalaaziz, of the Infidel,
The Moor, the tyrant-enemy of Spain!
All know her now; but they alone who knew
What Roderick was, can judge his wretchedness,
To that light spirit and unfeeling heart
In hopeless bondage bound. No children rose
From this unhappy union, towards whom
The springs of love, within his soul confined,
Might flow in joy and fulness; nor was he
One, like Witiza, of the vulgar crew,
Who in promiscuous appetite can find
All their vile nature seeks. Alas for man!
Exuberant health diseases him, frail worm!
And the slight bias of untoward chance
Makes his best virtue from the even line,
With fatal declination, swerve aside.
Ay, thou mayst groan for poor mortality,—
Well, Father, mayst thou groan!

My evil fate
Made me an inmate of the royal house,
And Roderick found in me, if not a heart
Like his,—for who was like the heroic Goth? —
One which at least felt his surpassing worth,
And loved him for himself.— A little yet
Bear with me, reverence Father, for I touch
Upon the point, and this long prologue goes,
As justice bids, to palliate his offence,
Not mine. The passion, which I fondly thought
Such as fond sisters for a brother feel,
Grew day by day, and strengthen'd in its growth,
Till the beloved presence had become Needful as food or necessary sleep,
My hope, light, sunshine, life, and every thing.
Thus lap'd in dreams of bliss, I might have lived
Contented with this pure idolatry,
Had he been happy; but I saw and knew
The inward discontent and household griefs
Which he subdued in silence; and alas!
Pity with admiration mingling then,
Alloy'd, and lower'd, and humanized my love,
Till to the level of my lowliness
It brought him down; and in this treacherous heart
Too often the repining thought arose,
That if Florida had been Roderick's Queen,
Then might domestic peace and happiness
Have bless'd his home and crown'd our wedded Loves.

Too often did that sinful thought recur,
Too feebly the temptation was repell'd.

See, Father, I have probe'd my inmost soul;
Have search'd to its remotest source the sin;
And tracing it through all its specious forms
Of fair disguisement, I present it now,
Even as it lies before the eye of God,
Bare and exposed, convicted and condemn'd.
One eye, as in the bowers which overhang
The glen where Tagus rolls between his rocks
I roam'd alone, alone I met the King.
His countenance was troubled, and his speech
Like that of one whose tongue to light discourse
At fits constrain'd, betrays a heart disturb'd:
I too, albeit unconscious of his thoughts,
With anxious looks reveal'd what wandering words
In vain essay'd to hide. A little while
Did this oppressive intercourse endure,
Till our eyes met in silence, each to each
Telling their mutual tale, then consciously
Together fell absah'd. He took my hand,
And said, Florinda, would that thou and I
Earlier had met! Oh, what a blissful lot
Had then been mine, who might have found in thee
The sweet companion and the friend endure'd,
A fruitful wife and crown of earthly joys!
Thou too shouldst then have been of womankind
Happiest, as now the loveliest. — And with that,
First giving way to passion first disclosed,
He press'd upon my lips a guilty kiss,—
Alas! more guiltily received than given.
Passive and yielding, and yet self-reproach'd,
Trembling I stood, upheld in his embrace;
When coming steps were heard, and Roderick said,
Meet me to-morrow, I beseech thee, here,
Queen of my heart! Oh meet me here again,
My own Florinda, meet me here again! —
Tongue, eye, and pressure of the impassion'd hand
Solicited and urged the ardent suit,
And from my hesitating, hurried lips
The word of promise fatally was drawn.
O Roderick, Roderick! hadst thou told me all
Thy purpose at that hour, from what a world
Of woé had thou and I — The bitterness
Of that reflection overcame her then,
And chok'd her speech. But Roderick sat the while Covering his face with both his hands close-press'd, his head bow'd down, his spirit to such point
Of suffering knit, as one who patiently
Awaits the uplifted sword.
Till now, said she,
Resuming her confession, I had lived,
If not in innocence, yet self-deceived,
And of my perilous and sinful state
Unconscious. But this fatal hour reveal'd
To my awakening soul her guilt and shame:
And in those agonies with which remorse,
Wrestling with weakness and with cherish'd sin,
Doth triumph o'er the lacerated heart,
That night — that miserable night — I vow'd,
A virgin dedicate, to pass my life
Immured; and, like redeemed Magdalen,
Or that Egyptian penitent, whose tears
Fretted the rock, and moisten'd round her cave
The thirsty desert, so to mourn my fall.
The struggle ending thus, the victory
Thus, as I thought, accomplish'd, I believed
My soul was calm, and that the peace of Heaven
Descended to accept and bless my vow;
And in this faith, prepared to consummate
The sacrifice, I went to meet the King.
See, Father, what a snare had Satan laid!
For Roderick came to tell me that the Church
From his unjustified bed would set him free,
And I should be his Queen.

O let me close
The dreadful tale! I told him of my vow;
And from sincere and scrupulous piety,
But more, I fear me, in that desperate mood
Of obstinate will perverse, the which, with pride,
And shame, and self-reproach, doth sometimes make
A woman's tongue, her own worst enemy,
Run counter to her dearest heart's desire,—
In that unhappy mood did I resist
All his most earnest prayers to let the power
Of holy Church, never more rightfully
Invoked, he said, than now in our behalf,
Release us from our fatal bonds. He urged
With kindling warmth his suit, like one whose life
Hung on the issue; I dispersed not
My cruel self-reproaches, nor my grief,
Yet desperately maintain'd the rash resolve;
Till, in the passionate argument, he grew
Incensed, inflamed, and madden'd or possess'd—
For Hell too surely at that hour prevail'd,
And with such subtle toils envelop'd him,
That even in the extremity of guilt
No guilt he purported, but rather meant
An amplest recompense of life-long love
For transitory wrong, which fate perversé—
Thus madly he deceived himself — compell'd,
And therefore stern necessity excused.
Here then, O Father, at thy feet I own
Myself the guiltier; for full well I knew
These were his thoughts, but vengeance master'd me,
And in my agony I cursed the man
Whom I loved best.

Dost thou recall that curse?
Cried Roderick, in a deep and inward voice,
Still with his head depress'd, and covering still
His countenance. Recall it? she exclaimed;
Father, I come to thee because I gave
The reins to wrath too long, — because I wrought
His ruin, death, and infamy. — O God,
Forgive the wicked vengeance thus indulged,
As I forgive the King! — But teach me thou
What reparation more than tears and prayers
May now be made; — how shall I vindicate
His injured name, and take upon myself —
Daughter of Julian, firmly he replied,
Speak not of that, I charge thee! On his fame
The Ethiop dye, fixed ineffaceably,
Forever will abide; so it must be,
So should be: 'tis his rightful punishment;
And if to the full measure of his sin
The punishment hath fallen, the more our hope
That through the blood of Jesus he may find
That sin forgiven him.

Paus'd thus, then, he raised
His hand, and pointed where Siverian lay
Stretch'd on the heath. To that old man, said he,
And to the mother of the unhappy Goth.
Tell, if it please thee, — not what thou hast pour'd
Into my secret ear, but that the child
For whom they mourn with anguish unallay'd,
Sinn'd not from vicious will, or heart corrupt,
But fell by fatal circumstance betray'd.
And if in charity to them thou sayest
Something to palliate, something to excuse
An act of sudden frenzy when the Fiend
O'creame him, thou wilt do for Roderick
All he could ask thee, all that can be done
On earth, and all his spirit could endure.

Venturing towards her an imploring look,
Wilt thou join with me for his soul in prayer?
He said, and troubled as he spoke.
That voice
Of sympathy was like Heaven's influence,
Wounding at once and comforting the soul.
O Father, Christ requite thee! she exclaim'd;
Thou hast set free the springs which withering griefs
Have closed too long. Forgive me, for I thought
Thou wert a rigid and un pitying judge;
One whose stern virtue, feeling in itself
No flaw of frailty, heard impatiently
Of weakness and of guilt. I wrong'd thee, Father!—
With that she took his hand, and kissing it,
Bathed it with tears. Then in a firmer speech,
For Roderick, for Count Julian, and myself,
Three wretchedest of all the human race,
Who have destroyed each other and ourselves,
Mutually wrong'd and wronging, let us pray!

XI.

COUNT PEDRO'S CASTLE.

Twelve weary days with unremitting speed,
Shunning frequented tracks, the travellers
Pursued their way; the mountain path they chose,
The forest or the lonely heath wide-spread;
Where castus shrubs sole seen exhaled at noon
Their fine balsamic odor all around;
Sown'd with their blossoms, frail as beautiful,
The thirsty soil at eve; and when the sun
Rolamed the gladden'd earth, opening anew
Their stores exuberant, prodigal as frail,
White'd again the wilderness. They left
The dark Sierra's skirts behind, and cross'd
The wilds where Ana, in her native hills,
Collects her sister springs, and hurries on
Her course melodious amid loveliest glens,
With forest and with fruitage overbower'd.
These scenes profusely blest by Heaven they left,
Where o'er the hazel and the quince the vine
Wide-mantling spreads; and clinging round the cork
And ilex, hangs amid their dusky leaves
Garlands of brightest hue, with reddening fruit
Pendent, or clusters cool of glassy green.
So holding on o'er mountain and o'er vale,
Tagus they cross'd, where, midland on his way,
The King of Rivers rolls his stately stream;
And rude Alverches' wide and stony bed,
And Duero distant far, and many a stream
And many a field obscure, in future war
For bloody theatre of famous deeds
Paredoom'd; and deserts where, in years to come,
Shall populous towns arise, and crested towers,
And stately temples rear their heads on high.

Cautious, with course circuitous they shunn'd
The embattled city, which, in eldest time,
Thrice-greatest Hercules built, so fables say,
Now subjugate, but fated to behold
Erelong the heroic Prince (who, passing now
Unknown and silently the dangerous track,
Turns thither his regardant eye) come down
Victorious from the heights, and bear abroad
Her banner'd Lion, symbol to the Moor
Of rout and death through many an age of blood.
Lo, there the Asturian hills! Far in the west,
Huge Rabanal and Foncebadon huge,
Preaminent, their giant bulk display,
Darkening with earliest shade, the distant vales
Of Leon, and with evening premature.
Far in Cantabria eastward, the long line
Extends beyond the reach of eagle's eye,
When buoyant in mid-heaven the bird of Jove
Soars at his loftiest pitch. In the north, before
The travellers the Ebroan mountains rise,
Bounding the land beloved, their native land.

How then, Alphonso, did thy cager soul
Chide the slow hours and painful way, which seem'd
Lengthening to grow before their lagging pace!
Youth of heroic thought and high desire,
'Tis not the spur of lofty enterprise
That with unequal throbbing hurries now
The unquiet heart, now makes it sink dismay'd;
'Tis not impatient joy which thus disturbs
In that young breast the healthful spring of life;
Joy and ambition have forsaken him.
His soul is sick with hope. So near his home,
So near his mother's arms; — alas! perchance
The long'd-for meeting may be yet far off
As earth from heaven. Sorrow, in these long months
Of separation, may have l Ind her low;
Or what if at his flight the bloody Moor
Hath sent his ministers of slaughter forth,
And he himself should thus have brought the sword
Upon his father's head? — Sure Hoya too
The same dark presage feels, the fearful boy
Said in himself; or wherefore is his brow
Thus overcast with heaviness, and why
Looks he thus anxiously in silence round?

Just then that faithful servant raised his hand,
And turning to Alphonso with a smile,
He pointed where Count Pedro's towers far off
Peer'd in the dell below; faint was the smile,
And while it sat upon his lips, his eye
Retain'd its troubled speculation still.
For long had he look'd wistfully in vain,
Seeking where far or near he might espy
From whom to learn if time or chance had wrought
Change in his master's house: but on the hills
Nor goatherd could he see, nor traveller,
Nor huntsman early at his sports afield,
Nor angler following up the mountain glen
His lonely pastime; neither could he hear
Carol, or pipe, or shout of shepherd's boy,
Nor woodman's axe, for not a human sound
Disturb'd the silence of the solitude.

Is it the spoiler's work? At yonder door
Behold the favorite kiding beats unheard;
The next stands open, and the sparrow there
Boldly pass in and out. Thither he turn'd
To seek what indications were within;
The chestnut-bread was on the shelf, the churn,
As if in haste forsaken, full and fresh;
The recent fire had moulder'd on the hearth;
And broken cobweb mark'd the whiter space
Where from the wall the buckler and the sword
Had late been taken down. Wonder at first
Had mitigated fear; but Hoya now
Return'd to tell the symbols of good hope,
And they prick'd forward joyfully. Erolong
Perceptible above the ceaseless sound
Of yonder stream, a voice of multitudes,
As if in loud achain, was heard far off;
And nearer as they drew, distincter shouts
Came from the dell, and at Count Pedro's gate
The human swarm were seen,—a motley group,
Maids, mothers, helpless infancy, weak age,
And wondering children, and tumultuous boys,
Hot youth, and resolute manhood gather'd there,
In upror upon the moving mass
Falls in half circle back; a general cry
Bursts forth; exultant arms are lifted up,
And caps are thrown aloft, as through the gate
Count Pedro's banner came. Alphonso shriek'd
For joy, and smote his steed and gallop'd on.

Fronting the gate, the standard-bearer holds
His precious charge. Behind, the men divide
In order'd files; green boyhood presses there,
And waning eld, pleading a youthful soul,
Entreats admission. All is ardor here,
Hope, and brave purposes, and minds resolved.
Nor where the weaker sex is left apart
Doth ought of fear find utterance, though perchance
Some paler cheeks might there be seen, some eyes
Big with sad bodings, and some natural tears.
Count Pedro's war-horse in the vacant space
Strikes with impatient hoof the trodden turf,
And gazing round upon the martial show,
Proud of his stately trappings, flings his head,
And snorts and champs the bit, and neighing shrill
Wakes the near echo with his voice of joy.
The page beside him holds his master's spear,
And shield, and helmet. In the castle-gate
Count Pedro stands, his countenance resolved,
But mournful, for Favinia on his arm
Hung, passionate with her fears, and held him back.
Go not, she cried, with this deluded crew?
She hath not, Pedro, with her frantic words
Bereft thy faculty,—she is crazed with grief,
And her delirium hath infected thee!
But, Pedro, thou art calm; thou dost not share
The madness of the crowd; thy sober mind
Surveys the danger in its whole extent,
And sees the certain ruin,—for thou know'st
I know thou hast no hope. Unhappy man,
Why then for this most desperate enterprise

Wilt thou devote thy son, thine only child?
Not for myself I plead, nor even for thee;
Thou art a soldier, and thou canst not fear
The face of death; and I should welcome it
As the best visitant whom Heaven could send.
Not for our lives I speak then,—were they worth
The thought of preservation;—Nature soon
Must call for them; the sword that should cut short
Sorrow's slow work were merciful to us.
But spare Alphonso! there is time and hope
In store for him. O thou who gavest him life,
Seal not his death, his death and mine at once!

Peace! he replied: thou know'st there is no
choice;
I did not raise the storm; I cannot turn
Its course aside; but where you banner goes
Thy Lord must not be absent! Spare me then,
Favinia, lest I hear thy honor'd name
Now first attainted with deserved reproach.
The boy is in God's hands. He who of yore
Walk'd with the sons of Judah in the fire,
And from the lions' den drew Daniel forth
U unhurt, can save him,—if it be his will.

Even as he spake, the astonish'd troop set up
A shout of joy which rung through all the hills.
Alphonso heeds not how they break their ranks
And gather round to greet him; from his horse
Precipitate and panting off he springs.
Pedro grew pale, and trembled at his sight;
Favinia clasped her hands, and looking up
To Heaven as she embraced the boy, exclaim'd,
Lord God, forgive me for my sinful fears;
Unworthy that I am,—my son, my son!

XI.

THE VOW.

Always I knew thee for a generous foe,
Pelayo: said the Count; and in our time
Of cunning, thou too, I know, didst feel
The feud between us was but of the house,
Not of the heart. Brethren in arms henceforth
We stand or fall together; nor will I
Look to the event with one misgiving thought,—
That were to prove myself unworthy now
Of Heaven's benignant providence, this hour,
Scarce by less than miracle, vouchsafed.
I will believe that we have days in store
Of hope, now risen again as from the dead,—
Of vengeance,—of portentous victory,—
Yea, manage all unlikelihoods,—of peace.
Let us then here indissolubly knit
Our ancient houses, that those happy days,
When they arrive, may find us more than friends,
And bound by closer than fraternal ties.
Thou hast a daughter, Prince, to whom my heart
Years now, as if in winning infancy
Her smiles had been its daily food of love.
I need not tell thee what Alphonso is,—
Thou know'st the boy.
Already had that hope,
Replyed Pelayo, risen within my soul.
O Thou, who, in thy mercy, from the house
Of Moorish bondage hast deliver'd us,
Fulfill the pious purposes for which
Here, in thy presence, thus we pledge our hands!

Strange hour to plight espousals! yielding half
To superstitious thoughts, Favinia cried,
And these strange witnesses!—The times are strange,
With thoughtful speech composed her Lord replies;
And what thou seest accord with them. This day
Is wonderful; nor could auspicious Heaven
With fairer or with fitter omen gift
Our enterprise, when, strong in heart and hope,
We take the field, preparing thus for works
Of piety and love. Unwillingly
I yielded to my people's general voice,
Thinking that she who with her powerful words
To this excess had roused and kindled them,
Spake from the spirit of her griefs alone,
Not with prophetic impulse. Be that sin
Forgiven me! and the calm and quiet faith
Which, in the place of incredulity,
Hath fill'd me, now that seeing I believe,
Doth give of happy end to righteous cause
A presage, not presumptuous, but assured.

Then Pedro told Pelayo how from vale
To vale the exalted Adosinda went,
Exciting sire and son, in holy war
Conquering or dying, to secure their place
In Paradise; and how reluctantly,
And mourning for his child by his own act
Thus doom'd to death, he bade with heavy heart
His banner be brought forth. Devout alike
Of purpose and of hope himself, he meant
To march toward the western Mountainers,
Where Odoar by his counsel might direct
Their force conjoint. Now, said he, we must haste
To Cangas, there, Pelayo, to secure,
With timely speed, I trust in God, thy house.

Then looking to his men, he cried, Bring forth
The armor which in Wamba's wars I wore.—
Alphonso's heart leapt at the auspicious words.
Count Pedro mark'd the rising glow of joy.—
Doubly to thee, Alphonso, he pursued,
This day above all other days is blest,
From whence, as from a birth-day, thus wilt date
Thy life in arms!

Rejoicing in their task,
The servants of the house, with emulous love,
Dispute the charge. One brings the cuirass, one
The buckler; this exultingly displays
The sword; his comrade lifts the helm on high;
The greaves, the gauntlets they divide; a spur
Seems now to dignify the officious hand
Which for such service bears it to his Lord.
Greek artists in the imperial city forged
That splendid armor, perfect in their craft;
With curious skill they wrought it, framed alike
To shine amid the pageantry of war,

And for the proof of battle. Many a time
Alphonso from his nurse's lap had stretch'd
His infant hands toward it eagerly,
Where gleaming to the central fire it hung
High in the hall; and many a time had wish'd,
With boyish ardor, that the day were come
When Pedro to his prayers would grant the boon,
His dearest heart's desire. Count Pedro then
Would smile, and in his heart rejoice to see
The noble instinct manifest itself.
Then, too, Favinia, with maternal pride,
Would turn her eyes exulting to her Lord,
And in that silent language bid him mark
His spirit in his boy; all danger then
Was distant, and if secret forethought faint
Of manhood's perils, and the chance of war,
Hateful to mothers, pass'd across her mind,
The ill remote gave to the present hour
A heighten'd feeling of secure delight.

No season this for old solemnities,
For wassailry and sport;—the bath, the bed,
The vigil,—all preparatory rites
Omitted now,—here, in the face of Heaven,
Before the vassals of his father's house,
With them in instant peril to partake
The chance of life or death, the heroic boy
Dons his first arms; the coated scales of steel
Which o'er the tunie to his knees depend,
The hose, the sleeves of mail; bareheaded then
He stood. But when Count Pedro took the spurs,
And bent his knee in service to his son,
Alphonso from that gesture half drew back,
Starting in reverence, and a deeper hue
Spread o'er the glow of joy which flush'd his cheeks.
Do thou the rest, Pelayo! said the Count;
So shall the ceremony of this hour
Exceed in honor what in form it lacks.
The Prince from Hoyo's faithful hand receiv'd
The sword; he girt it round the youth, and drew
And placed it in his hand; unheathing then
His own good falchion, with its burnish'd blade
He touch'd Alphonso's neck, and with a kiss
Gave him his rank in arms.

Thus long the crowd
Had look'd intently on, in silence hush'd;
Loud and continuous now with one accord,
Shout following shout, their acclamations rose;
Blessings were breathed from every heart, and joy,
Powerful alike in all, which, as with force
Of an incirrating cup, inspired
The youthful, from the eye of age drew tears.
The uproar died away, when, standing forth,
Roderick, with lifted hand, besought a pause
For speech, and moved towards the youth. I, too,
Young Baron, he began, must do my part;
Not with prerogative of earthly power,
But as the servant of the living God,
The God of Hosts. This day thou promisest
To die, when honor calls thee, for thy faith,
For thy liege Lord, and for thy native land;
The duties which at birth we all contract,
Are by the high profession of this hour
Made thine especially. Thy noble blood,
The thoughts with which thy childhood hath been fed,
And thine own noble nature more than all,
Are sureties for thee. But these dreadful times
Demand a further pledge; for it hath pleased
The Highest, as he tried his Saints of old,
So in the fiery furnace of his wrath
To prove and purify the sons of Spain;
And they must knit their spirits to the proof,
Or sink, forever lost. Hold forth thy sword,
Young Baron, and before thy people take
The vow which, in Toledo's sacred name,
Poor as these weeds bespeak me, I am here
To minister with delegated power.

With reverential awe was Roderick heard
By all, so well authority became
That mien, and voice, and countenance austere.
Pelayo with complacent eye beheld
The unlook'd-for interpos'd, and the Count
Bends toward Alphonso his approving head.
The youth, obedient, loosen'd from his belt
The sword, and looking, while his heart beat fast,
To Roderick, reverently expectant stood.

O noble youth, the Royal Goth pursued,
Thy country is in bonds; an impious foe
Oppresses her; he brings with him strange laws,
Strange language, evil customs, and false faith,
And forces them on Spain. Swear that thy soul
Will make no covenant with these accursed,
But that the sword shall be from this day forth
Thy children's portion, to be handed down
From sire to son, a sacred heritage,
Through every generation, till the work
Be done, and this insulted land hath drunk
In sacrifice the last invader's blood?

Bear witness, ancient Mountains! cried the youth,
And ye, my native Streams, who hold your course
Forever; —this dear Earth, and yonder Sky,
Be witness! for myself I make the vow,
And for my children's children. Here I stand
Their sponsor, binding them in sight of Heaven,
As by a new baptismal sacrament,
To wage hereditary, holy war,
Perpetual, patient, persevering war,
Till not one living enemy pollute
The sacred soil of Spain.

So, as he ceased,
While yet toward the clear, blue firmament
His eyes were raised, he lifted to his lips
The sword, with reverent gesture bending then,
Devoutly kiss'd its cross.

And ye! exclaimed
Roderick, as, turning to the assembled troop,
He motion'd with authoritative hand,—
Ye children of the hills and sons of Spain!

Through every heart the rapid feeling ran,—
For us! they answer'd all with one accord,
And at the word they knelt: People and Prince,
The young and old, the father and the son,
At once they knelt; with one accord they cried,
For us, and for our seed! with one accord
They cross'd their fervent arms, and with bent head
Inclined toward that awful voice from whence
The inspiring impulse came. The Royal Goth
Made answer, — I receive your vow for Spain
And for the Lord of Hosts: your cause is good;
Go forward in his spirit and his strength.

Ne'er in his happiest hours had Roderick
With such commanding majesty dispensed
His princely gifts, as dignified him now,
When, with slow movement, solemnly upraised,
Toward the kneeling troop he spread his arms,
As if the expanded soul diffused itself,
And carried to all spirits with the act
Its effluent inspiration. Silently
The people knelt, and when they rose, such awe
Held them in silence, that the eagle's cry,
Who far above them, at her highest flight
A speck scarce visible, gyred round and round,
Was heard distinctly; and the mountain stream,
Which from the distant glen sent forth its sounds
Wafted upon the wind, grew audible
In that deep hush of feeling, like the voice
Of waters in the stillness of the night.
Of Moorish blood,—that sword, whose hungry edge,
Through the fair course of all his glorious life, From that auspicious day, was fed so well. Cheap was the victory now for Spain achieved; For the first fervor of their zeal inspired. The Mountaineers,—the presence of their Chiefs, The sight of all dear objects, all dear ties, The air they breathed, the soil wherein they trod, Duty, devotion, faith, and hope, and joy. And little had the misbelievers seen’d
In such impetuous onset to receive
A greeting deadly as their own intent; Victims they thought to find, not men prepared And eager for the fight; their confidence Therefore gave way to wonder, and dismay. Effected what astonishment began. Scatter’d before the impetuous Mountaineers, Buckler, and spear, and cimeter they dropp’d, As in precipitate rout they fled before The Asturian sword: the vales, and hills, and rocks, Received their blood, and where they fell the wolves
At evening found them.

From the fight apart
Two Africans had stood, who held in charge
Count Eudon. When they saw their countrymen, Falter, give way, and fly before the foe,
One turn’d toward him with malignant rage, And saying, Infidel! thou shalt not live
To join their triumph! am’d against his neck
The money felonion’s point. His comrade raised
A hasty hand, and turn’d it’s edge aside,
Yet so that o’er the shoulder glancing down,
It scar’d him as it pass’d. The murderous Moor,
Not tarrying to secure his vengeance, fled;
While he of milder mood, at Eudon’s feet
Fell and embraced his knees. The mountaineer
Who found them thus, withheld at Eudon’s voice
His wrathful hand, and led them to his Lord.

Count Pedro, and Alphonse, and the Prince
Stood on a little rocky eminence
Which overlook’d the vale. Pedro had put
His helmet off, and with somberous horn
Blow the recall; for well he knew what thoughts,
Calm as the Prince appear’d and undisturb’d,
Lay underneath his silent fortitude;
And how at this eventful juncture speed
Imported more than vengeance. Thrice he sent
The long-resounding signal forth, which rung
From hill to hill, reechoing far and wide.
Slow and unwillingly his men obey’d
The swelling horn’s reiterated call;
Repining that a single foe escaped
The retribution of that righteous hour.
With lingering step reluctant from the chase
They turn’d,—their veins full-swollen, their sinews strung
For battle still, their hearts unsatisfied;
Their swords were dropping still with Moorish blood,
And where they wiped their reeking brows, the stain

Of Moorish gore was left. But when they came
Where Pedro, with Alphonso at his side,
Stood to behold their coming, then they press’d,
All emulous, with gratulation round,
Extolling, for his deeds that day display’d,
The noble boy. Oh! when had Heaven, they said,
With such especial favor manifest
Illustrated a first essay in arms!
They bless’d the father from whose loins he sprung,
The mother at whose happy breast he fed;
And pray’d that their young hero’s fields might be
Many, and all like this.

Thus they indulged
The honest heart, exuberant of love,
When that loquacious joy at once was check’d,
For Eudon and the Moor were brought before
Count Pedro. Both came fearfully and pale,
But with a different fear: the African
Felt, at this crisis of his destiny,
Such apprehension as without reproach
Might blanch a soldier’s cheek, when life and death
Hang on another’s will, and helplessly
He must abide the issue. But the thoughts
Which quail’d Count Eudon’s heart, and made his Limbs
Quiver, were of his own unworthiness,
Oblivious, and that he stood in power
Of hated and hereditary foes.
I came not with them willingly! he cried,
Addressing Pedro and the Prince at once,
Rolling from each to each his restless eyes
Aghast,—the Moor can tell I had no choice;
They forced me from my castle:—in the fight
They would have slain me:—see, I bleed! The Moor
Can witness that a Moorish cimenter
Inflicted this:—he saved me from worse hurt:
I did not come in arms:—he knows it all;—
Speak, man, and let the truth be known to clear
My innocence!

Thus as he ceased, with fear
And rapid utterance, panting open-mouth’d,
Count Pedro half repress’d a mournful smile,
Wherein compassion seem’d to mitigate
His deep contempt. Methinks, said he, the Moor
Might with more reason look himself to find
An intercessor, than be call’d upon
To play the pleader’s part. Didst thou then save
The Baron from thy comrades?

Let my Lord
Show mercy to me, said the Mussulman,
As I am free from falsehood. We were left, I and another, holding him in charge;
My fellow would have slain him when he saw
How the fight fared; I turn’d the cimenter
Aside, and trust that life will be the need
For life by me preserved.

Nor shall thy trust,
Rejoin’d the Count, be vain. Say further now,
From whence ye came;—your orders, what what force
In Gegio; and if others like yourselves
Are in the field.

The African replied,
We came from Gegio, order’d to secure
This Baron on the way, and seek thee here
To hear thee hence in bonds. A messenger
From Cordoba, whose speed denoted well
He came with urgent tidings, was the cause
Of this our sudden movement. We went forth
Three hundred men; an equal force was sent
For Cangas, on like errand, as I wove.
Four hundred in the city then were left.
If other force be moving from the south,
I know not, save that all appearances
Denote alarm and vigilance.

The Prince
Fix'd upon Eudon then his eye severe;
Baron, he said, the die of war is cast.
What part art thou prepared to take? against,
Or with the oppressor?

Not against my friends,—
Not against you! — the irresolute wretch replied,
Hasty, yet faltering in his fearful speech;
But,— have ye weigh'd it well? — It is not yet
Too late,— their numbers,— their victorious force,
Which hath already trodden in the dust
The sceptre of the Goths: — the throne de stroy'd,—

Our towns subdued,— our country overrun,—
The people to the yoke of their new Lords
Resign'd in peace — Can I not mediate?—
Were it not better through my agency
To gain such terms,— such honorable terms?

Terms! cried Pelayo, cutting short at once
That dastard speech, and checking, ere it grew
Too powerful for restraint, the inop'rant wretch
Which in indignant murmurs breathing round,
Rose like a gathering storm, learn thou what terms
Asturias, this day speaking by my voice,
Doth constitute to the law between
Thee and thy Country. Our portentous age,
As with an earthquake's desolating force,
Hath loosen'd and disjointed the whole frame
Of social order, and she calls not now
For service with the force of sovereign will.
That which was common duty in old times,
Becomes an arduous, glorious virtue now;
And every one, as between Hell and Heaven,
In free election must be left to choose.

Asturias asks not of thee to partake
The cup which we have pledged; she claims from none
The dauntless fortune, the mind resolved,
Which only God can give; — therefore such peace
As thou canst find where all around is war,
She leaves thee to enjoy. But think not, Count,
That because thou art weak, one valiant arm,
One generous spirit must be lost to Spain!
The vassal owes no service to the Lord
Who to his Country doth acknowledge none.
The summons which thou hast not heart to give,
I and Count Pedro over thy domains
Will send abroad; the vassals who were thine
Will fight beneath our banners, and our wars
Shall from thy lands, as from a patrimony
Which hath reverted to the common stock,
Be fed: such tribute, too, as to the Moors
Thou renderest, we will take. It is the price

Which in this land for weakness must be paid
While civil stars prevail. And mark me, Chief!
Fear is a treacherous counsellor! I know
Thou think'nest that beneath his horses' hoofs
The Moor will trample our poor numbers down;
But join not, in contempt of us and Heaven,
His multitudes! for if thou shouldest be found
Against thy country, on the readiest tree
Those recruent bones shall rattle in the wind,
When the birds have left them bare.

As thus he spake,
Count Eudon heard and trembled: every joint
Was loos'en'd, every fibre of his flesh
Thrill'd, and from every pore effused, cold sweat
Chung on his quivering limbs. Shame forced it forth,

Envy, and inward consciousness, and fear
Predominant, which stifled in his heart
Hatred and rage. Before his livid lips
Could shape to utterance their essay'd reply,
Compassionately Pedro interposed.
Go, Baron, to the Castle, said the Count;
There let thy wound be look'd to, and consult Thy better mind at leisure. Let this Moor
Attend upon thee there, and when thou wilt,
Follow thy fortunes — To Pelayo then
He turn'd, and saying, All-too-long, O Prince,
Hath this unlook'd-for conflict held thee here,—
He bade his gallant men begin their march.

Flush'd with success, and in auspicious hour,
The Mountaineers set forth. Blessings and prayers
Pursued them at their parting, and the tears
Which fell were tears of fervor, not of grief.
The sun was verging to the western slope
Of Heaven, but they till midnight travell'd on;
Renewing then at early dawn their way,
They held their unremitting course from morn
Till latest eve, such urgent cause impell'd;
And night had closed around, when to the vale
Where Sella in her ampler bed receives
Ponia's stream they came. Massive and black
Pelayo's castle there was seen; its lines
And battlements against the deep blue sky
Distinct in solid darkness visible.
No light is in the tower. Eager to know
The worst, and with that fatal certainty
To terminate intolerable dread,
He spurr'd his courser forward. All his fears
Too surely are fulfill'd,— for open stand
The doors, and mournfully at times a dog
Fills with his howling the deserted hall.
A moment overcome with wretchedness,
Silent Pelayo stood! recovering then,
Lord God, resign'd he eried, thy will be done!

XIV.

THE RESCUE

Count, said Pelayo, Nature hath assign'd
Two sovereign remedies for human grief;
Religion, surest, firmest, first and best,
Strength to the weak, and to the wounded balm;
And strenuous action next. Think not I came
With unprovided heart. My noble wife,
In the last solemn words, the last farewell
With which she charged her secret messenger,
Told me that whatsoever was my resolve,
She bore a mind prepared. And well I know
The evil, be it what it may, hath found
In her a courage equal to the hour.
Captivity, or death, or what worse pangs,
Sate in her children may be doom’d to feel,
Will never make that steady soul repent
Its virtuous purpose. I, too, did cast
My single life into the lot, but knew
Those dearer pledges on the die were set;
And if the worst have fallen, I shall but bear
That in my breast, which, with transfiguring power
Of piety, makes chastening sorrow take
The form of hope, and sees, in Death, the friend
And the restoring Angel. We must rest
Perforce, and wait what tidings night may bring,
Haply of comfort. Ho, here! Kindle fires,
And see if aught of hospitality
Can yet within these mournful walls be found!

Thus while he spake, lights were descried far off
Moving among the trees, and coming sounds
Were heard as of a distant multitude.
Anon a company of horse and foot,
Advancing in disorderly array,
Came up the vale; before them and beside
Their torches flash’d on Sella’s rippling stream;
Now gleam’d through chestnut groves, emerging now,
Over their huge boughs and radiated leaves
Cast broad and bright a transitory glare.
That sight inspired with strength the mountainers;
All sense of weariness, all wish for rest
At once were gone; impatient in desire
Of second victory alert they stood;
And when the hostile symbols, which from far
Imagination to their wish had shaped,
Vanish’d in nearer vision, high-wrought hope
Departing, left the spirit pall’d and blank.
No turban’d race, no sons of Africa
Were they who now came winding up the vale,
As waving wide before their horses’ feet
The torch-light floated, with its hovering glare
Blackening the incumbent and surrounding night.
Helmet and breastplate glitter’d as they came,
And spears erect; and nearer as they drew
Were the loose folds of female garments seen
On those who led the company. Who then
Had stood beside Pelayo, might have heard
The beating of his heart.

But vainly there
Sought he with wistful eye the well-known forms
Beloved; and plainly might it now be seen,
That from some bloody conflict they return’d
Victorious,—for at every saddle-bow
A gory head was hung. Anon, they stopp’d,
Levelling, in quick alarm, their ready spears.
Hold! who goes there? cried one. A hundred tongues
RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHs.

XV.

RODERICK AT CANGAS.

How calmly gliding through the dark-blue sky
The midnight Moon ascends! Her placid beams
Through thinly-scatter'd leaves and boughs grotesque,
Mottle with mazy shades the orchard slope;
Here, o'er the chestnut's fretted foliage, gray
And massy, motionless they spread; here shine
Upon the crests, deepening with blacker night
Their chasms; and there the glittering argentry
Ripples and glances on the confluent streams.

A lovelier, purer light than that of day
Rests on the hills; and oh, how awfully
Into that deep and tranquil firmament
The summits of Auseva rise serene!
The watchman on the battlements partakes
The stillness of the solemn hour; he feels
The silence of the earth, the endless sound
Of flowing water soothes him, and the stars,
Which in that brightest moonlight well nigh
quench'd

Scarce visible, as in the utmost depth
Of yonder sapphire infinite, are seen,
Draw on, with elevating influence,
Toward eternity the attemp'r'd mind.
Musing on worlds beyond the grave he stands,
And to the Virgin Mother silently
Prefers his hymn of praise.

The mountaineers
Before the castle, round their moulder'g fires,
Lie on the heath outstretched. Pelayo's hall
Is full, and he upon his careful couch
Hears all around the deep and long-drawn breath
Of sleep; for gentle night hath brought to these Perfect and undisturb'd repose, alike
Of corporal powers and inward faculty.

Withal the while he lay, yet more by hope
Than grief for anxious thoughts possess'd, — though grief
For Guisla's guilt, which freshen'd in his heart
The memory of their wretched mother's crime,
Still made its presence felt, like the dull sense
Of some perpetual inward malady;
And the whole peril of the future lay
Before him clearly seen. He had heard all;
How that unworthy sister, obstinate
In wrong and shameless, rather seem'd to woo
The upfront renegade than to wait
His wooing: how, as guilt to guilt led on,
Spurning at gentle admonition first,
When Gaudiosa hopelessly forbore
From further counsel, then in sullen mood
Resentful, Guisla soon began to hate
The virtuous presence before which she felt
Her nature how inferior, and her fault
How foul. Despightful thus she grew, because Humbled, yet unrepentant. Who could say
To what excess bad passions might impuls
A woman thus possess'd? She could not fail
To mark Siverian's absence, for what end
Her conscience but too surely had divined;
And Gaudiosa, well aware that all,
To the vile paramour was thus made known,
Had to safe hiding-place, with timely fear,
Removed her children. Well the event had proved
How needful was that caution; for at night
She sought the mountain solitudes, and morn
Beheld Numacian's soldiers at the gate.
Yet did not sorrow in Pelayo's heart
For this domestic shame prevail that hour,
Nor gathering danger weigh his spirit down.
The anticipated meeting put to flight
These painful thoughts: to-morrow will restore
All whom his heart holds dear; his wife beloved,
No longer now remember'd for regret,
Is present to his soul with hope and joy;
His inward eye behelds Favila's form
In opening youth robust, and Hermesind,
His daughter, lovely as a budding rose;
Their images beguile the hours of night,
Till with the earliest morning he may seek
Their secret hold.

The nightingale not yet
Had ceased her song, nor had the early lark
Her dewy nest forsaken, when the Prince
Upward beside Piona took his way
Toward Auneva. Heavily to him,
Impatient for the morrow's happiness,
Long night had linger'd; but it seem'd more long
To Roderick's aching heart. He, too, had watch'd
For dawn, and seen the earliest break of day;
And heard its earliest sounds; and when the Prince
Went forth, the melancholy man was seen
With pensive pace upon Piona's side
Wandering alone and slow.
For he had left
The weariness of his unrest, that morn
With its cold dews might bathe his throbbing brow;
And with its breath, the feverish heat
That burnt within. Also! the gales of morn
Reach not the fever of a wounded heart!
How shall he meet his Mother's eye, how make
His secret known, and from that voice revered
Obtain forgiveness,—all that he has now
To ask, ere on the lap of earth in peace
He lay his head resign'd? In silent prayer
He supplicat'd Heaven to strengthen him
Against that trying hour, there seeking aid
Where all who seek shall find; and thus his soul
Received support, and gather'd fortitude,
Never than now more needful, for the hour
Was nigh. He saw Siverian drawing near,
And with a dim but quick foreboding met
The good old man; yet when he heard him say,
My Lady sends to seek thee, like a knell
To one expecting and prepared for death,
But fearing the dread point that hastens on,
It smote his heart. He follow'd silently,
And knelt his suffering spirit to the proof.

He went resolved to tol his Mother all,
Fall at her feet, and drinking the last dregs
Of bitterness, receive the only good
Earth had in store for him.Resolved for this
He went; yet was it a relief to find
That painful resolution must await
A fitter season, when no eye but Heaven's
Night witness to their mutual agony.
Count Julian's daughter with Rusilla sat;
Both had been weeping, both were pale, but calm.
With head as for humility abased
Roderick approach'd, and bending, on his breast
He cross'd his humble arms. Rusilla rose
In reverence to the priestly character,
And with a mournful eye regarding him,
Thus she began:—Good Father, I have heard
From my old faithful servant and true friend,
Thou didst reprove the inconsiderate tongue,
That in the anguish of its spirit pour'd
A curse upon my poor unhappy child.
O Father Maccabae, this is a hard world,
And hasty in its judgments! Time has been,
When not a tongue within the Pyrenees
Dared whisper in dispraise of Roderick's name,
Lest, if the conscious air had caught the sound,
The vengeance of the honest multitude
Should fall upon the traitorous head, or brand
For life-long infamy the lying lips.
Now, if a voice be raised in his behalf,
'Tis noted for a wonder, and the man
Who utters the strange speech shall be admired
For such excess of Christian charity.
Thy Christian charity hath not been lost;—
Father, I feel its virtue:—it hath been Balm to my heart;—with words and grateful tears,—
All that is left me now for gratitude,—
I thank thee, and beseech thee in thy prayers
That thou wilt still remember Roderick's name.

Roderick so long had to this hour look'd on,
That when the actual point of trial came,
Torpid and numb'd it found him; cold he grew,
And as the vital spirits to the heart
Retreated o'er his wither'd countenance,
Deathy and damp, a whiter paleness spread.
Unmoved the while, the inward feeling seem'd,
Even in such dull insensibility
As gradual age brings on, or slow disease,
Beneath whose progress lingering life survives
The power of suffering. Wondering at himself,
Yet gathering confidence, he rais'd his eyes,
Then slowly shaking as he bent his head,
O venerable Lady, he reply'd,
It aught may comfort that unhappy soul,
It must be thy compassion, and thy prayers.
She whom he most hath wrong'd, she who alone
On earth can grant forgiveness for his crime,
She hath forgiven him; and thy blessing now
Were all that he could ask,—all that could bring Profit or consolation to his soul,
If he had been, as sure we may believe,
A penitent sincere.

Oh, had he lived,
Replied Rusilla, never penitence
Had equall'd his! full well I know his heart,
Vehement in all things. He would on himself
Have wreak'd such penance as had reach'd the height
Of fleshly suffering,—yea, which being told
With its portentous rigor should have made
The memory of his fault, o'erpower'd and lost
In shuddering pity and astonishment,
Fade like a febler horror. Otherwise
Seem'd good to Heaven. I murmur not, nor doubt
The boundless mercy of redeeming love.
For sure I trust that not in his offence
Harden'd and reprobat was my lost son,
A child of wrath, cut off!—that dreadful thought,
Not even amid the first fresh wretchedness,
When the ruin burst around me like a flood,
Assail'd my soul. I ever deem'd his fall
An act of sudden madness: and this day
Hath in unlook'd-for confirmation given
A livelier hope, a more assured faith.
Smiling benignant then amid her tears,
She took Florinda by the hand, and said,
I little thought that I should live to bless
Count Julian's daughter! She hath brought to me
The last, the best, the only comfort earth
Could minister to this afflicted heart,
And my gray hairs may now unto the grave
Go down in peace.

Happy, Florinda cried,
Are they for whom the grave hath peace in store?
The wrongs they have sustain'd, the woes they bear,
Pass not that holy threshold, where Death heals
The broken heart. O Lady, thou mayst trust
In humble hope, through Him who on the Cross
Gave his atoning blood for lost mankind,
To meet beyond the grave thy child forgiven.

I too with Roderick there may interchange
Forgiveness. But the grief which wastes away
This mortal frame, hastening the happy hour
Of my enlargement, is but a light part
Of what my soul endures!—that grief hath lost
Its sting:—I have a keener sorrow here,—
One which,—but God foreclosed that dire event,
May pass with me the portals of the grave,
And with a thought, like sin which cannot die,
Imbitter Heaven. My father hath renounced
His hope in Christ! It was his love for me
Which drove him to perdition,—I was born
To ruin all who loved me,—all I loved!
Perhaps I saw’d in leaving him;—that fear
Rises within me to disturb the peace
Which I should else have found.

To Roderick then
The pious mourner turn’d her suppliant eyes:
O Father, there is virtue in thy prayers! I do beseech thee offer them to Heaven
In his behalf!—For Roderick’s sake, for mine,
Wrestle with Him whose name is Merciful,
That Julian may with patience be touch’d,
And clinging to the Cross, implore that grace
Which ne’er was sought in vain. For Roderick’s sake
And mine, pray for him! We have been the cause
Of his offence! What other miseries
May from that same unhappy source have risen,
Are earthly, temporal, repairable all;—
But if a soul be lost through our misdeeds,
That were eternal evil! Pray for him,
Good Father Maccabee, and be thy prayers
More fervent, as the deeper is the crime.

While thus Florinda spake, the dog who lay
Before Russila’s feet, crying him long
And wistfully, had recognized at length,
Changed as he was and in these sordid weeds,
His royal master. And he rose and lick’d
His wither’d hand, and earnestly look’d up
With eyes whose human meaning did not need
The aid of speech; and moan’d, as if at once
To court and chide the long-withheld caress.
A feeling uncommix’d with sense of guilt
Or shame, yet painfulest, thrill’d through the King;
But he to self-control now long inured
Repress’d his rising heart, nor other tears,
Full as his struggling bosom was, let fall

Than seem’d to follow on Florinda’s words.
Looking toward her then, yet so that still
He shunn’d the meeting of her eye, he said,
Virtuous and pious as thou art, and ripe
For Heaven, O Lady, I must think the man
Hath not by his good Angel been cast off
For whom thy supplications rise. The Lord,
Whose justice doth in its unerring course
Visit the children for the sire’s offence,
Shall He not in his boundless mercy hear
The daughter’s prayer, and for her sake restore
The guilty parent? My soul shall with thine
In earnest and continual duty join.—
How deeply, how devoutly, He will know
To whom the cry is raised!

Thus having said,
Deliberately, in self-possession still,
Himself from that most painful interview
Dispeeding, he withdrew. The watchful dog
Follow’d his footsteps close. But he retired
Into the thickest grove; there yielding way
To his o’erburden’d nature, from all eyes
Apart, he cast himself upon the ground,
And threw his arms around the dog, and cried,
While tears stream’d down, Thou, Theron, then last known
Thy poor lost master,—Theron, none but thou!

COVADONGA.

MEANETIME Pelayo up the vale pursued
Eastward his way, before the sun had climb’d
Auseva’s brow, or shed his silvery beams
Upon Europa’s summit, where the snows
Through all revolting seasons hold their seat.
A happy man he went, his heart at rest,
Of hope, and virtue, and affection full,
To all exhilarating influences
Of earth and heaven alive. With kindred joy
He heard the lark, who from her airy height,
On twinkling pinions poised, pour’d forth profuse
In thrilling sequence of exuberant song,
As one whose joyous nature overflow’d
With life and power, her rich and rapturous strain.
The early bee, buzzing along the way,
From flower to flower, bore gladness on its wing
To his rejoicing sense; and he pursued,
With quicken’d eye alert, the frolic hare,
Where from the green herb in her wanton path
She brush’d away the dew. For he long time,
Far from his home and from his native hills,
Had dwelt in bondage; and the mountain breeze,
Which he had with the breath of infancy
Inhaled, such impulse to his heart restored,
As if the seasons had roll’d back, and life
Enjoy’d a second spring.

Through fertile fields
He went, by cots with pear-trees overbrow’d,
Or spreading to the sun their trellised vines;
Through orchards now, and now by thymy banks,
Where wooden hives in some warm nook were hid
From wind and shower; and now through shadowy paths,
Where hazels fringed Ponia's vocal stream;
Till where the lofier hills to narrower bound
Confine the vale, he reach'd those hills remote,
Which should hereafter to the noble line
Of Soto origin and name impart;
A gallant lineage, long in fields of war
And faithful chronicler's enduring page
Blazon'd; but most by him illustrated,
Avid of gold, yet greedier of renown,
Whom not the spoils of Atabálpa
Could satisfy insatiate, nor the fame
Of that wide empire overthrown appease;
But he to Florida's disastrous shores
In evil hour his gallant courages led,
Through savage woods and swamps, and hostile tribes,
The Apalachian arrows, and the snares
Of wilier foes, hunger, and thirst, and toil;
Till from ambition's feverish dream the touch
Of Death awoke him; and when he had seen
The fruit of all his treasures, all his toil,
Foresight, and long endurance, fade away,
Earth to the restless one refining rest,
In the great river's midland bed he left
His honor'd bones.

A mountain rivulet,
Now calm and lovely in its summer course,
Held by those hills its everlasting way
Towards Ponia. They, whose flocks and herds
Drink of its water, call it Deva. Here
Pelayo southward up the ruder vale
Traced it, his guide mounting. Amid heaps
Of mountain wreck, on either side thrown high,
The wide-spread traces of its wintry might,
The tortuous channel wound; o'er beds of sand
Here silently it flows; here, from the rock
Rebuilt, curls and caddies; plunges here
Precipitate; here roaring among crags,
It leaps, and foams, and whirls, and hurries on.
Gray alders here and bushy hazels hid
The mossy side; their wreath'd and knotted feet,
Bared by the current, now against its force
Repaying the support they found, upheld
The bank secure. Here, bending to the stream,
The birch fantastic stretch'd its rugged trunk,
Tall and erect from whence, as from their base,
Each like a tree, its silver branches grew.
The cherry here hung, for the birds of heaven,
Its rosy fruit on high. The elder there
Its purple berries o'er the water bent,
Heavily hanging. Here, amid the brook,
Gray as the stone to which it clung, half root,
Half trunk, the young ash rises from the rock;
And there its parent lifts a lofty head,
And spreads its graceful boughs; the passing wind
With twinkling motion lifts the silent leaves,
And shakes its rattling tufts.

Soon had the Prince
Behind him left the farthest dwelling-place
Of man; no fields of waving corn were here,
Nor wicker storehouse for the autumnal grain,
Vineyard, nor bowery fig, nor fruitful grove;
Only the rocky vale, the mountain stream,
Incumbent crags, and hills that over hills
Rose on either hand, here hung with woods,
Here rich with heath, that o'er some smooth ascent
Its purple glory spread, or golden gorse;
Bare here, and striated with many a hue,
Scored by the wintry rain; by torrents here
Riven, and with overhanging rocks abrupt.
Pelayo, upward as he cast his eyes
Where crags loose-hanging o'er the narrow pass
Impended, there beheld his country's strength
Insuperable, and in his heart rejoiced.
Oh that the Mussulman were here, he cried,
With all his myriads! While thy day endures,
Moor! thou mayst lord it in the plains; but here
Hath nature, for the free and brave, prepared
A sanctuary, where no oppressor's power,
No might of human tyranny, can pierce

The tears which started then sprang not alone
From lofty thoughts of elevating joy;
For love and admiration had their part,
And virtuous pride. Here then thou hast retired,
My Gandiosi! in his heart he said;
Excellent woman! ne'er was richer boon
By fate begiin to favor'd man indulged,
Than when thou went, before the face of Heaven,
Given me to be my children's mother, brave
And virtuous as thou art! Here thou best fled,
Thou, who rest in palaces, to dwell
In rocks and mountain caves!—The thought was proud,
Yet not without a sense of imminent pain;
For never had Pelayo, till that hour,
So deeply felt the force of solitude.
High over head, the eagle soared serene,
And the gray lizard, on the rocks below,
Bask'd in the sun; no living creature else,
In this remotest wilderness, was seen;
Nor living voice was there,—only the flow
Of Deva, and the rushing of its springs,
Long in the distance heard, which nearer now,
With endless repercussion deep and loud,
Throb'd on the dizzy sense.

The ascending vale,
Long straiten'd by the narrowing mountains,
here
Was closed. In front, a rock, abrupt and bare,
Stood eminently, in height exceeding far
All edifice of human power, by King,
Or Caliph, or barbaric Sultan rear'd,
Or mightier tyrants of the world of old,
Assyrian or Egyptian, in their pride;
Yet, far above, beyond the reach of sight,
Swell after swell, the heathery mountain rose
Here, in two sources, from the living rock
The everlasting springs of Deva gush'd.
Upon a smooth and grassy plat below,
By nature there, as for an altar, dress'd,
They join'd their sister stream, which from the earth
Well'd silently. In such a scene, rude man,
With pardonable error, might have knelt,
Feeling a present Deity, and made
His offering to the fountain Nymph devout
The arching rock disclosed, above the springs,
A cave, where huestest son of giant birth,
That e'er of old in forest of romance
'Gainst knights and ladies waged discourteous war,
Erect within the portal, might have stood.
The broken stone allow'd for hand and foot
No difficult ascent, above the base
In height a tall man's stature, measured thrice.
No holier spot than Covadonga Spain
Boast in her wide extent, though all her realms
Be with the noblest blood of martyrdom,
In elder or in later days, eaeri'd,
And glorified with tales of heavenly aid
By many a miracle made manifest;
Nor in the heroic annals of her fame
Doth she show forth a scene of more renown.
Then, save the hunter, drawn in keen pursuit
Beyond his wonted haunts, or shepherd's boy,
Following the pleasure of his straggling flock,
None knew the place.

Pelayo, when he saw
Those glittering sources and their sacred cave,
Took from his side the bugle, silver-tipt,
And with a breath long drawn, and bow expired,
Sent forth that strain, which, echoing from the walls
Of Cangas, wont to tell his glad return
When from the chase he came. At the first sound
Favila started in the cave, and cried,
My father's horn!—A sudden flush suffused
Hermesind's cheek, and she with quicken'd eye
Look'd eager to her mother silently.
But Gandiosa trembled and grew pale,
Doubting her sense deceived. A second time
The bugle breathed its well-known notes abroad;
And Hermesind around her mother's neck
Throw her white arms, and earnestly exclaim'd,
'Tis he!—But when a third and broader blast
Rung in the echoing archway, ne'er did wand,
With magic power enchi'd, call up a sight
So strange, as sure in that wild solitude
It seem'd, when from the bowels of the rock
The mother and her children hastened forth;
She in the sober charms and dignity
Of womanhood mature, nor verging yet
Upon decay; in gesture like a Queen,
Such inborn and habitual majesty
Ennobled all her steps,—or Priestess, chosen
Because within such faultless work of Heaven
Inspiring deity might seem to make
Its habitation known,—Favila such
In form and stature as the Sea Nymph's son,
When that wise Centaur from his cave well pleased
Beheld the boy divine his growing strength
Against some shaggy lionet essay,
And fixing in the half-grown mane his hands,
Roll with him in fierce daintance intertwined.
But like a creature of some higher sphere
His sister came; she scarcely touch'd the rock,
So light was Hermesind's aerial speed.
Beauty, and grace, and innocence in her
In heavenly union shone. One who had held
The faith of elder Greece, would sure have thought
She was some glorious nymph of seed divine,
Oread or Dryad, of Diana's train
The youngest and the loveliest: yea, she seem'd
Angel, or soul beatified, from realms
Of bliss, on errand of parental love,
To earth re-sent,—if tears and trembling limbs
With such celestial natures might consist.

Embraced by all, in turn embracing each,
The husband and the father for a while
Forgot his country and all things beside;
Life hath few moments of such pure delight,
Such foretaste of the perfect joy of Heaven.
And when the thought recur'd of sufferings past,
Perils which threaten'd still, and arduous toil
Yet to be undergone, remember'd griefs
Heighten'd the present happiness; and hope
Upon the shadows of futurity
Shone like the sun upon the morning mists,
When driven before his rising rays they roll,
And melt, and leave the prospect bright and clear.

When now Pelayo's eyes had drank their fill
Of love from those dear faces, he went up
To view the hiding-place. Spacious it was
As that Sicilian cavern in the hill,
Wherein earth-shaking Neptune's giant son
Duly at eve was wont to fold his flock,
Erst the wise Ithacan, over that brute force
By wiles prevailing, for a life-long night
Seal'd his broad eye. The healthful air had here
Free entrance, and the cheerful light of heaven;
But at the end, an opening in the floor
Of rock disclosed a wider vault below,
Which never sunbeam visited, or breath
Of vivifying morning came to cheer.
No light was there but that which from above
In dim reflection fell, or found its way,
Broken and quivering, through the glassy stream,
Where through the rock it gush'd. That shadowy light
Suffice to show, where from their secret bed
The waters issued; with whose rapid course,
And with whose everlasting cataracts
Such motion to the chill, damp atmosphere
Was given, as if the solid walls of rock
Were shaken with the sound.

Glad to breathe
The upper air, Pelayo hasten'd back
From that drear den. Look! Hermesind exclaim'd,
Taking her father's hand; thou hast not seen
My chamber:—See!—did ever ringdove choose
In so secure a nook her hiding-place,
Or build a warmer nest? 'Tis fragrant too,
As warm, and not more sweet than soft;—for thyme
And myrtle with the elastic heath are laid,
And, over all, this dry and pillowy moss,—
Smiling she spake. Pelayo kiss'd the child,
And, sighing, said within himself, I trust
In Heaven, where'er thy May of life is come,
Sweet bird, that thou shalt have a blither bower!—
Fither, lie thought, such chamber might beseech
Some hermit of Hilirion's school austere,
Or old Antonius, he who from the hell
Of his bewildering dream, a phantasy saw scenes
In actual vision, a fool through grotesque
Of all his fantastic shapes and forms obscure
Crowd in broad day before his open eyes.
That feeling cast a momentary shade
Of sadness o'er his soul. But deeper thoughts,
If he might have perceived the things to come,
Would there have filled him; for within that cave
His own remains were one day doom'd to find
Their final place of rest; and in that spot,
Where that dear child with innocent delight
Had spread her mossy couch, the sepulchre
Shall in the consecrated rock be hewn,
Where with Alphonso, her beloved lord,
Laid side by side, must Hermione partake
The everlasting marriage-bed, when he,
Leaving a name perdurable on earth,
Hath changed his earthly for a heavenly crown.
Dear child, upon that fated spot she stood,
In all the beauty of her opening youth,
In health's rich bloom, in virgin innocence,
While her eyes sparkled and her heart overflow'd
With pure and perfect joy of filial love.

Many a slow century since that day hath fill'd
Its course, and countless multitudes have trod
With pilgrim feet that consecrated cave;
Yet not in all those ages, amid all
The untold concourse, hath one breast been swollen
With such emotions as Pelayo felt
That hour. O Gaudiessa, he exclaimed,
And thou couldst seek for shelter here, amid
This awful solitude, in mountain caves!
Thou noble spirit! Oh, when hearts like thine
Grow on this sacred soil, would it not be
In me, thy husband, double infancy,
And tenfold guilt, if I despair'd of Spain?
In all her visitations, favoring Heaven
Hath left her still the unconquerable mind;
And thus being worthy of redemption, sure
Is she to be redeem'd.

Beholding her
Through tears he spake, and press'd upon her lips
A kiss of deepest love. Think ever thus,
She answer'd, and that faith will give the power
In which it trusts. When to this mountain hold
These children, thy dear images, I brought,
I said within myself, Where should they fly
But to the bosom of their native hills?
I brought them here as to a sanctuary,
Where, for the temple's sake, the indwelling
God
Would guard his suppliants. O my dear Lord,
Proud as I was to know that they were thine,
Was it a sin if I almost believed,
That Spain, her destiny being link'd with theirs,
Must save the precious charge?

So let us think,
The chief replied, so feel, and teach, and act.
Spain is our common parent: let the sons
Be to the parent true, and in her strength
And Heaven, their sure deliverance they will find.

RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

RODERICK AND SIVERIAN.

O holiest Mary, Maid and Mother! thou
In Corudonga, at thy rocky shrine,
Hast witness'd whatso'er of human bliss
Heart can conceive most perfect! Faithful love,
Long cross'd by envious stars, hath there attain'd
Its crown, in endless matrimony given;
The youthful mother there hath to the font
Her first-born borne, and there, with deeper sense
Of gratitude for that dear babe redeem'd
From threatening death, return'd to pay her vows.
But ne'er on nuptial, nor baptismal day,
Nor from their grateful pilgrimage discharged,
Did happier group their way down Deva's vale
Rejoicing hold, than this blest family,
O'er whom the mighty Spirit of the Land
Spread his protecting wings. The children, free
In youthhead's happy season from all cares
That might disturb the hour, yet capable
Of that intense and unalloyed delight
Which childhood feels when it enjoys again
The dear parental presence long deprived;
Nor were the parents now less bless'd than they,
Even to the height of human happiness;
For Gaudiessa and her Lord that hour
Let no misgiving thoughts intrude: she fix'd
Her hopes on him, and his were fix'd on Heaven,
And hope in that courageous heart derived
Such rooted strength and confidence assured
In righteousness, that 'twas to him like faith —
An everlasting sunshine of the soul,
Illumining and quickening all its powers.

But on Ponia's side meantime a heart
As generous, and as full of noble thoughts,
Lay stricken with the deadliest bolts of grief.
Upon a smooth gray stone sat Roderick there;
The wind above him stir'd the hazel boughs,
And murmuring at his feet the river ran.
He sat with folded arms and head declined
Upon his breast, feeding on bitter thoughts,
Till nature gave him in the exhausted sense
Of woe a repose something like repose;
And then the quiet sound of gentle winds
And waters with their hushing consonance
Beguiled him of himself. Of all within Oblivious there he sat, sentient alone
Of outward nature, — of the whispering leaves
That soothed his ear, — the genial breath of Heaven
That fann'd his cheek, — the stream's perpetual flow,
That, with its shadows and its glancing lights,
Dimples and thread-like motions infinite,
Forever varying and yet still the same,
Like time toward eternity, ran by.
Resting his head upon his master's knees,
Upon the bank beside him Theron lay.
What matters change of state and circumstance,
Or lapse of years, with all their dread events,
To him? What matters it that Roderick wears
The crown no longer, nor the sceptre wields? —
It is the dear-loved hand, whose friendly touch
Had hither'd him so oft; it is the voice,
At whose glad summons to the field so oft
From slumber he had started, shaking off
Dreams of the chase, to share the actual joy;
The eye, whose recognition he was wont
To watch and welcome with exultant tongue

A coming step, unheard by Roderick, roused
His watchful ear, and turning he beheld
Siverian. Father, said the good old man,
As Theron rose and fawn'd about his knees,
Hast thou some charm, which draws about thee thus
The hearts of all our house,—even to the beast
That lacks discourse of reason, but too oft,
With uncorrected feeling and dumb faith,
Puts lordly man to shame? — The king replied,
'Tis that mysterious sense by which mankind
To fix their friendships and their loves are led,
And which with fainter influence doth extend
To such poor things as this. As we put off
The cares and passions of this fretful world,
It may be too that we thus far approach
To elder nature, and regain in part
The privilege through sin in Eden lost.
The timid hare soon learns that she may trust
The solitary penitent, and birds
Will light upon the hermit's harmless hand.

Thus Roderick answer'd in exusive speech,
Thinking to draw the old man's mind from what Might touch him else too nearly, and himself
Disposed to follow on the lare he threw,
As one whom such imaginations led
Out of the world of his own miseries.
But to regardless ears his words were given,
For on the dog Siverian gazed the while,
Pursuing his own thoughts. Thou hast not felt,
Exclaim'd the old man, the earthquake and the storm;
The kingdom's overthrow, the wreck of Spain,
The ruin of thy royal master's house,
Have reach'd not thee! — Then turning to the King,
When the destroying enemy drew nigh
Toledo, he continued, and we fled
Before their fury, even while her grief
Was fresh, my Mistress would not leave behind
This faithful creature. Well we knew she thought
Of Roderick then, although she named him not;
For never since the fatal certainty
Fell on us all, hath that unhappy name,
Save in her prayers, been known to pass her lips
Before this day. She names him now, and weeps;
But now her tears are tears of thankfulness;
For blessed hath thy coming been to her
And all who loved the King.

His faltering voice
Here fail'd him, and he paused: recovering soon,
When that poor injured Lady, he pursued,
Did in my presence to the Prince absolve
The unhappy King —

Absolve him! Roderick cried,
And in that strong emotion turn'd his face
Sternly toward Siverian, for the sense
Of shame and self-reproach drove from his mind
All other thoughts. The good old man replied,
Of human judgments humanly I speak.
Who knows not what Pelayo's life hath been?
Not happier in all dear domestic ties,
Than worthy for his virtue of the bliss
Which is that virtue's fruit; and yet did he Absolve, upon Florida's tale, the King.
Siverian, thus he said, what most I hoped,
And still within my secret heart believed,
Is now made certain. Roderick hath been
More sin'd against than sinning.

As with that
He clasps'd his hands, and, lifting them to Heaven,
Cried, Would to God that he were yet alive!
For not more gladly did I draw my sword
Against Witiza in our common cause,
Than I would fight beneath his banners now,
And vindicate his name!

Did he say this?
The Prince? Pelayo? in astonishment
Roderick exclaim'd. — He said it, quoth the old man.
None better knew his kinsman's noble heart,
None loved him better, none bewail'd him more:
And as he felt, like me, for his reproach
A deeper grief than for his death, even so
He cherish'd in his heart the constant thought
Something was yet untold, which, being known,
Would palliate his offence, and make the fall
Of one, till then, so excellently good,
Less monstrous, less revolting to belief,
More to be pitied, more to be forgiven.

While thus he spake, the fallen King felt his face
Burn, and his blood flow fast. Down, guilty thoughts!
Firmly he said within his soul; lie still,
Thou heart of flesh! I thought thou hadst been quell'd,
And quell'd thou shalt be! Help me, O my God,
That I may crucify this inward foe!
Yea, thou hast help'd me, Father! I am strong,
O Savior, in thy strength.

As he breath'd thus
His inward supplications, the old man
Eyed him with frequent and unsteady looks.
He had a secret trembling on his lips,
And hesitated, still irresolute
In reverence to imbody the dear hope:
Fain would he have it strengthen'd and assured
By this concordant judgment, yet he fear'd
To have it chil'd in cold accord. At length
Venturing, he brake with interrupted speech
The troubled silence. Father Maccabæus,
I cannot rest till I have bid my heart
Open before thee. When Pelayo wish'd
That his poor kinsman were alive to rear
His banner once again, a sudden thought —
A hope — a fancy — what shall it be call'd?
Possess'd me, that perhaps the wish might see
Its glad accomplishment, — that Roderick lived,
And might in glory take the field once more
For Spain. — I see thou startest at the thought!
Yet spurn it not with hasty unbelief,
As though 'twere utterly beyond the scope
Of possible contingency. I think
That I have calmly satisfied myself
How this is more than idle fancy, more
Than mere imaginations of a mind
Which from its wishes builds a baseless faith.
His horse, his royal robe, his horned helm,
His mail and sword were found upon the field;
But if King Roderick had in battle fallen,
That sword, I know, would only have been found
Clinched in the hand which, living, knew so well
To wield the dreadful steel! Not in the throng
Confounded, nor amid the torpid stream,
Opening with ignominious arms a way
For flight, would he have perish'd! Where the strife
Was hottest, ring'd about with slaughter'd foes,
Should Roderick have been found: by this sure mark
Ye should have known him, if sought else re-
main'd,
That his whole body had been gore'd with wounds,
And quell'd with spears, as if the Moors had felt
That in his single life the victory lay,
More than in all the host!

Siverian's eyes
Shone with a youthful ardor while he spake;
His gathering brow grew stern; and as he raised
His arm, a warrior's impulse character'd
The impassion'd gesture. But the King was calm,
And heard him with unchanging countenance;
For he had taken his resolve, and felt
Once more the peace of God within his soul,
As in that hour when by his father's grave
He knelt before Pelayo.

Soon the old man
Paraded in calmer tones—Thus much I dare
Believe, that Roderick fell not on that day
When treason brought about his overthrow.
If yet he live, for sure I think I know
His noble mind, 'twas in some wilderness,
Where, in some savage den inhum'd, he drags
The weary load of life, and on his flesh,
As on a mortal enemy, inflicts
Fierce vengeance with immitigable hand.
Oh that I knew but where to bend my way
In his dear search! my voice perhaps might reach
His heart, might reconcile him to himself;
Restore him to his mother ere she dies,
His people and his country: with the sword,
Them and his own good name should he redeem.
Oh might I but behold him once again
Leading to battle these intrepid bands,
Such as he was,—yea, rising from his fall
More glorious, more beloved! Soon, I believe,
Joy would accomplish then what grief hath fail'd
To do with this old heart, and I should die
Clasping his knees with such intense delight,
That when I woke in Heaven, even Heaven itself
Could have no higher happiness in store.

Thus fervently he spake, and copious tears
Ran down his cheeks. Full oft the Royal Goth,
Since he came forth again among mankind,
Had trembling lest some curious eye should read
His luminaments too closely; now he long'd
To fall upon the neck of that old man,
And give his full heart utterance. But the sense
Of duty, by the pride of self-control
Corroborate, made him steadily repress
His yearning nature. Whether Roderick live,
Crying in penitence the bitter price
Of sin, he answered, or if earth hath given
Rest to his earthly part, is only known
To him and Heaven. Dead is he to the world;
And let not these imaginations rob
His soul of thy continual prayers, whose aid
Too surely, in whatever world, he needs.
The faithful love that mitigates his fault,
Heavenward address'd, may mitigate his doom.
Living or dead, old man, be sure his soul,—
It were unworthy else, — doth hold with thine
Entire communion? Doubt not he relies
Firmly on thee, as on a father's love,
Counts on thy offices, and joins with thee
In sympathy and fervent act of faith,
Though regions, or though worlds, should intervene.

Lost as he is, to Roderick this must be
Thy first, best, dearest duty; next must be
To hold right onward in that noble path,
Which he would counsel, could his voice be heard.
Now therefore aid me, while I call upon
The Leaders and the People, that this day
We may acclaim Pelayo for our King.

THE ACCLAMATION.

Now, when from Covadonga, down the vale
Holding his way, the princely mountaineer
Came with that happy family in sight
Of Cangas and his native towers, far off
He saw before the gate, in fair array,
The assembled land. Broad banners were dis-
play'd,
And spears were sparkling to the sun; shields shone,
And helmets glitter'd, and the blaring horn,
With frequent sally of impatient joy,
Provoked the echoes round. Well he areads,
From yonder ensigns and augmented force,
That Odor and the Prinate from the west
Have brought their aid; but wherefore all were thus
Instructed as for some great festival,
He found not, till Favila's quicker eye
Catching the ready buckler, the glad boy
Leap'd up, and clapping his exultant hands,
Shouted, King! King! my father shall be King
This day! Pelayo started at the word,
And the first thought which smote him brought a sigh
For Roderick's fall; the second was of hope,
Deliverance for his country, for himself
Enduring fame, and glory for his line.
That high prophetic forethought gather'd strength,
As looking to his honor'd mate, he read
Her soul's accostant angrily; her eyes
Brighten'd; the quicken'd action of the blood
Tinged with a deeper hue her glowing cheek,
And on her lips there sat a smile which spoke
The honorable pride of perfect love,
Rejoicing, for her husband's sake, to share
The lot he chose, the peril he defied,
The lofty fortune which their faith foresaw.

Roderick, in front of all the assembled troops,
Held the broad buckler, following to the end
That sturdy purpose to which his zeal
Had this day wrought the Chiefs. Tall as himself,
Erect it stood beside him, and his hands
Hung resting on the rim. This was an hour
That sweeter'd life, repaid and recompensed
All losses; and although it could not heal
All griefs, yet laid them for a while to rest.
The active, agitating joy that fill'd
The vale, that with contagious influence spread
Through all the exulting mountaineers, that gave
New ardor to all spirits, to all breasts
Inspired fresh impulse of excited hope,
Moved every tongue, and strengthen'd every limb,—
That joy which every man reflect'd saw
From every face of all the multitude,
And heard in every voice, in every sound,
Reach'd not the King. Abo' from sympathy,
He from the solitude of his own soul
Beheld the busy scene. None shared or knew
His deep and incommunicable joy;
None but that heavenly Father, who alone
Beholds the struggles of the heart, alone
Sees and rewards the secret sacrifice.

Among the chiefs conspicuous, Urban stood,
He whom, with well-weigh'd choice, in arduous time,
To arduous office the consenting Church
Had call'd when Simered, fear-smitten, fled:
Unfaithful shepherd, who for life alone
Solicitous, forsook his flock, when most
In peril and in suffering they required
A pastor's care. Far off at Rome he dwells
In ignominy, safety, while the Church
Keeps in her annals the deserter's name,
But from the service, which with daily zeal
Devout her ancient prelacy recalls,
Blots it, unworthy to partake his prayers.
Urban, to that high station thus being call'd,
From whence disseminating fear had driven
The former primate, for the general weal
Consulting first, removed with timely care
The relics and the written works of Saints,
Toledo's choicest treasure, prized beyond
All wealth, their living and their dead remains;
These to the mountain fastnesses he bore
Of unsubdued Cantabria, there deposed,
One day to be the boast of yet unborn
Oriedo, and the dear idolatry
Of multitudes unborn. To things of state
Then giving thought mature, he held advice
With Odeo, whom of counsel competent
And firm of heart he knew. What then they plann'd,
Time and the course of overruled events
To earlier act had ripen'd, than their hope
Had ever in its gladdest dream proposed;
And here by agents unforeseen, and means
Beyond the scope of foresight brought about,
This day they saw their dearest heart's desire
Accorded them; all-able Providence
Thus having ordered all, that Spain this hour
With happiest omens, and on surest base,
Should from its ruins rear again her throne.

For acclamation and for sacring now
One form must serve, more solemn for the breach
Of old observances, whose absence here
Deeper impress'd the heart, than all display
Of regal pomp and wealth pontifical,
Of vestments radiant with their gems, and stuff
With ornament of gold; the glittering train,
The long procession, and the full-voiced choir.
This day the forms of piety and war
In strange but fitting union must combine.
Not in his alb, and cope, and orary,
Came Urban now, nor wore he mitre here,
Precious or auriphragiate; bare of head
He stood, all else in arts complete, and o'er
His gorget's iron rings the pall was thrown
Of wool undyed, which on the Apostle's tomb
Gregory had laid, and sanctified with prayer;
That from the living Pontiff and the dead,
Replete with holiness, it might impart
 Doubly derived its grace. One Page beside Bore his broad-shadow'd helm; another's hand
Held the long spear, more suited in these times
For Urban, than the crossier richly wrought
With silver foliature, the elaborate work
Of Greek or Italian artist, train'd
In the eastern capital, or sacred Rome,
Still o'er the west predominant, though fallen.
Better the spear befits the shepherd's hand
When robbers break the fold. Now he had laid
The weapon by, and held a natural cross
Of rudest form, unsheeld, even as it grew
On the near oak that morn.
Mutilate aside
Of royal rites was this solemnity.
Where was the rubied crown, the sceptre where,
And where the golden pome, the proud array
Of ermines, aureate vests, and jewelry,
With all which Leuwigild for after kings
Left, ostentation of his power? The Moor
Had made his spoil of these, and on the field
Of Xeres, where contending multitudes
Had tramph'd it beneath their bloody feet,
The standard of the Goths forgotten lay
Defiled, and rotting there in sun and rain.
Utterly is it lost; nor evermore
Herald or antiquary's patient search
Shall from forgetfulness avail to save
Those blazon'd arms, so fatally of old
Renown'd through all the afflicted Occident.
That banner, before which imperial Rome
First to a conqueror bow'd her head abased;
Which when the dreadful Hun, with all his powers,
Roderick, the Last of the Goths

XVIII.

Came like a deluge rolling o'er the world,
Made head, and in the front of battle broke
His forces, till then irresistible; which so oft
Had with alternate fortune braved the Frank;
Driven the Byzantine from the farthest shores
Of Spain, long lingering there, to final flight;
And of their kingdoms and their name despoil'd
The Vandal, and the Alan, and the Sueve;
Botted from human records is it now
As it had never been. So let it rest
With things forgotten! But Oblivion ne'er
Shall cancel from the historic roll, nor Time,
Who changeth all, obscure that fated sign,
Which brighter now than mountain snows at noon
To the bright sun displays its argent field.

Rose not the vision then upon thy soul,
O Roderick, when within that argent field
Thou saw'st the rampant Lion, red as if
Upon some noblest quarry he had roll'd,
Rejoicing in his sateate rage, and drunk
With blood and fury? Did the auguries
Which open'd on thy spirit bring with them
A perilous consolation, deadening heart
And soul, yea, worse than death— that thou through all
Thy checker'd way of life, evil and good,
Thy errors and thy virtues, hadst but been
The poor, mere instrument of things ordain'd,—
Doing or suffering, impotent alike
To will or act,—perpetually bemock'd
With semblance of volition, yet in all
Blind worker of the ways of destiny!
That thought intolerable, which in the hour
Of woe indignant conscience had repel'd,
As little might it find reception now,
When the regenerate spirit self-approved
Beheld its sacrifice complete. With faith
Elate, he saw the banner'd Lion float
Refulgent, and recall'd that thrilling shout
Which he had heard when on Romano's grave
The joy of victory woke him from his dream,
And sent him with prophetic hope to work
Fulfilment of the great events ordain'd,
There in imagination's inner world
Prefigured to his soul.

Alone, advanced
Before the ranks, the Goth in silence stood,
While from all voices round, liquouious joy
Mingled its buzz continuous with the blast
Of horn, shrill pipe, and tinkling cymbals' clash,
And sound of deafening drum. But when the Prince
Drew nigh, and Urban, with the Cross upheld,
Stepp'd forth to meet him, all at once were still'd
With instantaneous hush; as when the wind,
Before whose violent gusts the forest oaks,
Tossing like billows their tempestuous heads,
Roar like a raging sea, suspends its force,
And leaves so dead a calm that not a leaf
Moves on the silent spray. The passing air
Bore with it from the woodland undisturb'd
The ringdove's wooing, and the quiet voice
Of waters warbling near.

Son of a race

Of Heroes and of Kings! the Primate thus
Address'd him, Thou in whom the Gothic blood,
Mingling with old Iberia's, hath restored
To Spain a ruler of her native line,
Stand forth, and in the face of God and man
Swear to uphold the right, abate the wrong,
With equitable hand, protect the Cross
Whereon thy lips this day shall seal their vow,
And underneath that hallow'd symbol, wage
Holy and inextinguishable war
Against the accursed nation that usurps
Thy country's sacred soil!

So speak of me
Now and forever, O my countrymen!
Replied Pelayo; and so deal with me
Here and hereafter, thou Almighty God,
In whom I put my trust!

Lord God of Hosts,
Urban pursued, of Angels and of Men
Creator and Disposer, King of Kings,
Ruler of Earth and Heaven,—look down this day,
And multiply thy blessings on the head
Of this thy servant, chosen in thy sight!
Be thou his counsellor, his comforter,
His hope, his joy, his refuge, and his strength;
Crown him with justice, and with fortitude;
Defend him with thine all-sufficient shield;
Surround him every where with the right hand
Of thine all-present power, and with the might
Of thine omnipotence; send in his aid
Thy unseen Angels forth, that potently
And royally against all enemies
He may endure and triumph! Bless the land
O'er which he is appointed; bless thou it
With the waters of the firmament, the springs
Of the low-lying deep, the fruits which Sun
And Moon nurture for man, the precious stores
Of the eternal hills, and all the gifts
Of Earth, its wealth and fulness!

Then he took
Pelayo's hand, and on his finger placed
The mystic circlet. — With this ring, O Prince,
To our dear Spain, who like a widow now
Mourneth in desolation, I thee wed:
For weal or woe thou takest her, till death
Dispart the union. Be it blest to her,
To thee, and to thy seed!

Thus when he ceased,
He gave the awaited signal. Roderick brought
The buckler: Eight for strength and stature chosen
Came to their honord office: Round the shield
Standing, they lower it for the Chieflain's feet,
Then, slowly raised upon their shoulders, lift
The steady weight. Erect Pelayo stands,
And thrice he brandishes the burnish'd sword,
While Urban to the assembled people cries,
Spaniards, behold your King! The multitude
Then sent forth all their voice with glad acclaim,
Raising the loud Red; thrice did the word
Ring through the air, and echo from the walls
Of Cangas. Far and wide the thundering shout,
Rolling among reduplicating rocks,
Peal'd o'er the hills, and up the mountain vales.
The wild ass starting in the forest glade
Ran to the covert; the affrighted wolf
Skulk'd through the thickets to a closer brake;
The sluggish bear, awakened in his den,
Roused up and answer'd with a sullen growl,
Low-breathed and long; and at the uproar scared,
The brooding eagle from her nest took wing.

Heroes and Chiefs of old! and ye who bore
Firm to the last your part in that dread strife,
When Julian and Witiza's virile race
Betray'd their country, hear ye from yon Heaven
The joyful acclamation which proclaims
That Spain is born again!  O ye who died
In that disastrous field, and ye who fall
Embracing with a martyr's love your death
And all the flames of Aura; and all ye
Victims innumerable, whose cries unheard
On earth, but heard in Heaven, from all the land
Went up for vengeance; not in vain ye cry
Before the eternal throne! — Rest, innocent blood!
Vengeance is due, and vengeance will be given.
Rest, innocent blood? The appointed age is come!
The star that harbingers a glorious day
[here
Hath risen!  Lo, there the Avenger stands!  Lo,
He brandishes the avenging sword!  Lo, there
The avenging banner spreads its argent field
Refulgent with auspicious light! — Rejoice,
O Leon, for thy banner is displayed;
Rejoice with all thy mountains, and thy vales
And streams! And thou, O Spain, through all thy realms,
For thy deliverance cometh! Even now,
As from all sides the miscreant hosts move on; —
From southern Bethis; from the western lands,
Where through redundant vales smooth Minho flows,
And Douro pours through vine-clad hills the wealth
Of Leon's gathered waters; from the plains
Burgessian, in old time Vardulia call'd,
But in their castellated strength erelong
To be design'd Castille, a deathless name,
From midland regions where Toledo reigns
Proud city on her royal eminence,
And Tagus bends his sickle round the scene
Of Roderick's fall; from rich Rioja's fields;
Dark Ebro's shores; the walls of Saldua,
Seat of the Sedetanians old, by Rome
Cesarian and August denominate,
Now Zaragoza, in this later time
Above all cities of the earth renown'd
For duty perfectly perform'd; — East, West,
And South, where'er their gather'd multitudes,
Urged by the speed of vigorous tyranny,
With more than with commensurable strength
Haste to prevent the danger, crush the hopes
Of rising Spain, and rivet round her neck
The eternal yoke, — the ravenous fowls of heaven
Flock there presentient of their food obscene,
Following the accursed armies, whom too well
They know their purveyors long.  Pursue their march,
Ominous attendants! Ere the moon hath fill'd
Her horns, these purveyors shall become the prey,
And ye on Moorish, not on Christian flesh
Wearying your beaks, shall clog your scaly feet
With foreign gore.  Soon will ye learn to know,
Followers and harbingers of blood, the flag
Of Leon where it bids you to your feast!
Terror and flight shall with that flag go forth,
And Havock and the Dogs of War and Death
Thou Covadonga with the tainted stream
Of Deva, and thus now rejoicing vale,
Soon its primatial triumphs will behold!
Nor shall the glories of the noon be less
Than such miraculous promise of the dawn:
Witness Clavijo, where the dreadful cry
Of Santiago, then first heard o'erpower'd
The Akbar, and that holier name blasphemed
By misbelieving lips! Simancas, thou
Be witness!  And do ye your record bear,
Tolosan mountains, where the Almohade
Beheld his myriads scatter'd and destroy'd,
Like locusts swept before the stormy North!
Thou too, Salado, on that later day
When Africa received her final soil,
And thy swollen stream incarnadined, roll'd back
The invaders to the deep, — there shall they toss
Till, on their native Mauritanian shore,
The waves shall cast their bones to whiten there.

RODERICK AND RUSILLA.

When all had been perform'd, the royal Goth
Look'd up towards the chamber in the tower,
Where, gazing on the multitude below,
Alone Rusilla stood.  He met her eye,
For it was singing him amid the crowd;
Obeying then the hand which beckon'd him,
He went with heart prepared, nor shrinking now,
But arm'd with self-approving thoughts that hour.
Entering in treasurable haste, he closed the door,
And turn'd to clasp her knees; but lo, she spread
Her arms, and catching him in close embrace,
Fell on his neck, and cried, My Son, my Son! —
Erelong, controlling that first agony
With effort of strong will, backward she bent,
And gazing on his head, now shorn and gray,
And on his furrow'd countenance, exclam'd,
Still, still my Roderick! the same noble mind!
The same heroic heart!  Still, still my Son! —
Chang'd, — yet not wholly fallen, — not wholly lost,
He cried, — not wholly in the sight of Heaven
Unworthy, O my Mother, nor in thine!
She lock'd her arms again around his neck,
Saying, Lord, let me now depart in peace!
And bow'd her head again, and silently
Gave way to tears.

When that first force was spent,
And passion in exhaustion found relief; —
I knew thee, said Rusilla, when the dog
Rose from my feet, and lick'd his master's hand.
All flash'd upon me then; the instinctive sense
That goes unerringly where reason fails, —
The voice, the eye, — a mother's thoughts are quick,—
Miraculous as it seem'd, — Sieverian's tale,
RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHs.

XIX.

Whatever there is given us to enjoy,
That we enjoy forever, still the same.
Much might Count Julian’s sword achieve for Spain
And me, but more will his dear daughter’s soul
Effect in Heaven; and soon will she be there,
An Angel at the throne of Grace, to plead
In his behalf and mine.

I knew thy heart,
She answer’d, and subdued the vain desire.
It was the World’s last effort. Thou hast chosen
The better part. Yes, Roderick, even on earth
There is a praise above the monarch’s fame,
A higher, holier, more enduring praise,
And this will yet be thine!

O tempt me not,
Mother! he cried; nor let ambition take
That specious form to cheat us! What but this,
Fallen as I am, have I to offer Heaven?
The ancestral sceptre, public fame, content
Of private life, the general good report,
Power, reputation, happiness, — whatever
The heart of man desires to constitute
His earthly weal, — unerring Justice claim’d
In fornication. I with submitted soul
Bow to the righteous law and kiss the rod.
Only while thus submitted, suffering thus,
Only while offering up that name on earth,
Perhaps in trial offer’d to my choice,
Could I present myself before thy sight;
Thus only could endure myself, or fix
My thoughts upon that fearful pass, where Death
Stands in the Gate of Heaven! — Time passes on,
The healing work of sorrow is complete;
All vain desires have long been weeded out,
All vain regrets subdued; the heart is dead,
The soul is ripe and eager for her birth.
Bless me, my Mother! and come when it will
The inevitable hour, we die in peace.

So saying, on her knees he bow’d his head;
She raised her hands to Heaven and bled her child
Then bending forward, as he rose, embraced
And clasp’d him to her heart, and cried, Once more
Theodofred, with pride behold thy son!

XX.

THE MOORISH CAMP.

The times are big with tidings; every hour
From east, and west, and south, the breathless scouts
Bring swift alarums in; the gathering foe,
Advancing from all quarters to one point,
Close their wide crescent. Nor was aid of fear
To magnify their numbers needed now;
They came in myriads. Africa had pour’d
Fresh showers upon the coast of wretched Spain;
Lured from their hungry deserts to the scene
Of spoil, like vultures to the battle-field,
Fierce, unremitting, habited in crimes,
Like hidden guests the misanthropic ruffians flock
To that free feast which in their Prophet's name
Rapine and Lust proclaim'd. Nor were the chiefs
Of victory less assured, by long success
Elate, and proud of that overwhelming strength,
Which, surely they believed, as it had roll'd
Thus far uncheck'd, would roll victorious on,
Till, like the Orient, the subjected West
Should bow in reverence at Mahomed's name;
And pilgrims, from remotest Arctic shores,
Tread with religious feet the burning sands
Of Araby, and Mecca's stony soil.

Proud of his part in Roderick's overthrow,
Their leader Abuleneem came, a man
Immitigable, long in war renown'd.
Here Mangues comes, who on the conquer'd walls
Of Cordoba, by treacherous fear betray'd,
Planted the meany standard: Ibrahim here,
He, who, by Genil and in Darro's vales,
Had for the Moors the fairest portion won
Of all their spoils, fairest and best maintain'd,
And to the Alpuxarras given in trust
His other name, through them preserved in song.
Here too Alcachán, vaunting his late deeds
At Auria, all her children by the sword
Cuts off, her halftakes razed, her towers laid low,
Her dwellings by devouring flames consumed,
Bloody and hard of heart, he little ween'd,
Vain-bold chief! that from those fatal flames
The fire of retribution had gone forth,
Which soon should wrap him round.

The renegades
Here too were seen, Ebba and Sissibert;
A spurious brood, but of their parent's crimes
True heirs, in guilt begetten, and in ill
Train'd up. The same unnatural rage that turn'd
Their swords against their country, made them seek,
Unmindful of their wretched mother's end,
Pelayo's life. No enmity is like
Domestic hatred. For his blood they thirst,
As if that sacrifice might satisfy
Witiza's guilty ghost, efface the shame
Of their adulterous birth, and one crime more
Crowning a hideous course, emanieate
Thenceforth their spirits from all earthly fear.
This was their only care; but other thoughts
Were rankling in that elder villain's mind,
Their kinsman Orpas, he of all the crew
Who in this fatal visitation fell,
The foulest and the falsest wretch that e'er
Renounced his baptism. From his cherish'd views
Of royalty cut off, he coveted
Count Julian's wide domains, and hopeless now
To gain them through the daughter, laid his toils
Against the father's life,—the instrument
Of his ambition first, and now design'd
Its victim. To this end, with cautious hints,
At favoring season ventured, he possess'd
The leader's mind; then, subtly fostering
The doubts himself had sown, with bolder charge
He bade him warily regard the Count,
Lest underneath an outward show of faith
The heart uncircumcised were Christian still;
Else, wherefore had Florida not obey'd
Her dear-loved sire's example, and embraced
The saving truth? Else, wherefore was her hand,
Plighted to him so long, so long withheld,
Till she had found a fitting hour to fly
With that audacious Prince, who now, in arms,
Defied the Calif's power;—for who could doubt
That in his company she fled, perhaps
The mover of his flight? What if the Count
Himself had plan'd the evasion which he reign'd
In sorrow to condemn? What if she went,
A pledge assured, to tell the mountaineers
That when they met the Mussulmen in the heat
Of fight, her father, passing to their side,
Would draw the victory with him?—Thus he breathed
Fiend-like in Abuleneem's ear his schemes
Of murderous malice; and the course of things,
Erelong, in part approving his discourse,
Aided his aim, and gave his wishes weight.
For scarce on the Asturian territory
Had they set foot, when, with the speed of fear,
Count Eudon, nothing doubting that their force
Would like a flood sweep all resistance down,
Hasten'd to plead his merits;—he alone,
Found faithful in obedience through reproach.
And danger, when the madd'nd multitude
Hurried their chiefs along, and high and low
With one infectious frenzy seized, provoked
The invincible in arms. Pelayo led
The raging crew,—he doubtless the prime spring
Of all these perilous movements; and 'twas said
He brought the assurance of a strong support,
Count Julian's aid, for in his company
From Cordoba, Count Julian's daughter came.

Thus Eudon spake before the assembled chiefs:
When instantly a stern and wrathful voice
Replied, I know Pelayo never made
That senseless promise! He who raised the tale
Lies foully; but the bitterest enemy
That ever hunted for Pelayo's life
Hath never with the charge of falsehood touch'd
His name.

The Baron had not recognized
Till then, beneath the turban's shadowing folds,
Julian's swart visage, where the fiery skies
Of Africa, through many a year's long course.
Had set their hue in burn't. Something he sought
In quick excuse to say of common fame,
Lightly believed and hastily diffus'd,
And that no enmity had moved his speech
Repeating rumor's tale. Julian replied,
Count Eudon, neither for thyself nor me
Excuse is needed here. The path I tread
Is one wherein there can be no return,
No pause, no looking back! A choice like mine
For time and for eternity is made,
Once and forever! and as easily
The breath of vain report might build again
The throne which my just vengeance overthrew,
As in the Calif and his Captain's mind
Affect the opinion of my well-tried truth.
The tidings which thou givest me of my child
Touch me more vitally; bad though they be,
A secret apprehension of aught worse
Makes me with joy receive them.

Then the Count
To Abulcaecem turn'd his speech, and said,
I pray thee, Chief, give me a messenger
By whom I may to this unhappy child
Despatch a father's bidding, such as yet
May win her back. What I would say requires
No veil of privacy; before ye all
The errand shall be given.

Boldly he spake,
Yet wary in that show of open truth,
For well he knew what dangers girt him round
Amid the faithless race. Blind with revenge,
For them in madness had he sacrificed
His name, his baptism, and his native land,
To feel, still powerful as he was, that life
Hung on their jealous favor. But his heart
Approved him now, where love, too long restrain'd,
Resumed its healing influence, leading him
Right on with no misgiving. Chiefs, he said,
Hear me, and let your wisdom judge between
Me and Prince Orpas!—Known it is to all,
Too well, what mortal injury provoked
My spirit to that vengeance which your aid
So signally hath given. A covenant
We made when first our purpose we combined,
That he should have Florinda for his wife,
My only child; so should she be, I thought,
Reveaged and honor'd best. My word was given
Truly, nor did I cease to use all means
Of counsel or command, entreating her
Sometimes with tears, seeking sometimes with threats
Of an offended father's curse to enforce
Obedience; that, she said, the Christian law
Forbade; moreover she had vow'd herself
A servant to the Lord. In vain I strove
To win her to the Prophet's saving faith,
Using perhaps a rigor to that end
Beyond permitted means, and to my heart,
Which loved her dearer than its own life-blood,
Abhorrent. Silently she suffer'd all;
Or, when I urged her with most vehemence,
Only replied, I knew her fix'd resolve,
And craved my patience but a little while,
Till death should set her free. Touch'd as I was,
I yet persisted, till at length, to escape
The ceaseless importunity, she fled:
And verily I fear'd, until this hour,
My rigor to some fearfuller resolve
Than flight, had driven my child. Chiefs, I appeal
To each and all, and, Orpas, to thyself
Especially, if, having thus essay'd
All means that law and nature have allow'd
To bend her will, I may not rightfully
Hold myself free, that promise being void
Which cannot be fulfill'd.

Thou sayest then,
Orpas replied, that from her false belief
Her stubborn opposition drew its force.
I should have thought that from the ways corrupt
Of these idolatrous Christians, little care
Might have sufficed to wean a duteous child,
The example of a parent so beloved
Leading the way; and yet I will not doubt
Thou didst enforce with all sincerity
And holy zeal upon thy daughter's mind
The truths of Islam.

Julian knit his brow,
And scowling on the insidious renegade,
He answer'd, By what reasoning my poor mind
Was from the old idolatry reclaim'd,
None better knows than Seville's mitred chief,
Who, first renouncing errors which he taught,
Led me his follower to the Prophet's pale.
Thy lessons I repeated as I could;
Of graven images, unnatural vows,
False records, tainting creeds, and juggling priests,
Who, making sanctity the cloak of sin,
Laugh'd at the fools on whose credulity
They fatt'n'd. To these arguments, whose worth
Prince Orpas, least of all men, should impeach,
I added, like a soldier bred in arms,
And to the subtleties of schools unused,
The flagrant fact, that Heaven with victory,
Where'er they turn'd, attested and approved
The chosen Prophet's arms. If thou wert still
The mitred Metropolitan, and I
Some wretch of Arian or of Hebrew race,
Thy proper business then might be to pry
And question me for lurking flaws of faith.
We Musulmwn, Prince Orpas, live beneath
A wiser law, which with the iniquities
Of thine old craft, hath abrogated this
Its foulest practice!

As Count Julian ceased,
From underneath his black and gather'd brow
There went a look, which with these wary words
Bore to the heart of that false renegade
Their whole envenom'd meaning. Haughtily
Withdrawing then his alter'd eyes, he said,
Too much of this! Return we to the sun
Of my discourse. Let Abulcaecem say,
In whom the Caliph speaks, if with all faith
Having essay'd in vain all means to win
My child's consent, I may not hold henceforth
The covenant discharged.

The Moor replied,
Well hast thou said, and rightly mayst assure
Thy daughter that the Prophet's holy law
Forbids compulsion. Give thine errand now;
The messenger is here.

Then Julian said,
Go to Felayo, and from him entreat
Admittance to my child, where'er she be.
Say to her, that her father solemnly
Annuls the covenant with Orpas pledged,
Nor with solicitations, nor with threats,
Will urge her more, nor from that liberty
Of faith restrain her, which the Prophet's law,
Liberal as Heaven from whence it came, to all
Indulges. Tell her that her father says
His days are number'd, and beseeches her
By that dear love, which from her infancy
Still he hath bore her, growing as she grew,
Nursed in our race and strengthen'd in our woe,
She will not in the evening of his life
Leave him forsaken and alone. Enough
Of sorrow, tell her, have her injuries
Brought on her father's head; let not her act
Thus aggravate the burden. Tell her, too,
That when he pray'd her to return, he wept
Profusely as a child; but bitterer tears
Than ever fell from childhood's eyes, were those
Which traced his hardy cheeks.

With faltering voice
He spake, and after he had ceased from speech
His lip was quivering still. The Moorish chief
Then to the messenger his bidding gave.
Say, cried he, to these rebel infidels,
Thus Abulecceem, in the Caliph's name
Exhorteth them: Repeat and be forgiven!
Nor think to stop the dreadful storm of war,
Which, conquering and to conquer, must fulfil
Its destined circle, rolling eastward now,
Back from the subjugated west, to sweep
Thrones and dominions down, till in the bond
Of unity all nations join, and Earth
Acknowledge, as she sees one Sun in heaven,
One God, one Chief, one Prophet, and one Law.
Jerusalem, the holy City, bows
To holy Mecca's creed; the Crescent shines
Triumphant o'er the eternal pyramids;
On the cold altars of the worshippers
Of Fire, moss grows, and reptiles leave their slime;
The African idolatries are fallen,
And Europe's senseless gods of stone and wood
Have had their day. Tell these misguided men,
A moment for repentance yet is left,
And mercy the submitted neck will spare
Before the sword is drawn; but once unsheath'd,
Let Auria witness how that dreadful sword
Accomplishest its work! They little know
The Moors, who hope in battle to withstand
Their valor, or in flight escape their rage!
Amid our deserts, we hunt down the birds
Of heaven,— wings do not save them! Nor shall rocks,
And holds, and fastnesses, avail to save
These mountaineers. Is not the Earth the Lord's?
And we, his chosen people, whom he sends
To conquer and possess it in his name?

XXI.

THE FOUNTAIN IN THE FOREST.

The second eve had closed upon their march
Within the Asturian border, and the Moors
Had pitch'd their tents amid an open wood
Upon the mountain side. As day grew dim,
Their scatter'd fires shine with distincter light
Among the trees, above whose top the smoke
Diffused itself, and stain'd the evening sky.
Ere long the stir of occupation ceased,
And all the murmur of the busy host,
Subsiding, died away, as through the camp
The crier, from a knoll, proclaim'd the hour
For prayer appointed, and with sonorous voice,
Thrice, in melodious modulation full,
 Pronounced the highest name. There is no God
But God, he cried; there is no God but God!
Mahommed is the Prophet of the Lord!

Come ye to prayer! to prayer! The Lord is great!
There is no God but God!— Thus he pronounced
His ritual form, mingling with holiest truth
The audacious name accursed. The multitude
Made their ablutions in the mountain stream
Obedient, then their faces to the earth
Bent in formality of easy prayer.

An arrow's flight above that mountain stream
There was a little glade, where underneath
A long, smooth, mossy stone a fountain rose.
An oak grew near, and with its ample boughs
O'er canopied the spring; its fretted roots
Emboss'd the bank, and on their tufted bark
Grew plants which love the moisture and the shade;
Short ferns, and longer leaves of wrinkled green
Which bent toward the spring, and when the wind
Made itself felt, just touch'd with gentle dip
The glassy surface, ruffled never but then,
Save when a bubble rising from the depth
Burst, and with faintest circles mark'd its place,
Or if an insect skimm'd it with its wing,
Or when in heavier drops the gather'd rain
Fell from the oak's high bower. The mountain roe,
When, having drank there, he would bound across,
Drew up upon the bank his meeting feet,
And put forth half his force. With silent lapse
From thence through mossy banks the water stole,
Then murmuring hastened to the glen below.
Diana might have loved in that sweet spot
To take her nointide rest; and when she stoop'd
Hot from the chase to drink, well pleased had seen
Her own bright crescent, and the brighter face
It crown'd, reflect'd there

Beside that spring
Count Julian's tent was pitch'd upon the glade;
There his ablutions Moor-like he perform'd,
And Moor-like knelt in prayer, bowing his head
Upon the mossy bank. There was a sound
Of voices at the tent when he arose.
And lo! with hurried step a woman came
Towards him; rightly then his heart pressed,
And ere he could behold her countenance,
Florinda knelt, and with uplifted arms
Embraced her sires. He raised her from the ground,
Kiss'd her, and clasp'd her to his heart, and said,
Thou hast not then forsaken me, my child!
How'er the inexorable will of Fate
May, in the world which is to come, divide
Our everlasting destinies, in this
Thou wilt not, O my child, abandon me!
And then, with deep and interrupted voice,
Nor seeking to restrain his copious tears,
My blessing be upon thy head, he cried;
A father's blessing! Though all faiths were false,
It should not lose its worth!— She lock'd her hands
Around his neck, and gazing in his face
Through streaming tears, exclaimed, Oh, never more,
Here or hereafter, never let us part!
And breathing then a prayer in silence forth,
The name of Jesus trembled on her tongue.
Whom hast thou there? cried Julian, and drew back,
Seeing that near them stood a meagre man
In humble garb, who rested with raised hands
On a long staff, bending his head like one
Who, when he hears the distant vesper-bell,
Halts by the way, and, all unseen of men,
Offers his homage in the eye of Heaven.
She answered, Let not my dear father frown
In anger on his child! Thy messenger
Told me that I should be restrain’d no more
From liberty of faith, which the new law
Indulged to all; how soon my hour might come
I knew not, and although that hour will bring Few terrors, yet methinks I would not be Without a Christian comforter in death.

A Priest! exclaimed the Count, and drawing back,
Stoop’d for his turban, that he might not lack
Some outward symbol of apostasy;
For still in war his wonted arms he wore,
Nor for the cemetery had changed the sword
Accustomed to his hand. He covered now
His short, gray hair, and under the white folds,
His swarthy brow, which gather’d as he rose,
Darken’d. Oh, frown not thus! Florinda said;
A kind and gentle counsellor is this,
One who pours balm into a wounded soul,
And mitigates the griefs he cannot heal.
I told him I had vow’d to pass my days
A servant of the Lord, yet that my heart,
Hearing the message of thy love, was drawn
With powerful yearnings back. Follow thy heart—
It answers to the call of duty here,
He said, nor canst thou better serve the Lord
Than at thy father’s side.

Count Julian’s brow,
While thus she spake, insensibly relax’d.
A Priest, cried he, and thus with even hand
Weigh vows and natural duty in the scale?
In what old heresy hast he been train’d?
Or in what wilderness hath he escaped
The domineering Prelate’s fire and sword?
Come hither, man, and tell me who thou art!

A sinner, Roderick, drawing nigh, replied,
Brought to repentance by the grace of God,
And trusting for forgiveness through the blood
Of Christ in humble hope.

A smile of scorn
Julian assumed, but merely from the lips
It came; for he was troubled while he gazed
On the strong countenance and thoughtful eye
Before him. A new law hath been proclaim’d,
Said he, which overthrows in its career
The Christian altars of idolatry.
What think’st thou of the Prophet?— Roderick
Made answer, I am in the Moorish camp,
And he who asketh is a Mussulman.
How then should I reply?— Safely, rejoind
The renegade, and freely mayst thou speak.
To all that Julian asks. Is not the yoke
Of Mecca easy, and its burden light?—

Spain hath not found it so, the Goth replied,
And groaning, turn’d away his countenance.

Count Julian knits his brow, and stood awhile
Regarding him with meditative eye
In silence. Thou art honest too! he cried;
Why, ’twas in quest of such a man as this
That the old Grecoan search’d by lantern light,
In open day, the city’s crowded streets;
So rare he deem’d the virtue. Honesty,
And sense of natural duty in a Priest!
Now for a miracle, ye Saints of Spain!
I shall not pry too closely for the wires,
For, seeing what I see, ye have me now
In the believing mood!

O blessed Saints,
Florinda cried, ’tis from the bitterness,
Not from the hardness of the heart, he speaks!
Hear him! and in your goodness give the scoff
The virtue of a prayer! So saying, she raised
Her hands, in fervent action clasped, to Heaven,
Then as, still clasped, they fell, toward her sire
She turn’d her eyes, beseeching him through tears
The look, the gesture, and that silent weep,
Soften’d her father’s heart, which in this hour
Was open to the influences of love.

Priest, thy vocation were a blessed one,
Said Julian, if its mighty power were used
To lessen human misery, not to swell
The mournful sum, already all-too-great.
If, as thy former counsel should imply,
Thou art not one who would for his craft’s sake
Fret with corrosives and inflame the wound,
Which the poor sufferer brings to thee in trust
That thou with virtuous balm wilt bind it up,—
If, as I think, thou art not one of those Whose villainy makes honest men turn Moors,
Thou wilt answer with unbiased mind
What I shall ask thee, and exorcise thus
The sick and feverish conscience of my child,
From inbred phantoms, fiend-like, which possess
Her innocent spirit. Children we are all
Of one great Father, in whatever clime
Nature or chance hath cast the seeds of life,
All tongues, all colors; neither after death
Shall we be sorted into languages
And tints,—white, black, and tawny, Greek and Goth.

Northmen and offspring of hot Africa,
The All-Father, He in whom we live and move,
He the indifferent Judge of all, regards
Nations, and hues, and dialects alike;
According to their works shall they be judged,
When even-handed Justice in the scale
Their good and evil weighs. All creeds, I wren,
Agree in this, and hold it orthodox.

Roderick, perceiving here that Julian paused,
As if he waited for acknowledgment
Of that plain truth, in motion of assent
Inclined his brow complacently, and said,
Even so! What follows?—This, resumed the Count;
That creeds, like colors, being but accident,
Are therefore in the scale imponderable;—
Thou seest my meaning; — That from every faith,
As every clown, there is a way to Heaven;
And thou and I may meet in Paradise.

Oh grant it, God! cried Roderick fervently,
And smote his breast. — Oh grant it, gracious God!
Through the dear blood of Jesus, grant that he
And I may meet before the mercy-throne!
That were a triumph of Redeeming Love,
For which admiring Angels would renew
Their hallelujahs through the choir of Heaven!
Man! quoth Count Julian, wherefore art thou moved
To this strange passion? — I require of thee
Thy judgment, not thy prayers:
Be not displeased!
In gentle voice subdued the Goth replies;
A prayer, from whatsoever lips it flow,
By thine own rule should find the way to Heaven,
So that the heart in its sincerity
Straight forward breathe it forth. — I, like thyself,
Am all untrain’d to subtleties of speech,
Nor competent of this great argument
Thou openest; and perhaps shall answer thee
Wide of the words, but to the purport known.
There are to whom the light of gospel truth
Hath never reach’d: of such I needs must deem
As of the sons of men who had their day
Before the light was given. — But, Count, for those Who, born amid the light, to darkness turn,
Willoful in error, — I dare only say,
God doth not leave the unhappy soul without
An inward monitor, and till the grave
Open, the gate of mercy is not closed

Priest-like! the renegade replied, and shook
His head in scorn. — What is not in the craft
Is error, and for error there shall be
No mercy found in Him whom yet ye name
The Merciful!

Now God forbid, rejoind
The fallen King, that one who stands in need
Of mercy for his sins should argue thus
Of error! Thou hast said that thou and I,
Thou dying in name a Mussulman, and I
A servant of the Cross, may meet in Heaven.
Time was when in our fathers’ ways we walk’d
Regardlessly alike; faith being to each —
For so far thou hast reason’d rightly — like
Our country’s fashion and our mother-tongue,
Of mere inheritance, — no thing of choice
In judgment fix’d, nor rooted in the heart.
Me have the arrows of calamity
Sore stricken; sinking underneath the weight
Of sorrow, yet more heavily oppress’d
Beneath the burden of my sins, I turn’d
In that dread hour to Him who from the Cross
Calls to the heavy-laden. — There I found
Relief and comfort; there I have my hope,
My strength, and my salvation; there, the grave
Ready beneath my feet, and Heaven in view,
I to the King of Terrors say, Come, Death, —
Come quickly! Thou too wert a stricken deer,
Julian, — God pardon the unhappy hand
That wounded thee! — but whither didst thou go
For healing? — Thou hast turn’d away from Him,
Who saith, Forgive, as ye would be forgiven;
And, that the Moorish sword might do thy work,
Received the creed of Mecca: with what fruit
For Spain, let tell her cities sack’d, her sons
Slaughter’d, her daughters than thine own dear child
More foully wrong’d, more wretched! — For thyself,
Thou hast had thy fill of vengeance, and, perhaps,
The cup was sweet, but it hath left behind
A bitter relish! Gladly would thy soul
Forget the past; as little canst thou bear
To send into futurity thy thoughts.
And for this Now, what is it, Count, but fear, —
However bravely thou mayst bear thy front, —
Danger, remorse, and stinging obloquy?
One only hope, one only remedy,
One only refuge yet remains. — My life
Is at thy mercy, Count! Call, if thou wilt,
Thy men, and to the Moors deliver me!
Or strike thyself! Death were from any hand
A welcome gift; from thine, and in this cause,
A boon indeed! — My latest words on earth
Should tell thee that all sins may be effaced,
Bid thee repent, have faith, and be forgiven!
Strike, Julian, if thou wilt, and send my soul
To intercede for thine, that we may meet,
Thou, and thy child, and I, beyond the grave.

Thus Roderick spake, and spread his arms as if
He offer’d to the sword his willing breast,
With looks of passionate persuasion fix’d
Upon the Count, who, in his first access
Of anger, seem’d as though he would have call’d
His guards to seize the Priest. The attitude
Disarm’d him, and that fervent zeal sincere,
And more than both, the look and voice, which like
A mystery troubled him. Florinda too
Hung on his arm with both her hands, and cried,
O father, wrong him not! he speaks from God!
Life and salvation are upon his tongue!
Judge thou the value of that faith whereby,
Reflecting on the past, I murmur not,
And to the end of all look on with joy
Of hope assured!

Peace, innocent! replied
The Count, and from her hold withdrew his arm;
Then, with a gather’d brow of mournfulness
Rather than wrath, regarding Roderick, said,
Thou pronkest that all sins may be effaced;
Is there forgiveness, Christian, in thy creed?
For Roderick’s crime? — — For Roderick and for thee,
Count Julian, said the Goth, and, as he spake,
Trembled through every fibre of his frame,
The gate of Heaven is open. — Julian threw
His wrathful hand aloft, and cried, Away!
Earth could not hold us both, nor can one Heaven
Contain my deadliest enemy and me!

My father, say not thus! Florinda cried;
I have forgiven him! I have pray’d for him!
For him, for thee, and for myself I pour
One constant prayer to Heaven! In passion then
She knelt, and bending back, with arms and face
Raised toward the sky, the supplicant exclaim'd,
Redeemer, heal his heart! It is the grief
Which fester there that hath bewilder'd him!
Save him, Redeemer! by thy precious death
Save, save him, O my God! Then on her face
She fell, and thus with bitterness pursued
In silent throes her agonizing prayer.

Afflict not thus thyself, my child, the Count
Exclaim'd; O dearest, be thou comforted;
Set but thy heart at rest, I ask no more!
Peace, dearest, peace! — and weeping as he spake,
He knelt to raise her. Roderick also knelt;
Be comforted, he cried, and rest in faith
That God will hear thy prayers! they must be heard.
He who could doubt the worth of prayers like thine,
May doubt of all things! Sainted as thou art
In sufferings here, this miracle will be
Thy work and thy reward!

Then, raising her,
They seated her upon the fountain's brink,
And there beside her sat. The moon had risen,
And that thir spring lay blackened half in shade,
Half like a burnish'd mirror in her light.
By that reflected light Count Julian saw
That Roderick's face was bathed with tears, and pole
As monumental marble. Friend, said he,
Whether thy faith be fabulous, or seditious
Indeed from Heaven, its dearest gift to man,
 Thy heart is true: and had the mitred Priest
Of Seville been like thee, or lustest thou hold
The place he fill'd?—but this is idle talk, —
Things are as they will be; and we, poor slaves,
Fret in the harness as we may, must drag
The Car of Destiny where'er she drives,
Inexorable and blind!

Oh wretched man!
Cried Roderick, if thou seestkest to assuage
Thy wounded spirit with that deadly drug,
Hell's sublimest venom; look to thine own heart,
Where thou hast Will and Conscience to believe
This juggling sophistry, and lead thee yet
Through penitence to Heaven!

Whate'er it be
That governs us, in mournful tone the Count
Replied, Fate, Providence, or Allah's will,
Or reckless Fortune, still the effect the same,
A world of evil and of misery!
Look where we will, we meet it; wheresoe'er
We go, we bear it with us. Here we sit
Upon the margin of this peaceful spring,
And oh! what volumes of calamity
Would be unfolded here, if either heart
Laid open its sad records! Tell me not
Of goodness! Either in some freak of power
This frame of things was fashion'd, then cast off!
To take its own wild course, the sport of chance;
Or the bad Spirit o'er the Good prevails,
And in the eternal conflict hath arisen
Lord of the ascendant!

Rightly wouldst thou say,
Were there no world but this! the Goth replied,
The happiest child of earth that e'er was mark'd
to be the minion of prosperity,
Richest in corporal gifts and wealth of mind,
Honour and fame attending him abroad,
Peace and all dear domestic joys at home,
And sunshine to the evening of his days
Closed in without a cloud,—even such a man
Would from the gloom and horror of his heart
Confirm thy fate! thought, were this world all!
Oh! who could bear the haunting mystery,
If death and retribution did not solve
The riddle, and to heaven'shest harmony
Reduce the seeming chaos?—Here we see
The water at its well-head; clear it is,
Not more transcendent the invisible air;
Pure as an infant's thoughts; and here to life
And good directed all its uses serve.
The herb grows greener on its brink; sweet flowers
Bend o'er the stream that feeds their freshened roots;
The red-breast loves it for his wintry haunts;
And when the buds begin to open forth,
Builds near it with his mate their brooding nest;
The thirsty stag, with widening nostrils, there
Invigorated draws his copious draught;
And there, amid its flags, the wild boar stands,
Nor suffering wrong nor meditating hurt.
Through woodlands wild and solitary fields,
Unsubdued it holds its bounteous course;
But when it reaches the resorts of men,
The service of the city there defiles
The tainted stream; corrupt and foul it flows,
Through loathsome banks and o'er a bed impure,
Till in the sea, the appointed end to which
Through all its way it hastens, 'tis received,
And, losing all pollution, mingles there
In the wide world of waters. So it is
With the great stream of things, if all were seen;
Good the beginning, good the end shall be,
And transitory evil only make
The good end happier. Ages pass away,
Thrones fall, and nations disappear, and worlds
Grow old and go to wreck; the soul alone
Endures, and what she chooseth for herself,
The arbiter of her own destiny,
That only shall be permanent.

But guilt,
And all our suffering? said the Count. The Goth
Replied, Repentance taketh sin away,
Death remedies the rest. — Soothed by the strain
Of such discourse, Julian was silent then,
And sat contemplating. Florinda too
Was calm'd. If sordid experience may be thought
To teach the uses of adversity,
She said, alas! who better learn'd than I
In that sad school? Methinks, if ye would know
How visitations of calamity
Affect the pious soul, 'tis shown ye there!
Look yonder at that cloud, which, through the sky
Sailing alone, doth cross, in her career,
The rolling Moon! I watch'd it as it came,
And deem'd the deep opake would blot her beams;
But, melting like a wreath of snow, it hangs
In folds of wavy silver round, and clothes
The orb with richer beauties than her own,
Then passing, leaves her in her light serene.
Thus having said, the pious sufferer sat,
Beholding with fix’d eyes that lovely orb,
Till quiet tears confused in dazy light
The broken moonbeams. They too by the toil
Of spirit, as by travail of the day
Subdued, were silent, yielding to the hour.
The silver cloud diffusing slowly past,
And now into its airy elements
Resolved is gone; while through the azure depth
Alone in heaven the glorious Moon pursues
Her course appointed, with indifferent beams
Shining upon the silent hills around
And the dark tents of that unholy host,
Who, all unconscious of impending fate,
Take their last slumber there. The camp is still;
The fires have moulder’d, and the breeze which stirs
The soft and snowy embers, just lays bare
At times a red and evanescent light,
Or for a moment wakes a feeble flame.
They by the fountain hear the stream below,
Whose murmur, as the wind arose or fell,
Fuller or fainter reach the ear attuned.
And now the nightingale, not distant far,
Began her solitary song, and pour’d
To the cold moon a richer, stronger strain
Than that with which the lyric bard salutes
The new-born day. Her deep and thrilling song  Seem’d with its piercing melody to reach
The soul, and in mysterious unison
Blend with all thoughts of gentleness and love.
Their hearts were open to the healing power
Of nature; and the splendor of the night,
The flow of waters, and that sweetest lay
Came to them like a copious evening dew
Falling on vernal herbs which thirst for rain.

XXII.

THE MOORISH COUNCIL.

Thus they beside the fountain sat, of food
And rest forgetful, when a messenger
Summon’d Count Julian to the Leader’s tent.
In council there, at that late hour, he found
The assembled Chiefs, on sudden tidings call’d
Of unexpected weight from Cordoba.
Jealous that Abdalaiz had assumed
A regal state, affecting in his court
The forms of Gothic sovereignty, the Moors,
Whom artful spirits of ambitious mould
Stir’d up, had risen against him in revolt:
And he who late had in the Caliph’s name
RULED from the Ocean to the Pyrenees,
A mutidle and headless carcass now,
From pitying hands received beside the road
A hasty grave, scarce hidden there from dogs
And ravens, nor from wintry rains secure.
She, too, who in the wreck of Spain preserved
Her queenly rank, the wife of Roderick first,
Of Abdalaiz after, and to both
Alike unhappy, shared the ruin now
Her counsels had brought on; for she had led
The infaluate Moor, in dangerous vaunttery,
To these aspiring forms,—so should he gain
Respect and honor from the Mussulman,
She said, and that the obedience of the Goths
Follow’d the sceptre. In an evil hour
She gave the counsel, and in evil hour
He lent a willing ear; the popular rage
Fell on them both; and they to whom her name
Had been a mark for mockery and reproach,
Shuddr’d with human horror at her fate.
Ayub was heading the wild anarchy;
But where the counsels of authority
Is wanting, all things there are dislocate:
The mutinous soldier, by every cry
Of rumor set in wild career, were driven
By every gust of passion, setting up
One hour, what in the impulse of the next,
Equally unreasoning, they destroy’d; thus all
Was in misrule where uprour gave the law,
And ere from far Damascen they could learn
The Caliph’s pleasure, many a moon must pass.
What should be done? should Abdalaiz march
To Cordoba, and in the Caliph’s name
Assume the power which to his rank in arms
Rightly devolved, restoring thus the reign
Of order? or pursue, with quicken’d speed,
The end of this great armament, and crush
Rebellion first, then to domestic ills
Apply his undivide’d mind and force
Victorious? What, in this emergency,
Was Julian’s counsel, Abdalaiz ask’d;
Should they accomplish soon their enterprise?
Or would the insurgent infidels prolong
The contest, seeking by protracted war
To weary them, and trusting in the strength
Of these wild hills?

Julian replied, The Chief
Of this revolt is wary, resolute,
Of approved worth in war: a desperate part
He for himself deliberately hath chosen,
Confiding in the hereditary love
Borne to him by these hardy mountaineers —
A love which his own noble qualities
Have strengthen’d so that every heart is his.
When ye can bring them to the open proof
Of battle, ye will find them in his cause
Lavish of life; but well they know the strength
Of their own fastnesses, the mountain paths
Impervious to pursuit, the vantages
Of rock, and pass, and woodland, and ravine;
And hardly will ye tempt them to forego
These natural aids wherein they put their trust
As in their stubborn spirit, each alike
Deem’d by themselves invincible, and so
By Roman found and Goth — beneath whose sway
Slowly persuaded rather than subdued
They came, and still through every change retain’d
Their manners obstinate and barbarous speech.
My counsel, therefore, is, that we secure
With strong increase of force the adjacent posts,
And chiefly Gregio, leaving them so mann’d
As may abate the hope of enterprise,
Their strength being told. Time, in a strife like this,
Becomes the ally of those who trust in him;
Make then with time your covenant. Old feuds
May disunite the chiefs: some may be gain'd
By fair entreaties, others by the stroke
Of nature, or of policy, cut off.
This was the counsel which in Cordova
I offer'd Abdulaziz: in ill hour
Rejecting it, he sent upon this war
His father's faithful friend! Dark are the ways
Of Destiny! Had I been at his side,
Old Muza would not now have mourn'd his age
Left childless, nor had Arab dared defy
The Caliph's represented power. The case
Calls for thine instant presence, with the weight
Of thy legitimate authority.

Julian, said Orpas, turning from beneath
His turban to the Count a crafty eye,
Thy daughter is return'd; doth she not bring
Some tidings of the movements of the foe?
The Count replied, When child and parent meet
First reconciled from discontent which wrung
The hearts of both, ill should their converse be
Of warlike matters! There hath been no time
For such inquiries, neither should I think
To ask her touching that for which I know
She hath neither eye nor thought.

There was a time —
Orpas with smile malignant thus replied —
When in the progress of the Caliph's arms
Count Julian's daughter had an interest
Which touch'd her nearly! But her turn is served,
And hatred of Prince Orpas may beget
Indifference to the cause. Yet Destiny
Still guideth to the service of the faith
The wayward heart of woman; for as one
Delivered Roderick to the avenging sword,
So hath another at this hour betray'd
Pelayo to his fall. His sister came
At nightfall to my tent a fugitive.
She tells me that, on learning our approach,
The rebel to a cavern in the hills
Had sent his wife and children, and with them
Those of his followers, thinking, there conceal'd,
They might be safe. She, moved by injuries
Which stung her spirit, on the way escaped,
And for revenge will guide us. In reward
She asks his brother's forti'tude of lands
In marriage with Numacien: something too
Touching his life, that for her services
It might be spared, she said; — an after-thought
To save decorum, and if conscience wake,
Serve as a sop; but when the sword shall smite
Pelayo and his dangerous race, I ween,
That a thin kerchief will dry all the tears
The Lady Guisla shed!

'Tis the old taint!
Said Julian mournfully; from her mother's womb
She brought the inbred wickedness which now
In ripe infection blossoms. Woman, woman,
Still to the Goths art thou the instrument
Of overthrow; thy virtue and thy vice
Fatal alike to them!
Say rather, cried
The insidious renegade, that Allah thus
By woman punisheth the idolatry
Of those who raise a woman to the rank
Of godhead, calling on their Mary's name
With senseless prayers. In vain shall they invoke
Her trusted succor now! Like silly birds,
By fear betray'd, they fly into the toils;
And this Pelayo, who, in lengthen'd war
Balling our force, has thought perhaps to reign
Prince of the Mountains, when we hold his wife
And offspring at our mercy, must himself
Come to the lure.

Enough, the Leader said;
This unexpected work of favoring Fate
Opens an easy way to our desires,
And renders further counsel needless now.
Great is the Prophet whose protecting power
Goes with the faithful forth! The rebels' days
Are number'd; Allah hath deliver'd them
Into our hands!

So saying he arose;
The Chiefs withdrew; Orpas alone remain'd
Obedient to his indicated will.
The event, said Abulcacem, hath approved
Thy judgment in all points; his daughter comes
At the first summons, even as thou saidst;
Her errand with the insurgents done, she brings
Their well-concerted project back, a safe
And unexpected messenger: — the Moor
The shallow Moor — must see and not perceive;
Must hear and understand not; yea, must bear,
Poor easy fool, to serve their after-mirth,
A part in his own undoing! But just Heaven
With this unlook'd-for incident hath marr'd
Their complots, and the sword shall cut this web
Of treason.

Well, the renegade replied,
Thou knowest Count Julian's spirit, quick in wiles,
In act audacious. Bafiled now, he thinks
Either by instant warning to apprise
The rebels of their danger, or preserve
The hostages when fallen into our power,
Till secret craft contrive, or open force
Win their enlargement. Haply, too, he dreams
Of Cordoba, the avenger and the friend
Of Abdulaziz, in that cause to arm
Moor against Moor, preparing for himself
The victory o'er the enfeebled conquerors.
Success in treason hath inboden'd him,
And power but serves him for fresh treachery,
False to Roderick first, and to the Caliph now.

The guilt, said Abulcacem, is confirm'd,
The sentence past; all that is now required
Is to strike sure and safely. He hath with him
A veteran force devoted to his will,
Whom to provoke were perilous; nor less
Of peril lies there in delay: what course
Between these equal dangers should we steer?

They have been train'd beneath him in the wars
Of Africa, the renegade replied;
Men are they, who, from their youth up, have found
Their occupation and their joy in arms;
Indifferent to the cause for which they fight,
But faithful to their leader, who hath won
By license largely given, yet temper'd still
With exercise of firm authority,
Their whole devotion. Vainly should we seek
By proof of Julian's guilt to pacify
Such martial spirits, unto whom all creeds
And countries are alike; but take away
The head, and forthwith with their fidelity
Goes at the market price. The act must be Sudden and secret; poison is too slow.
Thus it may best be done; the Mountaineers,
Doubtless, ere long will rouse us with some spur
Of sudden enterprise; at such a time
A trusty minister approaching him
May smite him, so that all shall think the spear
Comes from the hostile troops.

Right counsellor!
Cried Abulcacem, thou shalt have his lands,
The proper meed of thy fidelity:
His daughter thou mayst take or leave. Go now
And find a faithful instrument to put
Our purpose in effect! — And when 'tis done, —
The Moor, as Orpas from the tent withdrew,
Muttering pursued, — look for a like reward
Thyself! That restless head of wickedness
In the grave will brood no treasons. Other babes
Scream when the Devil, as they spring to life,
Infests them with his touch; but thou didst stretch
Thine arms to meet him, and, like mother's milk,
Suck the congenial evil! Thou hast tried Both laws, and, were there aught to gain, wouldst prove
A third as readily; but when thy sins
Are weigh'd, 'twill be against an empty scale,
And neither Prophet will avail thee then!

XXIII.

THE VALE OF COVADONGA.

The camp is stirring, and ere day hath dawn'd
The tents are struck. Early they rise whom Hope
Awakens, and they travel fast with whom
She goes companion of the way. By noon
Hath Abulcacem in his speed attain'd
The Vale of Cangas. Well the trusty scouts
Observe his march, and, fleet as mountain roes,
From post to post, with instantaneous speed,
The warning bear: none else is nigh: the vale
Hath been deserted, and Pelayo's hall
Is open to the foe, who on the tower
Hoist their white signal-flag. In Sella's stream
The misbelieving multitudes perform,
With hot and hasty hand, their noon tide rite,
Then hurryingly repeat the Impostor's prayer.
Here they divide; the Chieflain halts with half
The host, retaining Julian and his men,
Whom where the valley widon'd he disposed,
Liable to first attack, that so the deed
Of murder plann'd with Orpas might be done.
The other force the Moor Alcahman led,
Whom Guisha guided up Fonia's stream
Eastward to Soto. Ibrahim went with him,
Proud of Granada's snowy heights subdued,
And boasting of his skill in mountain war;
Yet sure he deem'd an easier victory
Awaited him this day. Little, quoth he,
Wecus the vain Mountaineer, who puts his trust
In dens and rocky fastnesses, how close
Destruction is at hand! Belike he thinks
The Ilumma's happy wings have shadow'd him,
And therefore Fate with royalty must crown
His chosen head! Pity the cincheter
With its rude edge so soon should interrupt
The pleasant dream!

There can be no escape
For those who in the cave seek shelter, cried
Alcahman; yield they must, or from their holes
Like bees we smoke them out. The Chief perhaps
May reign awhile King of the wolves and bears,
Till his own subjects hunt him down, or kites
And crows divide what hunger may have left
Upon his ghastly limbs. Happier for him
That destiny should this day to our hands
Deliver him; short would be his sufferings then;
And we right joyfully should in one hour
Behold our work accomplish'd, and his race Extinct.

Thus these, in mockery and in thoughts
Of bloody triumph, to the future blind,
Indulged the scornful vein; nor deem'd that they
Whom to the sword's unsurpassing edge they doom'd,
Even then in joyful expectation pray'd
To Heaven for their approach, and, at their post
Prepared, were trembling with excess of hope.
Here in these mountain straits the Mountaineer
Had felt his country's strength insuperable;
Here he had pray'd to see the Mussulman
With all his myriads; therefore had he look'd
To Covadonga as a sanctuary
Apt for concealance, easy of defence;
And Guisha's flight, though to his heart it sent
A pang more poignant for their mother's sake,
Yet did it further in its consequence
His hope and project, surer than decoy
Well-laid, or best-concerted stratagem.
That sullen and revengeful mind, he knew,
Would follow to the extremity of guilt
Its long fore-purposed shame: the toils were laid,
And she who by the Mussulmen full sure
Thought on her kindred her revenge to wreak,
Led the Moors in.

Count Pedro and his son
Were hovering with the main Asturian force
In the wider vale to watch occasion there,
And with hot onset when the alarm began
Pursue the vantage. In the fated straits
Of Deva had the King disposed the rest:
Amid the hanging woods, and on the cliffs,
A long mile's length on either side its bed,
They lay. The lever, and the axe, and saw
Had skilfully been pled; and trees and stones,
A dreadful artillery, ranged on crag, and shelf,
And steep descent, were ready at the word
Precipitate to roll resistless down.
The faithful maiden not more wistfully
Looks for the day that brings her lover home; —
Scarce more impatiently the horse endures
The rein, when loud and shrill the hunter's horn
RINGS in his joyous ears, than at their post
The Mountaineers await their certain prey;
Yet mindful of their Prince's order, off!
And solemnly enforced, with eagerness
Subduced by minds well-master'd, they expect
The appointed signal.

Hand must not be raised,
Foot stirr'd, nor voice be uttered, said the Chief,
Till the word pass; impatience would mar all.
God hath deliver'd over to your hands
His enemies and ours, so we but use
The occasion wisely. Not till the word pass
From man to man transmitted, "In the name
Of God, for Spain and Vengeance!" let a hand
Be lifted; on obedience all depends.
Their march before with noise of horse and foot,
And happily with theclang of instruments,
Might drown all other signal, this is sure;
But wait it calmly; it will not be given
Till the whole line hath enter'd in the toils.
Comrades, be patient, so shall none escape
Who once set foot within these straits of death.
Thus had Pelayo on the Mountaineers
With frequent and impressive charge enforced
The needful exhortation. This alone
He doubted, that the Mussulmen might see
The perils of the vale, and warily
Forbear to enter. But they thought to find,
As Guisla told, the main Asturian force
Seeking concealment there, no other aid
Soliciting from these their native hills;
And that, the babes and women having fallen
In thraldom, they would lay their weapons down,
And supplicate forgiveness for their sake.

Nor did the Moors perceive in what a strait
They enter'd; for the morn had risen o'ercast,
And when the Sun had reach'd the height of heaven,
Dimly his pale and beamless orb was seen
Moving through mist. A soft and gentle rain,
Scarce heavier than the summer's evening dew,
Descended, — through so still an atmosphere,
That every leaf upon the moreless trees
Was studded o'er with rain-drops, bright and full,
None falling till from its own weight o'erswollen
The motion came.

Low on the mountain side
The fleecy vapor hung, and in its veil,
With all their dreadful preparations, wrapp'd
The Mountaineers; — in breathless hope they lay,
Some blessing God in silence for the power
This day vouchsafed; others with fervency
Of prayer and vow invoked the Mother-Maid
Beseeching her that in this favoring hour
She would be strongly with them. From below,
Meantime, distinct they heard the passing tramp
Of horse and foot, continues as the sound
Of Deva's stream, and barbarous tongues commix'd
With laughter, and with frequent shouts, — for all
Exultant came, expecting sure success;
Blind wretches, over whom the rain hung!

They say, quoth one, that though the Prophet's soul
Doth, with the black-eyed Houris bathe in bliss,
Life hath not left his body, which bears up
By its miraculous power the holy tomb,
And holds it, at Medina, in the air,
Buoyant between the temple's floor and roof;
And there the Angels fly to him with news
From East, West, North, and South, of what befalls
His faithful people. If, when he shall hear
The tale of this day's work, he should, for joy,
Forget that he is dead, and walk abroad, —
It were as good a miracle as when
He sliced the moon! Sir Angel, hear me now,
Who'er thou be'st who art about to speed
From Spain to Araby! when thou hast got
The Prophet's ear, be sure thou tell'st him
How bravely Ghauleh did his part to-day,
And with what special reverence he alone
Desired thee to commend him to his grace! —
Fie on thee, scoffer that thou art! replied
His comrade; thou wilt never leave those gibes
Till some commission'd arrow through the teeth
Shall nail the offending tongue. Hast thou not heard
How, when our clay is leaven'd first with life,
The ministering Angel brings it from that spot
Whereon 'tis written in the eternal book
That soul and body must their part take,
And earth to earth return? How knowest thou
But that the spirit who compounded thee,
To distant Syria from this very vale
Bore thy component dust, and Azrael here
Awaits thee at this hour? — Little thought he
Who spake, that, in that valley, at that hour,
One death awaited both!

Thus they pursued
Toward the cave their auspicious way.
Weak childhood there, and ineffective age,
In the chambers of the rock, were placed secure;
But of the women, all whom with the babes
Maternal care detain'd not, were afoot
To aid in the destruction; by the side
Of fathers, brethren, husbands, station'd there,
They watch and pray. Pelayo in the cave,
With the venerable priest, took his post.
Ranged on the rising cliffs, on either hand,
Vigilant sentinels, with eye intent,
Observe his movements, when to take the word
And pass it forward. He, in arms complete,
Stands in the portal; a stern majesty
Reign'd in his countenance severe that hour,
And in his eye a deep and dreadful joy
Shone, as advancing up the vale he saw
The Moorish banners. God hath blinded them! He said; — the measure of their crimes is full.'
O Vale of Deva, famous shaft thou be
From this day forth forever; and to those Thy springs shall unborn generations come
In pilgrimage, and hallow with their prayers
The cradle of their native monarchy!

There was a stirring in the air; the sun
Prevail'd, and gradually the brightening mist
Began to rise and melt. A jutting crag
Upon the right projected o'er the stream,
Not farther from the cave than a strong hand
Expert, with deadly aim, might cast the spear,
Or a strong voice, pitch’d to full compass, make
Its clear articulation heard distinct.
A venturous dalesman, once ascending there
To rob the eagle’s nest, had fallen, and hung
Among the heather, wondrously preserved:
Therefore had he with pious gratitude
Placed on that overhanging brow a Cross,
Tall as the mast of some light fisher’s skiff,
And from the vale conspicuous. As the Moors
Advanced, the Chieftain in the van was seen,
Known by his arms, and from the crane a voice
Pronounced his name,— Alcahman! Hoa, look up,
Alcahman! As the floating mist drew up,
It had divided there, and open’d round
The Cross; part clinging to the rock beneath,
Hovering and waving part in fleecy folds,
A canopy of silver light condensed
To shape and substance. In the midst there stood
A female form, one hand upon the Cross,
The other raised in menacing act; below
Loose fowl’d her raiment, but her breast was arm’d,
And helmeted her head. The Moor turn’d pale,
For on the walls of Auria he had seen
That well-known figure, and had well believed
She rested with the dead. What, hoa! she cried,
Alcahman! In the name of all who fell
At Auria in the massacre, this hour
I summon thee before the throne of God
To answer for the innocent blood! This hour,
Moor, Misericant, Murderer, Child of Hell, this hour
I summon thee to judgment! — In the name
Of God! for Spain and Vengeance!
Thus she closed
Her speech; for taking from the Primate’s hand
That oaken cross which at the sacred rites
Had served for crosier, at the cavern’s mouth,
Pelayo lifted it and gave the word.
From voice to voice on either side it pass’d
With rapid repetition,— In the name
Of God! for Spain and Vengeance! and forthwith,
On either side, along the whole defile,
The Asturians, shouting in the name of God,
Set the whole ruin loose! Huge trunks and stones,
And loose’d crags, down, down they roll’d with rush,
And bound, and thundering force. Such was the fall,
As when some city, by the laboring earth
Heaved from its strong foundations, is cast down,
And all its dwellings, towers, and palaces,
In one wide desolation prostrated.
From end to end of that long strait, the crash
Was heard continuous, and, commix’d with sounds
More dreadful, shrieks of horror, and despair,
And death,— the wild and agonizing cry
Of that whole host in one destruction whelm’d.
Vain was all valor there, all martial skill;
The valiant arm is helpless now; the feet
Swift in the race avails not now to save;
They perish; all their thousands perish there,—
Horsemen and infantry, they perish all,—
The outward armor and the bones within
Broken, and bruised, and crush’d. Echo prolong’d
The long uproar: a silence then ensued,
Through which the sound of Deva’s stream was heard,
A lonely voice of waters, wild and sweet;
The lingering groan, the faintly-utter’d prayer,
The louder curses of despairing death,
Ascended not so high. Down from the cave
Pelayo hastens; the Asturians hasten down;
Fierce and immutagile down they speed
On all sides; and along the vale of blood
The avenging sword did mercy’s work that hour.

XXIV.

RODERICK AND COUNT JULIAN.

Trot hast been busy, Death! this day, and yet
But half thy work is done; the Gates of Hell
Are throng’d, yet twice ten thousand spirits more,
Who from their warm and healthful tenements
Fear no divorce, must, ere the sun go down,
Enter the world of woe! The Gate of Heaven
Is open too, and Angels round the throne
Of Mercy on their golden harps this day
Shall sing the triumphs of Redeeming Love.

There was a Church at Cangas dedicate
To that Apostle unto whom his Lord
Had given the keys—a humble edifice,
Whose rude and time-worn structure suited well
That vale among the mountains. Its low roof
With stone plants and with moss was overgrown,
Short fern, and richer weeds, which from the eaves
Hung their long tresses down. White lichens
Clothed the sides, where save the ivy spread, which bower’d
The porch, and clustering round the pointed wall,
Wherein two bells, each open to the wind,
Hung side by side, threaded with hairy shoots
The double niche; and climbing to the cross,
Wreath’d it, and half conceal’d its sacred form
With bushy tufts luxuriant. Here in the font—
Borne hither with rejoicing and with prayers
Of all the happy land, who saw in him
The lineage of their ancient Chiefs renew’d—
The Prince had been immersed: and here within
An oaken galilee, now black with age,
His old Iberian ancestors were laid.

Two stately oaks stood nigh, in the full growth
Of many a century. They had flourish’d there
Before the Gothic sword was felt in Spain,
And when the ancient sceptre of the Goths
Was broken, there they flourish’d still. Their boughs,
Mingled on high, and stretching wide around,
Form’d a deep shade, beneath which canopy
Upon the ground Count Julian’s board was spread;
For to his daughter he had left his tent,
Pitched for her use hard by. He at the board
Sat with his trusted Captains, Gunderick,
Felix and Miro, Thureded and Paul,
Basil and Gottila, and Virinar,
Men through all fortunes faithful to their Lord, And to that old and tried fidelity, By personal love and honor held in ties Strong as religious bonds. As there they sat, In the distant vale a rising dust was seen, And frequent flash of steel,—the flying fight Of men who, by a fiend's course pursued, Put forth their courser at full speed, to reach The aid in which they trust. Up sprang the Chieftains, And hastily taking helm, and shield, and spear, sped to their post.

Amid the chestnut groves
On Selia's side, Alphonso had in charge
To watch the foe: a prowling band came nigh, Whom, with the arder of impetuous youth, He charged, and followed them in close pursuit: Quick succors join'd them; and the stride grew hot, Ere Pedro, hastening to bring off his son, Or Julian and his Captains,—bent alike That hour to abstain from combat, (for by this Full sure they deem'd Alcalman had secured The easy means of certain victory)—

Could reach the spot. Both thus in their intent According, somewhat had they now alay'd The fury of the fight, though still spears flew, And strokes of sword and lance were interchanged, When, passing through the troop, a Moor came up On errand from the Chief, to Julian sent; A fatal errand fatally perform'd For Julian, for the Chief, and for himself, And all that host of Mussulman he brought; For while with well-dissembled words he hired The warrior's ear, the dexterous ruffian mark'd The favoring moment and unguarded place, And plunged a javelin in his side. The Count Fell, but in falling called to Cottiba,— Trenchery! the Moor! the Moor!—He too on whom He call'd had seen the blow from whence it came, And seiz'd the Murderer. Miserant! he explain'd, Who set thee on? The Mussulman, who saw His secret purpose baffled, undismayed, Replies, What I have done is authorized; To punish treachery and prevent worse ill, Orpas and Abalacceus sent me here;
The service of the Caliph and the Faith Required the blow.

The Prophet and the Fiend
Reward thee then! cried Cottiba; meantime Take thou from me thy proper earthly need; Villain!—and lifting, as he spoke, the sword, He smote him on the neck; the trenchant blade Through vein and artery pass'd and yielding bone; And on the shoulder, as the assassin dropp'd, His head half-sever'd fell. The curse of God Fall on the Caliph, and the Faith, and thee! Stamping for anguish, Cottiba pursued; African dogs, thus is it ye requite
Our services?—But dearly shall ye pay For this day's work!—O fellow-soldiers, here, Stretching his hands toward the host, he cried, Behold your noble leader basely slain! He who for twenty years hath led us forth To war, and brought us home with victory,—

Here he lies fouly murdered,—by the Moors,— Those whom he trusted, whom he served so well! Our turn is next! but neither will we wait Idly, nor tamely fall!

Amid the grief,
Tumult, and rage, of those who gather'd round, When Julian could be heard, I have yet life, He said, for vengeance. Virimar, speed thou To yonder Mountaineers, and tell their Chiefs That Julian's veteran army joins this day Pelayo's standard! The command devolves On Gunderick. Fellow-soldiers, who so well Redress'd the wrongs of your old General, Ye will not let his death go unrevenged!— Tears then were seen on many an iron cheek, And groans were heard from many a resolute heart, And vows with imprecations mix'd went forth, And curses check'd by sobs. Bear me apart, Said Julian, with a faint and painful voice, And let me see my daughter ere I die.

Scarcely had he spoken when the pitying throng Divide before her. Eagerly she came; A deep and fearful lustre in her eye, A look of settled woe,—pale, deadly pale, Yet to no lamentations giving way, Nor tears nor groans;—within her breaking heart She bore the grief, and kneeling solemnly Beside him, raised her awful hands to heaven, And cried, Lord God! be with him in this hour! Two things have I to think of, O my child — Vengeance and thee, said Julian. For the first I have provided: what remains of life As best may comfort thee may so be best Employ'd; let me be borne within the church, And thou, with that good man who follows thee, Attend me there.

Thus when Florinda heard
Her father speak, a gleam of heavenly joy Shone through the anguish of her countenance. O gracious God, she cried, my prayers are heard; Now let me die!—They raised him from the earth; He, knitting, as they lifted him, his brow, Draw in, through open lips and teeth firm-closed, His painful breath, and on the lance laid hand, Lest its long shaft should shake the mortal wound. Gently his men, with slow and steady step, Their suffering burden bore, and in the Church Before the altar laid him down, his head Upon Florinda's knees. Now, friends, said he, Farewell. I ever hoped to meet thy death Among ye, like a soldier, —but not thus! Go join the Asturians; and in after-years, When of your old commander ye shall talk, How well he loved his followers, what he was In battle, and how basely he was slain, Let not the tale its fit completion lack, But say how bravely was his death revenged. Vengeance! in that good word doth Julian make His testament; your faithful swords must give The will its full performance. Leave me now; I have done with worldly things. Comrades, farewell, And love my memory!

They with copious tears
Of burning anger, grief exasperating
Their rage, and fury giving force to grief,
Hasten'd to form their ranks against the Moors.
Julian meantime toward the altar turn'd
His languid eyes. 'That Image, is it not
St. Peter? he inquired; he who denied
His Lord, and was forgiven?' — Roderick rejoin'd,
It is the Apostle; and that same Lord,
O Julian, to thy soul's salvation bless
The seasonable thought!

The dying Count
Then fix'd upon the Goth his earnest eyes.
No time, said he, is this for bravery,
As little for dissemblance. I would fain
Die in the faith wherein my fathers died,
Whereunto they pledged me in mine infancy.
A soldier's habits, he pursued, have steel'd
My spirit, and perhaps I do not fear
This passage as I ought. But if to feel
That I have sinn'd, and from my soul renounce
The Imposter's faith, which never in that soul
Obtain'd a place, — if at the Savior's feet,
Laden with guilt, to cast myself and cry,
Lord, I believe! help thou my unbelief!
If this in the sincerity of death
Sufficeth, — Father, let me from thy lips
Receive the assurances with which the Church
Doth bless the dying Christian.

Roderick raised
His eyes to heaven, and crossing on his breast
His open palms— Mysterious are thy ways
And merciful, O gracious Lord! he cried,
Who to this end hast thus been pleased to lead
My wandering steps! O Father, this thy son
Hath sinn'd and gone astray; but hast not Thou
Said, When the sinner from his evil ways
Turneth, that he shall save his soul alive,
And Angels at the sight rejoice in Heaven?
Therefore do I, in thy most holy name,
Into thy family receive again
Him who was lost, and in that name absolv
The Penitent. — So saying, on the head
Of Julian solemnly he laid his hands.
Then to the altar tremblingly he turn'd,
And took the bread, and breaking it, pursued —
Julian! receive from me the Bread of Life!
In silence reverently the Count partook
The reconciling rite, and to his lips
Roderick then held the consecrated cup.

Me too! exclaim'd Florinda, who till then
Had listen'd speechless; thou Man of God,
I also must partake! The Lord hath heard
My prayers! one sacrament, — one hour, — one grave, —
One resurrection!

That dread office done,
Count Julian with amazement saw the Priest
Kneel down before him. By the sacrament
Which we have here partaken, Roderick cried,
In this most awful moment; by that hope, —
That holy faith which comforts thee in death,
Grant thy forgiveness, Julian, ere thou diest!
Behold the man who most hath injured thee!
Roderick, the wretched Goth, the guilty cause
Of all thy guilt, — the unworthy instrument
Of thy redemption, — kneels before thee here,
And prays to be forgiven!

Roderick! exclaim'd
The dying Count. — Roderick! — and from the floor
With violent effort half he raised himself;
The spear hung heavy in his side, and pain
And weakness overcame him, that he fell Back on his daughter's lap. O Death, cried he, —
Passing his hand across his cold, damp brow, —
Thou tempest the strong limb, and conquerest
The stubborn heart! But yesterday I said
One Heaven could not contain mine enemy
And me; and now I lift my dying voice
To say, Forgive me, Lord, as I forgive [eyes
 Him who hath done the wrong! — He closed his
A moment; then with sudden impulse cried,
Roderick, thy wife is dead, — the Church hath power
To free thee from thy vows, — the broken heart
Might yet he heal'd, the wrong redress'd, the throne
Rebuilt by that same hand which pull'd it down,
And those cursed Africans — Oh for a month
Of that waste life which millions misbestow! —
His voice was passionate, and in his eye
With glowing animation while he spake
The vehement spirit shone: its effort soon
Was past, and painfully, with feeble breath,
In slow and difficult utterance he pursued, —
Vain hope, if all the evil was ordain'd,
And this wide wreck the will and work of Heaven,
We but the poor occasion! Death will make
All clear, and, joining us in better worlds,
Complete our union there! Do for me now
One friendly office more: — draw forth the spear,
And free me from this pain! — Receive his soul,
Savior! exclaim'd the Goth, as he perform'd
The fatal service. Julian cried, O friend! —
True friend! — and gave to him his dying hand.
Then said he to Florinda, I go first,
Thou followest! — kiss me, child! — and now, good night!

When from her father's body she arose,
Her cheek was flush'd, and in her eyes there beam'd
A wilder brightness. On the Goth she gazed,
While underneath the emotions of that hour
Exhausted life gave way. O God! she said,
Lifting her hands, thou hast restored me all,
All — in one hour! — and round his neck she threw
Her arms, and cried, My Roderick! mine in Heaven!
Groaning, he clasp'd her close, and in that act
And agony her happy spirit fled.

XXV.

RODERICK IN BATTLE.

Erearr thousand men had to Asturias march'd
Beneath Count Julian's banner; the remains
Of that brave army which in Africa
So well against the Mussulman made head,
Till sense of injuries insupportable,
And raging thirst of vengeance, overthrew
Their leader's noble spirit. To revenge
His quarrel, twice that number left their bones,
Slain in unnatural battle, on the field
Of Xeres, when the sceptre from the Goths
By righteous Heaven was reft. Others had fallen
Consumed in sieges, alway by the Moor.
To the front of war opposed. The policy,
With whatsoever show of honor cloak'd,
Was gross, and this surviving band had oft
At their carousals, of the flagrant wrong,
Held such discourse as stirs the mounting blood,
The common danger with one discontent
Affecting chiefs and men. Nor had the bonds
Of rooted discipline and faith attach'd
Thus long restrain'd them, had they not known well
That Julian in their just resentment shared,
And fix'd their hopes on him. Slight impulse now
Sufficed to make these fiery martialists
Break forth in open fury; and though first
Count Pedro listen'd with suspicious ear
To Julian's dying errand, deeming it
Some new decoy of treason, — when he found
A second legate follow'd Virimai,
And then a third, and saw the turbulence
Of the camp, and how against the Moors in haste
They form'd their lines, he knew that Providence
This hour had for his country interposed,
And in such faith advanced to use the aid
Thus wondrously ordain'd. The eager Chiefs
Hasten to greet him, Cottha and Paul,
Basil and Miro, Theuderid, Gunderick,
Felix, and all who held authority;
The zealous services of their brave host
They proffer'd, and besought him instantly
To lead against the African their force
Combined, and in good hour assist a foe
Divided, nor for such attack prepared.

While thus they communed, Roderick from the church
 Came forth, and seeing Pedro, bent his way
Toward them. Sirs, said he, the Count is dead;
He died a Christian, reconciled to Heaven,
In faith; and when his daughter had received
His dying breath, her spirit too took flight.
One sacrament, one death, united them:
And I beseech ye, ye who from the work
Of blood which lies before us may return, —
If, as I think, it should not be my fate, —
That in one grave with Christian ceremonies
Ye lay them side by side. In Heaven I ween
They are met through mercy; — ill befall the man
Who should in death divide them! — Then he turn'd
His speech to Pedro in an under voice.
The King, said he, I know, with noble mind
Will judge of the departed; Christian-like
He died, and with a manly penitence:
They who condemn him most should call to mind
How grievous was the wrong which madden'd
him;
Be that remember'd in his history,
And let no shame be offer'd his remains.

As Pedro would have answer'd, a loud cry
Of menacing imprecation from the troops
Arose; for Orpas, by the Moorish Chief
Sent to alyay the storm his villany
Had stirr'd, came hastening on a milk-white steed,
And at safe distance having check'd the rein,
Beckon'd for pauley. "Twas Orelio
On which he rode, Roderick's own battle-horse,
Who from his master's hand had wont to feed,
And with a glad docility obey
His voice familiar. At the sight the Goth
Started, and indignation to his soul
Brought back the thoughts and feelings of old times.
Suffer me, Count, he cried, to answer him,
And hold these back the while! Thus having said,
He waited no reply, but as he was,
Bareheaded, in his weeds, and all unarmed,
Advanced toward the renegade. Sir Priest,
Quoth Orpas as he came, I hold no talk
With thee; my errand is with Gunderick
And the Captains of the host, to whom I bring Such liberal offers and clear proof——

The Goth,
Breaking with scornful voice his speech, ex-
claim'd,
What, could no steed but Roderick's serve thy to:n!
I should have thought some sleek and sober mule,
Long train'd in shackles to processionpace,
More suited to my lord of Seville's use
Than this good war-horse, — he who never bore
A villain, until Orpas cross'd his back! —
Wretch! cried the astonished renegade, and stoop'd,
Foaming with anger, from the saddle-bow,
To reach his weapon. Ere the hasty hand,
Trembling in passion, could perform its will,
Roderick had seiz'd the reins. How now, he cried,
Orello! old companion, — my good horse, —
Off with this recreant burden! — And with that
He raised his hand, and rear'd and back'd the steed,
To that remember'd voice and arm of power
Obedient. Down the helpless traitor fell,
Violently thrown, and Roderick over him
Thrice led, with just and unrelenting hand,
The trampling hoofs. Go, join Witzia now,
Where he lies howling, the avenger cried,
And tell him Roderick sent thee! —
At that sight,
Count Julian's soldiers and the Asturian host
Set up a shout, a joyful shout, which rung
Wide through the welkin. Their exulting cry
With louder acclamation was renew'd,
When from the expiring miscreant's neck they saw
That Roderick took the shield, and round his own
Hung it, and vaoled in the seat. My horse!
My noble horse! he cried, with flattering hand
Patting his high-arch'd neck! the renegade —
I thank him for't — hath kept thee daintily!
Orolo, thou art in thy beauty still,
Thy pride and strength! Orolo, my good horse,
Once more thou hastest to the field thy Lord,
He who so oft hath fed and cheerful hast thee,
He for whose sake, wherever thou art seen,
Thou wert by all men honored. Once again
Thou hast thy proper master! Do thy part
As thou wert wont; and bear him gloriously,
My beautiful Orolo,—to the last
The happiest of his fields!—Then he drew forth
The cimeter, and waving it aloft
Rode toward the troops; its unaccustomed shape
Disliked him. Renegade in all things! cried
The Goth, and cast it from him; to the Chiefs
Then said, If I have done ye service here,
Help me, I pray you, to a Spanish sword!
The trustiest blade that e'er in Bilbilis
Was dipp'd, would not to-day be mistowed
On this right hand!—Go, some one, Gunderick cried,
And bring Count Julian's sword. Who'er thou art,
The worth which thou hast shown avenging him
Entitles thee to wear it. But thou goest
For battle unequalp'd;—haste there, and strip
Yon villain of his armor!
Late he spake,
So fast the Moors came on. It matters not,
Replied the Goth; there's many a mountaineer,
Who in no better armor cas'd this day
Than his wond'ring leathern gipion, will be found
In the hottest battle, yet bring off untouched
The unguarded life he ventures.—Taking then
Count Julian's sword, he fitted round his wrist
The chain, and eyeing the elaborate steel
With stern regard of joy—The African
Under unhappily was born, he cried,
Who tastes thy edge!—Make ready for the charge!
They come—they come!—On, brethren, to the field!—
The word is, Vengeance!
Vengeance was the word;
From man to man, and rank to rank it pass'd,
By every heart enforced, by every voice
Sent forth in loud defiance of the foe.
The enemy in shrier sounds return'd
Their Akbar and the Prophet's trusted name.
The horsemen lower'd their spears, the infantry,
Deliberately, with slow and steady step,
Advanced; the bow-strings twang'd, and arrows hiss'd,
And javelins hurled by. Anon the hosts
Met in the shock of battle, horse and man
Conflicting; shield struck shield, and sword, and mace,
And curlcaxe on helm and buckler rang;
Armor was riven, and wounds were interchanged,
And many a spirit from its mortal hold
Hurr'd to bliss or bale. Well did the Chiefs
Of Julian's army in that hour support
Their old esteem; and well Count Pedro there
Enhanced his former praise; and by his side,
Rejoicing like a bridegroom in the strife,
Alphonso through the host of infidels
Bore on his bloody lance dismay and death.
But there was worst confusion and uproar,
There widest slaughter and dismay, where, proud
Of his recover'd Lord, Orolo plunged
Through thickest ranks, trampling beneath his feet
The living and the dead. Where'er he turns,
The Moors divide and fly. What man is this,
Appall'd they say, who to the front of war
Bareheaded offers thus his naked life?
Replete with power he is, and terrible
Like some destroying Angel! Sure his lips
Have drank of Kad's dark fountain, and he comes Strong in his immortality! Fly! fly!
They said; this is no human foe!—Nor less
Of wonder fill'd the Spaniards when they saw
How flight and terror went before his way,
And slaughter in his path. Behold, cries one,
With what command and knightly ease he sits
The intrepid steed, and deals from side to side
His dreadful blows! Not Roderick in his power
Bestrode with such command and majesty
That noble war-horse. His loose robe this day
Is death's black banner, shaking from its folds
Dismay and ruin. Of no mortal mould
Is he who in that garb of peace affronts
Whole hosts, and sees them scatter where he turns!
Auspicious Heaven beholds us, and some Saint Revisits earth!
Ay, cries another, Heaven
Hath ever with especial bounty bless'd
Above all other lands its favor'd Spain;
Choosing her children forth from all mankind
For its peculiar people, as of yore
Abraham's ungrateful race beneath the Law.
Who knows not how on that most holy night
When peace on Earth by Angels was proclaimed,
The light which o'er the fields of Bethlehem shone,
Irradiated whole Spain? not just display'd,
As to the Shepherds, and again withdrawn;
All the long winter hours from eve till morn
Her forests, and her mountains, and her plains,
Her hills and valleys, were imbathed in light,
A light which came not from the sun, or moon,
Or stars, by secondary powers dispensed,
But from the fountain-springs, the Light of Light
Effluent. And wherefore should we not believe
That this may be some Saint or Angel, charged
To lead us to miraculous victory?
Hath not the Virgin Mother, oftentimes
Descending, clothed in glory, sanctified
With feet adorable our happy soil!—
Mark'd ye not, said another, how he cast
In wrath the unhallow'd cimeter away,
And called for Christian weapon? Oh, be sure
This is the aid of Heaven! On, comrades, on!
A miracle to-day is wrought for Spain!
Victory and Vengeance! Hew the miscreants down,
And spare not! Hew them down in sacrifice!
God is with us! his Saints are in the field!
Victory, miraculous Victory!
Thus they
Inflamed with wild belief, the keen desire
Of vengeance on their enemies abhor'd.
The Moorish Chief, meantime, o'erlooked the fight
From an eminence, and cursed the renegade
Whose counsels sorting to such ill effect
Had brought this danger on. Lo, from the East
Comes fresh alarm! a few poor fugitives
Well nigh with fear examine the cause up,
From Covadonga flying, and the rear
Of that destruction, scarce with breath to tell
Their dreadful tale. When Abulacem heard
Stricken with horror, like a man bereft
Of sense, he stood. O Prophet, he exclain'd,
A hard and cruel fortune hast thou brought
This day upon thy servant! Must I then
Here with disgrace and ruin close a life
Of glorious deeds! But how should man resist
Fate's irreversible decrees, or why
Murmur at what must be? They who survive
May mourn the evil which this day begins:
My part will soon be done! — Grief then gave way
To rage, and cursing Guisla, he pursued —
Oh that that treacherous woman were but here!
It was a consolation to give her
The evil death she merits!

That reward
She hath had, a Moor replied. For when we reach'd
The entrance of the vale, it was her choice
There in the farthest dwellings to be left,
Lest she should see his brother's face; but thence
We found her flying at the overthrow,
And visiting the treason on her head,
Fiercely with wounds. — Poor vengeance for a host
Destroyed! said Abulacem in his soul.
Howbeit, resolving to the last to do
His office, he roused up his spirit. Go,
Strike off Count Eudon's head! he cried; the fear
Which brought him to our camp will bring him else
In arms against us now; for Sisibert
And Ebba, he continued thus in thought,
Their uncle's fate forever bars all plots
Of treason on their part; no hope have they
Of safety but with us. He call'd them then
With chosen troops to join him in the front
Of battle, that, by bravely making head,
Retreat might now be won. Then fiercely raged
The conflict, and more frequent cries of death,
Mingling with supplications and with prayers,
Rose through the din of war.

By this the blood
Which Deva down her fatal channel pour'd,
Purple Ponia's course, had reach'd and stain'd
The wider stream of Sella. Soon far off
The frequent glance of spears and gleam of arms
Were seen, which sparkled to the westering orb,
Where down the vale impatient to complete
The glorious work so well that day begun,
Pelayo led his troops. On foot they came,
Chiefains and men alike; the Oaken Cross
Triumphant, borne on high, precedes their march,
And broad and bright the argent banner shone.
Roderick, who, dealing death from side to side,
Had through the Moorish army now made way,
Beheld it flash, and judging well what aid
Approach'd, with sudden impulse that way rode,
To tell of what had pass'd,— lest in the strife
They should engage with Julian's men, and mar
The mighty consummation. One ran on
To meet him fleet of foot, and having given
His tale to this swift messenger, the Goth
Halted awhile to let Orello breathe.
Siverian, quoth Pelayo, if mine eyes
Deceive me not, you horse, whose recking sides
Are red with slaughter, is the same on whom
The apostate Orpas in his vauntury
Wont to parade the streets of Cordoba.
But thou shouldst not know him best; regard him well;
Is't not Orello?

Either it is he,
The old man replied, or one so like to him,
Whom all thought matchless, that similitude
Would be the greater wonder. But behold,
What man is he who in that disarray
Doth with such power and majesty bestride
The noble steed, as if he felt himself
In his own proper seat? Look, how he leans
To cherish him; and how the gallant horse
Curves up his stately neck, and bends his head,
As if again to court that gentle touch,
And answer to the voice which praises him!
Can it be Maccabei? rejoin'd the King,
Or are the secret wishes of my soul
Indeed fulfill'd, and hath the grave given up
Its dead? — So saying, on the old man he turn'd
Eyes full of wide astonishment, which told
The incipient thought that for incredible
He spake no further. But enough had pass'd,
For old Siverian started at the words
Like one who sees a spectre, and exclaim'd,
Blind that I was to know him not till now!
My Master, O my Master!

He meantime
With easy pace moved on to meet their march.
King, to Pelayo he began, this day,
By means scarce less than miracle, thy throne
Is stablisi'd, and the wrongs of Spain revenged.
Orpas, the accursed, upon yonder field
Lies ready for the ravens. By the Moors
Treacherously slain, Count Julian will be found
Before Saint Peter's altar; unto him
Grace was vouchsafed; and by that holy power
Which at Visiola by the Primate's hand,
Of his own proper act to me was given,
Unworthy as I am,— yet sure I think
Not without mystery, as the event hath shown,—
Did I accept Count Julian's penitence,
And reconcile the dying man to Heaven.
Beside him hath his daughter gone to rest.
Deal honorably with his remains, and let
One grave with Christian rites receive them both.
Is it not written that as the Tree falls
So it shall lie?

In this and at things else,
Pelayo answer'd, looking wistfully
Upon the Goth, thy pleasure shall be done.
Then Roderick saw that he was known, and turn'd
His head away in silence. But the old man
Laid hold upon his bridle, and look'd up
In his master's face, weeping and silently.
Thereat the Goth, with fervent pressure, took
His hand, and bending down toward him, said,
RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTH.

My good Siverian, go not this day
To war! I charge thee keep thyself from harm!
Thou art past the age for combat, and with whom
Hereafter should thy mistress talk of me.
If thou were gone? — Thou seest I am unarm'd;
Thus disarray'd as thou beholdest me.
Clean through thy miscreant army have I cut
My way unhurt; but being once by Heaven
Preserved, I would not perish with the guilt
Of having wilfully provoked my death.
Give me thy helmet and thy cuirass! — Nay, —
Thee wert not wont to let me ask in vain,
Nor to oppose me when my will was known!
To thee, methinks, I should be still the King.

Thus saying, they withdrew a little way
Within the trees. Roderick alighted there,
And in the old man's armor digb himself.
Dost thou not marvel by what wondrous chance,
Said he, Orello to his master's hand
Hath been restored? I found the renegade
Of Seville on his back, and hurl'd him down
Headlong to the earth. The noble animal
Rejoicingly obey'd my hand to shake
His recreant burden off, and trample out
The life which once I spared in evil hour.
Now let me meet Witiza's vipers sons
In yonder field, and then I may go rest
In peace, — my work is done!
And nobly done! Exclaim'd the old man. Oh! thou art greater now
Than in that glorious hour of victory
When groveling in the dust Witiza lay,
The prisoner of thy hand! — Roderick replied,
O good Siverian, happier victory
Thy son hath now achieved, — the victory
Over the world, his sins, and his despair.
If on the field my body should be found,
See it, I charge thee, laid in Julian's grave,
And let no idle ear be told for whom
Thou mournest. Thou wilt use Orello
As doth beseech the steer which hath so oft
Carried a King to battle; — he hath done
Good service for his rightful Lord to-day,
And better yet must do. Siverian, now
Farewell! I think we shall not meet again
Till it be in that world where never change
Is known, and they who love shall part no more.
Commend me to my mother's prayers, and say
That never man enjoy'd a heavenlier peace
Than Roderick at this hour. O faithful friend,
How dear thou art to me these tears may tell!

With that he fell upon the old man's neck;
Then vaulted in the saddle, gave the reins,
And soon rejoind the host. On, comrades, on! Victory and Vengeance! he exclain'd, and took
The lead on that good charger, he alone
Horsed for the onset. They, with one consent,
Gave all their voices to the inspiring cry,
Victory and Vengeance! and the hills and rocks
Caught the prophetic shout and roll'd it round.
Count Pedro's people heard amid the heat
Of battle, and return'd the glad acclam.

The astonish'd Mussulmen, on all sides charged,
Hear that tremendous cry; yet manfully
They stood, and every where, with gallant front,
Opposed in fair array the shock of war.
Desperately they fought, like men expert in arms,
And knowing that no safety could be found,
Save from their own right hands. No former day
Of all his long career had seen their chief
Approved so well; nor had Witiza's sons
Ever before this hour achieved in fight
Such feats of resolute valor. Sisibert
Beheld Pelayo in the field afoot,
And twice essay'd to bear his horse's feet
To thrust him down. Twice did the Prince evade
The shock, and twice upon his shield received
The fratricidal sword. Tempt me no more,
Son of Witiza, cried the indignant chief,
Lest I forget what mother gave thee birth!
Go meet thy death from any hand but mine!
He said, and turn'd aside. Fittest from me!
Exclaim'd a dreadful voice, as through the throng
Orello forced his way: fittest from me
Receive the rightful death too long withheld!
'Tis Roderick strikes the blow! And as he spoke,
Upon the traitor's shoulder fierce he drove
The weapon, well-beswo'd. He in the seat
Totter'd and fell. The Avenger hasten'd on
In search of Ebba; and in the heat of fight
Rejoicing, and forgetful of all else,
Set up his cry, as he was wont in youth —
Roderick the Goth! — his war-cry known so well.
Pelayo eagerly took up the word,
And shouted out his kinsman's name beloved —
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance! Odoar gave it forth;
Urban repeated it, and through his ranks
Count Pedro sent the cry. Not from the field
Of his great victory, when Witiza fell,
With louder acclamations had that name
Been borne abroad upon the winds of heaven.
The unreflecting throng, who yesterday,
If it had pass'd their lips, would with a curse
Have clag'd it, of all that it could say
From some celestial voice in the air, reveal'd
To be the certain pledge of all their hopes.
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance! O'er the field it spread,
All hearts and tongues uniting in the cry;
Mountains, and rocks, and vales resoched round,
And he, rejoicing in his strength, rode on,
Laying on the Moors with that good sword, and smote.
And overthrow, and scatter'd, and destroy'd,
And trampled down; and still at every blow
Exultingly he sent the war-cry forth,
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance!

Thus he made his way,
Smiting and slaying, through the astonished ranks,
Till he beheld, where, on a fiery Barb,
Ebba, performing still a soldier's part,
Dealt to the right and left his deadly blows.
With mutual rage they met. The renegade
Displays a cimeter, the splendid gift
Of Walid from Damascus sent; its hilt
Emboss'd with gems, its blade of perfect steel,
Which, like a mirror sparkling to the sun
With dazzling splendor, flash'd. The Goth objects
His shield, and on its rim received the edge
Driven from its aim aside, and of its force
Diminish'd. Many a frustrate stroke was dealt
On either part, and many a foim and thrust
Aim'd and rebated; many a deadly blow
Straight, or reverse, delivered and repel'd.
Roderick at length with better speed hath reach'd
The apostate's turban, and through all its folds
The true Cantabrian weapon making way
Attain'd his forehead. Wretch! the avenger cried,
It comes from Roderick's hand! Roderick the Goth!
Who spared, who trusted thee, and was betray'd?
Go tell thy father now how thou hast sped
With all thy treasons! Saying thus, he seized
The miserable, who, blinded now with blood,
Reel'd in the saddle; and with sidelong step
Backing Orelio, drew him to the ground.
He shrieking, as beneath the horse's feet
He fell, forgot his late-learnt creed, and called On Mary's name. The dreadful Goth pass'd on,
Still plunging through the thickest war, and still Scattering, where'er he turn'd, the affrighted ranks.

O who could tell what deeds were wrought that day;
Or who endure to hear the tale of rage,
Hatred, and madness, and despair, and fear,
Horror, and wounds, and agony, and death,
The cries, the blasphemies, the shrieks, and groans,
And prayers, which mingled with the din of arms
In one wild uproar of terrific sounds;
While over all predominant was heard,
Reiterate from the conquerors o'er the field,
Roderick the Goth! Roderick and Victory!
Roderick and Vengeance!—Woefully for Africa!
Woefully for the circumsised! Woefully for the faith
Of the lying Ishmaeleite that hour! The Chiefs
Have fallen; the Moors, confused, and captainless,
And panic-stricken, vainly seek to escape
The inevitable fate. Turn where they will,
Strong in his cause, rejoicing in success,
Instructed at the banquet of revenge,
The enemy is there; look where they will,
Death hath environed their devoted ranks:
Fly where they will, the avenger and the sword
Await them, — wretches! whom the righteous arm
Hath overtaken! — Join'd in bonds of faith
Accurs'd, the most flagitious of mankind
From all parts met are here; the apostate Greek,
The vicious Syrian, and the sullen Copt,
The Persian cruel and corrupt of soul,
The Arabian robber, and the prowling sons
Of Africa, who from their thirsty sands
Pray that the focusts on the peopled plain
May settle and prepare their way. Conjoined
Beneath an impious faith, which sanctifies
To them all deeds of wickedness and blood, —
Yea, and halloos them on, — here are they met
To be conjoin'd in punishment this hour.
For plunder, violation, massacre,
All hideous, all imputable things,
The righteous, the immitigable sword
Exacts due vengeance now! the cry of blood
Is heard: the measure of their crimes is full;
Such mercy as the Moor at Auria gave,
Such mercy hath he found this dreadful hour!
The evening darkèd, but the avenging sword
Turn'd not away its edge till night had closed
Upon the field of blood. The Cibetains then
Blew the recall, and from their perfect work
Return'd rejoicing, all but he for whom
All look'd with most expectation. He fully sure
Had thought upon that field to find his end
Desired, and with Florida in the grave
Rest, in indissoluble union join'd.
But still where through the press of war he went
Half-arm'd, and like a lover seeking death,
The arrows pass'd him by to right and left;
The spear-point piercèd him not; the cimeter
Glancèd from his helmet; he, when he beheld
The rout complete, saw that the shield of Heaven
Had been extended over him once more,
And bowed before its will. Upon the banks
Of Sella was Orelio found, his legs
And flanks incarnadine, his p'oital smeared
With froth, and foam, and gore, his silver mane
Sprinkled with blood, which hung on every hair,
Aspersed like dew-drops; trembling there he stood
From the toil of battle, and at times bent forth
His tumultuous voice far echoing loud and shrill,
A frequent, anxious cry, with which he seem'd
To call the master whom he loved so well,
And who had thus again forsaken him.
Siverian's helm and cuirass on the grass
Lay near; and Julian's sword, its hilt and chain
Clotted with blood; but where was he whose hand
Had wielded it so well that glorious day?

Days, months, and years, and generations pass'd;
And centuries held their course, before, far off
Within a hermitage near Viseu's wall.
A humble tomb was found, which bore inscribed
In ancient characters King Roderick's name.

NOTES.

Count Julian called the invaders. — L. p. 629. col. 2.
The story of Count Julian and his daughter has been treated as a fable by some authors, because it is not mentioned by the three writers who lived nearest the time. But those writers state the mere fact of the conquest of Spain as briefly as possible, without entering into particulars of any kind; and the best Spanish historians and antiquaries are persuaded that there is no cause for disbelieving the uniform and concurrent tradition of both Moors and Christians.

For the purposes of poetry, it is immaterial whether the story be true or false. I have represented the Count as a man both slain against and sinning, and equally to be commiser-ated and condemned. The author of the Tragedy of Count Julian has contemplated his character in a grander point of view, and represented him as a man self-justified in bringing an army of foreign auxiliaries to assist him in delivering his country from a tyrant, and foreseeing, when it is too late to recede, the evils which he is thus bringing upon her.

Not vict'ry that o'er-shadow him, sees he! No airy and slight passion stirr'd abroad To ruflle or to smother him; all are quell'd Beneath a mightier, sternest, stress of mind: Wretched he sits, and lovely and unmoved. Beyond the arrows, vows, or shouts of men: As oftentimes an eagle, when the sun Throws o'er the varying earth his early ray, Stands solitary, stands immovable Upon some highest cliff, and rolls his eyes, Clear, constant, unobscur'd, unabsor'd. In the cold light, above the dews of morn. — Act 5, Scene 2.

Paits of this tragedy are as fine in their kind as any thing which can be found in the whole compass of English poetry. Juan de Mena places Count Julian with Orpsis, the renegado Archbishop of Seville, in the deepest pit of hell.

No buenas maneras to go out of Church. Se oye en el valle mas hondo de afém, Que no se redéme jamas por bienes: Qual no era cosa posible indignar A render en da las tierras y legos. De Espaia, las guadas pejus de monts. En años a bastos no pudo cobrar, Copia 91.

A Portuguese poet, Andre de Saiya Mascarenhas, is more indulgent to the Count, and seems to consider it as a mark of degeneracy in his own times, that the same crime would no longer provoke the same vengeance. His account of women who have become famous by the evil of which they have been the occasion, begins with Eve, and ends with Anne Boleyn.

Lawer se pode ao Conde o sentimiento De effusam se sua honestidade, Se a apan viracoper ca errando Disbarbate da Hispana Christiamidade: Se hoje auersa etapors cesto e cesto Nada nossa festas lasciva idade, Noa se perdera mas a forte Espaia, Que o crime frequentado num se estranha.

Por mulheres parecem se tem perdido Noites veryas da outra e desta vida; Por Eor se perdera o Ceo sobrada, Por Helenon a Asia censurada; Por Cleopatra a Egypia foi rendida, Asstaria por Samirnianos perdida; Por Cava se perdera a forte Espaia, E por Anna Bolena a Gran Bretanha. Destruyim de Espaia, p. 9.

Inhuman priests with unquenchable blood Had stain'd their country.— 1, p. 649, col. 2.

Never has any country been so caused by the spirit of persecution as Spain. Under the Heathen Emperors it had its full share of suffering, and the first fatal precedent of appealing to the secular power to punish heresy with death, occurred in Spain. Then came the Arian controversy. There was as much bigotry as much rancor, as little of the spirit of Christianity, and as much intolerance, on one part as on the other: but the successful party were better politicians, and more expert in the management of miracles. Next to the city of Oren, or Orel, there was a famous Catholic church, and more famous baptistry, which was in the form of a cave. On Holy Thursday every year, the bishop, the clergy, and the people assembled there, saw that the baptistry was empty, and enjoyed a marvellous fragrance, which differed from that of any, or all, flowers and spices, for it was an odor which comes as the vesture of the divine virtue that was about to manifest itself. Then they fastened the doors of the church, and sealed them. On Easter Eve the doors were opened, the baptistry was found full of water, and all the children born within the preceding twelve months were baptiz'd. Then carded, an Arian king, set his seal also upon the doors for two successive years, and set a guard there. Still the miraculous baptistry was filled. The third year he suspected pipes, and ordered a trench to be dug round the building; but before the day of trial arrived, he was murdered, as opportunely as Arius himself. The trench was dry, but the workmen did not dig deep enough, and the miracle was continued. When the victory of the Catholic party was complete, it was no longer necessary to keep it up. The same baptistry was employed to convince the Spaniards of their error in keeping Easter. In Brito's time, a few rains, called Osela, were shown near the river Cambrin; the broken baptistry was then called the Bath, and some wild superstitions which the old story related bore traces of the original legend. The trick was not unpractical; it was practised in Sicily and in other places. The story, however, is of some value, as showing that baptism was administered only once a year, (except in cases of danger,) that immersion was the manner, and that infants were baptiz'd.

Arianism seems to have linger'd in Spain long after its defeat. The names Pelayo (Pelegrino) and Arias certainly appear to indicate a cherished heresy, and Brito must have left this when he deduced the former name from Santa Pelayo of the tenth century; for how came the Saint by it, and how could Brito have forgotten the founder of the Spanish monarchy?

In the latter half of the eleventh century, the Count of Barcelona, Ramon Berenguer, Cap de estops, as he was called, for his bushy head, made war upon some Christians who are said to have turned Arians, and took the castles into which they retired. The number of their castles, which he gave to those chiefs who assisted him in conquering them, they appear to have been numerous. It is not improbable that these people were really what they are called; for Arian has never been, like Manichaeus, a sect so ignorantly and indiscreetly given to heretics of all descriptions; and there is no heresy which would be so well understood in Spain, and so likely to have reviv'd there.

The feelings of the triumphant party toward their opponents are well mark'd by the manner in which St. Isidore speaks of the death of the emperor Valens. Thracium ferro incendioque depopulatum, delictoque Romanorum cura est quum Valentem jacto vulneratum, in quadam villa flagrantem succedentem, ut merito quoque eis viciss triumphum certamen incedant, qui tum postea in hostem suas ignas extrae tertiarie. If the truth of this opinion should be doubted, there is a good Athanasian miracle in the Chronicle 11 of St. Isidore and Melitius, to prove it. A certain Arian, by name Olympius, being in the bath, blasphemed the Holy Trinity, and, behold! how struck a miraculous sight by his eyes, while he was in the midst of baptism. With regard to the Arians, the Catholics only did to the others as the others would have done to them; but the persecution of the Jews was equally unprovoked and inhuman. They are said to have betrayed many towns to the Moors; and it would be strange indeed if they had not, by every means in their power, assisted in overthrowing a government under which they were miserably oppressed. St. Isidore has a memorable passage relating to their cruel persecution and compulsory conversion under Iscàbal; Qui initio regni Iulianonis in Iberim Christus Pater atque generosus aurantium equidem etiam sacrum, sed non omnium scientiam: potestatem enim compellere, quos provocaret futilis ratione aperiret. Sed etsi est scriptum sive per occasionem sive per veritatem, Christus non asecurat, ut hoc gaudere et gaudem- bo.— St. Isidore, Christ. Goth. Espan Sagrada, l. 892.

* In the seventeenth and last council of Toledo, it was decreed that the baptismal shrine should be tombs, and sealed with the episcopal oval, during the while year, till Good Friday; on that day the bishop in his pontifical, was to open it with great solemnity, in token that Christ, by his passion and resurrection, had made the place to be heaven for the faithful, so that the day was hoped of obtaining of redemption through the Holy Eucharist as a man of baptism. — Moratol, 16, 62, 3.

NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTIS, 711

got put all former horrors out of remembrance. When Toledo was recovered from the Moors by Alonso VI., the Jews of that city were put upon the conqueror, and assured him that they were part of the ten tribes whom Nebuchadnezzar had transported into Spain; not the descendants of the Jerusalem Jews who had crucified Christ. Their ancestors, they said, were entirely innocent of the crucifixion, for when Caiaphas gave the Jews an opportunity to excommunicate their divine Master, they refused to do so; and when the Spanish profession of faith was made in the original Hebrew, and in Arabic, as it had been translated by command of King Galilee. Alonso gave ear to the story, but had the letter rendered into Latin and Castilian, and deposited it among the archives of Toledo. The letter version is thus printed by Sandoval:

"Lerv Archibasganco, e Samuel, et Joseph, hones honos de Al-jamin de Toledo, a Erazel Mayol gran Sacerdote, e Samuel Cassel, y Anos, y Cuypahas, hones hones de la Alhama de la Terra Santa, Salud in Dios de Israel.

-Sandoval, 71.

Here Alonso being zealous as some of his Gothic predecessors, or as his own Christian successors, he might have found a fair pretext in this letter for ordering all the Jews of Toledo to the font, unless they would show cause why they should adhere to the opinion of Calpinhas and the Jerusalem Jews, rather than to that of their own ancestors.

General Vallon believes that the Spanish Jews were brought to the Peninsula by Nebuchadnezzar, and admits these Tribes as authority. He quotes Count de Geland, and refers to those who were put in execution, and threatened with the most terrible penalties in the case of the death of Christ; and they were known by this, that they were in continual motion, hands and feet, and could not rest; neither could their spirit ever be still, and they had very little shame. The second were the descendents of those who put in execution and assisted at the various parts of the sufferings and death of Christ, and they never could look any man in the face, nor could they, without great difficulty, ever look up to heaven. The third were the children of David, who did all they could to prevent the death of Christ, and who themselves rose up in the temple that they might not witness it. These are affable, good men, who love their neighbors; a quiet, peaceful race, who can look any where.

Thomas Timonius de Vargas, the editor of the spurious Lut-zerian, says, that not only many Hebrew words are mixed with the old Spanish, but that, 'propter?' the black and stinking Jewish blood had been mingled with the most pure blood of the Spaniards. (p. 95.) They were very anxious, he says, to intermarry, and spoil the pure blood. And he adds, that the Spaniards call them Jutos, quos patet.

"Put," says Mr. Thomas Brown, that an ungodly or godly, or national to the Jews, we cannot well concede. And if, (according to good relations,) where they may freely speak it, they forbear not to boast that there are at present many thousand Jews in Spain, France, and England, and some dispersion without even to the degree of priestlocal, it is a matter very considerable, and could they be smelled out, would much advantage not only the church of Christ, but also the coffer of princes. —The ground that begat or propagated this assertion might be the distastefulness of the Christian from the Jews upon the death of Christ. Furthermore, they add but fact, which they esteem abominable, and 'stick' in the nostrils of all men. 1 Which real practice and metaphorical expression did after proceed into a literal construction, but was a fraudulent fiction; for such an evil savors their Father Jacob acknowledg'd in himself, when he said his sons had made him stink in the land, that is, to be abominable unto the inhabitants thereof. Another cause is urged by Campeggius, and much received by Christians; that this ill savors a curse derived upon them by Christ, and stands as a badge or brand of a generation that renounced their Salvation. Fals, for they were not known by any other fact, which makes them abominaable, and 'stick' in the nostrils of all men. 1 Which real practice and metaphorical expression did after proceed into a literal construction, but was a fraudulent fiction; for such an evil savors their Father Jacob acknowledg'd in himself, when he said his sons had made him stink in the land, that is, to be abominable unto the inhabitants thereof. The Melchoranes also hold a like opinion of the unavowerness of the Jews, and account for it by this legend, which is generally believed to be founded upon the original story given by Suidas, or others. According to this story the survivors of their dwellings because of a pestilence, or, as others say, to avoid servitude in a religious war; but as they fled, God struck them all dead in a certain valley. About eight days or more, after their bodies were corrupted, the Prophet Ezekiel happening to pass that way, at the sight of the dead, God gave him to know, and to them, O Ezekiel, and I will restore them to life. And accordingly, on the prophet's call, they all arose, and lived several years after; but they retained the color and stanch of dead corpses as long as they lived, and the clothes they were wont to wear, as black as pitch, which qualifies them to transmit their posterity. 2

One of our own travellers* tells us of a curious practical application of this belief in Barbary. "The Moors of Tangier," he says, "when they want rain, and have prayed in vain for it, set the Jews to work, saying, that though God would not grant it to the prayers of the faithful, he would to the Jews, in order to be rid of their stink." Ludicrous as this is, South has a passage concerning the Jews, which is little more reasonable, in one of his sermons. "The truth is," he says, "they were once held, toward sort of people, and such as God seems to have chosen, and (as the Prophets sometimes place it) to have exposed to himself, upon the very same account that Socrates exposed Xanthippus, only for her extreme ill conditions, above all that he could possibly find or pick out of that sex; and so the strictest argument both to

The following description of the state of the Christian world when the Saramacos began their conquests, is taken from a singular manuscript, that where in the history of the Crusades and of all the Mahommedan emperors from A. D. 555, to A. D. 1588, is gathered out of the Chronicles of William Archibald of Tyucs, the protoscribe of Palestine, of Basilius Johannes Heraklos, and sundry others, and reduced into a poem epique by Robert Barret, 1619. The author was an old soldier, whose language is a compound of Josuah Sylvester and King Cambysses, with a strong relish of Ancient Pastoral.

Now in this sin-flood age not only in East
Did the impious imp the faithful persecute,
But like affliction they pursued in West,
And in all parts the good trod under foot.
For faith in some was cold, from others fled,
And Fear of God dissolved out human hearts.

Roderick’s royal ear. — I. p. 568, col. 1.

"Roderico, the first day after the batallye, observing the ancient guise of his countrey, came into the field apparell’d in a gowne of beaten golde, having also on his head a crown of gold, and gold of other sort, and all his other apparell set with rich peeces and precious stones, ryding in a horse-litter of ioire, drawne by two goofy horses; which order the Gothes used always in battelles for this consideration, that the soul-diers, well-knowing their king could not escape away by flight from them, should be assured that there was none other way but either to die together in that place, or else to winne the victorie; for it had been a thing most shamefull and reprochfull to forsake their prince and anointed soveraigne. Which custome and manner many free confederate cities of Italie following, trimmed and adorned for their princes a certaine charyre of cattel of statute, wherein were set the peeces and ensigns of all the confederates; this charye, in battalle, was drawn by many oxen, whereby the whole houset was gouen to understand that they could not with any homely fiye, by reason of the shew pacc and marveillerly view of those heap'd banners." — A Notable Historie of the Saracens, drawn out of Augustine Curcio, and sumery other good Authours. By Thomas Newton, 1575.

The author of the chivalrous Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo gives a singular description of this car, upon the authority of his pretended original Esteastas; for he, seeing that calamities went on increasing, and that the destruction of the Goths was at hand, thought that if things were to end as they then began, it would be a marveil if there should be in Spain any king or lord of the lineage of the Goths after the death of King Don Rodrigo; and therefore it imported much that he should leave behind him a remembrance of the customs of the Gothic kings, and of the manner in which they were wont to enter into battle, and how they went to war. And he says, that the king used to go in a car made after a strange fashion. The wheels of this car were made of the bones of elephants, and the axle-tree was of fine silver, and the perch was of fine gold. It was drawn by two horses, who were of great size and gentle; and upon the car there was pitched a tent, so large that it covered the whole car, and it was of fine cloth of gold, upon which were wrought all the great feasts in arms which had been achieved until that time; and the pillars of the tent was of gold, and many stones of great value were set in it, which sent forth such splendor, that by night there was no need of any other light therein. And the car and the horses bore the same adornments us the king, and these were full of pearls the largest which could be found. And in the middle of the car there was a seat placed against the pillar of the tent; and this seat was of great price, inso much that the value of it cannot be summed up, so many and so great were the stones which were set in it; and it was wrought so subtly, and of such rare workmanship, that they who saw it marvelled thereat. And upon this seat the king was seated, being lifted up so high that all in the host, little or great, might behold him. And in this manner it was appointed that the king should go to war. And round about the car there were to go a thousand knights, who had all been knighted by the hand of the king, all armed; and in the day of battle they were to be on foot round about the car; and all plighted homage to the king not to depart from it in any manner whatsover, and that they would rather die, or have their heads cut off, than go from their place beside the car. And the king had his crown upon his head. And in this guise all the kings of the Goths, who had been lords of Spain, were to go to battle; and this custom they had all observed till the King Don Rodrigo; but he, because of the great grief which he had in his heart, would never ascend the car, neither did he go in it to the battle."

That helm

Morales describes this horned helmet from a coin. "Tiene de la una parte su rostro, harto diferente de los que en las otras Monedas de estos Reyes parece. Tiene numeros de estar armado, y sostengo por cuesa de la edad unas puentes como cuecos pequeños y derechos por ambos lados, que la hacen extraña y espantable". Flora has given this coin in his Medallas de España, from the only one which was known to be in existence, and which was then in the collection of the Infante D. Gabrís. It was struck at Egipcia, the present Isma, and, like all the coins of the Visigoth kings, is of the rudest kind. The lines in which Morales describes are sufficiently apparent, and if they are not intended for horns, it is impossible to guess what else they may have been meant to represent.

"These Gothic coins," says P. D. Jeronymo Contador de Argote, "have thousand barbarisms, as well in their letters as in other circumstances. They mingle Greek characters with Latin ones; and in what regards the relief or figure, nothing can be more dissimilar than the representation to the thing which it is intended to represent. I will relate what happened to me with one, however. I asked Hugo of Alber

Valerio Pinto de Sa, an honorable citizen of Braga, of whom, in various parts of these Memoirs, I have made well-deserved mention, and of whose friendship I have been proud ever since I have been in that city, gave me, some six or seven years ago, a gold coin of King Leovigildo, who was the first of the Gothic kings of Spain that coined money, for till then both Gods and Suevos used the Roman. I examined it, and truly, there was a cross on the one side upon some steps, and some ill-shaped letters around it; and on the reverse something, I knew not what: It seemed to me like a tree, or a stake which shot out some branches: Round about were some letters, more distinct; I could not, however, ascertain what they signified. It happened about that time that I had the honor of a visit from the most illustrious Sr. D. Francisco de Almeida, then a most worthy Academician of the Royal Academy, and at present a most dis

He found himself on Ace's bank, Fast by the Cautian schools. — I. p. 631, col. 1.

The site of this monastery, which was one of the most flourishing seminaries of that age, is believed to have been two leagues from Merida, upon the Cautiana, where the Ermita, or Chapel of Cubillana, stood at present, or was standing a few hundred years before. The legend, from which I have taken such circumstances as might easily have happened, and as suited my plan, was invented by a race of men who, in the talent of invention, have left all poets and romancers far behind them. Flores refers to Brito for it, and excuses himself from relating it, because he is not necessary to his subject; — in reality he neither believed the story, nor chose to express his objec- tions to it. His disbelieb was probably founded upon the sus- picious character of Brito, who was not at that time so de- cidedly condoned by his countrymen as he is at the present. I give the legend from the most veracious Cistercian. Most of his other fabrications have been exploded, but this has given rise to a popular and fashionable idolatry, which still maintains its ground.

The monk did not venture to leave him alone in that dis- consolidate state, and taking him apart, besought him by the passion of Jesus Christ to consent that they twain should go together, and save a venerable image of the Virgin Mary our Lady, which in that convent flourished with great miracles, and had been brought from the city of Nazareth by a Greek monk, called Cyrilus, at such a time as a heresy in the parts of the East arose against the use and venerating of images; and with it a relte of the Apostle St. Bartholomew, and another of St. Bras, which were kept in an ivory covey, for it would be a great sacrifice to leave them. Brito, according to public fame, left neither temple nor sacred place which they did not profane, casting the images into the fire, and dragging them at their horses' tails for a greater opprobrium to the baptized people. The King, seeing himself thus conjured by the passion of our Redeemer Jesus Christ, in whom alone he had consolation and hope of remedy, and considering the piety of the thing in which he was chosen for companion, he himself be overcame by his entreaties; and taking in his arms the little image of our Lady, and Romano the covey with the relics, and mounted on his horse, in the journey, they struck into the middle of Portugal, having their faces always towards the west, and seeking the coast of the ocean sea, because in those times it was a land more solitary, and less frequented by people, where they thought the Moors would not reach so soon, because, as it were there no countries to com- petition in those parts, there was no occasion which should lead them thither. Twenty-and-six days the two companions travelled without touching at any inhabited place, and after enduring many difficulties in crossing mountains and fording rivers, they sighted of the sea on the 29th of December, being the day of the Virgin Martyr St. Cecilia; and as if in that place they should have an end of their labors, they took some comfort, and gave thanks to God, for that they had saved them from the hand of their enemies. The place which they reached is in the Cotos de Almora, near to the eastern side of which there see the town of Pedrera, on the eastern side of which there see the

... in the midst of certain sands, a hill of rock and firm sand, somewhat prolonged from north to south, so lofty and well proportioned that it seemed miraculously placed in that site, being surrounded on all sides with plains covered with sand, without heightiness, to which it appears sedentary. And so much as the manner thereof draws to it the eyes of who- soever beholds this work of nature, the king and the monk desired to ascend the height of it, to see whether it would afford a place for them in which to pass their lives. They found there a little hermitage with a holy crucifix, and no other sign of man, save only a plain tomb, without writing or epitaph to declare whose it might be. The situation of the place, which, according to a notable height, gives a prospect by way and by land as far as the eyes can reach, and the sudden sight of the place caused in the mind of the said king such excite- ment and so great consolation, that, embracing the foot of the cross, he lay there melting away in rivers of tears, not new of grief for the kingdoms and dominions which he had lost, but of consolation in seeing that in exchange the same Jesus himself had in this solitary mountain offered himself to him, in whose company he resolved to pass the remainder of his life; and this he declared to the monk, who, to content him, and also because he saw that the place was convenient for contemplation, approved the king's resolve, and abode there with him some days during which, possibly he did some inconveniences in living upon the summit of the mountain, from whence it was necessary to descend with much labor, whenever they would drink, or seek for herbs and fruits for their food; and moreover, understanding that it was the king's de- sire to remain upon that place, he advised himself in tears and exclamations, which he made oftentimes before the image of Christ, he went with his cognate to a place little more than a mile from the mountain, which being on the one side smooth and of easy approach, lounge on the other over the sea with so huge a precipice, that it is impossible to comprehend in particular height, from the top of the rock to the water. There, be- tween two great rocks, each of which projects over the sea, hanging suspended from the height in such a form, that they seem to threaten destruction to him who sees them from the beach, Romano entered the little cave, made naturally in the cliff, which he enlarged with some walls of loose stone, built up with his own hands, and having thus made a sort of hermitage, he placed therein the image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth, which he had brought from the Cautiana current, and which being small, and of a dark color, with the infant Jesus in its arms, hath in the countenance a certain perfection, with a modesty so remarkable, that at first sight it presents something miraculous; and having been known and venerated so great a number of years, during many of which it was in a place which did not protect it from the injuries of time, it has never been painted, neither hath it been found necessary to renew it.

The situation of this hermitage was, and is now, within sight of the mountain where the king dwelt; and though the me- morials from whence I am deriving the circumstanced of these events do not specify it, it is to be believed that they often saw each other, and held such divine communion as their mode of life and the holiness of the place required; especially consid- ering the great temptations of the Devil which the king suffered at the beginning of his penitence, for which the counsels and instructions of the monk would be necessary; and the fact of his prayers, and the presence of the relics of St. Bartholomew, which miraculously saved him many times from various illu- sions of the enemy. And in these our days there are seen upon the top of the mountain, in the living rock, certain human foot- steps, and others of a different form, which the common people, without knowing the person, affirm to be the footsteps of St. Bartholomew and the Devil, who was there defeated and his illusions comfounded by the saint, coming in aid of a devout man who called upon him in the force of his tribulation. This must have been true, (though the people know it not), whom the saint thus visibly aided, and he chose that for a memorial of this aid, and of the power which God has given him over the evil spirits, these marks should remain impressed upon the living rock. And the ancient stones being taken up and changed into that of the Apostle, and is called at present St. Bartholomew's; and the hermitage which remains upon the top of it is under the invocation of the same saint and of St. Bras, which must have arisen from the relics of these two saints that Romano brought with him and left with the king for his consolation, when he withdrew with the image of Our Lady to the place where we have spoken, when he lived little more than a year; and by knowing the time of his death, he communicated it to the king, beseeching him that, in requital for the love with which he had accompanied him, he would remember to pray to God for his soul, and would give his body to the earth, from which it had sprung; and, looking to depart, he would not leave there the image and the relics, in such manner as he should dispose them before he died. With that Roderico departed to enjoy the reward deserved by his labors, leaving the king with fresh occasion of grief for want of so good a companion. Of this place, some of the traditions and tribulations which he endured at the end of his life, there is no authentic historian, nor memorial which should certify them, more than some relations mingled with fabulous tales in the ancient Chronicle of King Don Rodrigo, where, among the truths which are taken from the Moor Rasis, there are many things notoriously impossible; such as the journey which the king took, being guided by a white cloud till he came near Viseo; and the penance in which he ended his life there, enclosing himself alive in a certain tomb with a serpent which he had reared for that purpose. But as these are things difficult to believe, we shall pass them over in silence, leaving to the judgment of the curious the credit which an ancient picture deserves, still existing near Viseo, in the church of St. Michael, over the tomb of the said King Don Roderick, in which is seen a serpent pointed with two heads; and in the tomb itself shall be staked, pole, though on which they say that the snake entered. That which is certain of all this, as our historians relate, that the king came to this place, and in the hermitage of St. Michael, which we now see near Viseo, ended his days in great penance, no man knows for certain. Then I think that there is no other memorial clearer than that in process of time a writing was found upon a certain tomb in this church with these words: Hic requiescit Rodericus ultimus Rex Gothorum, Hic restat Roderick, the last King of the Goths. I remember to have seen ancient words written upon an arch of the wall, which is over the tomb of the king, although the Archbishop Don Rodrigo, and they who follow him, give a longer inscription, not observing that all which he has added are his own curios and imprecaisons upon Count Don Julian, (as Ambrosio de Morales has properly remarked, following the Bishop of Sancheu and others,) not parts of the same inscription, as they make them. The church in which is the tomb of the king is at present very small, and of great antiquity, especially the first chapel, joined to which on either side is a cell of the same length, but narrow, and dark also, having no windows or light; it is joined with clouds of sinister atmosphere engaging to the east. In one of these cells (that is on the south side) it is said that a certain hermit dwelt, by whose advice the king governed himself in the course of his penance; and at this time his grave is shown close to the walls of the chapel, on the Epistle side. In the other cell (which is on the north) the king passed his life, paying now, in the strictness of that place, for the largeness of his palaces, and the liberties of his former life, whereby he had offended his Creator. And in the wall of the chapel which answers to the Gospel side, there remains a sort of arch, in which the tomb is seen, wherein are his bones; and it is devoutly visited by the natives, who believe that through his means the Lord does miracles there upon persons afflicted with agues and other like maladies. Under the said arch, in the part answering to it in the inside of the cell, I saw painted on the wall the hermit and the king, with the serpent with two heads, and I read the letters which are given above, all defaced by time, and bearing marks of great antiquity, yet so that they could distinctly be seen. The tomb is flat, and made of a single stone, in the same body which contains within it the body of the saint, and is worn from both sides. When I saw it, it was open, the stone which had served to cover it not being there, neither the bones of the king, which they told me had been carried into Castille some years before, but in what manner they knew not, nor by whose order; neither could I discover, by all the inquiries which I made among the people of that place, the reason or to be acquainted with a thing of so much importance, if it were as certain as some of them affirmed it to be."—Brito, Monarchia Lusitania, P. ii. 7. c. 3.

"The great venerableness of the image of our Lady of Nazareth which the king left hidden in the very place where Romans in his lifetime had placed it, and the continual miracle which it has produced, is the subject to which the learned Mauro de Brito continne to continue the history of this Image, which, no doubt, he did the more willingly because he bears a part in it himself. In the days of Augusto Henriques, the first king of Portugal, this part of the country was governed by D. Fons Rompilho, a knight famous in the Portuguese chronicles, who resided in the castle at Porto de Mos. This Don Fins, when he saw the land secure from enemies, used often to go out hunting among the sands and thickets between the town and the sea, where, in those days, there used to be great store of game, and where the king had left some of his relics; for which reason it is still some; and as he followed this exercise, the proper just-time of noble and spirited men, and came sometimes to the sea-shore, he came upon that remarkable rock, which, being level on the side of the north, and on a line with the flat country, ends towards the south in a precipice over the waves of the sea, of a prodigious height, causing the greater admiration to him who, going over the plain country without finding any irregularity, finds himself, when least expecting it, suddenly on the summit of such a height. And as he was curiously regarding this natural wonder, he observed between the two biggest cliffs which stand out from the ground and project over the sea, a sort of house built of stones which, from its form and antiquity, made him go himself to examine it; and descending by the chasm between the two rocks, he entered into it. And then he saw the wall enclosing this per- fect image of the Virgin Mary of Nazareth, being of such perfection and modesty as are found in very few images of that size. The Catholic King venerated it with all submission, and would have removed it to his castle of Porto de Mos, to have placed it in a veneration, but that he feared to offend it if he should take it from a place where it had abode for so many years. This consideration made him leave it for the present in the same place and manner in which he found it; and although he visited it afterwards when in course of the chase he came to those parts, nevertheless he never took it in hand to improve the image, which he supposed he would have done it, if the Virgin had not saved him from a notorious danger of death, which, peradventure, God permitted as a punishment for his negligence, and in this manner to make the virtue of the Holy Image manifest to the world. It was thus, that going to his ordinary exercise of the chase, in the month of September, in the year of Christ 1182, and on the 10th of the month, being the day on which the church celebrates the festival of the Exaltation of the Cross upon which which Christ redeemed the human race, as the day rose thick with more heavy clouds, the king, who was riding through the country round about could not be seen by reason of the clouds, save for a little space, it befell that the dogs put up a stag, (if indeed it were one,) and Don Fins pressing his horse in pursuit, without fear of any danger, because he thought it was all plain ground, and the mist hindered him from seeing where he was, found himself upon the very edge of the rock on the precipice, two hundred fathoms above the sea, at a moment when it was no longer in his power to turn the reins, nor could he do any thing more then invoke the succours of the Virgin Mary, whose image was in that place; and where she saved him in such a manner, that less than two palms from the edge of the rock, on a long and narrow point thereof, the horse stopped as if it had been made of stone, the marks of his hoofs remaining in proof of the miracle imprinted in the living rock, such as at this day they are seen by all strangers and persons on pilgrimage, who go to visit the Image of Our Lady; and it is a notable thing, and deserving of serious consideration, to see that in the midst of this rock, upon which the miracle happened, and on the side towards the east, and inscribed in the rock, in the exact part where it is most visible, there is a sign improbable that any human being could reach. Nature herself has impressed a cross as if nailed to the narrowness of the rock, as though she had sanctioned that cliff therewith, and marked it with that holy sign, to be the theatre in which the miraculous circumstance was to be celebrated; which, by reason that it took place on the day of the Exaltation of the Cross, seemed as if it showed the honor and glory which should from thence redound to the Lord who redeemed us thereon. Don Fins, seeing himself delivered from so great danger, and knowing from whence the grace had come to him, went to the little hermitage, where, with that great devotion which they had been taught of their father, and the devotion which he himself had preserved, he gave infinite thanks to Our Lady, acceing himself before her of having neglected to repair the house, and promising all the amend which his possibility permitted. His huntsmen afterwards arrived, following the track of the horse, and knowing the marvel which had occurred, they proclaimed it before the presence of Our Lady, adding with their astonishment to the devotion of Dom Funs, who, hearing that the stag had not been seen, and that the dogs had found no track of him in any part, though one had been represented before him to draw him to it, concluded that it was an illusion of the Devil, seeking by that means to make him persist uncritically. All these considerations enhanced the greatness of the miracle, and the obligations of Dom Funs, who, tarrying there some days, made workmen come from Leyria and Porto de Mos, to make other hermitage, in which the Lady should be more venerated; and as they were demolishing the first, they found placed between the stones of the altar a little box of ivory, and within it reliks of St. Brus, St. Bartholomew, and other saints, with a parchment, wherein a relation was given of how and at what time those relics and the ivory were brought there, according as has been aforesaid. A vaulted chapel was soon made, after a good form for times so ancient, over the very place where the Lady had been; and to the end that it might be seen from all sides, it was left open with four arches, which in the time of theCCCCCC...

My friend Walter Scott's Vision of Don Rodriguez supplies a singular contrast to the picture which is represented in this passage. I have great pleasure in quoting the stanzas; if the context had been intentional, it could not have been more complete.

The first monastery is said to have been established in that country by St. Anthony the Great, towards the close of the third century. He who rests in solitude, said the saint, is saved from three conflicts,—from the war of hearing, and of speech, and of sight; and he has only to struggle against his own heart. (Acta Sanctorum, i, ii, p. 143.) Indulgence was not the only virtue which he and his disciples introduced into the catalogue of Christian perfections. S. Euthraxia entered a convent consisting of a hundred and thirty nuns, not one of whom had ever washed her hair after baptism; the very mention of the bath was an abomination to them. (Acta Sanctorum, March 13.) St. Macarius had renounced most of the decencies of life; but he returned one day to his convent, humbled and mortified, excluding:—I am not yet a monk; but I have seen monks! for he had met two of those wretches stark naked. — Acta Sanctorum, i, p. 107.

The principles which these madmen established were, that every indulgence is sinful; that whatever is gratifying to the body, must be injurious to the soul; that in proportion as men inflict torments upon himself, he pleases his Creator; that the ties of natural affection wean the heart from God; and that every social duty must be abandoned by him who would be perfect. The doctrine of two principles has never produced such practical evils in any other system as in the Romanish. Monks, indeed, sometimes all evil to the equal power of the Evil Principle, (that power being only for a time,) and some of the corrupted forms of Christianity actually exclude a good one.

There is a curious passage in the Bibliothecas Orientalis of Ausonius, in which the deserts are supposed to have been originally intended for the use of these saints, compensating for their sterility by the abundant crop of virtues which they were to produce. In ulla vero soli constat, quia procul a XXII ripis quaquerentur laesiones propterque, non erubis, non dominici, non apergi, non ubertas, non adscendit, non tamen tamen hunc terram portem (ut Ecclerix verbitur) sustulere, et in honorationem dimitis Deus, quos in primordiis veram omnia in specularia facit, et singula quoque fatares unicas aedas distingueret; et cantus non magis prodestis magistrisque, quod fatares pro- spectavit cerius, cerius, ut arbitror, Sanctorum Evan. parentis. If the ways of religion? says Smith, are ways of pleasantness, such as are not ways of pleasantness are not truly and properly ways of religion. Upon which ground it is easy to see what judgment is to be passed upon all those affected, unchristianized, and unchristianized, as they are by some of the Romanish. Pilgrimages, going barefoot, hair-shirts and whips, with other such gospel-artillery, are their only help to devotion; things never enjoined, either by the prophets under the Jewish, or by the apostles under the Christian economy, who yet surely understood the proper and the most efficacious instruments of piety, as well as any confessor or friar of all the order of St. Francis, or any casuist whatsoever.

7 It seems that with them a man sometimes cannot be a penitent unless he also turns vagabond, and foots it to Jerusalem, or wanders over this or that part of the world to visit the shrines of such or such a pretended saint, though perhaps in his life ten times more ridiculous than themselves. Thus, that which was Cain's error, is become their religion. He that thinks to expiate a sin by going barefoot, only makes ear-

The history of Europe during the dark ages abounds with examples of consecration, as it was called by those writers who endeavored, towards the middle of the 17th century, to introduce the style-ornate into our prose after it had been hitherto from poetry. In the East, the practice is still continued. When Alphonse took possession of Oranz, he sent to Portugal fifteen of his former kings, whom he had found there, each of whom, in his turn, had been deposed and blinded. In the semi-barbarous stage of society, any kind of personal blemish seems to have been considered as disqualifying a prince from the succession, like the law of the Normans by the son of Owen Gwynedd, was set aside in Wales because of his broken nose; Count Oliva, in Barcelona, because he could not speak till he had stamped with his foot three times like a goat. The trend of our thought in the history of Henry V. and Charles VI. of France, by which Henry was appointed King of France after Charles's decease, was that decreed that the French should sweare to become liege men and vassals to our said sun King Henry, and obey him as the true King of France, and without any opposition or dispute shall receive him as such, and never pay obedience to any other as king or regent of France, but to our said sun King Henry, unless our said sun should lose life or limb, or be attacked by a mortal disease, or suffer diminution in person, state, honor, or property.

A remarkable instance of the inconvenient manner in which the b and e are indiscriminately used by the Spaniards, occurs here in the original edition. The e not being used in that language, it would naturally be represented by r; and here, the printer, using most unluckily his typographical license, has made the word Ptolon.

"The Spaniards," says that late worthy John Stamford, some time fellow of Magdalen college, in Oxford, (in his Spanish Grammar, 1624), "do with a kind of wantonness so confound the sound of b with e, that it is hard to determine when and in what words it retains its vulgar letter b, which gave just cause of laughter at that Spaniard who, being in conversation with a French lady, and minding to command her children for fair, said unto her, using the Spanish liberty in pronouncing the French,—Madame, paruez ence nue e-fosse, trilling her that she had calved to her children, instead of saying, bonne enfosse, fair children. Neither can I well justify him who wrote beneficio for beneficio."

Conimbriga, whose ruined towers

The Roman Conimbriga stood about two leagues from the present Coimbra, on the site of Condaxa Veja. Ataces, king of the Alans, won it from the Sueves, and, in revenge for its obstinate resistance, dispersed it, making all its inhabitants, without distinction of persons, work at the foundation of Coimbra where it now stands. Hennemérico, the king of the Sueves, attacked him while thus employed, but was defeated and pursued to the Douro; peace was then made, and Sãohélinda, daughter of the conqueror, gave in marriage to the conqueror. In memory of the pacification thus effected, Ataces bore upon his banners a damsel in a tower, with a drawn sword at one side, and a lion roughe on the other, that gave just cause of laughter at that Spaniard who, being in conversation with a French lady, and minding to command her children for fair, said unto her, using the Spanish liberty in pronouncing the French,—Madame, paruez ence nue e-fosse, trilling her that she had calved to her children, instead of saying, bonne enfosse, fair children. Gaspar Estapo has shown that this is the name of the founder of Guimates; and that it is not, as some writers had supposed, erroneously thus written, because the words Monna and Dona followed each other in the deeds of gift wherein it is preserved; the same being frequently found with its title affixed thus, Dona Monumada.

Sacaur, ... indignantly
Did he toward the ocean bend his way,
And, skaking from his feet the dust of Spain,
Took ship, and belated sail through seas unknown
To seek for freedom. — IV. p. 659, col. 2.

This tale, which is repeated by Bleda, rests on no better authority than that of Abulacaem, which may, however, be admitted, so far as to show that it was a prevalent opinion of his time.

The Antonlo Galvan, in his Tratado dos Desenobromientos Antiguos e Modernos, relates a current, and manifestly false story, which has been supposed to refer to Sacaur, and the companions of his emigration. "They say," he says, "that at this time, A. D. 1447, a Portuguese ship sailing out of the Straits of Gibraltar, was carried by a storm much further to the west than she had intended, and came to an island where there were seven cities, and where our language was spoken; and the people asked whether the Moors still occupied Spain, from whence they had fled after the loss of King Don Rodrigo. The commander of the ship said, that he brought away a little sand from the island, and sold it to a goldsmith in Lisbon, who extracted from it a good quantity of gold. It is said that the Infante D. Pedro, who governed at that time, ordered these things to be written in the Casa do Tombo. And some will have it that those lands and islands at which the Portuguese seamen, were those which are now called the Antilhas and New Spain." (P. 94.)

Thus Antilia, or Island of the Seven Cities, is laid down in Martin Belloeim's map; the story was soon improved by giving seven bishoprics to the seven cities; and Galvan has been accused by Horinias of having invented it to give his countrymen the honor of having discovered the West Indies! Now, it is evident that Antonio Galvan relates the story as if he did not believe it,—content they relate,— and, dit, it is said,— never affirming the fact, nor making any inference from it, but merely stating it as a report; and it is certain, which perhaps Horinias did not know, that there never lived a man of purer integrity than Antonio Galvan; a man whose history is disgraceful, not to his country, but to the government under which he lived, and whose uniform and unassailed virtue entitles him to rank among the best men that have ever done honor to human nature.

The writers who repeat this story of the Seven Islands and their bishops, have also been pleased to find traces of Sacaur in the new world, for which the imaginary resemblance to Christianity which were found in Yucatan and other places, serve them as proofs.— Gregorio Garcia, Origen de los Indianos, 1. iv. c. 20.

The work of Abulacaem, in which the story first appears, has been roundly ascertained to be the forgery of the translator, Miguel de Laus. The Portuguese academican, Contador de Argute, speaking of this romantic history, acquires him of the fraud, which law with little reflection been laid to his charge. Pedroça, he says, in the Grandezas de Granada, and Rodrigo Curo, in the Grandezas de Sevilla, both affirm that the original Arabics exist in the Escurial, and Escalona asserts the same, although he figures only six or seven books with the catalogus of them. Libraries do not make mention of any such book. If Luna had forg'd it, it would not have had many of those blunders which are observed in it; nor is there any reason for imputing such a fraud to Luna, a man well skilled in Arabic, and of good reputation. What I suspect, that the book was composed by a Granadan Moor, and the reason which induces me to form this opinion is, the minutness with which he describes the compotest which Tariff made of those parts of the kingdom of Granada, of the Alpujarras and the Sierra Nevada, pointing out the etymologies of the names of places, and other circumstances, which any one who reads with attention will observe. As to the time in which the composer of this amusing romance flourished, it was certainly after the reign of Bedecci Aben Hilbur, who governed, and was Lord of Granada about the year 1018, as Mormolor relates, after the Arabian writers; and the reason which I have for this assertion is, that in the romance of Ababolien the story is told which gave occasion to the said Bedecci Aben Hilbur to set up in Granada that famous vane, which represents a knight upon horseback in bronze, with a spear in the right hand, and a club in the left, and these words in Arabic, Bedecci Aben Hilbur says, that in this manner Andalusia must be kept! the figure moves with every wind, and veers about from one end to another. — Memorias de Braga, t. iii. p. 120.

In the fabulous Chronicle of D. Rodriga, Segurana, as he is called, there is a conspicuous personage; but the tale of his emigration was not then current, and the author kills him before the Moors appear upon the stage. He seems to have designed him as a representation of perfect generosity.

All too long.
Here in their own inheritance, the sons
Of Spain have groaned beneath a foreign yoke.
IV. p. 659, col. 2.

There had been a law to prohibit intermarriages between the Goths and Romans; this law Recesvivano annulled, observing, in his edict, that the people ought in no slight degree to rejoice at the repeal. It is curious that the distinction which had existed so long; but it is found also in a law of Wumano's, and doubtless must have continued till both names were lost together in the general wreck. The vile principle was laid down in the laws of the Visigoths, that such as escape the law must be made to care for the children of slaves, slaves also.

Many men well versed in history, says Contador de Argoz, (Memorias de Braga, 2, 274,) think, and think rightly, that this was a civil war, and that the monarchy was divided into two factions, of which the least powerful availed itself of the Arabs as auxiliaries; and that these auxiliaries made themselves masters, and easily effected their intent by means of the divisions in the court.

The natives of Spain, says Josam de Harros, never bore much love to the Goths, who were strangers and comings, and when they came had no right there, for the whole belonged to the Roman empire. It is believed that the greater part of those whom the Moors now were Goths, and it is said that, on one side and on the other, in the course of two years there were slain by the sword seven hundred thousand men. The Christians who escaped chose that the name of Goths should be lost; and though some Cartilhanas complain that the race should be extinguished, saying with Don Jorge Manrique,

Pues la sangre de los Godos
y el linage y la nobleza tan crecida, por quantas vidas y modos se traz en su grande altura en esta vida.

* Fuero Juzgo, l. 3, tit. 1, leg. 1.

I must say that I see no good foundation for this; for they were a proud nation and barbarous, and were a long time heretics of the sects of Arius and Eutychius and Pelagius, and can be praised as nothing except as warriors, who were so greatly for dominion, that after they reached they laid every thing bare like locusts, and therefore the emperor ceded to them this country. The people who dwelt in it before were a better race, always praised and feared, and respected by the Romans, loyal and faithful and true and reasonable; and if the Goths afterwards were worthy of any estimation they became so here: for as plants lose their bitterness and improve by being planted and translated into a good soil, (as is said of peaches,) so does a good land change its inhabitants, and of rustic and barbarous make them polished and virtuous.

The Moors did not say that they came against the Christians, but against the Goths, who had usurped Spain; and it appears that to the people of the land it mattered little whether they were under Goths or Moors; or indeed it might not be too much to say that they preferred the Moors, not only because all new things and changes would be pleasing, but because they were exasperated against the Goths for what they had done against the Christians, (i.e. the Catholics,) and for the bad government of King Wiliad. [2]

'You are not to think,' says the Chronicle, 'that Count Don Julian and the Bishop Don Orpes came of the lineages of the Goths, but of the lineages of the Casaraz, and therefore they were not grieved that the good lineages should be destroyed.'

There relates the story in the words of the old translation of an Arabic original imputed to Basset. "When Belkizan, the son of Musa, remained for Lord of Spain, and had ordered his affairs right well, they told him tidings of Ulca, who had been the wife of King D. Rodrigo, that she was a right worthy dame, and right beautiful, and of a great lineage, and that she was a native of Africa; whereupon he set forth, and ordered that beasts should be given her, and much property, and men-servants and maid-servants, and all things that she could require till she could come to him. And they brought her unto him, and when he saw her, he was well pleased with her, and said, Ulca, tell me of thy affairs, and conceal nothing from me; for thou knowest I may do with thee according to my will, being my captive. And when she heard this, she told him the grief which she had in her heart, and her sorrow was such, that she had well nigh fallen dead to the ground, and she replied weeping and said, Baron, what wouldst thou know more of my affairs? For doth not all the world know, that I, a young damsel, being married with King
D. Rodrigo, was with him Lady of Spain, and dwelt in honor and in all pleasure, more than I deserved; and therefore I did all that they should have no longer. A now I am in dishonor greater than ever was done of such high estate: For I am plundered, and have not a single palm of inheritance; and I am a captive, and brought into bondage. I also have been mistress of all the land that I hold. Therefore, Sir, have pity upon my misfortunes; and in respect of the great lineage which you know to be mine, suffer not that wrong or violence be offered me by any one; and, Sir, if it be your grace you will ransom me. There are men I know who would take compassion on me, and give you for me a great sum. And Belazin said to her, Be certain that so long as I live, you shall never go from my house. And Ularo said, What then, Sir, would you do with me? and Belazin said, I will that you should remain in my house, and there you shall be free from all work and burdens, with my other wives. And she said, In an evil day was I born, if it is to be true that I have been wife of the honored king of Spain, and now have to live in a stranger's house as the concubine and captive of another! And I swear unto God whose pleasure it is to dismay me thus, that I will rather seek my own death as soon as I can; for I will endure worse miseries, seeing that by death I can escape it. And when Belazin saw that she thus lamented, he said to her, Good done, think not that we have conclusions, but by our law we may have seven wives, if we can maintain them, and therefore you shall be my wife, like each of the others; and all things which a man requires that a man should for his wife, will I do for you; and therefore you have no cause to lament; and be sure that I will do you much honor, and will make all who love me serue and honor you, and you shall be mistress of all my wives. To this she made answer and said, Sir, offer me no violence concerning my law, but let me live as a Christian: And to this Belazin was nothing both, and he granted it, and his marriage was performed with her according to the law of the Moors; and every day he liked her more, and did her such honor that greater could not be. And it befell that Belazin being one day with Ularo, she said to him, Sir, do not think it ill if I tell you of a thing in which you do not act as if you knew the custom. And he said, Wherein is it that I err? Sir, she said, because you have no crown, for no one was ever confirmed in Spain, except he had a crown upon his head. He said, This which you say is nothing, for we have it not of our lineage, neither is it our custom to wear a crown. She said, Many good reasons are there why a crown is of use, and it would injure you nothing, but be well for you, and when you should wear your crown upon your head, you would know you are others also by it: And she said, You would look full comely with it, and it would be great nobleness to you, and be right fitting, and you should wear it in certain stones, which will be good for you, and avail you. And in a short time afterwards, Belazin went to dwell with her. And he carried Ularo with him, and she took of her gold, and of her pearls, and of her precious stones, which she had many and good, and made him the noblest crown that ever was seen by men, and gave it him, and bade him take it, and place it where it should be well kept; and Ularo, as she was a woman of understanding and prudence, ordered her affairs as well as Belazin, so that he loved her much and did great honor to her, and did many of those things which she desired; so that he was well pleased with the Christians, and did them much good, and showed favor unto: They Marinas de los Reyes Catholicas, 1, p. 26. The issue of this was fatal to Abdulaziz. In Albucacin's history, it is said that he was converted by this Christian wife, and for that reason put to death by his father. Others have supposed that by means of her influence he was endeavouring to make himself King of Spain, independent of the Caliph. A characteristic circumstance is added. Egidina was very desirous to convert her husband, and that she might at least obtain from him some mark of outward respect for her images, made the door of the apartment in which she kept them, so low, that he could not enter without bowing. — Riede, p. 234.

The character of this Queen is beautifully conceived by the author of Count Julian:—

Beaming with virtuous inaccessible
Stood Egidina; for her lord she lived,
And for the heavens that raised her sphere so high:
All thoughts were on her—albeit beside her own.
Neglecting as the blossoms of the field,
Arrayed in candor and simplicity,
Before her path she heard the streams of joy
Murmur her name in all their cadences,
Saw them in every scene, in light, in shade,
Reflect her image; but acknowledged them
Hers most complete when flowing from her most.
All things in want of her, herself of none,
Pomp and dominion by beneath her feet
Unfelt and unregarded: now behold
The earthly passions war against the heavenly!
Pride against love; ambition and revenge
Against devotion and complacency—
Her glorious beams adversity hath blunted,
And coming neath the sere:
The original row of coarse mortality
Hardens and dawns around her.

Our day of bitter and severe delight. — VI. p. 663, col. 2.

I have ventured to borrow this expression from the tragedy of Count Julian. Nothing can be finer than the passage in which it occurs.

Julian. Abdulaziz,
All men with human feelings love their country.
Not the high-born or wealthy man alone,
Who looks on his children, each one held
By its gay handmaid, from the high alcaoe,
And hears them once a-day; not only he
Who hath forgotten, when his guest inquires
The name of some far village all his own;
Whose rivers bore the province, and whose hills
Touch the last cloud upon the level sky:
No; better men still better love their country.
'Tis the old mansion of their earliest friends,
The chapel of their first and best devotions;
When violent or pernicious, invades,
Or when unworthy lords bold wassail there,
And wiser heads are dropping round its masts,
At last they fix their steady and stiff eye
There, there alone—stand while the trumpet blows,
And view the hostile flames above its towers
Spin, with a bitter and severe delight.

Restoring in thy native line, O Prince,
The sceptre to the Spanish. — VII. p. 666, col. 1.

This was a favorite opinion of Garilays, himself a Bis- cayan, but he has little better proof for it than the fact, that Gothic names disappeared with Roderick, and that Pelico and his successors drew their nomenclature from a different stock. He says, indeed, that ancient writings are not wanting to support his opinion. Some rude commentator has written against this assertion in the margin of my copy, aiente Garil- bag; and I am afraid the commentator is the true man of the two.

There is a fabulous tale of Pelico's birth, which, like many other tales of no better authority, has legends and relics to support it. The story, according to Dr. D. Christoval Lozano, in his history of Los Reyes Nuevos de Toledo, is this. Luz, niece to Egidina, and sister of Roderick, dwelt at Tolledo, in the palace of King Egidas. Duke Pavlin, her father's brother, fell in love with her, and came from his residence in Cantabria to ask her in marriage, expecting to find no other obstacle than the dispensable one of consanguinity. But it so happened that the King was wooing her cousin; her refusal made him jealous, as he could not conceive that it proceeded from any cause except love for another, and as his temper and power were not to be provoked without danger, Fuliús dared not openly make his suit. He and his mistress therefore met in private, and pleaded their views before an image of the Virgin. The consequences soon became apparent,—the more so, because, as Dr. Lozano assures us, there were at that time no fashions to conceal such things, I was que en aquella era no se ocultaban las guarda-infantes. The King observed her in her emple, and placed spies upon her, meaning to destroy the child and punish the mother with the rigor of the law, death by fire being the punishment for such an offence. Lou was well aware of the danger. She trusted her Camarasa and one servant. They made an ark; she herself, as soon as the infant was born, threw water in his face, and baptized him by the name of Pelayo; a writing was placed with him in the ark, requesting that whoever should find it would break up the boy with care, for he was of good lineage. Money enough was added to support him for eight years, and the ark was then launched upon the Tagus, where it floated down the stream all night, all day, and all the following night. On the second morning it grounded near Alcantara, and was found by Grañeses, who happened to be Lou’s uncle. The King’s suspicion being confirmed in the lady’s appearance, he used every means to detect her, but without avail; he even ordered all children to be examined who had been born in or around Toledo within three months, and full inquiry to be made into the circumstances of their births: To the astonishment of later writers, 35,000 of that age were found, and not one among them of suspicious extraction. The tale proceeds in the ordinary form of romance. The lady is accused of incontinence, and to be burnt, unless a champion defends her sucror. Fuliús of course undertakes her defence, and of course is victorious. A second battle follows with the same success, and fresh combats would have followed, if a hermit had not brought the king to repentance. Grañeses in due time discovers the secret, and restores the child to his parents.

This fabulous chronicle seems to be the oldest written source of this story, but some such tradition had probably long been current. The ark was shown at Alcantara, in the convent of St. Benito; and a description of it, with reasons why its authenticity should be admitted, may be found in Francisco de Pidal’s Description de Toledo, l. iii. c. i.

And in thy name,
Accept the Crown of Thorns she proffers me. — VII. 665, col. 2.

Godefry was actually crowned with thorns in Jerusalem,—a circumstance which has given rise to a curious question in heraldry,—thus curiously stated and commented by Robert Barret, in that part of his long poem which relates to this Prince—

A Prince religious, if ever say,
Considering the age wherein he lived,
Vice-hater great, ended with virtues many,
True humilized, void of mundane pride;
For though he now created were great king,
Yet would he not, as royal power to become,
Enwrapped be with crownet glistening
Of gold and gems to munish vain desires;
But with a prickling, prickling crown of thorns,
Bearing thereto a Christian reverence,
Sitting Heaven’s King, man’s Redeemer, did not scorn
To wear such crown within that city’s fence,
When as, cross-laden, humbly he went,
All covering under burden of that wood,
To free man from hell
To pay the pain of man’s due punishment,
And from Pluto’s hands Prometheus brood.
By reas’n of Godefry’s great humility
Refusing golden-crowned dignity,

The foolishness of H7.

Some blundering in world-witted heraldry,
Not knowing how to distinguish vertues true;
Do question make this Christian king to set
In catalogue of gold-diademed kings;
Regardan gitter of the external jet,
And not true garnish of th’ internal things;
Th’ internal virtues, souls sweet ornaments,
So pleasing to th’ Eternal’s view.
In angels’ chere connecting sweet concords
Of heavenly harmony ’ave chrotil skis.
But we, e contra, him not only deem
A Christian king, but perfect Christian king,
A Christian soul, lamping light in Christ,
To after-crowned kings, world enprizing;
For he, religious prince, did despise
The Heaven-sent gift to be unainted king,
But disesteem’d the mundane pompous guise.
Tickling the hearts of princes menarching.

Annot. Potentates regard this heaven-aspiring Prince,
Not priding, as up proves his dignity;
High throned kings aspire the starred fence
Of this true map of true kings royally;
Not bestowing in cloud-kissing towers,
Not Semiramising in pride’s palaces,
Not Neronizing in all sanguine hours,
Not Helogenizing in lusts less;
But Judasimiting in his Christian camp,
And Judasitinizing in the Heav’n’s seat,
And Davidizing in his Sion’s stump,
And Solomonizing in all sacred heat.

Outwatching for her sake
The stary host, and ready for the work
Of day before the Venus begins her course. — VII. p. 667, col. 2.

Garcí Fernández Mariquie surprised the Moors so often during the night, that he was called Garcí Madrigu, an appellation of the same import as Peep-of-day-boy. He founded the convent of St. Salvador de Palacios de Bemagai for Benedictine monks, and when he called up his merry men, used to say, Up, sirs, and fight, for my name are up and praying; Leonantes Seuores a pelcare, que mis mugos an levanclos a rezar. — Prunus de la Hist. de la Casa de Lara, p. 42.

Mariana derives the name of Hermesinda from the reverence in which Hermenegild was held in Spain,—a prince who has beenainted for having renounced the Homoeasian creed, and raised a civil war on his father’s behalf to repel the Moslem invasion. It is not a little curious, when the fate of D. Carlos is remembered, that his name should have been inserted in the calendar, at the solicitation of Philip II. From the same source Mariana derives the names Hermasinda, Armeongil, Ermenguill, Hermagudilas, and Hermelídez. But here, as Brito has done with Pelayo, he seems to forget that the name was current before it was borne by the Saint, and the derivations from it as numerous. Its root may be found in Hermo, whose German name will prevail over the Latinized Arnimou.
since God hath done thee such good, and such favor as that thou shouldst be king of all Spain, I come to require of thee that thou give me to see this house, and the lock upon the house which we are appointed to keep. And the king demanded of them what house was that, and wherefore he should put upon it his lock. And they said unto him, Sir, we will willingly tell thee, that thou mayst know. Sire, true it is, that when Hercules had made his pleasure in Spains, he made in it many marvellous things in those places where he understood that they might best remain; and thus when he was in Toledo he understood well that that city would be one of the best in Spain; and saw that the kings who should be Lords of those places, did purpose to have their sometime dwellings therein as in any other part; and seeing that things would come after many ways, some contrariwise to others, it pleased him to leave many enchanments made, to the end that after his death his power and wisdom might by them be known. And he made in Toledo a house, after the manner which we shall now describe, with great mastership, so that we have not heard tell of any other such: The which is made after this guise. There are four lions of metal under the foundation of this house: and so large are they, that a man sitting upon a great horse on the one side, and another in like manner upon the other, cannot see each other, so large are the lions. And the house is upon them, and it is entirely round, and so lofty that there is not a man in the world who can throw a stone to the top: and many have attempted this, but they never came near it, and a man that is wise enough to tell you by what manner this house was made, neither whose understanding can reach to say in what manner it is worked within. But of that which we have seen without, we have to tell thee. Cerises in the whole house there is no stone bigger than this, and all of them are of the jasper and marble, so clear and shining, that they seem to be crystal. They are so of many colors that we do not think there are two stones in it of the same color; and so cunningly are they joined one with another, that if it were not for the many colors, they could not be seen but by the whole though these make of one entire stone. And the stones are placed in such manner one by another, that seeing them you may know all the things of the battles aforesaid, and of great feats. And this is not by pictures, but the color of the stones, and the great art of joining one with the other, make it appear thus. And ass he doubt he who should wish to know the truth of the great deeds of arms which have been wrought in the world, might by means of that house know it. See now in what manner Hercules was wise and fortunate, and right valiant, and acquainted with the things which were to come, seeing he was Lord of Spain, he made it after this guise, which we have related unto you. And he commanded that neither King nor Lord of Spain who might come after him, should seek to know that which was within; but that every one instead should put a lock upon the door thereof, and the first that had the lock, and fasten it with his key. And after him there has been no King nor Lord in Spain, who has thought it good to go from his bidding; but every one as he came put on each his lock, according to that which Hercules appointed. And now that we have told thee the manner of the house, and that which we know concerning it, we require of thee that thou shouldst go thither, and put on thy lock on the gates thereof; even as all the kings have done who have regned in Spain until this time. And the King Don Rodrigo hearing the marvellous things which he had heard and things to know what there was within, and moreover being a man of great heart, wished to know of all things how they were, and for what guise. He made answer, that no such lock would he put upon that house, and that by all means he would know what there was within. And they said unto him, Sir, you will not do that which has never been done in Spain; he pleased therefore to observe that which the other kings have observed. And the king said unto them, Leave off now, and I will appoint the soonest that may he how I may go to see this house, and then I will do that which shall seem good. And he would give them no other reply. And when they saw that he would give them no other reply, they dared not persist farther, and they desisted themselves of him, and went their way.

Now it came to pass that the King Don Rodrigo called to mind how he had been required to put a lock upon the doors of the house which was in Toledo, and he resolved to carry into effect that unto which his heart inclined him. And one day he gave orders to have the lock put upon the house, and he went to see this house, and he saw that it was more marvellous than those who were its keepers had told him, and as he was thus beholding it, he said, Friends, I will by all means see what there is in this house which Hercules did, and it is evident that he gave them with him heard this, they began to say unto him that he ought not to do this; for there was no reason why he should do that which never king nor Caesar, that had been Lord of Spain since Hercules, had done until that time. And the king said unto them, you should not see it, but what may be seen. I am well sure that the enchantments cannot hinder me, and this being so, I have nothing to fear. And the knights said, Do that, sir, which you think good, but this is not done by our counsel. And when he saw that they were all of a different accord from that which he wished to do, he said, Now gainsey me as you will, for what let will happen I shall not forbear to do my pleasure. And forthwith he went to the doors, and ordered all the locks to be opened; and this was a great honor, for so many were the keys and the locks, that if they had not seen it, it would have been a great thing to believe. And after they were unlocked, the king pushed the door with his hand, and he went in, and the chief persons who were there with him, as many as he pleased, and they found a hall made in a square, being as wide on one part as on the other, and that the many locks which were held in that bed that the statue of a man, exceeding great, and armed at all points, and he had the one arm stretched out, and a writing in his hand. And when the king and those who were with him saw this bed, and the man who was held in it, everyone was amazed; and they marveled what it was, for no wonder was there. On that bed was laid in it the bed of the statue of a man, exceeding great, and armed at all points, and he had the one arm stretched out, and a writing in his hand. And when they saw the writing which he held in his hand, they showed it to the king, and the king went to him, and took it from his hand, and opened it and read it, and it said thus: You shall have the house and the keys; and this writing mark well what thou hast, and how great evil thou shalt all come to pass, for even as Spain was peopled and conquered by me, so by thee shall it be depopulated and lost. And I say unto thee, that I was Hercules the strong, he who conquered the greater part of the world, and all Spain; and I slew Geryon the Great, who was Lord thereof; and I alone subdued all these lands of Spain, and conquered many nations, and brave knights, and never any one could conquer me, save only Death. Look well to what thou dost, for from this world thou wilt carry with thee nothing but the good which thou hast done. And when the king had read the writing he was troubled, and he wished then that he had not begun this thing. However he made semblance as if it touched him not, and said that no man was powerful enough to know that which is to come, except the king, who was the first, and after him the others. Besides they were much troubled because of what the writing said; and having seen this they went to behold another apartment, which was so marvellous, that no man can relate how marvellous it was. The colors which were therein were four. The one part of the apartment was white as snow; and the other, which was over against it, was more black than pitch: and another part was green as a fine emerald, and that which was over against it was redder than fresh blood; and the whole apartment was bright and more lucid than crystal, and it was covered all over with so beautiful colors, that if each of the sides were made of a single stone, and all who were there present said that there was not more than a single stone in each, and that there was no joining of one stone with another, for every side of the whole four appeared to be one solid slab; and they all said, that never in the world had such a work as this else where been made, and that it must be held for a remarkable thing, and for one of the wonders of the world. And in all the apartments there was no beam, nor any work of wood, neither within nor without; and as the door thereof was so also was the ceiling above. Above there were windows, and so many, that they gave a great light, so that all which was within might be seen as clearly as that which was without. And when they had seen the apartment how it was made, they found it in nothing but one pillar, and that not very large, and round, and of the height of a man of mean stature: and there was a door in it right cunningly made, and upon it was a little writing in Greek letters, which said, Hercules made this house in the year of Adam three hundred and three, and then these letters were written. And understood that which they said, he opened the door, and when it was opened they found Hebrew letters which said, This house is one of the wonders of Hercules; and when they had read these letters they saw a niche made in that pillar, in which was a coffer of silver, right subtly wrought, and after a strange manner, and it was gilded, and covered with many precious stones, and of great price, and it was fastened with a lock of mother-of-pearl. And this was made in such a manner that it was a strange thing, and there were cut upon it Greek letters which said, It cannot be but that the king, in whose time this coffer shall be opened, shall see wonders before his death: thus said Hercules the Lord of Greece and of Spain, who knew some of those things which are to come. And when the king understood this, he said, Within this coffer lies that which I seek to know, and which Hercules has so strongly forbidden to be known. And he took the lock and broke it with his hands, for there was no other who durst break it: and when the lock was broken, and the coffer open, they found nothing within, except a white cloth folded between two pieces of copper; and he took it and opened it, and found Moors painted therein with arms, and banners, in their hands, and with their swords round their necks, and their bows behind them at the saddle-low, and over these figures were letters which said, When this cloth shall be opened, and these figures seen, most appeared like them shall conquer Spain and shall be Lords thereof.

"When the King Don Rodrigo saw this, he was troubled at heart, and all the knights who were with him. And they said unto him, Now, sir, you may see what has befallen you, because you would not listen to those who counselled you not to pry into so great a thing, and because you despised the kings who were before you, who all observed the commands of Hercules, and ordered them to be observed, but you would not do this. And he had greater trouble in his heart than he had ever before felt; howbeit he began to comfort them all, and said to them, God forbid that all this which we have seen should come to pass. Nevertheless, I say, that if things must be according as they are here declared, I could not set aside that which hath been ordained, and, therefore, it appears that I am he by whom this house was to be opened, and that for me it was reserved. And seeing it is done, there is no reason that we should grieve for that which cannot be prevented, if it must needs come. And let come what may, with all my power I will strive against that which Hercules has foretold, even till I take my death in resisting it: and if you will all do in like manner, I wot whether the whole world can take from us our power. But if by God it hath been appointed, no strength and no art can avail against his Almighty power, but that all things must be fulfilled even as to him seemeth good. In this guise they went out of the house, and he charged them all that they should tell no man of what they had seen there, and ordered the doors to be fastened in the same manner as before. And they had hardly fastened them, when they beheld an eagle fall right down from the sky, as if it had descended from Heaven, carrying a burning firebrand, which it laid upon the top of the house, and began to fan it with its wings; and the firebrand with the motion of the air began to blaze, and the house was kindled and burnt as if it had been made of resin; so strong and mighty were the flames and so high did they blaze up, that it was a great marvel, and it burnt so long that there did not remain the sign of a single stain and all was burnt into ashes. And after a while there came a great flight of birds small and black, who hovered over the ashes, and they were so many, that with the fuming of their wings, all the ashes were stirred up, and rose into the air, and were scattered over the whole of Spain, and many of those persons upon whom the ashes fell, appeared as if they had been besmeared with blood. All this happened in a day, and many said afterwards, that all those persons upon whom those ashes fell, died in battle when Spain was conquered; and this was the first sign of the destruction of Spain."—Chronica del Rey D. Rodrigo, Part I. p. 28-29.

"Y siendo verdad lo que escribieron nuestros Cronistas, y el Alcaide Turf, las letras que en este Palacio fueron halladas, no se ha de retenir que fueron puestas por Hercules en su fundación, ni por algun nigromante, como algunos piensan, pues solo Dios sabe las cosas por cuenta, y aquellas asepú el es cordero revelado por alguna santa persona aquellas nuestras. Señor lo osereis revelado y mandado, como vuelve el castigo que avia de suceder del diluvio general en tiempo de Nos, que fue pregunto de la justicia de Dios: y el de las ciudades de Sodoma y Gomorra a Abraham."—Fran. de Pisa, Deset, de Toledo, l. 2, c. 31.

The Spanish ballad upon the subject, fine as the subject is, is that as a Rounder:

De los noblesimos Gochos que en Castilla acaian regando
Rodrigo regna el posferro de los reyes que han pasado
En cuyo tiempo las Aleras
todo Espana avian ganado, oe fuera las Alazines
que defendia Don Pelayo.

En Toledo este Rodrigo
al comienzo del regando;
vuele gran voluntad
de ver lo que esto cerrado
en la torre que esta alla, antigua de muchos anos.

En esta torre los reyes
cada uno hecho un canado,
porque lo ordenara asi.

Hercules el afamado, que gano primero a España
de Gerion gran torero.

Cree el que en ella la torre grande tuvo guarnida;
la torre fue luego abierta
y quitados los canados; no
ay en ella cosa alguna,
sola una casa hav hallado.

El rey la mandara abrir:
un palo dentro se ha hallado,
con unas letras latinas
que dicen en Castellano, cuando aquellas candoradas
que eieren estas canados, forradas abiertas y visto
lo en el palo echado,
Espafia sera perdida,
y toda ella asolada;
granara la gente estrana
como aqui est en figurados,
los restos muy desfigurados,
los brazos arrancados,
muchas colores vestidas,
en las cabezas tocados, algadas traer en sus ojos
en coroals cavelando,
largas largos en sus manos,
can espanolas en su lado.

Alcaldes se dieron,
y de aquesta tierra estranos;
perdieran toda España,
que nada no sera finado.

El rey con sus ricos hombas
todos se acran tapandose, que no vieron las letras
y que les hemos contado;
excluyen a cerrar la torre,
qued el rey muy angustiado.

Romances nuevoamente cantados por Lorenzo de Sepulveda, ff. 160, 1564.

Juan Yague de Sahas relates a singular part of this miracle, which I have not seen recorded anywhere but in his very rare and curious poem:

Cuanta como rompian los canados
De la brega cuenca, y sepultadas
De sus roces obscuras ríos tristes
No bien articuladas, si a rememorar,
Repetidas adnotro por el ayer,
Y una mas breve se ocurre que dice,

Desdichado Rey Don Alfonso (en ocho días).
Quedando la R submersa entre piqueros

La Casa perdida, y de Min, y de Cé,

No dice el una, ni el otro, ni el tuyo, no dice;

Almudena no se siente, si bien opone

Por lo tanto, trata de esta Historia
Que ya permite el Cielo que el Mece

Castigase por tan causas el Regno Godo,
Por solo que lo rajas con mal modo.

The Chronic General del Rey Don Alfonso gives a singular account of the first inhabitant of this fatal spot: —

"There was a king who had to name Rocos; he was of the east country from Edom, wherein was paradise, and for the love of wisdom he forsake his Kingdom, and went about the world seeking knowledge. And in a country between the east and the north, he found seventy pillars; thirty were of brass, thirty of marble, and they lay upon the ground, and upon them was written all knowledge and the nature of things. These Rocos translated, and carried with him the book in which he had translated them, by which he did marvels. He came to Troy when the people under Laconon were building the city, and seeing them he laughed. They asked him why, and he replied, that if they knew what was to happen, they would cease from their work. Then they took him and led him before the king, one of the Trojans, and Laconon asked him for why he had spoken these words, and Romans answered, that he had spoken truth, for the people should be put to the sword, and the city be destroyed by fire. Wherefore the Trojans would have slain him, but Laconon, judging that he spoke from folly, put him in prison to see if he would repent. He, fearful of death, by his art sent a sleep upon the guards, and fled off his iron, and went his way. And he came to the seven hills by the Tiber, and there, upon a stone, he wrote the letters Roma, and Romans found them, and gave them as a name to that place: for whereas they have a resemblance to his own.

"Then went King Rocos westward, and he entered Spain, and went round it and through it, till coming to the spot where Toledo stands, he discovered that it was the central place of the country, and that one day a city should there be built, and these he found a cove, into which he entered. There lay in it a huge dragon, and Rocos in fear besought the dragon not to hurt him, for they were both creatures of God. And the dragon took such love towards him, that he always brought him part of his food from the cove, and they dwelt together in peace. And when he was at length old, and was called Tartus, was hunting in that mountain, and he found a bear, and the bear fled into the cave, and Rocos, in fear, addressed him as he had done the dragon, and the bear quietly lay down, and Rocos fondled his head; and Tartus following, saw the bear was as long, and his body covered with hair, and he thought it was a wild man, and fitted an arrow to his bow, and drew the string. Then Rocos besought him in the name of God not to slay him, and obtained security for himself and the bear under his protection. And when Tartus heard how he was a king, he invited him to leave that den and return with him, and he would give him his only daughter in marriage, and leave him all that he had. By this the dragon returned. Tartus was alarmed, and would have fled, but Rocos interfered, and the dragon threw down half an cx, for he had done the bear, and asked the king to stop and eat. Tartus declined the invitation, for he must be gone. Then said Rocos to the dragon, My friend, I must now leave you, for we have sojourned together long enough. So he departed, and married, and had two sons; and, for love of the dragon, he built a tower over the cave, and dwelt. After his death, one of his sons built another, and King Pirros added more building, and this was the beginning of Toledo."

Lardner published a letter to Jonas Hanway, showing why houses for the reception of penitent harlots ought not to be called Magdalen Houses; Mary Magdalen not being the sinner recorded in the 7th chapter of Luke, but a woman of dis-

This picture of John Despagnet is an article thus entitled: — De Marie Magdalene laquelle passant aussi au del aux estre femmes de mauvaise vie. Le let. que lait font les Theologians pour la plus part en leurs sermons, en leurs livres; et especialment la Bible Anglaise en l’argument de Le chap. de St. Luc.

The image of this Huguenot, which the Roman church does to another Mary, the sister of Lazarus, has been sufficiently confuted by the orthodox. It has been ignorantly believed that this Mary, and another who was of Magdala, and the sinner who is spoken of in the 7th of Luke, are the same one, confusing the two names. We have justified one of the three, to wit, her of Bethany, the sister of Lazarus; but her of Magdala we still defame, as if that Magdalen were the sinner of whom St. Luke speaks.

"Nothing is more common in the mouth of the vulgar than the wicked life of the Magdalens. The preachers who wish to confess souls that are afflicted with horror at their sins, represent to them this woman as one of the most inimodest and dissolute that ever existed, to whom, however, God has shown mercy. And upon this same prejudice, which is altogether imaginary, has been founded a reason why the Son of God, having been raised from the dead, appeared to Mary Magdalen before any other person; for, say they, it is because she had greater need of consolation, having been a greater sinner than the others. — He who wrote the Practice of Piety places her with the greatest offenders, even with Manasses, one of the wandering prophets, and then, after enumerating other the more, it has been inserted in the Bible itself. For the argument to the 7th of Luke in the English version says, that the woman whose sins were in greater number than those of others — the woman, who till then had lived a wicked and infamous life — was Mary Magdalen. But, Isr., The text gives no name to this sinner: Where then has it been found? Which of the Evangelists, or what other authentic writing, has taught us the proper name or surname of the woman? For she who poured an ointment upon Christ (Matth. xxvi. John xii.) who appears in the history of her life, and who still abounds in an invention not only fabulous, but injurious to the memory of a woman illustrious in piety? We ought as well to beware of bearing false witness against the dead as against the living.

"It is remarkable that neither the sinner (Luke vii.) nor the adulteress who is spoken of in the 7th of John, are named in the sacred history, any more than the thief who was converted on the cross. There are particular reasons, beyond a doubt, and we may in part conjecture them, why the Holy Spirit has abstained from relating the names of these great sinners, although converted. It is not then for us to impose them; still less to appropriate them to persons whom the Scripture does not accuse of any enormous sins."

That Egyptian penitent. — X. p. 672, col. 1.

St. Mary the Egyptian. This is one of those religious romances which may probably have been written to edify the people, without any intention of deceiving them. Some parts of the legend are beautifully conceived. An English Romanist has verified it in eight books, under the title of the Triumph of the Cross, or Penitent of Egypt. Birmingham, 1776.

He had the advantage of believing his story, — which ought to have acted like inspiration.
NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHs.

Que quiere amor, que quando un Rey se vinda
Deстансе puedan resistir su llamado.
No fue de Grecia mas hermosa y tierna
La que el día por su atulada busca,
Y desde el Sagrar a Cypornea
Se vio en tanto vigo randa hermana.

Creció el amor como el deseo crecía;
Enfuego el poder; la resistencia
Se fue avasallando, pero no podía
Sofrier un Rey sucula competencia.
Estendiese a juro la cortesía,
Las tretonse pusieron de la penitencia,
Haciendo los mayores desgracíones
Las horas menas, y las veaces años.

Cuando ya Rodrigo de que seca
T sürec un amor, y intentos viven,
Sin que demostración alguna hizada,
Puso su gusto en practica de manos:
Pues quiera de tanto amor no le tociasse
Con los medios mas faciles y humanos,
Como todavía entonces suficientes
De injusta fuerza en el rigor violento.

Ainias, congojas, lagrimas y veces,
Aunque amor, furia, injuria,
Pruebas, pelican, rey,
Don que men, rubias, al que aborrecer, forzias;
Discurren las pronomestas velozes,
Que ofrece el pensamiento aquella injuria:
Rodrigo teme, y ama, y fuerza, y ella
Quanto mas se resista, celas mas bella.

Ya viste de jasmine el desnudo
Las eldadas metallas sinpre hermosas,
Ya la verguenza del vuelo de Maya,
Alexandriana, y parropedias:
Rodrigo ya como arcedio rey.
Que no respeta las sagradas cosas,
Ni se cayga en sus lagrimas, ni mueve
Porque se abrasa, a se contiebra en viento.

Rustico el al sa la fresnial flaysia
Al varial valor y atrevidio;
Quedó sin lustre la audaz belleza
Que es de una costa Virgen armamento;
Sin la injusta furia la lucha,
Aparciendo el apercebimiento,
Que viene como sombras del pecado,
Principios del castigo del culpado.

Fue con Rodrigo este mortal disgusto,
Y cuando con Florida la verguenza,
Que le propuso el cojo misa injusta
Que de nager nuestra memoria alcance;
Diziese que no ver en el Rey gusto,
Sino de tan amor tanto angude
Fue la ocasion, que la nager vergonz
Mas siente aborrecida que forzada.

Jerusalen Conquistada, 1, 6, fl. 132.

Lope de Vega quotes scripture in proof of the opinion expressed in this last couplet. — 9 Kings, ch. xiii.

Old Barret tells the story as Ancient Pistol would have done: —

"In 11th. time there reigned in Spain
One Roderick, King from the Gothian race;
Tato whose secret heart with silent strain
Infestted the studder of hart pushike chaste,
Hama carnamorizing of a piece,
A piece by Nature quaintly symmetrical,
Enthroned with beauty as Helen Fair of Greceon:
Count Julian’s daughter of wed-wedlock chaste,
Yeloped Caba; who in court sustained
The rest, as Hepherus the dimmed star.
This piece the king in his love’s chest,
Surviving but by wit, gold, gems, or forced jure."

It is thus related in the fabulous Chronicle: — "Después que el Rey uno descuidado fue a corregir, a la Casa, no era día que la no requiriera, la reina o da, y ella se defendía con buena razón: empero al cabo como el Rey no pensaba cosa como en esto, un día en la sueta cumbre con un demote auy x la Casa; y ella vino a su mandado; y como en casa no era en todo su cámara otro sino ella talda todos, el campillo con ella todo la fue. Lupsre tanto sabía que si ella quisiera dar loces que bien fuera auy la regna, mas callasse con lo que el Rey quiso fazer." — P. I, c. 172.

In this fabulous Chronicle Roderick’s fall is represented as the work of his stars: — "Y aunque a los reyes puesta el gran yere en que temblaron, y en la natalidad que se corre con esa adora, sin embargo, tanto era el orden que tenía que lo arribaba toda, y esto arrocería la malandanza que le auido a quert, y la destrucción de España que auido de aver camino para se hazer; y quiere vos dezir que su constitución no podia esorrar que esto no pasacose asi; y ya
Diez lo auido envesado en su discrecion; y el por cosa que fuese no se podia arrocerar que no fuesse en ello." — P. I, c. 161.

"Certes," says the fabulous Chronicler, "he was a Lord of greater bounty than ever had been seen before his time. —
He used to say, that if all the world were his, he would rather lose than one friend; for the world was nothing which, if it were lost, might be recovered; but a friend once lost could never be recovered for all the treasure in the world. And because he was thus bountiful, all those of Spain were likewise; and they had the fame of being the most liberal men in the world, especially those of the lineage of the Goths. Never a thing was asked at his hands, whether great or small, to which he could say no; and never king nor other great lord asked aid of him that he denied, but gave them of his treasures and of his people as much as they needed. And doubt not, but that if Fortune had smiled on that in his time, the lineage of the Goths should be cut off, and Spain destroyed, there was no king or emperor whom he would not love brought into subjection; and if the whole world ought to be placed in the power of one man, (speaking of worldly things,) there never was, nor will be, a man so detesting to possess it, save he alone.
But as envy in the beginning of all evil, and saw how great was the goodness of this king, she never rested till she had brought about that things should be utterly reversed, even till she had destroyed him. Oh what great damage to the world will it be when God shall consent that so much bounty, and courage, and frankness, and loyalty should be destroyed forever! All nations ought to char themselves in wretched weeds one day in the week to mourn for the flower of the world, and especially ought the people of Spain to make such mourning." —
Chronicles of the Faithful Don Rodrigo, p. 1, c. 55.

And again, when the last battle is approaching, he praises
the king: — "Y el Rey era el mas esforzado hombre de corazon que nunca se que dezir; y el mas franco de todo lo que podia acer; y preciado mas cobrage amigo que no quento teopor poderes estar en su regio, y en el dia que creo el resurse del tyrerdel corde Dol Julios; y a martelada era buen cavallerio que el tiempo que el no rey, se no hallava cavallerio que a la su bundad se gazolazia, y tanto sabia que sino por estas malandanzas que le tueriez, nunca cavallerio al mundo de tales condiciones fue; y tuene a el rino chiste ni grande que del se partiese despajado a cafyp yello." — P. 1, c. 215.

The manner in which Florida calls upon her father to revenge her is curiously expressed by Lope de Vega:

Al escribirte tiendas pluma y mano,
Llega el agracito, la piadita retira,
Pura quese caverse la verguenza, tanto
Quiere borrar de la verguenza el lante.

No sos menos las letras que soldados,
Las riveros y estulos e armaduras,
Que al son de las susuerias con formados
Haciendo las distancias las deidades:
Los mayores caracteres, armados
Haciendo tus agachas, de armas,
Los puntos, las utoas, los acentos
capitanes, Alferez y Sergentos.

In the valuable historical view of this king by a contemporary writer, the following character of the French is given:

The bath, the bed, the vigil. — XI. p. 675, col. 2.

The Partidas have some curious mutters upon this subject.

"Cleanliness makes things appear well to those who behold them, even as propriety makes them seemly, each in its way. And therefore the ancients held it good that knights should be made cleanly. For they ought to have cleanliness within them in their manners and customs, so ought they to have it without in their garments, and in the arms which they wear. For albeit their business is hard and cruel, being to strike and to slay; yet notwithstanding they may not so far forget their natural inclinations, as not to be pleased with fair and goodly things, especially their apparel. And for one part they give joy and delight, and on the other make them fearlessly perform feats of arms, because they are aware that by them they are known, and that because of men they take more heed to what they do. Therefore, for this reason, cleanliness and propriety do diminish the hardiness and cruelty which they ought to have. Moreover, as is aforesaid, that which appear without is the signification of what they have in their inclinations within. And therefore the ancients ordained that the squire, who is of noble lineage, should keep vigil the day before he received knighthood. And after of said-day the squires shall bathe him, and wash his head with their hands, and lay him in the goodliest bed that may be. And there the knights shall draw on his hose, and clothe him with the best garments that can be had. And when the cleansing of the body has been performed, they shall do as much to the soul, taking him to the church, where he is to labor in watching and beseeching mercy of God, that he will forgive him his sins, and guide him so that he may demean himself well in that order which he is about to receive; to the end that he may defend his law, and all other things regarding as it behoved him, and that he would be his defender and keeper in all dangers and in all difficulties. And he ought to bear in mind how God is powerful above all things, and can show his power in them when he listeth, and especially in affairs of arms. For in his hand are life and death, to give and to take away, and to make the weak strong, and the strong weak. And when he is making this prayer, he must be with his knees bent, and all the rest of the time on foot, as long as he can bear it. For the vigil of knights was not ordained to be a sport, nor for any thing else, except that they, and those who go there, should pray to God to protect them, and direct them in the right path, and conduct them, and to enter upon the way of death."

If the vigil is over, as soon as it is day, he ought first to hear mass, and pray God to direct all his feats to his service. And afterwards he who is to knight him shall come and ask him if he would have the order of knighthood; and if he had the order of knighthood, and had been ascertained, then shall he be asked, if he will maintain it as it ought to be maintained; and when he shall have promised to do this, that knight shall fasten on his spurs, or order some other knight to fasten them on, according to what summer of the year it is, and the rank which he holds.

And this they do to signify, that as a knight puttheth spurs on the right and on the left, to make his horse: gallop straight forward, even so he ought to let his actions be straight forward, swerving on neither side. And then shall his sword be gird on his head. — Formerly it was ordained that when noble men were made knights, they should be armed at all points, as if they were about to do battle. But it was not held good that their heads should be covered, for they who cover their heads do so for two reasons: the one to hide something there which shall not bear any ill signification; and the other reason they were girded on, and wore them with any fair and becoming covering.

The other reason is, when a man hath done some unseemly thing of which he is ashamed. And this in no wise becometh noble knights. For when they are about to receive so noble and so honorable a thing as knighthood, it is not fitting that they should enter into it with any evil shame, neither with fear. And when they shall have girded on his sword, they shall draw it from out the scabbard, and place it in his right hand, and make him swear these three things: first, that he shall not fear to die for his faith, if need be; secondly, for his natural Lord; thirdly, for his master, and when he hath sworn this, then shall he blow on the neck be given him, in order that those things aforesaid may come into his mind, saying, God guard him to his service, and let him perform all that he hath promised; and after this, who hath conferred the order upon him, shall kiss him, in token of the faith and peace and brotherhood which ought to be observed among knights. And the same ought all the knights to do who are in that place; not only at that time, but whenever they shall meet with him during that whole year."

The great spurs which the knights put on have many significations; for the gold, which is so greatly esteemed, he puts upon his feet, denoting thereby, that the knight shall not for gold commit any maligancy or treason, or like deed, that would detract from the honor of knighthood. The spurs are sharp, that they may quicken the speed of the horse; and this signifies that he will not be slow in any thing, and that he will be wise, and overtake noble-minded, more virtuous, and of better customs than all the others; and then he sought among all beasts for that which was the goodliest, and the swiftest, and which could bear the greatest fatigue, and might be convenient for the service of war. When that horse had been given him, he was chosen from the thousand; and for this reason he was called cavalleres, because the best animal was thus joined to the most noble man. And when Romulus founded Rome, he chose out a thousand young men to be knights, and Verno nonnumms moribus androbo moriesf facer in tempore ealcert. — P. 1, C. 14, ff. 40.

The custom which some kings had of knighting themselves is ceased by the Partidas. — P. vi. T. 21. L. 11. It is there said, that there must be one to give, and another to receive the same, and that he may not be a knight, that a knight can no more knight, than a priest can ordain himself.
When the Infant Hernando of Castile was chosen king of Aragon, he knighted himself on his coronation day:

De quo todos los Barones nobles se tengan una gran maravedis, como el mayor o feo cavalier, que segame las deseas dias de regar, venem para este cavalier, sino dones nose fa cavalier de ma de cavalier qui hage lorda de cavalleria.

—Tomich. C. 47, ff. 68.

The qualifications for a knight, cavalier, or horse-soldier, in the barbarous stage of society, were three: 1st, That he should be able to endure fatigue, hardship, and privation. 2nd, That he should have been used to strike, that his blows might be the more deadly. 3rd, That he should be blood-minded, and rob, hack, and destroy the enemy without compunction. The persons, therefore, who were preferred, were mountaineers, accustomed to hussiting:—carpenters, blacksmiths, stone-cutters, and butchers. But it being found that such persons would sometimes run away, it was then discovered that they who were chosen for cavaliers ought to have a natural sense of shame. And for this reason it was appointed that they should be men of family.

The privileges of knighthood were at one time so great, that if the goals of a knight were liable to seizure, they could not be seized where he or his wife were present, nor even where his cloak or shield was to be found.

Canciani (T. 3, p. 31) gives a representation of Roland from the porch of the Cathedral at Verona, which is supposed to have been built about the beginning of the ninth century. The figure is identified on the inscription, Dura-rarado. The loros, which Canciani explains, Vestita bellissime aureo ferreo contocto, is illustrated by this figure. It is a coat or cloak of steel-mail reaching to the knees, and with half sleeves. The only hand which appears is unarmed, as far as the elbow. The right leg also is unarmed; the other leg and foot are in the same sort of armor as the coat. The end of a loose garment appears under the mail. The shield reaches from the chin to the middle of the leg; it is broad enough at the top to cover the breast and shoulder, and slopes gradually off to the form of a long oval.

—At every saddle-bow

A gory head was hung. —XIV. p. 679, col. 1.

This picture frequently occurs in the Spanish Chronicles. Sigard the elder, Earl of Ockney, owed his death to a like custom. "Suddenly charging spurs to his horse, as he was returning home in triumph, bearing, like each of his followers, one of these bloody spoils, a large front tooth in the mouth of the head which hung danging by his side, cut the calf of his leg,—the wound mortified, and he died. The Earl must have been horse-legged."—Teofilo, quoted in Edmonston's View of the Zetland Islands, vol. i. p. 33.

Frontería el agre, y de colores
El suelo tuvo alfombra de primavera.

Aunque los montes con espigas breñas
El lulo al atardecer tronaron,
Y contra su verde desnudos peñas
Compiten de lo llano la fisonomía.
Pináculos pajareados dulces ayes
Al son del agn en trino somnoliento
De ignorados idíomas en su canto
Dan con arpadas picos dulce ecoanto.

La última de este valle la alta sierra
De Cacolunga acuña, donde fuerte
Se expone el Hebre al juego de la guerra,
Su timor negro escaso de la suerte:
Las que unimos este sitio encierra
El ceniz despreciable de la muerte,
Su pecho encienden en la utóica llama
Que no cobra en las trampas de la Fama.

De Tibá en ella la preciosa suerte
Al llano bravo arroyos de cristales,
Donde en pequeña balm su corriente
Se detiene en suspenso manantiales:
Después se precipita su torrente
Quanto sus ondas enfrente se retuercen,
Con somnolento ruido de la peña
El curso de sus aguas se despina.

Cierre todo este valle esta robusta
Peña, donde la Cueva está dividida,
Que amenaza tajada a su izquierda.
Del bronce llano formidable rueda:
Parece quiere ser con suüa abstrusa
Seno padron, y fuera se destina
A erigirse epítajo peñacoso,
Suponiendo su horror el sitio hermoso.

De piedra viva tan tremenda altura
Que la vista al mirarla se extermecer;
Fusta gréxía se viste, y la hermosura
De la fertilidad susa absorbe:
En tan damasetrada su estatura
Que estrecha el agre, y barbara parece
Que quiere la sirvum de Cuenca
Las fulminantes luces de la Espera.

Corno a dos picas en la peña dura
Construye en circun una abiertura rara,
De una pica de alto, y dos de anchura,
Rica de sombras su maniobra acar a:
Festante, ó boca de la cueva obscura
Donde el Sol no dispues un las Clara,
Tan corta, que en su centro tenebroso
Ano no admite crepusculo dudoso.

En este sitio pues, donde compite
La rustic que con las pintaslas flores,
Puez la peluda sierra no permite
A la vista, sino es vastos horrores;
Por el contrario el llano que en si admite
De los bellos matices los primeros,
Efecto situado de naturaleza,
La unión en la fidelidad, y la belleza.

A tierra de cristal los dulces ayes

Mostró la blanca Luna cristalizadas:
Y corriendo por partes diferentes
Eran de gral maravilla dignas,
Y en qualquiera de todos por su parte
Naturalica se emener con arte.

La una mana de una vida pena,
Y qual si tambien fuera el agua viva,
Parte la banca, y parte se despina
Con radiq corriente fugitiva:
Después distante un largo arroyo aneja
Que por diversas partes se detenía,
Con diferente curso en varió modo,
Hasta que a donde nace bueco todo.

Otra, que alta descubre ancha Orizonte,
Como agravable del lugar segundo
Sustenta un monstro que parece un monte,
Quel Alisente que tira en pescu el mundo:
Y comoוי el caudaloso Orient
Dor el ancho tránsito al mar profundo,
Asi se arrójna con furiosas ondas,
Por las partes mas bajas y mas hondas.

Sale blandiendo la tercera fuente,
Como un mar, y después por el arca
Va con tan mansa y placida corriente
Tan grata y sossegada, y tan serena,
Que á las feras, gansos, peces, gente,
Puede aplacar la sed, meazar la poca,
Y da después la benta, y forma el curso
de la Luna, imitando el curso eterno.

Nue la cuarta de una gran caverna,
Y signifinando su prospera derrota
Parece que arte se guiera,
Segun va desciendo gata a gata:
No visto antigua edad, edad moderna
En region muy propina, o muy remonta,
Frente tan peregrina, obra tan nueva,
En grata artificio, o tosca cueva.

Fuller, the Worthy, has a beautiful passage in his Church History concerning "Primitive Monks with their Piety and Painfulness.” — "When the furnace of persecution in the infancy of Christianity was grown so hot, that most cities, towns, and populous places were visited with that epidemic disease, many poor men died into the sort; there to live with more safety, and serve God with less disturbance. No wild humor to make themselves miserable, and to choose and court their own calamity, put them on this project, much less any superstitious opinion of transmortal sanctity in a solitary life, made them willingly to leave their former habitations. For whereas all men by their birth are indebted to their country, there to stand and discharge all civil relations, it had been dishonesty in them like bankrupts to run away into the wilder ness to defraud their country, their creditor, except some violent occasion (such as persecution) forced them thence unto; and this was the first original of monks in the world, so called from μονος, because living alone by themselves.

"Here they in the deserts hoped to find rocks and stocks, you beasts themselves, more kind than men had been to them. What would bide and heat, rover and keep warm, served them for clothes, not placing (as their successors in after ages) any holiness in their habitation, folded up in the affected fashion thereof. As for their food, the grass was their cloth, the ground their table, herbs and roots their diet, wild fruits and berries their dainties, hunger their sauce, their nails their knives, their hands their cups, the next well their wine-cellur; but what their bill of fare wanted in cheer it had in grace, their life being constantly spent in prayer, reading, musing, and such like pious employments. They turned solitariness itself into society; and elevating themselves unwaver by the divine art of meditation, did make of one, two or more, opposing, answering, moderating in their own bosoms, and harry in themselves with variety of heavenly recreations. It would do one good even but to think of their goodness, and at the rebound and second hand to meditate upon their meditations. For if ever poverty was to be envied it was here. And I appeal to the moderate men of these times, whether in the height of these worldly, they have not sometimes wraith (not out of passionate dislike, but serious recollection of themselves) some such private place to retire unto, where, out of the noise of this clamorous world, they might have reposed themselves, and served God with more quiet."

None but that heavenly Father, who alone
Beholds the struggles of the heart, alone
Sees and rewards the secret sorrows.

NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHS.

The pulling of wool said, which goes on the diocet's tomb
Gregory had laid.—XVIII. p. 322, col. 2.

4. By the way, the pull is a punicest vitulum, considerable for the matter, making, and mysteries thereof. For the matter, it is made of lamb's wool and superstition. I say of lamb's wool, as it comes from the sheeps' back, without any other artificial colour, spun, say some, by a peculiar order of numbers, first cast into the tombs of St. Peter, taken from his body, say others, surely most sacred if both; and superstitiously adorned with little black crosses. For the form thereof; the breadth exceeded not three fingers, one of our heathing lamb's wool skeins in Cambridge would make three of them, having two labels hanging down before and behind, which the archbishops only, when going to the altar, put about their necks, above their other punicist ornaments. Three mysteries were consecrated therein. First, Humility, which beautesifies the shape of was, being mostly copies. Secondly, Industry, to imitate lamb-like simplicity. And, Thirdly, Industry, to follow him who fetched his wending sheep home on his shoulders. But to speak plainly, the mystery of mysteries in the pull was, that the archbishops receiving it showed therein their dependency on a perfect one; and a note in this manner ceremoniously taken was a sufficient acknowledggement of their submission. And as it owned Rome's power, so in after ages it increased their profit. For, though now such pulls were freely given to archbishops, whose places in Britain for the present were rather numerous than other, no more than three for their labour; yet in after ages the archbishop of Canterbury's pull was sold for five thousand ducres, so that the pope might well have the golden fleece if he could sell all his lamb's wool at that rate. Surely let me add, that the author of Canterbury book stiles this pull Tocqueau grandis Orhii Scenographias. It is well to punctum in order to help it, or else we should have had eight sacraments.44 — Fuller's Church History, page 71.

The relics and the written works of Saints, Toledo's choicest treasures, prized beyond All wealth, their living and their dead remains; These to the mountain fastnesses be bore Of unחשבed Catahria, there depored, One day to be the brat of yet unbuilt Oviedo, and the dore idolab Multitudes unknown.—XVIII, p. 338, col. 1.

45 Among these, says Morales, "who then passed from Toledo to Asturias, was the archbishop of Toledo, named Urban. — He, with a holy foresight, collected the sacred relics which he could, and the most precious books of his own church and of others, determining to carry them all to the Asturias, in order that the holy relics might not be profaned or treated with little reverence. He likewise, and that the books of the Holy Scriptures, and of the ecclesiastical offices, and the works of our holy doctors, might not be lost. — And although many relics are mentioned which the archbishop then carried from Toledo, especial mention is made of a holy ark full of many and most remarkable relics, which through divers chances and dangers, had been brought from Jerusalem to Toledo, and of which all that is fitting shall be related in its place, if it please God that this history should proceed. It is also expressly said, that the cope which Our Lady gave to St. Hugo of Trani, that same which bore with the other relics; and being so capital a cope, it was a worthy thing to write of it thus particularly. Of the sacred books which were saved at that time, there are specified the Holy Scriptures, the Councils, the works of St. Isidore, and St. Iliebenio, and certain books of Toledo. And as there is at this day in the church of Oviedo that holy ark, together with many others of the relics which were then removed, so do I verily believe that there are in the library of that church three or four books of those which were then brought from Toledo. I am led to this belief by seeing that they are written in a form of Gothic letters, which being composed with writings six hundred years old, are without doubt much older, and more ancient than the other, that to which they may well be attributed to the times of the Goths. One is the volume of the Councils, another is a Sacraf, another contains the books of St. Isidore de Natiore Ramon, with other works of other authors. And there are also some leaves of a Bible. To put these sacred relics in greater security, and avoid the danger of the Moors, they laid them in a cave, and in a sort of deep pit therein, two leagues from the city of Oviedo, (which was not at that time built,) in a mountain, which was for this reason called Monastera. It is now by a slight eremption called Monte, and the head of the church of San Pedro, in the cave in great veneratio, and a great romany, or pilgrimage, is made on St. Magdalene's day. — Morales, i. 12, c. 71.

The place where the relics were deposited is curiously described in the Romantic Chronicle. He found that in this land of Asturias there was a serra, full great, and high, which had only two entrances, after this manner. On the one entrance, there was a great river, which was to be passed seven times, and in none of those seven places was it fordable at any time, except in the month of July. And after the river had been crossed, there was another, which was to fordable a high mountain, which is full of many great trees and great thicketts, wherein are many wild beasts, such as bears and boars and wolves, and there is a pass there between two rocks, which ten men might defend against the whole world, and this is the entrance. The other entrance ascends this great mountain, by a path of two full leagues in length, on the one side having always the river, and the way so narrow, that one man must go before another, and one man can defend the path in such manner, that no arbalist, nor engine of other kind, might make them, can hurt him, but the whole world were to come against him. And if any one were to stumble upon this path, he would fall more than two thousand fathom, down over rocks into the river, which lies at such a depth that the water appear thicker than pitch. And upon that mountain there is a good spring, and a place where there are good meadows, and room enough to raise grain for eight or ten persons for a year; and the snow is always there for company, enduring from one year to another. And upon that mountain the archbishop made two churches, one to the honour of St. Mary Magdelia, and the other to the honour of St. Michael, and there he placed all these reliques, where he had no fear that any should take them; and for the honour of these relics, the archbishop consecrated the whole mountain, and appointed good guard over the sacred relics, and left there three men of the holy house, who were willing to remain there, serving God, and doing penance for their sins." — P. 2, c. 48.

Of the Camera Santa, Morales has given a curious account in his Journal: the substance, with other remarkable circumstances, he afterwards thus inserted, in his great history: — "The other church (or chapel) which King Almone of Casto ordered to be built on the south side of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) was with the advocation of the glorious Archangel St. Michael. And in order that he might elevate it, he placed under it another church of the Virgin and Martyr St. Leocadia, somewhat low, and vaulted with a strong arch, to support the great weight which was to lay upon the wall. The king's motive for thus elevating this church of St. Michael, I believe certainly to have been because of the great humility of that land. He had determined to place in this church the famous relics of which we shall presently speak, and the humility of the region is so great, that even in summer the furniture of the houses on high ground is covered with mold. This religious prince therefore elevated the church with becoming foresight for reverence and better preservation of the precious treasure which was therein to be deposited. For this reason the altar (the chamber,) and for the many and great relics which it contains, it has most deservedly the appellation of Holy. You ascend to it by a flight of twenty-two steps, which begin in the cross of the Iglesia Mayor, (or cathedral,) and lead to a vaulted apartment for chamber, and another, in which upon which mass is said; for within there is no altar, neither is mass said there by reason of the reverence shewn to so great a sanctuary; and it may be seen that K. D. Alonso attended in his plan that there should be no altar within. In this apartment or outer chapel is a great arched door, with a very strong jambs, and at the further end a square chamber, vaulted also, with a square door, which also is fastened with another strong fastening, and these are the fastenings and keys which the Bishop Sampiero admires for their strength and security.

The square door is the door of the Holy Chamber, which is in the form of a complete church, and you descend to it by twelve steps. The body of this church is twenty-four feet in length, and sixteen in width. Its arched roof is of the same dimensions. The roof is most richly wrought, and supported upon six columns of divers kinds of marble, all precious and right beautiful, upon which the twelve apostles are sculptured, two and two. The ground is laid with Mosaic work, with variety of columns, representing jasper ware. The Bishop Sampiero had good reason to complain of the darkness of this church, which has only one small window in the upper part of the chapel; and, therefore, in this which we call the body of the church, there are commonly three silver lamps burning, the one in the middle larger than the other two, and many other lights are kindled when the relics are shown. These are kept within a glass, which divides the chapel from the church. The chapel has two rich naves at the entrance; it is eighteen feet in length, and its width somewhat less; the floor and the roof are after the same fashion as those of the church, but it is one estulde lower, which in those times seems to have been the church of St. Austin, or Galliciana, the Capillas Mayores, or principal chapels, being much lower than the body of the church. The roof of the chapel is plain, and has painted in the middle our Saviour in the midst of the four evangelists; and this performance is so ancient, that it is most likely it was of the designing of the founder. Strangers are usually detained; there is a lower one within of wood, to which persons are admitted who desire this privilege for their dignity; and few there who enter farther. This church the king built to remove it, as necessary to be forthwith removed, the Holy Ark, the holy bodies, and the other great relics, which, at the destruction of Spain, were hidden in the cave and well of Monsagro, and for this cause he had it built with so much care, and so richly, and with such security.

I have described the Camara Santa thus particularly, that what I may say of the most precious relics which it contains may be the better enjoyed. I will particularize the most principal of them, beginning with the Holy Ark, which with great reason has deserved this name. It is in the midst of the church, in that gilded case grate, that you can only go round it on three sides, and it is placed upon a stone pedestal, wrought with mouldings of a palm in height. It is a vara and a half (about five feet) in length; little less than a vara wide, and about as deep, that part which is of silver, not visible but hidden while the particle that gives the cover is flat, and it is covered in all ports with silver plates of some thickness, and gilt on the front. At the sides, or on that side which fronts the body of the church, it has the twelve apostles in more than half relief, and on the sides there are histories of Our Lady in the same silver-work. On the flat part of the cover there is a large crucifix engraved with many other images round about it. The sides are elaborately wrought with foliage, and the whole displays great antiquity. The cover has round about it four lines in the silver of Toledo, engraving in some places. What they contain is thin, as I have copied it faithfully, with its bad Latin and other faults:

Perditus factus est receptaculum, sanctorum pignoribus insignium argentum danoratam, exteriores adorantam et suis officiis pecudibus: pro quo quidem locum. Hoc est sancta sanctorum sanctorum sanctus jublj. Hoc quidem salutat et — Here a large piece of the silver is zone. — Nunc omnium provinciis in terra sine dobo. — Here there is another great chasam. — Munus et industria clerorum et praefidum, qui propter hoc consignas cantibus de sancto Principé, et de sancto Sacerdote, et sancto Ilia, et sancto Ovida, et sancto Petro, et sancto Thoma, et sancto Bartolomeo, et sancto Diomo, et sancto Fabian, et sancto Sebastiani, et sancto Eusabio, et sancto Ambrosio, et sancto Sophronio, et sancto Marcus..."

This inscription, with its bad Latin and other defects, and by reason of the parts that are lost, can be ill translated. Nevertheless I shall render it, in order that it may be enjoyed by all. It says thus: Know all the congregation of Catholic people, worthy of God, whose the famous relics are, which they venerate within the most precious sides of this Ark. Know then that herein is great part of the wood or cress of our Lord. Of his garment for which they cast lots. Of the blessed bread whereof he ate at the supper. Of this linen, of the holy handkerchief, (the Sudarium,) and of his most holy blood. Of the holy ground which he then trod with his holy feet. Of the garments of his mother the Virgin Mary, and also of her milk, which is a great wonder. With those also there are many other relics of Saint Petrus, Saint Thomas, Saint Bartholomew. Beasts of the propeks, and of all the Apostles, and of many other saints whose names are known only to the wisdom of God. The noble King Don Alonso, being full of humble devotion for all these holy relics, was it a befitting thing for him to provide with his property for the building, and to make it a place of pilgrimage, with plagues of the saints, and on the outside covered with silver, and gilded with no little cunning. For which the may he deserve after this life the company of these Saints in heaven, being aided by their intercession. — These holy relics were placed here by the hands of many clergy and prelates, who were here assembled with the said King D. Alonso, and with his chosen sister called Donna Urraca. To whom may the Redeemer of all grant remission and pardon of all their sins, for the reverence and rich reliquary which they made for the said relics of the Apostles, and for those of the Saints, St. Justus and Pastor, St. Cosme and St. Damian, St. Eulalia the Virgin, and of the Saints Maximius, Germanus, Basilius, Panteleon, Cyprians and Justina, Sebastian, Fa- cundus and Primitivos, Christopher, Cucufatius, Felix and Salulpus, alleluia, alleluia, alleluia...

The sum of the manner in which this Holy Ark came into Spain is this, conformably to what is written by all our grave authors. When Cseroses the King of Persia, in the time of the Emperor Herachius, came upon the Holy Land, and took the city of Jerusalem by the hand of King Philip, and his clergy, with pious forethought, secreted the Holy Ark, which from the time of the Apostles had been kept there, and its store augmented with new relics, which were deposited therein. After the victory of Cosroes, the Bishop Philip, with many of his clergy, passed into Africa, carrying with them the Holy Ark: and there it remained some years, till the Saracens entered into that province also, and then Fulgentius the Bishop of Ruspius, with providence like that which had made Philip bring it to Africa, removed it into Spain. The Ark was then translated by relaying some, and was from thence removed to Asturias, and hidden in the cave of Monsagro: finally, King D. Alonso el Casto removed it to the Camara Santa; and afterwards K. D. Alonso the Great enriched it. Thus our histories write, and the name is read in the lessons on the festival which the church of Oviedo celebrates of the coming thence of this Holy Ark, with a sermon proper for the day, and much solemnity, the service being said on the 13th of March, after vespers, above in the church of the Camara Santa. This is a most weighty testi- mony wherefore we are bold to say that what truth it contains and of the genuineness of the most great treasure which it contains. — These also are strong testimonies, that K. D. Alonso the Great should not only have made the Ark so rich, but that this king should also have fortified the city of Oviedo, surrounding it with walls, and making for it a castle, and building also the castle of Guason upon the shore, for the defence and security of this holy treasure, and for another end, as he left written upon the stone of which we have elsewhere spoken. Another testimony of great authority, is the great reverence which has been shown to this Holy Ark, from the time of its being opened. It has remained the most solemn and sacred of all the inscriptions to these our days. This is so great that no one has dared to open it, McClure examples being related of some daring attempts which have been made. That which occurred in our days is not mournful, but rather of much devotion and holy joy. The most illustrious Señor D. Cristoval de Esguiz y Sevillano, who is now the most worthy Archbishop of Seville, when he was Bishop of Oviedo, determined to open the holy Ark. For this, as the singular devotion and most holy zeal for the glory of God which he has in all things, astonished him, he made solemn preparations and an exhal-functional a fast of forty days in his church and through all his diocesan, commanding that prayers should be made to our Lord, beseeching him that he would be pleased with what was intended, his Most-Illustriousness giving the example, which is very common and very edifying in his church, in himself, and in the ministers thereof. Three days before the Sunday on which the Ark was to be opened, he ordered all persons to fast, and to make greater prayers with processions. When the day arrived, he, in his spiritual mass, had the presence of his holy exhortations much of his own devout desires into the hearts of the hearers. The mass being finished, clad as he was, he ascended to the Camara Santa, with much outward solemnity, and with much fervor of devotion internally in his heart, and having there again his human prayers to our Lord, and quickened the order of that sacred desire which had influenced him; on his knees as he was before the Holy Ark, he took the key to open it. At the moment when he stretched out his hand to put the key in the holy ark, a sudden and such horror and dismay, and such hurling self so bereft of all power (tax impossibilitatu) to move it in any way, that it was impossible for him to proceed, or do any thing but remain in that holy consecration, without having strength or ability for more. And as if he had come there to receive a peculiar recompense of the very angels, so much desire and preparation, he had intended to do, he desisted from his intent, and gave it up, his whole holy desire being turned into a chill of humble shrinking and fear. Among other things which his most Illustrious Lordship relates of what he then felt, he says, that his hair stood up in such a manner and with such force, that it seemed to him, as if it lifted the mitre a considerable way from his head. Now, we all know that this famous prelate has vigor and persevering courage for all the great things which he undertakes in the service of our Lord; but the respect he has to our Lord has heightened them, and thus I believe it will always remain, fastened more surely with veneration and reverence, and with respect of these examples, than with the strong bolt of its lock.

In the inscription of this Holy Ark, mention is made of the relics of St. Budifol, and by reason that he is a Saint very little known, it will be proper to say something of him. This Saint is much revered in Salamanca and in Zamora, and in both cities he has a parochial church, and in Zamora they have a good part of his relics. They have so much corrupted the name, calling him St. Boul, that the Saint is now scarcely known by his own.

They of the church say, that the cote of St. Idelfonso, which Our Lady gave him, is in the Ark. This may well he believed, since our good authors particularly relate that it was carried from Oviedo with the Holy Ark, and with the other relics, and it does not now appear among them, and there is much more reason to think that it has been very carefully put away, than that it has been lost. Also they say, that when the celestial cote was put into the Holy Ark, they took out of it the picture in the most correct fashion, and at the head of our Señor was wrapped up for his interment, as is said in the inscription of the Ark. This is one of the most famous relics in all Christendom, and therefore it is most richly adored, and reverently preserved, being shown only three times in the year with great solemnity, for which it is known. It is wrapped without of gold and azure, with beautiful moulings and pictures, and other ornaments of much authority. Within this there is a square piece of wood, covered entirely with black velvet, with silver handles, and other decorations of silver round about; in the hollow of this square, the holy Sudario is stretched and fastened upon the velvet; it is a thin linen cloth, three quarters long and half a vara wide; and in number of its inches, 172.4. In the center of the head of our Redeemer, in divers forms and stains of various sizes; wherein some persons observe marks of the divine countenance and other particularities. I did not perceive this; but the feeling which came upon me when I looked at it is sufficient to make me believe any thing of it; and if a wretch like me was thus affected, what must it be thus those who deserve of our Lord greater repentance on such an occasion! It is exhibited to the people three times in a year: on Good Friday, and on the two festivals of the Cross in May and September. The Bishop lifts the veil, which at the sight of the Holy Sudario, another music begins of the voices of the people, deeply affected with devotion, which visibly penetrates all hearts. The Bishop stands some time, turning the Sacred Relic to all sides, and afterwards the veil being replaced, the veil rests upon the Holy Sudario in its box. With all these solemnities, the very Illustrious and most Reverend Señor M. D. Gonzalo de Solarzano, Bishop of Oviedo, exhibited this Holy Relic on the day of Santiago, in the year of our Redemption 1573, in order that I might be more completely informed of the King our Lord, I having at this time undertaken this sacred journey by his command.

Another chest, with a covering of crimson and brocade, contains a good quantity of bones, and some pieces of a hand; which, although they are very dumpy, and black, and this all who were present perceived, when they were shown me, and we spoke of it as of a notable and marvellous thing. The account which they of the church give of this holy bones is, that it is that of St. Ferrano, without knowing any thing more of it. I, considering the great dampness of the sacred bones, believe certainly that it was brought up to the Camara Santa from the church, of Leocadia, which, as it has been seen, is underneath it. And there, in the altar, the great stone chest is empty, in which King Alonso el Casto enclosed many relics, as the Bishop told me himself. I have always held for certain, that the body of St. Leocadia is that in this rich chest. And in this opinion I am the more confirmed since the year 1530, when such exquisite diligence has been used by our Spaniards in the monastery of the Glicerio, near Mous de Henao in Pla- ders, to verify whether the body of St. Leocadia, which they have there, is that of our Saint. The result has been, that it was ascertained beyond all doubt to be the same; since an authentic writing was found of the person who carried it thither by favor of one of our earliest kings, and he carried it from Oviedo without dispute; because, according to my researches, it is certain that it was there. Now I affirm, that the king who gave part left part also; and neither is that which is there so much, that what we saw at Oviedo might not well have been left, neither is this the truth but that which is at Mous might well have been given.

In the church below, in a hollow made for this purpose, with grates, and a gate well ornamented, is one of the vessels which our Redeemer Jesus Christ filled with miraculous wine at the marriage in Galilee. It is of white marble, of an ar- of forty. So much as it is in the wall of the church of K. Alonso el Casto, and all the work about it is very marvellous, it may be believed; that the said king ordered it to be placed there." — Corisco.

mountains of Europe:—but, he adds, it might have come by water from Andalusia or Portugal, and in that case this would have been a land journey of only four or five leagues. In his Journal, Morales mentions certain other relics of which the church of Oviedo boasted; but for which he required better evidence than could be adduced for them. Such were a portion of Tobit's fish, and of Samuel's honey-comb, with other such things, which, he says, would bid fare the credit of the Ark, where, according to the Bishop of Oviedo, D. Pelayo, and Sebastian, Bishop of Zamora, they were deposited. Of these precious relics he says nothing in his history, neither does he mention a piece of Moses's rod, a large piece of St. Bartholomew's skin, and the sole of St. Peter's shoe, all which he enumerates in his Journal, implying rather than expressing his doubts of their authenticity. As a scrupulous and faithful antiquary, Morales was accustomed to require evidence, and to investigate it; and for these he could find no other testimony than tradition and antiquity, which, as presumptive proofs, were strong corroborants of faith, but did not suffice of themselves. The Holy Ark has all the evidence which he required, and the reverence with which he regarded it, is curiously expressed in his Journal. "I have now," he says, "described the material part of the Cumaean Pythian. The spiritual and devotional character which it derives from the sacred treasures which it contains, and the feeling which is experienced upon entering it, cannot be described without giving infinite thanks to our Lord, that he has been pleased to suffer a wretch like me to enjoy it. I write this in the church before the gates, and God knows I mean as it befits myself with fear and reverence, and I can only beseech God to give me strength to proceed with that for which I have no power myself."—T. 10, p. 91.

Morales, like Origen, had given in his youthful decisive proof of the sincerity of his religious methods, and it is sometimes seen as if he had exculpated his mind as well as his body. But with all this abject superstition, he was a thoroughly pious and good man. His life is deeply interesting, and his writings, besides their great historical and antiquarian value, derive additional interest from the picture of the author's mind which they so frequently display. The portrait prefixed to the last edition of his work is singularly characteristic.

As late as the age of the Philes, the Portuguese were called Suevos by the Castilians, as an opprobrious name. Brito says, It was the old word Suevos continued and corrupted, and used contemptuously, because its origin was forgotten.—Monarchia Lusitana, 2, 6, 4.

When the Sueves and Alans overran Spain, they laid siege to Lisbon, and the Saints Maximus, Julius, and Verissimus, (in most undoubted personage,) being Lusianians, were applied to by their town's people to deliver them. Accordingly a sickness broke out in the besiegers' camp, and they agreed to depart upon payment of a sum of money. Bernardo de Brito complains that Blondus and Salcedianus, in their account of this transaction, have been so careless as to mention the money, and omit the invocation of the Saints.—M. Luc. 2, 5, 23.

Lord God of Hosts, &c.—XVIII. p. 689, col. 2.

The substance of these prayers will be found in the forms of coronation observed by the Anglo-Saxons, and in the early ages of the French monarchy. I am indebted for them to Turner's most valuable History of the Anglo-Saxons, and to Mr. Lingard's Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxons church, a work not more full of erudition than it is of Romish sophistry and misrepresentation.

"Amid our deserts we hunt down the birds
Of heaven,—wise do not seize them!"—XX. p. 694, col. 1.

The Moors have a peculiar manner of hunting the pritidge. In the plains of Akkermute and Jibbel Hildel in Scheden, they take various kinds of dogs from them, from the greyhound to the shepherd's dog, and following the birds on horseback, and allowing them no time to rest, they soon fatigue their dogs, when they are taken by the dogs. But as the Moosel- mies eats nothing but what has had its throat cut, he takes out
A knotty grave, scarce hidden there from dogs
And raven, nor from winter rains secure.

In composing these lines I remembered a far more beautiful passage in one of the Eclogues of the Jesuit Bussiöres:

. . . . . their white signal-flag. — XXIII. p. 700, col. 1.

A white flag, called El Alen, the signal, is hoisted every day at twelve o'clock, to warn the people out of hearing, or at a great distance, to prepare, by the necessary preliminary ablations, to prostrato themselves before God at the service of prayer. — Jacomos. Morocco, p. 140.

The Humma's happy wings have shadowed him.

XXIII. p. 700, col. 2.

The humma is a fabulous bird. The head over which its shadow once passeth will assuredly be encircled with a crown.

Life hath not left his body. — XXIII. p. 701, col. 1.

Among the Prerogatives et Proprietés singulières du Prophète, Gaquier states that, "Il est venu dans son Tombeau. Il fit la prière dans ce Tombeau à chaque fois que le Crieur en fait la proclamation, et au même temps qu'on la recite. Il y a un Ange posté sur son Tombeau qui le soin de lui donner avis des Prêtres que les fidèles font pour lui." — Vie de Mahomet, l. vii. c. 18.

The common notion, that the impostor's tomb is suspended by means of a noose, is well known. Lahat, in his History, Occidentale, (1st. ii. p. 143), mentions the lie of a Marabout, who, on his return from a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina, affirmed, "que le tombeau de Mahomet est porté en l'air par le moyen de certaines Anges qui se relagent d'heure en heure pour soutenir son sarcophage." These fables, however, are modern in comparison with those which the Franciscans and Dominicans have invented to magnify their founders.

Hast thou not heard
Here, when our clay is level'd first with life,
The undeserving Angel brings it from that spot.
Whereon his written in the eternal book
That soul and body must their parting take,
And earth to earth return? — XXIII. p. 701, col. 2.

The Persians, in their creed, have a pleasant imagination concerning the death of men. They say that every one must come and die in the place where the Angel took the earth of which he had been made, thinking that one of these spirits has the care of forming the human creature, which he doth by mingling a little earth with the seed. — Thenewut.

They perish, all their thousands perish there.

XXIII. p. 703, col. 1.

The battle of Cauvondoua is one of the great miracles of Spanish history. It was asserted for many centuries, without contradiction, and is still believed by the people, that when the Moors attacked Felayo in the cave, their weapons were turned back upon themselves; that the Virgin Mary appeared in the clouds, and that part of a mountain fell upon the Infidels, and crushed those who were flying from the destruction. In what manner that destruction might have been effected, was exemplified upon a smaller scale in the Tyrol, in the memorable war of 1820.

Barret sums up the story briefly, and in the true strain of Mine Ancient.

The Sarret, hearing that his Apostates had King created, and stood on their guard, Sends multitudes of Mohammedan knights To rouze them out of their rocks, and force their ward. Pelagius, hearing of this enterprise, Prepares his petty power on Aussey mount; Aichmem comes with Zarreae multiplies, Meaning Pelagius' forces to dismount. To blow them they come; but lo! a storm divine. The Iber, few, beats numbrous Surracem, Two myrids with Mahomet went to die In Parca's park.

The Bread of Life. — XXIV. p. 704, col. 1.

It is now admitted by the best informed of the Romish writers themselves, that, for a thousand years, no other but common or leavened bread was used in the Eucharist. The wafer was introduced about the eleventh century. And as far down as the twelfth century, the people were admitted to communicate in both kinds.

The Musical Pilgrim in Purchas thus describes the Leonese:—

Wymmen in that land use no vullen,
But alle in letter be the wouneden:
And her hevedez wonderly ben trust,
Turning in her forterase as a crest,
In could clouthe lappet sile be form
Like to the prikke of a Nun Unicorn.
And men have doublelettez full scherti,
Bare leggett and light to stert. — P. 1231

Purchas supposes this very curious poem to have been written about 1500 years before he published it, i. e. about 1425
It is probably much older. In entering Castille from Elvar, the author says,

Now into Castell shall we fare
Over the river, the land is bare
Of hills and lusher above,
And Sarazyns Governor thereto.

Now Cadajoz, and that part of the country, was finely recovered in the Moors in the early part of the thirteenth century. Purvale perhaps judged from the age of the manuscript, which may have been written about the time on which he fixes, and the language modernized by the transcriber.

The light which o'er the fields of Bethlehem shone,
Irradiated whole Spain. — XXV. p. 706, col. 2.

A more extraordinary example of the divine favor towards Spain is triumphantly brought forward by Francisco de Pica.

Our Lord God, says he, has been pleased to vouchsafe those kingly purity in the purity of the Faith, like a terrestrial Paradise, by means of the Cherubim of the Holy Office, which, with its sword of fire, has defended the entrance, through the merits and patronage of the most serene Virgin Mary the Mother of God. Had sido servido nuestro Señor Dios conservar estos reinos de España en la custodia de la Fe, como a un Para dego terrenal, mediante el Cherubin del Santo Oficio, que con su espada de fuego les ha defendido la entrada por los muros y patronación de la serena asombrosa Virgen María Madre de Dios. — Dese. de Toledo, L. I, C. 25.

This passage is truly and lamentably characteristic.

The Oaken Cross. — XXV. p. 707, col. 1.

The oaken cross which Pelayo bore in battle is said to have been preserved at Oviedo, in the Camara Santa, in company with that which the angels made for Alonso the Great, concerning which Morales delivers a careful opinion, how much of it was made by the angels, and how much has been human workmanship. The people of Cangas, not willing that Pelayo's cross should be in any thing inferior to his successor's, insist that it fell from Heaven. Morales, however, says, it is more certain that the king had it made to go out with it to battle at Covadonga. It was covered with gold and enamel, in the year 988; when Morales wrote, it was in fine preservation, and doubtless so continued till the present generation. Upon the top branch of the cross there was this inscription: Sanctum placie sacraeque lucis sanctae Dei aeternae auctoritatis et sanctae crucis memoriam sancti laureati regni nostri. Hoc signum tuum, haec signa vinceris inimicis. On the feet, 15 apostolos in celo, apostolos in terra, sancti Salutatoris octo sanctissima. Hac signo tuetur pia, hoc signo vincitur inimicis. On the foot, 15 apote tom est in Castello Guzman como Regni nostri XVII diece cratae Era DCCXXVLI.

There is no other testimony, says Morales, that this is the cross of King Don Pelayo, than tradition handed down from his time. I wish the king had stated that it was so in his inscription, and I even think he would not have been silent upon this point, unless he had wished to imitate Alonso el Casto, who, in like manner, says nothing concerning the Angels upon his cross. This passage is very characteristic of good old Ambrosius.

I have nowhere seen a more curious description of a battle between Christians and Sarazens than in Barret's manuscript:

The forlorn Christian troops Moens't troops encircle,
The Moons trooped requite them with the like;
Whilst Grecian lance crackers (thundering) Pariath take,
Parth's di-lo-dash arrow Grecian through death prick:
And whilst that Median sementer unlimbs
The Christian knight, doth Christian castle axe
Unhead the Medina horsemen; whilst bile dins
The Pagan's goggling-eyes by Greekish axe,
The Greek unhorsed lies by Persian push,
And both all rageful grapple on the ground.
And whilst the Sarazens with furious lurch
The Syrian shocks, the Syrian as round
Down shambles seren: whilst Babel blade
Sends soul Byzantine to the starred cell,
Byzantine pike with like-employed trade,
Packs Babel's spirit posting down to hell.

The Saharanas, or Arabs of the Desert, rejoice to see the clouds of locusce proceeding towards the north, anticipating therewith a general mortality, which they call elhakeb, the good, or the benediction; for, after depopulating the rich plains of Barbary, it affords to them an opportunity of cun
nuting from their arid recesses, in the desert, to pitch their tents in the desolated plains, or along the banks of some river. — Jackson's Morocco, p. 106.

The account which the Romanic Chronicle gives of Roderick after his disappearance, is in so singular a strain of fiction, that I have been led to translate it. It strikingly exemplifies the doctrine of penance, of which monastic history supplies many instances almost as extraordinary as this fable

Chap. 325. — How the King Don Rodrigo left the battle and arrived at a hermitage, and of that which befell him.

Now when the King Don Rodrigo had escaped from the battle, he began to go as fast as he could upon his horse along the banks of the Grandilet, and night came on, and the horse began to fill by reason of the many wounds which he had received; and as he went thus by the river side deploiring the great ruin which had come upon him, he knew not where he was, and the horse got into a quagmire, and when he was in he could not get out. And when the king saw this he alighted, and stript off all his rich arms and the furniture thereof, and took off his crown from his head, and threw them all into the quagmire, saying, Of earth was I made, and even so are all my deeds like unto mud and mire. Therefore my pomp and vanity shall be buried in this mud till it has all returned again to earth, as I myself must do. And the vile end which I have deserved will becom me well, seeing that I have been the principal cause of this great cruelty. And as he thus stript off all his rich apparel, he cast the shoes from his feet, and went his way, and wandered on towards Portugal, and he travelled so far that night and the day following, that he came to a hermitage near the sea, where there was a good man who had dwelt there serving God for full forty years; and not long after, he was ordained a priest.

And he entered into the hermitage, and found a crucifix therein, being the image of our Lord Jesus Christ, even as he was crucified, and for the remembrance of Him, he bent both his knees to the ground, and clasped his hands, weeping and confessing the holy spirit upon himself, not that any man in the world saw or heard him. And he said thus, O very Lord who by thy word hast made all the world from nothing which it was, and hast created all things, those which are visible to men, and those which are invisible, the heavenly as well as the earthy, and who didst incarnate thyself that thou mightst enlighten the world and teach those who firmly put their trust in thee, giving up thy holy ghost from thy glorified body upon the tree of the true cross,—and who didst descend into Hell, and deliveredst thy friends from there, and didst regale them with the glory of Heaven; And afterwards thy holy spirit came again into that most holy body, which thou wast pleased to take upon thee in this world; and, manifesting thyself for the true God which thou wert, thou didst design to hide in this dark world forty days with their nights, and then thou didst ascend into thy heavenly glory, and didst enlighten there a long time, of which the Holy Ghost thy beloved disciples. I beseech thee, O Lord, that thou wouldst enlighten me, a king in tribulation, wretched and full of many sins, and deserving all evils; let not the soul which is thine, and which cost thee so dear, receive the evil and the desecrator of this dreadful misfortune; and may it please thee, O Lord, after the downfall, destruction, pedition, and desolation, which I, a miserable king, have suffered in this world, that my disconsolate soul may not be forgotten by thee, and that all this misery may be in satisfaction for my errors. And I earnestly beseech thee, O Lord, that the great mortal band, which in that in this world I may make satisfaction for my sins, so that at the Great Day of Judgment I may not be condemned to the torments of hell.

Having said these words, weeping as though he would have died, he said: It is not for me to assert that any man in the world saw or heard him. And when the Hermit heard him say all this, he was greatly astonished, and he went unto him. And when the King saw him he was little pleased; howbeit after he had talked with him, he would rather have found him there than have been restored again to the great honor which he had lost; for the Hermit comforted him in such wise in this his tribulation, that he was right well contented; and he confessed unto him, and told him all that concerned him. And the Hermit said to him, King, thou shalt remain in this hermitage, which is a remote place, and where thou mayst live so upon the word of God, which should be for me, on the third day from hence, I shall pass away out of this world; and thou shalt bury me, and thou shalt take my garments, and fulfil the time of a year in this hermitage. Take no thought as to provision for thy support, for every Friday shalt thou have bread, and every fifth he always gave thee bread; and thou shalt so husband it, that it may suffice thee for the whole week; That flesh which has been fostered in great delight shall suffer abstinence, lest it should grow proud; and thou shalt endure hunger and cold and thirst in the love of our Lord, that he may have compassion upon thee. Thy station till the hour of sleep must always be upon that rock, where there is an oratory facing the east; and thou shalt continue the service of God in such manner as God will direct thee to do. And take heed that thy soul fall not into temptation. And since thou hast spoken this day of penitence, to-morrow shalt thou communicate and receive the true body of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will be thy protection and support against the enemy and the persecutor. And put thou thy firm trust in the sign of the Cross; and thus shalt thou please thy Sover.

Many other things the holy Hermit said, which made the King right joyfull to hear them; and there they continued till it was the hour for sleep. And the holy Hermit showed him his bed, and said, When I shall have left the company, thou wilt follow the way which I have followed, for which our Lord wills it. And he extended his hand over thee, that thou mayst perseverer in good, and in his holy service. And then they laid down and slept till it was the hour of matins, when they should both arise. And the Hermit awoke him, for as the King had not slept for a long time, and was moreover full weary, he would not have awaked so soon, if the Hermit had not roused him; and they said their matins. And when they were executed Hermit said mass, and the King heard it with great devotion, and communed with great contrition, and remained in prayer for the space of two hours. And the hour for taking food came, and the Hermit took a leaf which was made of pannick and of rye, and gave half thereof to the King, and told for himself the other half. And they ate little of it, as men who could not eat more, the one by reason of age, and the other because he was not used to such fare. And thus they continued till the third day, when the holy Hermit departed this life.

Ch. 359. — How the Hermit died, and the King found a writing in his hand.

On the third day, the pious Hermit expired at the same hour which he had said to the King, whereat the King was full sorrowful, as one who took great consolation in the lessons which he gave. And when he laid thus deceased, the King by himself, with his hands, and with an oakstic which was there, made his grave. And when he was about to bury him, he found a writing in his hand; and he took it and opened it, and found that it contained these words.

Ch. 360. — Of the rule of life which the Hermit left written for Don Roderigo.

O King, who through thy sins hast lost the great honor in which thou wast placed, take heed that thy soul also come not into the same judgment which hath fallen upon thy flesh. And receive into thy heart the instructions that I shall give thee now, and see that thou swerve not from them, nor obstinate thyself, but do not seek any thing against them, which I have taught thee, thou wilt find satisfaction upon them. And that thou mayst not be deceived in case any company should come unto thee, mark and observe this and pass in it thy life. Thou shalt arise two hours after midnight, and say thy matins within the hermitage. When the day breaks thou shalt go to the oratory, and kneeling upon the ground, say the whole hours by the breviary, and when thou hast finished them thou shalt say certain prayers of our Lord, which thou wilt find therein. And when thou hast done this, contemplate upon the great power of our Lord, and upon his mercy, and upon the greatest mercy he has shown hitherto to thee, and upon the crosses, being himself very God, and master of all things; and how with great humility he chose to be incarnate in a poor virgin, and not to come as a king, but as a meditator among the nations. And contemplate also upon the poor life of the Hermit, the little meat which was communicated upon the crosses, and the great poverty which he lived in, that he will come at the day of judgment to judge the quick and the dead, and give to every one the meed which he had deserved. Then shalt thou give sustenance to thy flesh of that bread of pannick and rye, which shall be brought to thee every Friday in the manner that I have said; and of other food thou shalt not eat, although it should be given or sent thee; neither shalt thou change thy bread. And when thou hast eaten give thanks to God, because he has let thee come to repentance; and then thou shalt go to the oratory, and there give praise to the Virgin our Lady holy mother of God, in such manner as shall come to thee in devotion. If, when thou hast finished, heaviness should come upon thee, thou mayst sleep, and when thou shalt have rested as long as is reasonable, return thou to thy oratory, and there remain, making thy prayers always upon thy knees, and for nothing which may happen depart from the oratory, till thou hast made an end of thy prayers, whether it rain or snow, or if a tempest should blow. And for as much as the flesh could sustain so many mundane pleasures, so must it suffer also celestial abstinence; two masses thou hast heard in this hermitage, and in it, it is God's will that thou shalt hear no more, for more would not be to his service. And if thou observest these things, God will have compassion upon thy deserts. And when the King had read this, he held it over the altar, in a place where it would be well preserved.
NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GITHS.

Ch. 211. — How the Devil came in the form of a Hermit to deceive the King Don Rodrigo.

"Now when the King had made a grave in which to bury the Hermit, the Devil was troubled at the good course which the King had taken, and he cast about for means how he might undo it. And he could find nothing but to come to him in the figure of a hermit, and keep company with him, to turn him aside from those doctrines which the Hermit had given him, that he might not fulfill his penitence. And the King being in great haste to bury the body, the Devil came to him with a long white beard, and a great hood over the eyes, and some potters-hooks hanging from his girdle, and supporting himself upon a staff as though he were lame, and could not go. And when he came where the King was, he humbled himself, and said unto him, Peace be with thee! And the King turned toward that side from which he came, and when he saw him of so great age, he thought that it was some holy man who knew of the death of the Hermit, and was come to bury him; and he humbled himself, and went towards him to kiss his hand, and the Devil would not saying, It is not fitting that a King should kiss the hand of a poor servant of God. And the King was a-tongued at hearing himself named, and believed that this must needs be a man of holy life, and that he spake by some revelation; nevertheless, he said, I am not a king, but a miserable sinner, for whom it had been better never to have been born than that so great a evil should have happened through me. And the false Hermit said to him, Think not that thou hast so much fault as thou imaginest in what has now been done, for even if thou hast had no part in it, this destruction would have fallen at this time. And since it was ordained that it should be the God is no other; some fault thou hast, but it was very little. And think not that I speak this of myself; for my words are those of a spirit made and created by the will of God, who speaks through me this and many other things, which hereafter thou shalt know, that thou mayest see how God has given me power that I should know all thy concerns, and counsel thee in what manner thou shouldst live. And albeit I have more need of rest than of labor, by reason of my age, which is far greater than my countenance shows, yet I have disposed myself to labor for the love of thee, to console thee in thy persecutions, knowing that this good man was about to die. Of a truth you may believe that on this day month I was in Rome, being there in the church of St. John de Lateran, out of which I had never gone for thirty years, till I came now to keep the company of thee. I have commanded that a barrel not that I had sent to thee, of a man of so great age, and crippled as I am, should have been able to traverse so much land in so short time, for certes I tell thee that he who speaks in this form which thou seest, has given me strength to go through so great a journey; and soon dost thou see how he comes, in the same way by which I saw him forth. And the King said to him, Friend of God, I rejoice much in thy coming, for in my misfortunes I shall be by thee consoled and instructed in that which must be done to fulfill my penitence; I rejoice also that this holy Hermit here shall receive burial from the hands of a man much more righteous than I. And the false Hermit said, Think not, King, that it is for the service of God to give to any person a name not appertaining to him. And this I say because I well know the life of this person, what it was; and as thou knowest nothing of celestial things, thou thinkest that as the tongue speaketh, even such is the heart. But I tell thee the habit does not make the monk, and it is from such persons as these that the saying arose which is common in the world, I would have justice, but not for my own house. This I say to thee, because he commanded thee to perform a penance such as never man did, the which is, that thou shouldst eat only once a day, and that of such bread that even the shepherds' dogs would not eat it; and of that thou shouldst not eat as much as thou couldst; and appointed thee the term of a year that thou shouldst live upon this diet; and that thou shouldest not hear mass during the time that thou abidest here, for that the two massers which thou hast heard should suffice; look now if that doctrine be good, which bids a man forget the holy sacrament! Cerets I tell thee that only dost thou pay the tithes of thy house, and thou hast not建设用地 assigned to a place where I would not that thine should go for all the world, if it were in my power, with all its riches.

Nevertheless, to be rid of the ill smell which he would give, it is fit that I bury him, and while I bury him, I will go for food. And the King said, Friend of God, do not take this trouble, but remain still, and before noon there will come food, which will suffice for you and for me; help me now to give burial to this good man, which will be much for the service of the Church. And the false Hermit answered, King, it would be less evil to soil him over those rocks into the sea; but if not, let him lie thus upon the earth till the birds and the beasts devour his flesh. And the King marvelled at this; nevertheless though he believed that the false Hermit was a servant of God, he left not for that to bury the good Hermit who there lay without life, and he began by himself to carry him to the grave which he had made. And as he was employed in burying him, he saw that the false Hermit went away over the mountains at a great rate, not as one who was a cripple, but like a stout man and a young; and he marvelled what this might mean.

Ch. 212. — How King Don Rodrigo informed himself concerning the penance which he was to perform, from the writing which the holy Hermit left him.

"When the King had finished burying the good servant of God, he went to the altar, and took the writing in his hand, and read it to inform himself well of it. And when he had read it, he saw that of a certainty all that was said therein was for the service of God, and was of good doctrine for his soul; and he said, that, according to the greatness of his sins, it behoved that his penitence must be severe, if he wished to save his soul. And then he called to mind the life which St. Mary Magdalene endured, for which God had mercy on her. And forthwith he went to him to his oratory, and in his palace and his chamber, and he remained there till it was near noon; and he knew that he had nothing to eat, and waited till it should be brought him.

Ch. 213. — How the Devil brought want to King Don Rodrigo that he should eat it, and he would only eat of the Hermit's bread.

"After it was mid-day the false Hermit came with a basket upon his shoulders, and went straight to where the King was, and he came sweating and weary. And the King had compassion on him, because he said nothing, neither did he leave his prayers. And the false Hermit said to him, King, make an end of thy prayers, for it is time to eat; and here is bread and food. And the King lifted up his eyes and looked toward him, and he saw that there came into the hermitage a shepherd with a wallet upon his back, and he thought this must be he who brought him that which he was to eat. And so in truth it was, that was the bread and the food which he brought him; and he was a penitent, and he gave them to the King, and the false Hermit, and he had the four leaves, and he took one, and brake it in the middle, and laid by the rest carefully, and he went out of the hermitage into the portal, where there was a table full small, and he had a cloth upon it, and the bread which he was to eat, and the water; and he began to bless the table, and then seated himself. And the false Hermit noted well how he blessed the table, and arose from where he was, and went to the King, and said, King, take of this poor fare which I have brought, and which has been given me in name. And he took out two loaves which were full white, and a roasted partridge, and a fowl, of which the legs were wanting; and he placed it upon the table. And when the King saw it, his eyes were filled with tears, for he could not but call to mind his great honor in former times, and how it was now no more, and he was commanded thus, that thou shouldest not hear mass during the time that thou abidest here, for that the two massers which thou hast heard should suffice; look now if that doctrine be good, which bids a man forget the holy sacrament! Cerets I tell thee that only dost thou pay the tithes of thy house, and thou hast not建设用地 assigned to a place where I would not that thine should go for all the world, if it were in my power, with all its riches.
Hermit, who saw that he gave no regard neither to the bread, nor the meat which he had brought, said to the King, Why eatest thou not of which this God has sent thee? and the King said, I came not to this hermitage to serve God, but to do what I should not do, and that I might not be found at last. And the penance which is given me in this life, I must observe for a year, and not depart from it, lest it should prove to my great hurt. And the false Hermit said, how, King, hast it been given thee for penance, that thou shouldst let thyself die for despair? The Gospel command not so; contrariwise it forbids man to do any such penance through which the body might be brought to death; for if in killing another, he causes the death is held for a murderer, much more is he who killeth himself, and such thou wouldst be. And now through despair thou wouldst let thyself die, which thing that thou mightst not longer live in this world, wherefore I say eat of this food that I have brought thee some little, that thou mayst not die. And with that he began to eat right heartily. And the King, which he beheld him, was seized with affection to do the like, howbeit he was withheld, and would eat nothing thereof. And as it was time when he would drink of the water, the false Hermit said to him, that he should drink of the wine; and the King would only taste of that water; and as he went to take of it, the false Hermit struggled with him, but the King beat back his hand, according to his rule, and departed not from it. And when he had eaten, he began to give thanks to God. And the false Hermit, who saw that he would have to cross himself at rising from the table, rose up before him, as one who was about to do something; and the King beheld him not. And when he had thus eaten, he went to the oratory, and began to give praises to the Virgin Mary, according as the good man had commanded him, when that traitor went to him and said, Certes this doctrine which thou holdest is no way to serve God, for sans doube when the stomach is satisfied with food the will shall have no power to pray as it ought; and although the tongue may say the prayers, the heart confirms them not, being hindered by the force which nature derives from the food. Therefore I say to thee that thou oughtest to sleep first; for whilst art asleep the food will settle, and the will will then be more able for contemplation. Moreover, God is not pleased with prayers without contrition, as with one who speaketh of one thing, and hath his heart placed on another, so that he can give no faith to the words which he beginneth. If thou wouldst be saved, O King, it behoveth thee to listen to me; and if thou wilt not believe me, I will depart and leave thee, as one who will take no counsel, except from himself. And the King replied, if I should see that thou confirmest the good manner of life whereof my soul hath need, according as it was appointed by the good man whom I have buried, then would I follow thy way. But I see that thy life is not that of a man of abstinence, nor of one who forsakes worldly enjoyments for the love of God; rather it seemeth by what I see in thee that thy life is a strengthening of worldly glory; for thou dost eat thy flesh with good viands as I was wont to do, when I was puffed up with the vanities of the world. Wherefore I will in no wise follow thy way, for I see that thou art a worldly man, who deceivest God and the world, and when it cometh to the end thou wilt be deceived.

Notes to Roderick, The Last of the Goths:

Ch. 245. — Of the reply which the King made to the Devil.

Suns doubt said the King, he forbade me not that I should hear music; but because he commanded me that I should fulfil my penance here for the term of a year, as he knew the hour of his own death, so also he knew that no other person who could say mass would come to this hermitage within the year; and, therefore, he said to me, that in this hermitage I should not hear mass, but he never forbade me from hearing it.

Ch. 246. — Of the reasoning which the false Hermit made to King Don Rodrigo.

The false Hermit said, Now thou thyself manifestest that he was not so worthy as a man ought to be who knows that which is to come. For according to thy words, he knew not that I should come here, who can say mass if I please; and if there be good judgment in thee, thou wilt understand that I must needs be nearer to God, because I know all which he had commanded thee to do, and also how he was to die. And I can know better in what place he is, than he who has commanded thee to observe this rule, know concerning himself while he was here. But this I tell thee, that as I came to thee, and as I teach thee the way in which thou shouldst live, and thou wilt not follow my directions, I will return as I came. And now marvel not at any thing which he had befallen thee, for thou hast a right stubborn heart; hard and painful wilt thou feel the way of thy salvation, and in vain wilt thou do all this, for it is a thing which profiteth nothing.

Ch. 247. — Of the reply which King Don Rodrigo made to the false Hermit.

Good man, said the King, all that thou shalt command me to do beyond the rule which the holy Hermit appointed me, that will I do; that in which my penance may be more severe, willingly will I do it. But in other manner I will not take thy counsel; and as thou hast talked enough of this, leave me, therefore, to my prayers. And then the King bent his knees, and began to go on with his rule. And the false Hermit, when he saw this, departed, and returned not again for a month; and all that time the King maintained his penance, in the manner which had been appointed him. And by reason that he ate only of that black bread, and drank only water, his flesh fell away, and he became such that there was not a man in the world who would have known him. Thus he remained in the hermitage, thinking of no other thing than to implore the mercy of God that he would pardon him.

Ch. 248. — Of what the false Hermit said to King Don Rodrigo to dispart him from his rule.

King Don Rodrigo living thus, one day, between midnight and dawn, the false Hermit came to the hermitage; and not in the same figure as before, but appearing more youthful, so that he would not be known. And he called at the door, and the King looked who it might be, and saw that he was habited like a servant of God, and he opened the door forthwith. And they saluted each other. And when they saw each other, the false Hermit greeted the King, and demanded of him where the father was; and the King answered, that for more than a month there had been no person dwelling there save himself. And the false Hermit, when he heard this, made semblance as if he were afflicted with exceeding grief, and said, How came this to be, for it is not yet six weeks since I came here and confessed my sins to the father who abode here, and then departed from this hermitage to my own, which is a league from hence? And King Don Rodrigo said, Friend, know that this Hermit is now in Paradise with my love, and I had promised him with my own mouth to show him the place where he lay. And when he went there he began to kiss the earth of the grave, and to make great dote and lamentation over him. And when some half hour had past, he went on as though he were never dead, and went on for many years. And before the King had finisht to say his, he came to him, and said, Good man, will you say mass? And the King answered, that he never said it. Then, said the false Hermit, Hear me then in penitence, for I would confess And the NOTES TO RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHSS.

King seeing that it was for the service of God to hear him in penitency, they seated themselves both at the foot of the altar. And when the false Hermit made it appear that Spaniard had no sin to confess: for he began to relate many great services which he had done to God, as well in the life which he led as in other things. And before the King could absolve him he rose up, and asked if things were ready for the mass. And when he saw that there was no means of doing him good, he was now that time that he should go to his oratory. And the false Hermit asked him that he should assist him in saying mass, and then he should hear it. And the King said, that for nothing in the world would he leave to fulfill his penance, according as it had required of him; and then remove to his oratory. And the false Hermit made as if he put on the vestments and all the ornaments, and began to say mass, to the end that he might deceive the King, and make him cease to observe his penance, and come to adore the mass. And he made a watery cloud arise, so that it raised heavily where the King was. And when he saw that he could in no ways entice him, then he went to him, and said, Good man, for that you may be placed out of danger in cases which at all times will happen, seeing that you are alone, I have consecrated the body of Jesus Christ, that you may adore it every day, since you may not hear mass; and thus you may fulfill your penance as a faithful Christian. And with that he dispensed himself, saying, In the cover upon the altar you will find the Corpus Christi: when you rise from hence go and adore it. When he had said this, he went his way. And the King believed that what he had said was true, and held that he was a good man, and of holy life.

Ch. 240. — How the Holy Ghost visited King Don Rodrigo.

Now when the King had ended his prayers, which he used to say every day before he took his food, he saw a good man come towards him, clad in white garments, and with a fresh countenance and a cheerful, and a cross upon his breast. And as he arrived where the King was, he blessed him; and when the King saw him, he was not assured of the good that he drew to the King, and he joined his hands and placed himself on his knees upon the ground, weeping plentifully. And the holy man said, King, who art desirous of heavenly glory, continue the service which thou art performing for the love of my holy name; and take heed lest the enemy overcome thee, as he who many times hath overcome thee, whereby thou hast come to what thou now art. And believe none of all those who may come to thee here, for they come for no other cause but only to deceive thee, and withdraw thee from the service which thou art performing. And this is told thee by the holy man whom thou hast here; for I am content with it, and thy soul shall receive refreshment if thou observest it. Come here, and I will show thee how the Devil thought to deceive thee, that thou mightst adore him. Then the King arose and went, always upon his knees, following the Holy Spirit of God; and when he was within the hermitage, our Lord spake and said, Depart from hence, thou cursed one, and go thy way, for thou hast no power to deceive him who continues in my service. Get thee to the infernal palms which are suffered by those who are in the ninth torment! And at that hour the King plainly saw how from the ark, which was upon the altar, there went out a soul and filthy devil, with more than fifty tails, and as many eyes, who, uttering great yells, departed from the place. And the King was greatly dismayed at this vision, in which the Holy Spirit of God had delivered him. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, King, let thy hope be in my name, and I will always be with thee, so thou wilt not let thyself be vanquished by the enemy. Then the Holy Spirit of God departed, and the King remained full joyful and greatly comforted, as if he had been in celestial glory. And thus he continued his holy fast for forty months.

Ch. 250. — How the Devil would have deceived King Don Rodrigo in the figure of Count Don Julian.

The King was in his oratory one Sunday toward nightfall, just as the sun was setting, when he saw a man coming toward him, clad in such guise as isfitting for one who follows arms. And as he looked at him, he saw that it was the Count Don Julom who approached; and he saw that behind him there came a great power of armed people. And the false Count, when he drew near, made believe to the King that he would not see him, and kept at seeing him, for he knew him well; nevertheless he remained still. And the false Count came to him, and would have kissed his hand, but the King would not give it, neither would he rise up from the oratory: and the false Count knelt upon the ground before to kiss it. And Sir, forasmuch as he who sinned against thee like a man who is a traitor to his Lord, and as I did it with great wrath and fury, which possessed my heart through the strength of the Devil, our Lord God both had compassion upon me, and would not that I should be put down from thy great honor and state, and the great lordship which thou hast in Spain. And he has shown me, in a revelation, how thou went here in this hermitage doing this great penance for thy sins. Wherefore I say to thee, thou shouldst do justices upon me, and take vengeance according to thy will, as upon one who deservest, for I acknowledge that thou wert my lord, and also the great treason into which I have fallen. Wherefore, sir, I pray and beseech thee by the one only God, that thou wilt take the power of Spain, which is there awaiting thee, and that thou wilt go forth to defend the Faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, and suffer not that poor Spain should be utterly destroyed, seeing that thou dost defend it and protect it. And then Count Julian drew his sword, and gave it to the King, saying, Sir, take this my sword, and with thine own hand do justice upon me, and take vengeance upon me as thou pleasest, and for the love of God and with much patience, seeing that I have sinned against thee. And the King was greatly troubled at this sight, and at his words also, and knew not what he should do, neither what he should say. Howbeit, it commonly he called to mind what the Holy Spirit of God had said to him, how he should take heed lest the Devil should subdue him; and so he said nothing, but continued in his prayer. And the false Count Don Julian said to him, Sir, wilt thou not turn for the Holy Faith of Jesus Christ, which is utterly going to destruction? rise up and defend it. And I will serve God and receive the honor which thou hast lost, rise then and go forth, and have pity upon miserable Spain, which is about to be lost; and have compassion also upon so many people as are perishing for want of a Lord who should defend them. Now all these words were only meant to deceive him, for it was the Devil who had taken the form of Count Don Julian, and not the Count himself. But the King could no longer restrain himself from replying, and he said, Go you, Count, and defend the land with this force which you have assembled, and which I gave you under penalty of the most heavy and cruel penalty which you committed against me and against God. And even as you brought the men, who are enemies of God, and of his Holy Faith, and led them into Spain, so now thrust them out and defend it; for I will neither stay you, nor assist you in it, nor be the hinderer for the love of God. And I pray for you, for here I will do penance for my sins. Urge me, therefore, no more with these reasons. And the false Count Don Julian rose, and went to the great company which he had brought there, and brought them all before the King. And the King, when he beheld that great company of knights, some among them whom he surely thought had been slain in battle. And they all said to him with loud voices, Sir, with whom thou send us, that we may take him for our King and Lord to protect and defend us, seeing that we will not defend the land, unless thou dost assist us. And the King, seeing the Infat Don Sanchez. Is he dead? What then wouldst thou command us that we should do? Look to it well, sir; it is no service of God that thou shouldst let perish so great a Christianity as is every day perishing, because thou art here dwelling in this solitude. Look to it, for God will require an account at thy hands: thou hast the charge of defending them, and thou lettest them die. And tell us what course we shall take. And when the King heard these words he was moved to compassion: and the tears came into his eyes, so that he could not restrain them; and he was in such state that he thought that he was going to die, and was simply made to apply to any thing that they could say. And all these companies who saw him complained so much the more, and sent forth great cries, and made a great tumult and uproar; and said, O miserable King, why wilt thou not rouse thyself for thy own

And, that the holy was sign, that it was his will that he should be able not to yield, he learnt to such meekness that he will not be able to obey, by reason of the great abstinence to which his body has been subjected during his continuance there. And the holy man said to me, Care not for this, for God will give you strength; and then shall say to him for a sign that he may believe thee, how I told him that he should take heed lest the enemy deceive him, and how I told the Devil depart from the altar where he was in the ark instead of the Corpus Christi, for that he should adore him. When thou testest him this he will believe thee, and will understand that it is by the command of God. And when he had said these words he disappeared, so that I saw him no more; and I realized it was a full hour, being greatly comforted, because I knew of your life, so that it seemed to me there were no other glory in this world. And when I came to myself I went inconveniently to my father Count Don Julian, and told him all that had befallen me with the serpent that he had caused to be made, and I asked him if he knew aught concerning you. And he told me how he had gone to you with all his chirality to bid you come out from thence to defend your country, which the enemies had taken from you, and that you would not; but father command him it to him that he should make you to go and defend the land and govern it, and that it grieved him to think that you would not be alive, because of the great abstinence which you imposed every day upon your flesh; nevertheless, since it pleased our Lord that I should have a son by you, who had been so to be good a son, as I had to him, he would have me go to this place, where I should find you if you were alive; and right content would be thee, that there should remain of you so great good. And I, sir King, seeing how it pleased God that this should be accomplished, according as I have said, am come here in secret, for neither man nor woman knoweth of this, save my father Count Don Julian; for I have told my people who came with me to remain yonder, because I would go and confess to a holy man who had made his abode here more than fifty years. Now, said I, when I have gone away from this house I will tell you the time when you told me that there was nothing in the world which you loved so much as me, nor which you desired so greatly as to obtain a promise of me, the which I could not give at that hour, by reason that the Queen was living, and I knew it to be good she should have more children, for the command of God, for it please him to send me here; and, also, because the Queen is no longer in this present life. And because you are so fallen away of your strength, let us go out into the hermitage, or I will order a tent to be placed here, and let us sup together, that your heart may revive and you may fulfill the command of God.

Ch. 235. — How the Devil would have deceived King Don Rodrigo, if the Holy Spirit had not visited and protected him.

As the King heard all this, his whole body began to tremble, and his soul within him also; and all sense and power passed away from him, so that he was in a trance, and then it was revealed to him that he should take heed against that temptation. And the false Cava, who saw him thus consumed, made many burning torches of wax come there, by reason that it was cold, and because that the King should derive heat; also there was a pavilion pitched there, and a table set within it with many viands thereon, and all the people who came with her were set afar upon it. And so it was that he recovered himself, but he saw that the false Cava was drest in a close-fitting kirtle, which came half-way before the knee, and she seemed to him the fairest woman that he had ever seen in his life, and it appeared to the King that she said to him, Here, sir, come...
And take your supper. And the King began again to trouble and lose his judgment, and fell into such a state that he knew not where he was, and it was revealed to him in that hour that he should guard against the temptation. And when he came to himself he saw that the pavilion was spread over his head; and the carpet was spread in all places, but the door was open, and perceived that it was where it used to be; and within the pavilion he saw the false Cava, who was there with him, and that she was standing beside a bed, which was a full rich one, and that she began to take off her kirtle, and remained in her shift only, and with her long hair, which reached to her feet; and he said to her, See, sir, here is your power that you most desired, and which is now awaiting you. Rejoice, then, and take heart, and do that which God has appointed, and which will recover Spain, and recompense the losses, and sorrows and wrongs, which you have endured. And then she turned toward the King, for the Devil thought thus to tempt him, and make him break the penance which he had begun; and certes I ween there was no living man who would not right ghastly have approached her. And then before him, in his sight, he began to comb and to plait her golden locks. And the King, seeing how beautiful she was, began to tremble all over, as if he had been struck with palsy; and he lost his judgment again, and became entangled, and remained thus a long while before he came again to himself. And it was revealed to him that she should try how the Devil tempted him, and that he should have firm hope in God, and not break the penance which the holy Hermit had appointed him. But ever when he recovered from these trances, he forgot all which had been revealed to him while he was entangled, and when he found himself he was a large blister placed by him, and that La Cava was lying there beside him on some pillows, which were richly wrought in gold, under, as he had seen her, and that she said to him, Come, sir, for you tarry long, and it will soon be day-break. And the King seeing her so near him, then he was greatly troubled, yet could he not move his eyes from her, and he called her, and said how the Holy Spirit of God had bade him that he should always confide in his name, and place his true hope in the sign of the cross. And he clasped his hands, and lifted them towards Heaven, and weeping bitterly, and in great consternation, he said, O Lord and very God Jesus Christ, deliver me from all temptation, and preserve my soul, that it fall not into perdition. And while he was praying thus, he saw how there came from the hermitage a great brightness, and he said, Deliver me, Lord, from the power of the Devil, that I may not be deceived nor withdrawn from thy holy service. And at that hour he made the sign of the cross upon his forehead, and blest himself; and at that hour the false Cava fell down the rock into the sea, with such a sound as if the whole world were falling to pieces, and with the plunge which she made there was a flash of light, and the King was wetted with the spray. And he remained in such astonishment that he could not for an hour recover himself. And when he came to himself he began to pray with great reverence, as if he had been on the point of falling into temptation. And the Holy Spirit of God came to him in that same manner in which he had seen it the former time. And he fell on his face upon the ground, and began to lament full bitterly, and to say, Lord, have mercy upon my soul, and forsake me not among mine enemies, who would withdraw me from the holy service of thy holy name. And at that hour he saw how the Devil said to him, on the point of perishing! And the King made no reply, for he did nothing but weep. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, Take heed, King, lest the Devil deceive thee, and have power over thee, that thou shouldst not fulfils the penance which thou hast commenced, neither save thy soul. And the King lifted up his countenance, and had great shame to behold him. Howbeit he took courage, and said, Lord, have mercy upon me, and let me be tempted by the enemy, for my heart is weak, and hath no power; but give me, O King, of this faith, from that day henceforth, how that thou hast been on the point of perishing! And the King made no reply, for he did nothing but weep. And the Holy Spirit of God said to him, Take courage and fear not, that thou shalt depart from this place sooner than thou thinkest. And when it is time I will guide thee to the place, from where thou shalt do thy penance, that thy soul may receive salvation. When thou hast seen a white cloud appear above thee, and that there is no other in the sky, follow after it; and in the place where it shall stop thou shalt fulfils thy penance, according as the chief priest in that place shall appoint it thee. And take heart, and always call to mind this, that thou hast a constant hope in thy Savior. And when he had said this he departed. And the King was greatly comforted and full of grace, as one with whom God was present in his mercy. And he bore in the hermitage a whole year, according to his reckoning, and twelve days more, when it was full clear, the King looked up and saw above him the cloud of which the Holy Spirit of God had told him; and when he saw it he was full joyful, and gave many thanks to God. Nevertheless the King did not rise from his prayers, neither did the cloud move from above him. And when he had finished his prayers he looked at the cloud and saw that it moved forward.

Ch. 253. — How King Don Rodrigo departed from the hermitage, and arrived where he was to do penance.

"The King arose from the oratory and followed the cloud; and so great was the pleasure which he had, that he cared not for food, neither remembered it, but went after that his holy guide. And he saw how the cloud was about to set, turned to the right of the road toward the mountains; and it went on so far, that before night had closed it came to a hermitage, in which there was a good man for a Hermite, over more than ninety years of age, and there it stoppeth. And the King perceived that this was there, and the good man welcomed the King, and they spake together of many things. And the King was well contented with his speech, and saw that certes he was a servant of God. And all that day the King had not eaten, and he was barefoot, and his raiment tattered; and he had not been used to travel, and with his feet bare, his eyes were swollen with blisters. And when it was an hour after night, the Hermite gave him a loath, full small, which was made of ree, and there were ashes kneaded with it, and the King ate it; and when he had eaten they said prayers. And when they had said their prayers, they lay down to sleep. And when it was midnight they arose and said their hours; and when they had said them the King went out of the hermitage, and saw that the cloud did not move: and then the King understood that he had to tarry here, or that he was to live a convent, and cast himself upon the Hermite to hear his confession, and the Hermite confessed him. And when he had confessed, he said that he would communicate, and the good Hermite saw that it was good, and he put on his vestments and said mass; and the King heard the mass, and received communion. And when the King was done, he went out to look at the cloud. And as he went out of the hermitage he saw that the cloud began to move, and then he dispensèd himself from the Hermite, and they embraced each other weeping, and each treated the other, that he would hear him in mind, and remember him in his prayers. And when the King had dispensèd himself, he followed after his holy guide, and the holy Hermite returned to his hermitage. And the King Don Rodrigo, notwithstanding his feet were swollen and full of blisters, and his raiment tattered, was not ashamed to follow after the cloud, and he said that he would do as he should direct him. And the Abbot ordered that a loaf should be brought of pannick and maize mixed together, and a jar of water, and on the other side he had food placed such as the monks had used; and the King Don Rodrigo said to him, He had been wont to do, and he drank of the water. And when he had eaten, the Abbot asked him if he would remain that night or not, and the King said that he knew not, but that he would go out and see whether he were to go or to remain. And the Abbot said that it was the hour of vespers, and that he could not remain; and the King and the Abbot and all saw that the cloud moved, and that it behoved him to go, and he dispeeded himself from the Abbot, and they commented themselves each to the other in his prayers. And the Abbot saw plainly how that cloud had guided him, and how there was no other in the sky, and he marvelled greatly, and said, Certes this is some holy man, and he gave thanks to God. And the King went on that evening till he came to a church which was solitary and remote from populated places; and there the cloud stopped, and he abode there that night. And the King went into the church, and found in it a lamp burning, and it rejoiced him much, for by the light of it he saw his hours as well before he should sleep as after. And on the morrow when he had made his prayer, he went out of the church and beheld the cloud, and saw that it moved; and he went after it, and after two days' journey he came to a place where it is, or what it is called, is not said, save that it is the place of his burial, for such it is. And there the cloud stopped, and proceeded no further; and it rested without the town over an ancient hermitage. And the Elder of that place incontinent knew by the Holy Spirit how King Don Rodrigo was come there; but he knew not his name, neither who he was; and he asked him if he meant to lead his life there, and he answered that it was to be as God should pleased. And the Elder said to him, Friend, I am the Elder of this place, for all the others, when they saw him, did not know him, nor saw his shew, nor was nigh and vanished, fled from hence for fear of the Moors, and of the traitor Count Don Julian, and they all went to the mountains to escape. And I remained, putting my trust in our Lord God, and in his holy hands; for that I would rather abide thus than to have them give me grace and pardon and be confounded together, and utterly forsake our mother holy church; while I am able I will remain here and not forsake it, but rather receive my death. And therefore I say, that if you are to abide here you must provide you of that wherewith you have need. And the King said, Friend of God, concerning your testimony I cannot certify you; though surely I think that I shall abide; and if for the service of God you will be pleased to send me every day that I remain a loaf of pannick and water, I shall be contented therewith. And the Elder promised this, and departed forthwith and went to his home, and sent him a loaf of pannick and water. And the cloud remained there three days over that hermitage, and when the three days were at an end, it was seen no more. And the King, when he could no longer see it, understood that there must perform his pleasure, and that he must take his departure. And the Elder proceeded, that he should not forsake his abode, and his poor and his brethren, and his hearers, and his deacons; and he went on his way, Troubled that no man knew it, save only the King and the Elder. And when it was day he break the Elder went to the church and said mass, with many tears and with great devotion beseeching God that he would have mercy and compassion upon King Don Rodrigo, that with great solace and comfort and grace he might complete his penance in this manner, which was for his service. And when he had said mass, he went to the place where King Don Rodrigo lay, and asked him how he fared, and the King answered, Well, thanks to God, and better than he deserved, but as yet he was as just as when we went in. And the Elder strengthened him as much as he could, telling him that he should call to mind how he had been a sinner, and that he should give thanks to our Lord God, for that he had visited him in this world, and delivered him from many temptations, and all the evil that he had known, and he should suffer and take with patience, for soon he would be in heavenly glory. And the King said to him, that he well knew how according to his great sins he merited a stronger pence; but that he gave many thanks to our Lord Jesus, for that he himself had given him this pence, which he did receive and take with great patience; and he besought the Elder that he would continue to pray our Lord God that he would let him fulfil it. And the Elder said to him many good things about our Lord God. The King lay there three days, during all which time the serpent would not seize on him. And when the third day, after that he had gone into the tomb, was completed, the serpent rose from his side, and crept upon his belly and his breast, and began with the one head to eat at his nature, and with the other straight toward his heart. And at this time the Elder came to him and asked him how he fared, and he said, Well, thanks to God, for now the serpent had beguiled to eat. And the Elder asked him at what place, and he answered at two, one right against the heart with which he had conceived all the lies that he had done, and the other at his nature, the which had been the cause of the great destruction of Spain. And the Elder said that God was with him, and exhorted him that he should be of good courage, for now all his persecutions both of the body and of the soul would have an end. And the King cast not always to demand us that things are said to be of God, he would be pleased to forgive him. And the Elder went to his home, and would not send himself to eat, but retired into his chamber, and weeping, prayed devoutly to our Lord that he would give strength to the King that he might complete his penance. And the serpent, as he was dying for longer, and moreover was large, had in one minute eaten the nature, and began to eat at the bowels; nevertheless he did not eat so fast, but that the King endured in that torment an hour before night till it was past the middle of the day. And when the serpent broke through the web of the heart, he said there and at no further. And incessantly the King gave up his spirit to our Lord, who by his holy mercy took him into his glory. And at that hour when he expired all the bells of the place rang of themselves as if men had rung them. Then the Elder knew that the King was dead, and that his soul was saved.11

Thomas Newton, in his 12 Notable History of the Saracens,13 seems to imagine that this story is allegorical. 14 Nove,15 he says,16 whereas it is reported, and written that he followed a stare or a messenger of God, which conducted and guided him in his way; it may be so, and the sane hath also happened to others; but it may as well also be understood of a certaine secrette stare moving and directing his will. 17 And whereas they say he was put by that holy man into a cave or hole, and a serpent with him that had two heads, which in two days' space gnawed all the flesh off his body from the bones; this, being simple taken and understood, hath no likelihood of any truth. For what sanctity, what religion, or what pietie, commandeth to kill a penitent person, and one that seeketh comfort of his afflicted mind by amendment of life, with such horrible torments and strange punishment? Wherefore I would rather think it to be spoken mysteriously, and that the serpent with two heads signifieth his sinful and gyty conscience.18

A humble tomb was found. — XXV. p. 709, col. 2.

How Carestes found the grave of King Don Rodrigo at Visco in Portugal.

19 If, Carestes, vassel of King Don Alfonso of Leon, son-in-law of the Knight of God, King Don Pelayo, when he said King Don Alfonso won Viseo from the Moors who held it, found a grave in a field, upon the which were written in Gothic letters, the words which you shall here read. This grave was in front of a little church, without the town of Visco, and the superscription of the writing was thus:

Of the writing which was upon the grave of King Don Rodrigo.

20 Here lies King Don Rodrigo, the last of the Goths. Cursed be the wrath of the traitor Julian, for it was of long endurance, and cursed be his anger, for it was unbridled and evil, for he was mad with rage, and sanguinely with pride, and puffed up with folly, and void of loyalty, and unmindful of the laws, and a despair thereof; cruel in himself, a slayer of his lord, a destroyer of his country, a traitor to his countrymen; bitter in his name; and it is as grief and sorrow in the mouth of him who pronounces it; and it shall always be cursed by all that speak of him.19

That voracious chronicler Carestes then enrothles his true history in these words: — 21 And by this which I found written upon this grave, I am of mind that King Don Rodrigues lies there, and because of the life which he led in his pietie, according as ye have heard, which also was in the same tomb written in a book of parchment, I believe without doubt that it is true, and because of the great pietie which he did, that God was pleased to make it known in such manner as it past, for those who hereafter shall have to rule and govern, to the end that all men may see how true pride is abused and humility exalted. This Chronicle is composed in memory of the noble King Don Rodrigo; that God pardon his sins, and that the son of the Virgin without stain, Jesus Christ, bring us to true repentance, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever. Amen.

Thanks be to God! 22

I believe the Archbishop Roderick of Tabelo is the earliest writer who mentions this discovery. He died in 1247. The fact may very possibly have been true, for there seems to have been no intention of setting up a shrine connected with it. The archbishop's words are as follow: —

Æqual de Rege Rodericen accidenta ignotarum; tamem corona vestes et insignia et calcamenta auro et lapidibus adornata, et eussip qui Oratio dictatur, in loco tenuale juxta Sanctum eius corpore sunt inventae. Quid autem de corpore fuerit factum pesti ter ignoratur, quia quod modernissima temporibus apud Viscom civitatem Poringiaria inscripta tamen inventur, Hic jacet Rodericus ultimus Rex Gothorum. Muteditas feror impious Juliani quia pertinax, et indignitatem, quia est; animosus vindicta, impetuosus furor, obitus faciundus, immorci religiosis, contemptor divinitatis, crudelis in se, humilis in dominius, hostis in domesticis, valetur in patrum, reus in aures, memoriae ejus in omni are amovens, et eorum ejus in aternum pius est. — Tol. Tol. f. 3, g. 19.

Lope de Vega has made this epistle, with its accompanying reflections, into two stanzas of Latin rhymes, which occur in the midst of one of his long poems: —

Iher juget in sarcophago Rex ille
Prisculissimus Gothorum in Hispania,
Infelix Rodericus; visor iil,
Ne forte parent tota laudatio,
Provoctsus Cupiditis misilae
Telo, tam magis affecetus fus inanis
Quam tota Almeria vinculis astricta
Testatur meite, testimntor victa.

Excerobiliu Comites Julianum
Abhorrunt omnes, noniae et remota
Patrius, appellent Eravrtatum Hispanum,
Nec tantum vestri, sed in arbe tota.
Dum corrent cali sidera, resumum
Vesperam, testante Mauro et Gotho,
Cesset Floruniae nomen inanize,
Cura visitor aut, a Cura cave.

The Poet's Pilgrimage to Waterloo.

ARGUMENT.

The first part of this Poem describes a journey to the scene of war. The second is in an allegorical form; it exposes the gross material philosophy which has been the guiding principle of the French politicians, from Mirabeau to Bonaparte; and it states the opinions of those persons who lament the restoration of the Bourbons, because the hopes which they entertained from the French Revolution have not been realized; and of those who see only evil, or blind chance, in the course of human events.

To the Christian philosopher all things are consistent and clear. Our first parents brought with them the light of natural religion and the moral law; as men departed from these, they tended towards barbarous and savage life; large portions of the world are in this degenerated state; still, upon the great scale, the human race, from the beginning, has been progressive. But the direct object of Bonaparte was to establish a military despotism wherever his power extended; and the immediate and inevitable consequence of such a system is to brutalize and degrade mankind. The contest in which this country was engaged against that Tyrant, was a struggle between good and evil principles; and never was there a victory so important to the best hopes of human nature as that which was won by British valour at Waterloo, - its effects extending over the whole civilized world, and involving the vital interests of all mankind.

That victory leaves England in security and peace. In no age, and in no country, has man ever existed under circumstances so favorable to the full development of his moral and intellectual faculties, as in England at this time. The peace which she has won by the battle of Waterloo, leaves her at leisure to pursue the great objects and duties of bettering her own condition, and diffusing the blessings of civilization and Christianity.

PROEM.

1. Once more I see thee, Skiddaw! once again Behold thee in thy majesty serene, Where, like the bulwark of this favor'd plain, Alone thou standest, monarch of the scene - Thou glorious Mountain, on whose ample breast The sunbeams love to play, the vapors love to rest!

2. Once more, O Derwent, to thy awful shores I come, insatiate of the accustom'd sight, And, listening as the eternal torrent roars, Drink in with eye and ear a fresh delight; For I have wander'd far by land and sea, In all my wanderings still remembering thee.

3. Twelve years, (how large a part of man's brief day?!) Nor idly nor ingloriously spent, Of evil and of good have held their way, Since first upon thy banks I pitch'd my tent. Hither I came in manhood's active prime, And here my head hath felt the touch of time.

4. Heaven hath with goodly increase blest me here, Where childless and oppress'd with grief I came
With voice of fervent thankfulness sincere
Let me the blessings which are mine proclaim:
Here I possess—what more should I require?—
Books, children, leisure,—all my heart's desire.

5.
O joyous hour, when o'er our longing home
The long-expected wheels at length drew nigh!
When the first sound went forth, "They come,
They come!"
And hope's impatience quicken'd every eye!
"Never had man whom Heaven would heap with bliss
More glad return, more happy hour than this."

6.
Aloft on yonder bench, with arms dispread,
My boy stood, shouting there his father's name,
Waving his hat around his happy head;
And there, a younger group, his sisters came:
Smiling they stood with looks of pleased surprise,
While tears of joy were seen in elder eyes.

7.
Soon each and all came crowding round to share
The cordial greeting, the beloved sight;
What welcomings of hand and lip were there!
And when those overflowings of delight
Subsided to a sense of quiet bliss,
Life hath no purer, deeper happiness.

8.
The young companion of our weary way
Found here the end desired of all her ills;
She who, in sickness pining many a day,
Hunger'd and thirsted for her native hills,
Forgetful now of sufferings past and pain,
Rejoiced to see her own dear home again.

9.
Recover'd now, the homesick mountaineer
Sat by the playmate of her infancy,
Her twin-like comrade,—reader'd doubly dear
For that long absence: full of life was she,
With voluble discourse and eager mien
Telling of all the wonders she had seen.

10.
Here silently between her parents stood
My dark-eyed Bertha, timid as a dove;
And gently oft from time to time she woud
Pressure of hand, or word, or look of love,
With impulse shy of bashful tenderness,
Soliciting again the wish'd caress.

11.
The younger twain, in wonder lost were they,
My gentle Kate, and my sweet Isabel:
Long of our promised coming, day by day,
It had been their delight to hear and tell;
And now, when that long-promised hour was come,
Surprise and wakening Memory held them dumb.

12.
For in the infant mind, as in the old,
When to its second childhood life declines,
A dim and troubled power doth Memory hold:
But soon the light of young Remembrance shines
Renew'd, and influences of dormant love,
Waken'd within, with quickening influence more.

13.
O happy season theirs, when absence brings
Small feeling of privation, none of pain,
Yet at the present object love re-springs,
As night-closed flowers at morn expand again!
Nor deem our second infancy unblest,
When gradually composed we sink to rest.

14.
Soon they grew blithe as they were wont to be;
Her old endearments each began to seek:
And Isabel drew near to climb my knee,
And put with fondling hand her father's cheek;
With voice, and torch, and look, reviving thus
The feelings which had slept in long disuse.

15.
But there stood one whose heart could entertain
And comprehend the fulness of the joy;
The father, teacher, playmate, was again
Come to his only and his studious boy:
And he beheld again that mother's eye
Which with such ceaseless care had watch'd his infancy.

16.
Bring forth the treasures now,—a proud display,—
For rich as Eastern merchants we return!
Behold the black Beguine, the Sister gray,
The Friars whose heads with sober motion turn,
The Ark well-fill'd with all its numerous hives,
Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japhet, and their wives;—

17.
The tumbler, loose of limb; the wrestlers twain;
And many a toy beside of quaint device,
Which, when his fleecy troops no more can gain
Their pasture on the mountains hoar with ice,
The German shepherd carves with curious knife,
Earning in easy toil the food of frugal life.

18.
It was a group which Richter, had he view'd,
Might have deem'd worthy of his perfect skill;
The keen impatience of the younger brood,
Their eager eyes and fingers never still;
The hope, the wonder, and the restless joy
Of those glad girls and that vociferous boy!—

19.
The aged friend serene with quiet smile,
Who in their pleasure finds her own delight;
The mother's heart-felt happiness the while;
The aunts, rejoicing in the joyful sight;
And he who, in his gayety of heart,
With glib and noisy tongue perform’d the show-man’s part.

20.
Scoff ye who will! but let me, gracious Heaven,
Preserve this boyish heart till life’s last day!
For so that inward light by Nature given
Shall still direct, and cheer me on my way,
And, brightening as the shades of age descend,
Shine forth with heavenly radiance at the end.

21.
This was the morning light vouchsaf’d, which led
My favor’d footsteps to the Muses’ hill,
Whose arduous paths I have not ceased to tread,
From good to better persevering still;
And if but self-approved, to praise or blame
Indifferent, while I toil for lasting fame.

22.
And, O ye nymphs of Castaly divine!
Whom I have dutifully served so long,
Benignant to your votary now incline,
That I may win your ear with gentle song,
Such as, I ween, is ne’er disown’d by you,—
A low, prelusive strain, to nature true.

23.
But when I reach at themes of loftier thought,
And tell of things surpassing earthly sense,
(Which by yourselves, O Muses, I am taught,)—
Then aid me with your fuller influence,
And to the height of that great argument,
Support my spirit in her strong ascent!

24.
So may I boldly round my temples bind
The laurel which my master Spenser wore;
And free in spirit as the mountain wind
That makes my symphony, in this lone hour,
No perishable song of triumph raise,
But sing in worthy strains my Country’s praise.

PART I.

THE JOURNEY.

Τὰν παλικαρίαν γὰρ
Οὐχ ἄκατον Ὠσί.....ESCHYLUS.

1.

FLANDERS.

Our world hath seen the work of war’s debate
Consummated in one momentous day
Twice in the course of time; and twice the fate
Of unborn ages hung upon the fray:

First at Platae, in that awful hour
When Greece united smote the Persian’s power.

2.
For had the Persian triumph’d, then the spring
Of knowledge from that living source had ceased
All would have fallen before the barbarous King,
Art, Science, Freedom; the despotic East,
Setting her mark upon the race subdived,
Had stamp’d them in the mould of sensual servitude.

3.
The second day was that when Martel broke
The Mussulmen, delivering France oppress’d,
And in one mighty conflict, from the yoke
Of believing Mecca saved the West;
Else had the Imposter’s law destroy’d the ties
Of public weal and private charities.

4.
Such was the danger when that Man of Blood
Burst from the iron Isle, and brought again,
Like Satan rising from the sulphurous flood,
His impious legions to the battle plain:
Such too was our deliverance when the field
Of Waterloo beheld his fortunes yield.

5.
I, who, with faith unshaken from the first,
Even when the Tyrant seem’d to touch the skies,
Had look’d to see the high-blown bubble burst,
And for a fall conspicuous as his rise,
Even in that faith had look’d not for defeat
So swift, so overwhelming, so complete.

6.
Me most of all men it behooved to raise
The strain of triumph for this fee subdued,
To give a voice to joy, and in my lays
Exalt a nation’s hyman of gratitude,
And blazon forth in song that day’s renown,—
For I was graced with England’s laurel crown.

7.
And as I once had journey’d to behold,
Far off, Onirique’s consecrated field,
Where Portugal, the faithful and the bold,
Assumed the symbols of her sacred shield,
More reason now that I should bend my way
The field of British glory to survey.

8.
So forth I set upon this pilgrimage,
And took the partner of my life with me,
And one dear girl just ripe enough of age
Retentively to see what I should see;
That thus, with mutual recollections fraught,
We might bring home a store for after-thought.

9.
We left our pleasant Land of Lakes, and went
Throughout whole England’s length, a weary way,
Even to the farthest shores of eastern Kent:
Embarking there upon an autumn day,
Toward Ostend we held our course all night,
And anchor'd by its quay at morning's earliest light.

10.
Small vestige there of that old siege appears,
And little of remembrance would be found,
When, for the space of three long, painful years,
The persevering Spaniard girt it round,
And gallant youths, of many a realm from far,
Went students to that busy school of war.

11.
Yet still those wars of obstinate defence
Their lessons offer to the soldier's hand;
Large knowledge may the statesman draw from thence;
And still from underneath the drifted sand
Sometimes the storm, or passing foot, lays bare
Part of the harvest Death has gather'd there.

12.
Peace be within thy walls, thou famous town,
For thy brave bearing in those times of old;
May plentiful industrious children crown,
And prosperous merchants day by day behold
Many a rich vessel, from the injurious sea,
Enter the bosom of thy quiet quay.

13.
Embarking there, we glided on between
Strait banks raised high above the level land,
With many a cheerful dwelling, white and green,
In goodly neighborhood on either hand.
Huge-timber'd bridges o'er the passage lay,
Which wheel'd aside and gave us easy way.

14.
Four horses, aided by the flavoring breeze,
Drew our gay vessel, slow, and sleek, and large;
Crack goes the whip; the steersman at his ease
Directs the way, and steady went the barge.
Ere evening closed, to Bruges thus we came,—
Fair city, worthy of her ancient fame.

15.
The season of her splendor is gone by,
Yet every where its monuments remain—
Temples which rear their stately heads on high,
Canals that intersect the fertile plain,
Wide streets and squares, with many a court and hall
Spacious and undefaced, but ancient all.

16.
Time hath not wrong'd her, nor hath Ruin sought
Rudely her splendid structures to destroy,
Save in those recent days, with evil fraught,
When Mutability, in drunken joy
Triumphant, and from all restraint released,
Let loose the fierce and many-headed beast.

17.
But for the scars in that unhappy rage
Inflicted, firm she stands and undecay'd;

Like our first sirs', a beautiful old age
Is hers, in venerable years array'd;
And yet to her benignant stars may bring,
What fate denies to man,—a second spring.

18.
When I may read of tilts in days of old,
And tourneys graced by chieftains of renown,
Fair dames, grave citizens, and warriors bold,
If Fancy would portray some stately town,
Which for such pomp fit theatre should be,
Fair Bruges, I shall then remember thee.

19.
Nor did thy landscape yield me less delight,
Seen from the deck as slow it glided by,
Or when beneath us, from thy Belfroy's height,
Its boundless circle met the bending sky;
The waters smooth and straight, thy proper boast,
And lines of road-side trees in long perspective lost.

20.
No happier landscape may on earth be seen,
Rich gardens all around and fruitful groves,
White dwellings trim relieved with lively green,
The pollard that the Flemish painter loves,
With aspens tall and poplars fair to view,
Casting o'er all the land a gray and willowy hue.

21.
My lot hath lain in scenes sublime and rude,
Where still devoutly I have served and sought
The Power divine which dwells in solitude.
In boyhood was I wont, with rapture fraught,
Amid those rocks and woods to wander free,
Where Avon hastens to the Severn sea.

22.
In Cintra also have I dwelt erewhile,
That earthly Eden, and have seen at eve
The sea-mists, gathering round its mountain pile,
Whelm with their billows all below, but leave
One pinnacle sole seen, whereon it stood
Like the Ark on Ararat, above the flood.

23.
And now am I a Cumbrian mountaineer;
Their wintry garment of unsullied snow
The mountains have put on, the heavens are clear,
And you dark lake spreads silently below;
Who sees them only in their summer hour
Sees but their beauties half, and knows not half their power.

24.
Yet hath the Flemish scene a charm for me
That soothes and wins upon the willing heart;
Though all is level as the sleeping sea,
A natural beauty springs from perfect art,
And something more than pleasure fills the breast,
To see how well-directed toil is blest.

25.
Two nights have past; the morning opens well;
Fair are the aspects of the favoring sky;
THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

26. Beside the busy wharf the Trekschuit rides,
With painted plumes and tent-like awning gay;
Carts, barrows, coaches, hurry from all sides,
And passengers and porters throng the way,
Contending all at once in clamorous speech,—
French, Flemish, English,—each confusing each.

27. All disregardant of the Babel sound,
A swan kept oaring near with upraised eye,—
A beauteous pensioner, who daily found
The bounty of such casual company;
Nor left us till the bell said all was done,
And slowly we our watery way begun.

28. Europe can boast no richer, goodlier scene,
Than that through which our pleasant passage lay,
By fertile fields and fruitful gardens green,
The journey of a short autumnal day;
Sleek, well-fed steeds our steady vessel drew;
The heavens were fair, and Mirth was of our crew.

29. Along the smooth canal's unbending line,
Beguiling time with light discourse, we went,
Nor wanting savory food nor generous wine.
Ashore, too, there was feast and merriment;
The jovial peasants at some village fair
Were dancing, drinking, smoking, gambling there.

30. Of these, or of the ancient towers of Ghent
Renown'd, I must not tarry now to tell;
Of picture, or of church, or monument;
Nor how we mounted to that ponderous bell,
The Belfroy's boast, which bears old Roland's name,
Nor yields to Oxford Tom, or Tom of Lincoln's fame;—

31. Nor of that sisterhood whom to their rule
Of holy life no hasty vows restrain,
Who, meek disciples of the Christian school,
Watch by the bed of sickness and of pain:
Oh what a strength divine doth Faith impart
To inborn goodness in the female heart!

32. A gentle party from the shores of Kent
Thus far had been our comrades, as befell;
Fortune had link'd us first, and now Consul,—
(For why should Choice divide whom Chance so well
Had join'd?) and they to view the famous ground,
Like us, were to the Field of Battle bound.

33. Farther as yet they look'd not than that quest,—
The land was all before them where to choose.
So we consorted here as seemed best;
Who would such pleasant fellowship refuse
Of ladies fair and gentle comrades free?
Certes we were a joyous company.

34. Yet lack'd we not discourse for graver times,
Such as might suit sage auditors, I ween;
For some among us, in far distant climes
The cities and the ways of men had seen;
No unobservant travellers they, but well
Of what they there had learnt they knew to tell.

35. The one of frozen Moscovy could speak,
And well his willing listeners entertain
With tales of that inclement region bleak,
The pageantry and pomp of Catherine's reign,
And that proud city, which with wise intent
The mighty founder raised, his own great monument.

36. And one had dwelt with Malabar and Moors,
Where fertile earth and genial heaven dispense
Profuse their bounty upon Indian shores;
Whate'er delights the eye, or charms the sense,
The valleys with perpetual fruitage bless'd,
The mountains with unfading foliage dress'd.

37. He those barbaric palaces had seen,
The work of Eastern potentates of old;
And in the Temples of the Rock had been,
Awe-struck their dread recesses to behold;
A gifted hand was his, which by its skill
Could to the eye portray such wondrous scenes at will.

38. A third, who from the Land of Lakes with me
Went out upon this pleasant pilgrimage,
Had sojourn'd long beyond the Atlantic sea;
Adventurous was his spirit as his age,
For he in far Brazil, through wood and waste,
Had travell'd many a day, and there his heart was placed.

39. Wild region, — happy if at night he found
The shelter of some rude Tapuya's shed,
Else would he take his lodgment on the ground,
Or from the tree suspend his handy bed;
And sometimes, starting at the jaguar's cries,
See through the murky night the prowler's fiery eyes.

40. And sometimes over thirsty deserts drear,
And sometimes over flooded plains he went;—
A joy it was his fireside tales to hear,
And he a comrade to my heart's content:
For he of what I most desired could tell, [well.
And loved the Portugals because he knew them

41.
Here to the easy barge we bade adieu;
Land-travellers now along the well-paved way,
Where road-side trees still lengthening on the view,
Before us and behind unvarying lay:
Through lands well labor'd to Abost we came,
Where whilome treachery stain'd the English name.

42.
Then saw we Afflighem, by ruin rent,
Whose venerable fragments strow the land;
Grown wise too late, the multitude lament
The ravage of their own unhappy hand;
Its records in their frenzy torn and lost,
Its precious stores of learning wreck'd and lost.

43.
Whatever else we saw was cheerful all,
The signs of steady labor well repaid;
The grapes were ripe on every cottage wall,
And merry peasants seated in the shade
Of garner, or within the open door,
From gather'd hop-vines pluck'd the plenteous

44.
Through Assche, for water and for cakes renown'd,
We pass'd, pursuing still our way, though late;
And when the shades of night were closing round,
Brussels received us through her friendly gate,—
Proud city, fated many a change to see,
And now the seat of new-made monarchy.

II.

BRUSSELS.

1.
Where might a gayer spectacle be found
Than Brussels offer'd on that festive night,
Her squares and palaces irradiate round
To welcome the imperial Moscovite,
Who now, the wrongs of Europe twice redress'd,
Came there a welcome and a glorious guest?

2.
Her mile-long avenue with lamps was hung
Innumerous, which diffus'd a light like day;
Where, through the line of splendor, old and young
Paraded all in festival array;
While fiery barges, plying to and fro,
Illumin'd as they moved the liquid glass below.

3.
By day with hurrying crowds the streets were throng'd,
To gain of this great Czar a passing sight;
And music, dance, and banqueting prolong'd
The various work of pleasure through the night.

You might have deem'd, to see that joyous town,
That wretchedness and pain were there unknown.

4.
Yet three short months had scarcely pass'd away,
Since, shaken with the approaching battle's breath,
Her inmost chambers trembled with dismay;
And now, within her walls, insatiate Death,
Devourer whom no harvest e'er can fill,
The gleanings of that field was gathering still.

5.
Within those walls there linger'd at that hour
Many a brave soldier on the bed of pain,
Whom aid of human art should ne'er restore
To see his country and his friends again;
And many a victim of that fell debate
Whose life yet waver'd in the scales of fate.

6.
Some I beheld, for whom the doubtful scale
Had to the side of life inclined at length;
Enraged was their form, their features pale,
The limbs, so vigorous late, bereft of strength;
And for their gay habiliments of yore,
The habit of the House of Pain they wore.

7.
Some in the courts of that great hospital,
That they might taste the sun and open air,
Crawl'd out; or sat beneath the southern wall;
Or, leaning in the gate, stood gazing there
In listless guise upon the passers by,
Whiling away the hours of slow recovery.

8.
Others in wagons borne abroad I saw,
Albeit recovering, still a mournful sight:
Languid and helpless, some were stretch'd on straw;
Some, more advanced, sustain'd themselves upright,
And with bold eye and careless front, methought,
Seem'd to set wounds and death again at nought.

9.
Well had it fared with these; nor went it ill
With those whom war had of a limb bereft,
Leaving the life untouch'd, that they had still
Enough for health as for existence left;
But some there were who lived to draw the breath
Of pain through hopeless years of lingering death.

10.
Here might the hideous face of war be seen,
Stripp'd of all pomp, adornment, and disguise;
It was a dismal spectacle, I ween,
Such as might well to the beholders' eyes
Bring sudden tears, and make the pious mind
Grieve for the crimes and follies of mankind.

11.
What had it been, then, in the recent days
Of that great triumph, when the open wound
III.

THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

Was festering, and along the crowded ways,
Hour after hour, was heard the incessant sound
Of wheels, which o'er the rough and stony road
Convey'd their living, agonizing load!

12.

Hearts little to the melting mood inclined
Grew sick to see their sufferings; and the thought
Still comes with horror to the shuddering mind
Of those sad days when Belgian ears were taught
The British soldier's cry, half groan, half prayer,
Breathed when his pain is more than he can bear.

13.

Brave spirits, nobly had their part been done!
Brussels could show, where Senne's slow waters glide,
The cannon which their matchless valor won,
Proud trophies of the field, ranged side by side,
Where, as they stood in inoffensive row,
The solitary guard paced to and fro.

14.

Unconscious instruments of human woe,
Some for their mark the royal files bore,
Fix'd there where Britain was the Bourbon's foe; And some, emboss'd in brazen letters, wore
The sign of that abhor'd miracle, which broke
The guilty nation for a Tyrant's yoke.

15.

Others were stamp'd with that Usurper's name,—
Recorders thus of many a change were they,
Their deadly work through every change the same;
Nor ever had they seen a bloodier day,
Than when, as their late thunders roll'd around,
Brabant in all her cities felt the sound.

16.

Then ceased their occupation. From the field
Of battle here in triumph were they brought;
Ribbons and flowers, and laurels half conceal'd
Their brazen mouths, so late with ruin fraught;
Women beheld them pass with joyful eyes,
And children clapp'd their hands and rent the air with cries.

17.

Now idly on the banks of Senne they lay,
Like toys with which a child is pleased no more:
Only the British traveller bends his way
To see them on that unfrequented shore,
And, as a mournful feeling blends with pride,
Remembers those who fought, and those who died.

A horseman who in haste pursued his road
Would reach it as the second hour began.
The way is through a forest deep and wide,
Extending many a mile on either side.

2.

No cheerful woodland this of antick trees,
With thickets varied and with sunny glade;
Look where he will, the weary traveller sees
One gloomy, thick, impenetrable shade
Of tall, straight trunks, which move before his sight,
With interchange of lines of long green light.

3.

Here, where the woods, receding from the road,
Have left, on either hand, an open space
For fields and gardens, and for man's abode,
Stands Waterloo; a little, lowly place,
Obscure till now, when it hath risen to fame,
And given the victory its English name.

4.

What time the second Carlos ruled in Spain,
Last of the Austrian line by Fate decreed,
Here Castenaee reared a votive fane;
Praying the Patron Saints to bless with seed
His childless sovereign; Heaven denied an heir,
And Europe mourn'd in blood the frustrate prayer.

5.

That temple to our hearts was hallow'd now;
For many a wounded Briton there was laid,
With such poor help as time might then allow
From the fresh carnage of the field convey'd;
And they whom human succors could not save
Here in its precincts found a hasty grave.

6.

And here, on marble tablets set on high,
In English lines by foreign workmen traced,
Are names familiar to an English eye;
Their brethren here the fit memorials placed,
Whose unadorn'd inscriptions briefly tell
Their gallant comrades' rank, and where they fell.

7.

The stateliest monument of public pride,
Enrich'd with all magnificence of art,
To honor Chieftains who in victory died,
Would wake no stronger feeling in the heart
Than these plain tablets, by the soldier's hand
Raised to his comrades in a foreign land.

8.

Not far removed you find the burial-ground,
Yet so that skirts of woodland intervene;
A small enclosure, rudely fenced around;
Three grave-stones only for the dead are seen:
One bears the name of some rich villager,
The first for whom a stone was planted there.

9.

Beneath the second is a German laid,
Whom Bremen, shaking off the Frenchman's yoke,
Sent with her sons the general cause to aid;
He in the fight received his mortal stroke,
Yet for his country's aggrieved woes
Lived to see vengeance on her hated foes.

10.

A son of Erin sleeps below the third;
By friendly hands his body where it lay
Upon the field of blood had been interr'd,
And thence by those who mourn'd him borne away,
In pious reverence for departed worth,
Laid here with holy rites in consecrated earth.

11.

Repose in peace, brave soldiers, who have found
In Waterloo and Soigny's shade your rest! Ere this hath British valor made that ground
Sacred to you, and for your foes unhallow'd,
When Marlborough here, victorious in his might,
Surprised the French, and smote them in their flight.

12.

Those wars are as a tale of times gone by,
For so doth perishable fame decay,—
Here on the ground wherein the slaughter'd lie,
The memory of that fight is pass'd away;—
And even our glorious Blenheim to the field
Of Waterloo and Wellington must yield.

13.

Soon shall we reach that scene of mighty deeds,
In one unending line a short league hence;
Aright the forest from the road recedes,
With wide sweep trending south and westward thence;
Aleft along the line it keeps its place,
Some half hour's distance at a traveller's pace.

14.

The country here expands, a wide-spread scene;
No Flemish gardens fringed with willows these;
Nor rich Brabantine pastures ever green,
With trenches lined and rows of aspen trees;
In tillage here the unwooded, open land
Returns its increase to the farmer's hand.

15.

Behold the scene where Slaughter had full play!
A mile before us lieth Mount St. John,
The hamlet which the Highlanders that day
Preserved from spoil; yet as much farther on
The single farm is placed, now known to fame,
Which from the sacred hedge derives its name.

16.

Straight onward yet for one like distance more,
And there the house of Belle Alliance stands,
So named, I guess, by some in days of yore,
In friendship or in wedlock joining hands;
Little did they who call'd it thus foresee
The place that name should hold in history!

17.

Beyond these points the fight extended not—
Small theatre for such a tragedy!
Its breadth scarce more, from eastern Papelot
To where the groves of Hougoumont on high
Rear in the west their venerable head,
And cover with their shade the countless dead.

18.

But wouldst thou tread this celebrated ground,
And trace with understanding eyes a scene
Above all other fields of war renown'd,
From western Hougoumont thy way begin;
There was our strength on that side, and there first,
In all its force, the storm of battle burst.

19.

Strike eastward then across toward La Haye,
The single farm: with dead the fields between
Are line'd, and thou wilt see upon the way
Long wave-like dips and swells which intervene,
Such as would breathe the war-horse, and impede,
When that deep soil was wet, his martial speed.

20.

This is the ground whereon the young Nassau,
Emulating that day his ancestors' renown,
Received his hurt; admiring Belgium saw
The youth proved worthy of his destined crown:
All tongues his prowess on that day proclaim,
And children his praise and bless their Prince's name.

21.

When thou hast reach'd La Haye, survey it well;
Here was the heat and centre of the strife;
This point must Britain hold whate'er befell,
And here both armies were profuse of life:
Once it was lost,—and then a standby
Belike had trembled for the victory.

22.

Not so the leader, on whose equal mind
Such interests hung in that momentous day;
So well had he his motley troops assign'd,
That where the vital points of action lay,
There had he placed those soldiers whom he knew
No fears could quail, no dangers could subdue.

23.

Small was his British force, nor had he here
The Portuguese, in heart so near allied,
The worthy comrades of his late career,
Who fought so oft and conquer'd at his side,
When with the Red Cross join'd in brave advance.
The glorious Quinas mock'd the air of France.

24.

Now of the troops with whom he took the field,
Some were of doubtful faith, and others raw;
He station'd these where they might stand or yield;
But where the stress of battle he foresaw,
There were his links (his own strong words I speak)
And rivets, which no human force could break.
25. The poet's pilgrimage.

O my brave countrymen, ye answer'd well
To that heroic trust! Nor less did ye,
Whose worth your grateful country aye shall tell,
True children of our sister Germany,
Who, while she groan'd beneath the oppressor's chain,
Fought for her freedom in the fields of Spain.

26. La Haye, bear witness! sacred is it light,
And sacred is it truly from that day;
For never braver blood was spent in fight
Than Britain here hath mingled with the clay.
Set where thou wilt thy foot, thou scarce canst tread
Here on a spot unhallow'd by the dead.

27. Here was it that the Highlanders withstood
The tide of hostile power, received its weight
With resolute strength, and stemm'd and turn'd the flood;
And fitly here, as in that Grecian strait,
The funeral stone might say, Go, traveller, tell Scotland, that in our duty here we fell.

28. Still eastward from this point thy way pursue.
There grows a single hedge along the lane,—
No other is there far or near in view:
The raging enemy'sd in vain
To pass that line,—a braver foe withstood,
And this whole ground was moisten'd with their blood.

29. Leading his gallant men, as he was went,
The hot assailants' onset to repel,
Advancing hat in hand, here in the front
Of battle and of danger, Picton fell;
Lamented Chief! than whom no braver name
His country's annals shall consign to fame.

30. Scheldt had not seen us, had his voice been heard,
Return with shame from her disastrous coast:
But Fortune soon to fairer fields prefer'd
His worth approved, which Cambria long may boast:
France felt him then, and Portugal and Spain
His honor'd memory will for aye retain.

31. Hence to the high-wall'd house of Papelot,
The battle's boundary on the left, incline;
Here thou seest Frischemont not far remote,
From whence, like ministers of wrath divine,
The Prussians, issuing on the yielding foe,
Consummated their great and total overthrow.

32. Decem not that I the martial skill should boast,
Where horse and foot were station'd, here to tell,
What points were occupied by either host,
And how the battle raged, and what befell,
And how our great Commander's eagle eye,
Which comprehended all, secured the victory.

33. This were the historian's, not the poet's part;
Such task would ill the gentle Muse becometh,
Who, to the thoughtful mind and pious heart,
Comes with her offering from this awful theme;
Content if what she saw and gather'd there
She may in unambitious song declare.

34. Look how upon the Ocean's treacherous face
The breeze and summer sunshine softly play,
And the green-heaving billows bear no trace
Of all the wrath and wreck of yesterday;—
So from the field, which here we look'd upon,
The vestiges of dreadful war were gone.

35. Earth had received into her silent womb
Her slaughter'd creatures: horse and man they lay,
And friend and foe, within the general tomb.
Equal had been their lot; one fatal day
For all,—one labor,—and one place of rest
They found within their common parent's breast.

36. The passing seasons had not yet effaced
The stamp of numerous hoofs impress'd by force
Of cavalry, whose path might still be traced.
Yet Nature every where resumed her course;
Low pansies to the sun their purple gave,
And the soft poppy blossom'd on the grave.

37. In parts the careful farmer had renew'd
His labors, late by battle frustrated;
And where the unconscious soil had been imbued
With blood, profusely there like water shed,
There had his ploughshare turn'd the guilty ground,
And the green corn was springing all around.

38. The graves he left for natural thought humane
Untouch'd; and here and there, where in the strife
Contending feet had trampled down the grain,
Some harder roots were found, which of their life
Tenacious, had put forth a second head,
And sprung, and ear'd, and ripen'd on the dead.

39. Some marks of wreck were scatter'd all around,
As shoe, and belt, and broken bandoleer,
And hats which bore the mark of mortal wound;
Gun-flints and balls for those who closelier peer;
And sometimes did the breeze upon its breath
Bear from ill-cover'd graves a taint of death.
40. More vestige of destructive man was seen
Where man in works of peace had labor'd more;
At Hougoumont the hottest strife had been,
Where trees and walls the mournful record bore
Of war's wild rage, trunks pierced with many a wound,
And roofs and half-burnt rafters on the ground.

41. A goodly mansion this, with gardens fair,
And ancient groves and fruitful orchard wide,
Its dove-cot and its decent house of prayer,
Its ample stalls and garner's well supplied,
And spacious bartons clean, well-wall'd around,
Where all the wealth of rural life was found.

42. That goodly mansion on the ground was laid,
Save here and there a blacken'd, broken wall;
The wounded who were borne beneath its shade
Had there been crush'd and buried by the fall;
And there they lie, where they received their doom,—
Oh, let no hand disturb that honorable tomb!

43. Contiguous to this wreck, the little fane,
For worship hallow'd, still uninjured stands,
Save that its Crucifix displays too plain
The marks of outrage from irreverent hands.
Alas, to think such irreverent deed
Of wrong from British soldiers should proceed!

44. The dove-cot too remains; seared at the fight,
The birds sought shelter in the forest shade;
But still they kept their native haunts in sight,
And, when few days their terror had allay'd,
Forsook again the solitary wood,
For their old home and human neighborhood.

45. The gardener's dwelling was untouch'd; his wife
Fled with her children to some near retreat,
And there lay trembling for her husband's life:
He stood the issue, saw the foe's retreat,
And lives unhurt, where thousands fell around,
To tell the story of that famous ground.

46. His generous dog was well approved that hour,
By courage as by love to man allied;
He through the fiery storm and iron shower
Kept the ground bravely by his master's side;
And now, when to the stranger's hand he draws,
The noble beast seems conscious of applause.

47. Toward the grove, the wall with musket-holes
Is pierced; our soldiers here their station held
Against the foe; and many were the souls
Then from their fleshly tenements expell'd.
Six hundred Frenchmen have been burnt close by,
And underneath one mound their bones and ashes lie.

48. One streak of blood upon the wall was traced,
In length a man's just stature from the head;
There where it gush'd you saw it uneffaced:
Of all the blood which on that day was shed,
This mortal stain alone remain'd impress'd,—
The all-devouring earth had drunk the rest.

49. Here, from the heaps who strew'd the fatal plain,
Was Howard's corse by faithful hands convey'd,
And, not to be confounded with the slain,
Here in a grave apart with reverence laid,
'Till hence his honor'd relics o'er the seas
Were borne to England, there to rest in peace.

50. Another grave had yielded up its dead,
From whence to hear his son a father came,
That he might lay him where his own gray head
Ere long must needs be laid. That soldier's name
Was not remember'd there, yet may the verse
Present this reverent tribute to his hearse.

51. Was it a soothing or a mournful thought,
Amid this scene of slaughter as we stood,
Where armies had with recent fury fought,
To mark how gentle Nature still pursued
Her quiet course, as if she took no care
For what her noblest work had suffer'd there?

52. The pears had ripen'd on the garden wall;
Those leaves which on the autumnal earth were spread,
The trees, though pierced and searr'd with many a ball,
Had only in their natural season shed:
Flowers were in seed, whose buds to swell began
When such wild havoc here was made of man!

53. Throughout the garden, fruits, and herbs, and flowers,
You saw in growth, or ripeness, or decay;
The green and well-trimm'd dial mark'd the hours
With gliding shadow as they pass'd away;
Who would have thought, to see this garden fair,
Such horrors had so late been acted there!

54. Now, Hougoumont, farewell to thy domain!
Might I dispose of thee, no woodman's hand
Should e'er thy venerable groves profane;
Untouch'd, and like a temple should they stand,
And, consecrate by general feeling, wave
Their branches o'er the ground where sleep the brave.

55. Thy ruins, as they fell, should aye remain,—
What monument so fit for those below?
Thy garden through whole ages should retain
The form and fashion which it weareth now,
That future pilgrims here might all things see,
Such as they were at this great victory.

IV.

THE SCENE OF WAR.

1.
No cloud the azure vault of heaven distain'd
That day when we the field of war survey'd;
The leaves were falling, but the groves retain'd
Foliage enough for beauty and for shade;
Soft airs prevail'd, and through the sunny hours
The bees were busy on the year's last flowers.

2.
Well was the season with the scene combined.
The autumnal sunshine suited well the mood
Which here possess'd the meditative mind,—
A human sense upon the field of blood,
A Christian thankfulness, a British pride,
Temper'd by solemn thought, yet still to joy allied.

3.
What British heart that would not feel a flow,
Upon that ground, of elevating pride?
What British cheek is there that would not glow
To hear our country blest and magnified?—
For Britain here was blest by old and young,
Admired by every heart, and praised by every tongue.

4.
Not for brave bearing in the field alone
Doth grateful Belgium bless the British name;
The order and the perfect honor shown
In all things, have enhanced the soldier's fame;
For this we heard the admiring people raise
One universal voice sincere of praise.

5.
Yet with indignant feeling they inquired
Wherefore we spared the author of this strife?
Why had we not, as highest law required,
With ignominy closed the culprit's life?
For him alone had all this blood been shed,—
Why had not vengeance struck the guilty head?

6.
O God! they said, it was a pitious thing
To see the after-horrors of the fight,
The lingering death, the hopeless suffering,—
What heart of flesh unmoved could bear the sight?
One man was cause of all this world of woe,—
Ye had him,— and ye did not strike the blow!

7.
How will ye answer to all after-time
For that great lesson which ye fail'd to give?
As if excess of guilt excused the crime,
Black as he is with blood, ye let him live!

Children of evil, take your course henceforth,
For what is Justice but a name on earth!

8.
Vain had it been with these in glozing speech
Of precedents to use the specious tongue:
This might perplex the ear, but fail to reach
The heart, from whence that honest feeling sprung;
And had I dared my inner sense belie,
The voice of blood was there to join them in their cry.

9.
We left the field of battle in such mood
As human hearts from thence should bear away,
And musing thus our purposed route pursued,
Which still through scenes of recent bloodshed lay,
Where Prussia late, with strong and stern delight,
Hung on her hated foes to persecute their flight.

10.
No hour for tarryance that, or for remorse!
Vengeance, who long had hunger'd, took her fill,
And Retribution held its righteous course:
As when in elder time, the Sun stood still
On Gibeon, and the Moon above the vale
Of Ajalon hung motionless and pale.

11.
And what though no portentous day was given
To render here the work of wrath complete;
The Sun, I ween, seem'd standing still in heaven
To those who hurried from that dire defeat;
And when they pray'd for darkness in their flight,
The Moon arose upon them broad and bright.

12.
No covert might they find; the open land,
O'er which so late exultingly they pass'd,
Lay all before them and on either hand;
Close on their flight the avengers follow'd fast,
And when they reach'd Genappe, and there drew breath,
Short respite found they there from fear and death.

13.
That fatal town betray'd them to more loss;
Through one long street the only passage lay,
And then the narrow bridge they needs must cross
Where Dyle, a shallow streamlet, cross'd the way:
For life they fled,— no thought had they but fear,
And their own baggage chok'd the outlet here.

14.
He who had bridged the Danube's affluent stream,
With all the unbroken Austrian power in sight,
(So had his empire vanish'd like a dream,)
Was by this brook impeded in his flight,—
And then what passions did he witness there
Rage, terror, excrations, and despair!
15. The Poet’s Pilgrimage.

Ere through the wreck his passage could be made,
Three miserable hours, which seem’d like years,
Was he in that ignoble strait delay’d;
The dreadful Prussian’s cry was in his ears,
Fear in his heart, and in his soul that hell
Whose due rewards he merited so well.

16. Foremost again, as he was wont to be
In flight, though not the foremost in the strife,
The Tyrant hurried on, of infancy
Regardless, nor regarding ought but life; —
O wretch! without the courage or the faith
To die with those whom he had led to death!

17. Meantime his guilty followers in disgrace,
Whose pride forever now was beaten down,
Some in the houses sought a hiding-place;
While at the entrance of that fatal town
Others, who yet some show of heart display’d,
A short, vain effort of resistance made; —

18. Feeble and ill-sustain’d! — The foe burst through:
With unbatling heat they search’d around
The wretches from their lurking-holes they drew,—
Such mercy as the French had given they found;
Death had more victims there in that one hour
Than fifty years might else have render’d to his power.

19. Here did we inn upon our pilgrimage,
After such a day an unfit resting-place:
For who from ghastly thoughts could disengage
The haunted mind, when every where the trace
Of death was seen,—the blood-stain on the wall,
And musket-marks in chamber and in hall!

20. All talk, too, was of death. They show’d us here
The room where Brunswick’s body had been laid,
Where his brave followers, bending o’er the bier,
In bitterness their vow of vengeance made;
Where Wellington beheld the slaughter’d Chief,
And for a while gave way to manly grief.

21. Duhamel, whose crimes the Catalans may tell,
Died here; — with sabre strokes the posts are scored,
Hewn down upon the threshold where he fell,
 Himself then tasting of the ruthless sword;
A Brunswick discharged the debt of Spain,
And where he dropp’d the stone preserves the stain.

22. Too much of life hath on thy plains been shed,
Brought on the French, in warning to all times,
A vengeance wide and sweeping as their crimes; —

23. Vengeance for Egypt and for Syria’s wrong;
For Portugal’s unutterable woes;
For Germany, who suffer’d all too long
Beneath these lawless, faithless, godless foes;
For blood which on the Lord so long had cried,
For Earth oppress’d, and Heaven insulted and defied.

24. We follow’d from Genappe their line of flight
To the Cross Roads, where Britain’s sons sustain’d
Against such perilous force the desperate fight;
Deserving for that field, so well maintain’d,
Such fame as for a like devotion’s need
The world hath to the Spartan band decreed.

25. Upon this ground the noble Brunswick died,
Led on too rashly by his ardent heart;
Long shall his grateful country tell with pride
How manfully he chose the better part;
When groaning Germany in chains was bound,
He only of her Princes faithful found.

26. And here right bravely did the German band
Once more sustain their well-deserved applause;
As when, revenging there their native land,
In Spain they labor’d for the general cause,
In this most arduous strife none more than they Endured the heat and burden of the day.

27. Here too we heard the praise of British worth,
Still best approved when most severely tried;
Here were broad patches of loose-lying earth,
Sufficing scarce the mingled bones to hide,—
And half-uncover’d graves, where one might see
The loathliest features of mortality.

28. Eastward from hence we struck, and reach’d the field
Of Ligny, where the Prussian, on that day
By far-outnumbering force constrain’d to yield,
Fronted the foe, and held them still at bay;
And in that brave defeat acquired fresh claim
To glory, and enhanced his country’s fame.

29. Here was a scene which fancy might delight
To treasure up among her cherish’d stores,
And bring again before the inward sight
Often when she recalls the long-pass’d hours; —
Well-cultured hill and dale extending wide,
Hamlets and village spires on every side; —

30. The autumnal-tinted groves; the upland mill,
Which oft was won and lost amid the fray;
Green pastures water'd by the silent rill;
The lordly Castle yielding to decay,
With bridge and Barbican, and moat and tower,
A fairer sight perchance than when it flour'n'd in power;—

31.
The avenue before its ruin'd gate,
Which, when the Castle, suffering less from time
Than havock, hath foregone its strength and state,
Uninjured flourish'd in nature's prime;
To us a grateful shade did it supply,
Glad of that shelter from the noontide sky;—

32.
The quarries deep, where many a massive block
For some Parisian monument of pride,
Hewn with long labor from the granite rock,
Lay in the change of fortune cast aside;
But rightly with those stones should Prussia build
Her monumental pile on Ligny's bloody field;—

33.
The wealthy village bearing but too plain
The dismal marks of recent fire and spoil;
Its decent habitants, an active train,
And many a one at work with needful toil
On roof or thatch, the ruin to repair,—
May never War repeat such devastation there!

34.
Ill had we done if we had hurried by
A scene in faithful history to be famed
Through long succeeding ages; nor may I
The hospitality let pass unmanned,
And courteous kindness on that distant ground,
Which, strangers as we were, for England's sake we found.

35.
And dear to England should be Ligny's name;
Prussia and England both were proved that day;
Each generous nation to the other's fame
Her ample tribute of applause will pay;
Long as the memory of those labors past,
Unbroken may their Fair Alliance last!

36.
The tales which of that field I could unfold,
Better it is that silence should conceal
They who had seen them shoulder'd while they told
Of things so hideous; and they cried with zeal,
One man hath caused all this, of men the worst,—
O wherefore have ye spared his head accurst?

37.
It fits not now to tell our farther way
Through many a scene by bounteous nature blest,
Nor how we found, where'er our journey lay,
An Englishman was still an honor'd guest;
But still upon this point, where'er we went,
The indignant voice was heard of discontent.
The open graves, the recent scene of blood,
Wore present to the soul's creative sight;
These mournful images my mind possess'd,
And mingled with the visions of my rest.

2. Methought that I was travelling o'er a plain
Whose limits, far beyond all reach of sense,
The aching, anxious sight explored in vain.
How I came there I could not tell, nor whence;
Nor where my melancholy journey lay;
Only that soon the night would close upon my way.

3. Behind me was a doleful, dreary scene,
With huge and mouldering ruins widely spread;
Wastes which had whilome fertile regions been,
Tombs which had lost all record of the dead;
And where the dim horizon seem'd to close,
Far off the gloomy Pyramids arose.

4. Full fain would I have known what lay before,
But lifted there in vain my mortal eye;
That point with cloud and mist was cover'd o'er,
As though the earth were mingled with the sky.
Yet thither, as some power unseen impell'd,
My blind, involuntary way I held.

5. Across the plain innumerable crowds,
Like me, were on their destined journey bent,
Toward the land of shadows and of clouds:
One pace they travelled, to one point they went,—
A motley multitude of old and young,
Men of all climes and hues, and every tongue.

6. Erelong I came upon a field of dead,
Where heaps of recent carnage fill'd the way;
A ghastly sight,—nor was there to tread,
So thickly slaughter'd, horse and man, they lay.
Methought that in that place of death I knew
Again the late-seen field of Waterloo.

7. Troubled I stood, and doubtful where to go;
A cold, damp shuddering ran through all my frame;
Fain would I fly from that dread scene, when, lo!
A voice as from above pronounced my name;
And looking to the sound, by the way-side
I saw a lofty structure edified.

8. Most like it seem'd to that aspiring Tower
Which old Ambition rear'd on Babel's plain,
As if he ween'd in his presumptuous power
To scale high Heaven, with daring pride profane;
Such was its giddy height; and round and round
The spiral steps in long ascension wound.

9. Its frail foundations upon sand were placed,
And round about it mouldering rubbish lay;
For easily by time and storms defaced,
The loose materials crumbled in decay;
Rising so high, and built so insecure,
Ill might such perishable work endure.

10. I not the less went up, and as I drew
Toward the top, more firm the structure seem'd,
With nicer art composed, and fair to view:
Strong and well-built, perchance, I might have deem'd
The pile, had I not seen and understood
Of what frail matter form'd, and on what base it stood.

11. There, on the summit, a grave personage
Received and welcomed me in courteous guise;
On his gray temples were the marks of age,
As one whom years, methought, should render wise.
I saw that thouwert fill'd with doubt and fear,
He said, and therefore have I call'd thee here.

12. Hence from this eminence sublime I see
The wanderings of the erring crowd below,
And pitying thee in thy perplexity,
Will tell thee all that thou canst need to know
To guide thy steps aright. I bent my head
As if in thanks,—And who art thou? I said.

13. He answer'd, I am Wisdom. Mother Earth
Me, in her vigor self-conceiving, bore;
And as from eldest time I date my birth,
Eternally with her shall I endure;
Her noblest offspring, to whom alone
The course of sublunary things is known.

14. Master! quoth I, regarding him, I thought
That Wisdom was the child divine of Heaven.
So, he replied, have fable, preachers taught,
And the dull World a light belief hath given.
But vainly would these fools my claim decry,—
Wisdom I am, and of the Earth am I.

15. Thus while he spake I scann'd his features well;
Small but audacious was the Old Man's eye;
His countenance was hard, and seem'd to tell
Of knowledge less than of effrontery.
Instruct me then, I said, for thou shouldst know
From whence I came, and whither I must go.

16. Art thou then one who would his mind perplex
With knowledge bootless even if attain'd?
Fond man! he answer'd;—wherefore shouldst thou vex
Thy heart with seeking what may not be gain'd?
Regard not what has been, nor what may be;
O Child of Earth, this Now is all that toucheth thee!

17.
He who performs the journey of to-day
Cares not if yesterday were shower or sun:
To-morrow let the heavens be what they may,
And what recks he?—his wayfare will be done.

18.
I kept my rising indignation down,
That I might hear what farther he would teach;
Yet on my darken'd brow the instinctive frown,
Gathering at that abominable speech,
Maintain'd its place: he mark'd it, and pursued,
Tuning his practised tongue to subtle flattery's mood:—

19.
Do I not know thee,—that from earliest youth
Knowledge hath been thy only heart's desire?
Here seeing all things as they are in truth,
I show thee all to which thy thoughts aspire:
No vapors here impede the exalted sense,
Nor mists of earth attain this eminence.

20.
Whither thy way, thou askest me, and what
The region dark whereto thy footsteps tend,
And where, by one inevitable lot,
The course of all thy multitude must end.
Take thou this glass, whose perfect power shall aid
Thy faulty vision, and therewith explore the shade.

21.
Eager I look'd; but seeing with surprise
That the same darkness still the view o'erspread,
Half angrily I turn'd away mine eyes.
Complacent then the Old Man smiled and said,
Darkness is all! what more wouldst thou desire?
Rest now content, for farther none can spy.

22.
Now mark me, Child of Earth! he thus pursued;
Let not the hypocrites thy reason blind,
And to the quest of some unreal good
Divert with dogmas vain thine erring mind:
Learn thou, what'er the motive they may call,
That Pleasure is the aim, and Self the spring of all.

23.
This is the root of knowledge. Wise are they
Who to this guiding principle attend;
They, as they press along the world's highway,
With single aim pursue their steady end;
No vain compunction checks their sure career;
No idle dreams deceive; their heart is here.

24.
They from the nature and the fate of man,
Thus clearly understood, derive their strength;

25.
Such, I made answer, was the Tyrant's creed
Who bruised the nations with his iron rod,
Till on yon field the wretch received his meed
From Britain, and the outstretch'd arm of God
Behold him now,—Death ever in his view,
The only change for him,—and Judgment to ensue!

26.
Behold him when the unbidden thoughts arise
Of his old passions and unbridled power;
As the fierce tiger in confinement lies,
And dreams of blood that he must taste no more,—
Then waking in that appetite of rage,
Frets to and fro within his narrow cage.

27.
Hath he not chosen well? the Old Man replied;
Bravely he aim'd at universal sway;
And never earthly Chief was glorified
Like this Napoleon in his prosperous day.
All-ruling Fate itself hath not the power
To alter what has been: and he has had his hour

28.
Take him, I answer'd, at his fortune's flood;
Russia his friend, the Austrian wars succeased,
When Kings, his creatures some, and some subdued,
Like vassals waited at his marriage feast;
And Europe like a map before him lay,
Of which he gave at will, or took away.

29.
Call then to mind Navarre's heroic chief,
Wandering by night and day through wood and glen,
His country's sufferings like a private grief
Wringing his heart: would Mina even then
Those perils and that sorrow have foregone
To be that Tyrant on his prosperous throne?

30.
But wherefore name I him whose arm was free?
A living hope his noble heart sustain'd,
A faith which bade him through all dangers see
The triumph his enduring country gain'd.
See Hofer with no earthly hope to aid,—
His country lost, himself to chains and death betray'd!

31.
By those he served deserted in his need;
Given to the unrelenting Tyrant's power,
And by his mean revenge condemn'd to bleed,—
Would he have barter'd, in that awful hour,
His heart, his conscience, and his sure renown,
For the malignant murderer's crimes and crown?

32.
Him too, I know, a worthy thought of fame
In that dread trance upheld; — the foresight sure
That in his own dear country his good name
Long as the streams and mountains should endure;
The herdsman on the hills should sing his praise,
And children learn his deeds through all succeeding days.

33.
Turn we to those in whom no glorious thought
Lent its strong succor to the passive mind;
Nor stirring enterprise within them wrought; —
Who to their lot of bitterness resign'd,
Endured their sorrows by the world unknown,
And look'd for their reward to Death alone:

34.
Mothers within Gerona's丧失'd wall, [die; —
Who saw their famish'd children pine and Widows surviving Zaragoza's fall
To linger in abhor'd captivity: —
Yet would not have exchanged their sacred woe
For all the empire of their miscreant foe!

35.
Serene the Old Man replied, and smiled with scorn,
Behold the effect of error! thus to wear
The days of miserable life forlorn,
Struggling with evil and consumed with care; —
Poor fools, whom vain and empty hopes mislead!
They reap their sufferings for their own need.

36.
O false one, I exclaim'd, whom canst thou feel?
With such gross sophisms, but the wicked heart?
The pupils of thine own unhappy school
Are they who choose the vain and empty part;
How oft in age, in sickness, and in woe,
Have they complain'd that all was vanity below!

37.
Look at that mighty Gaznevide, Mahnood,
When, pining in his Palace of Delight,
He lade the gather'd spoils of realms subdued
Be spread before him to regale his sight,
What'er the Orient boasts of rich and rare,—
And then he wept to think what toys they were!

38.
Look at the Russian minion when he play'd
With pearls and jewels which surpass'd all price;
And now apart their various hues array'd,
Blended their colors now in union nice,
Then, weary of the bawbles, with a sigh,
Swept them aside, and thought that all was vanity!

39.
Wean'd by the fatal Messenger from pride,
The Syrian through the streets exposed his shroud:
And one that ravaged kingdoms far and wide
Upon the bed of sickness cried aloud,
What boots my empire in this mortal three?
For the Grave calls me now, and I must go!

40.
Thus felt these wretched men, because decay
Had touch'd them in their vitals; Death stood by;
And Reason, when the props of flesh gave way,
Purged as with exasperate the mortal eye.
Who seeks for worldly honors, wealth, or power,
Will find them vain indeed at that dread hour!

41.
These things are vain; but all things are not so;
The virtues and the hopes of human-kind!—
Yea, by the God who, ordering all below,
In his own image made the immortal mind,
Desires there are which draw from Him their birth,
And bring forth lasting fruits for Heaven and Earth.

42.
Therefore through evil and through good content,
The righteous man performs his part assign'd;
In bondage lingering, or with sufferings spent,
Therefore doth peace support the heroic mind;
And from the dreadful sacrifice of all,
Meek woman doth not shrink at Duty's call.

43.
Therefore the Martyr clasps the stake in faith,
And sings thanksgiving while the flames aspire;
Victorious over agony and death,
Sublime he stands, and triumphs in the fire,
As though to him Elijah's lot were given,
And that the chariot and the steeds of Heaven.

II.

THE EVIL PROPHET.

1.
With that my passionate discourse I brake;
Too fast the thought, too strong the feeling came.
Composed the Old Man listen'd while I spake,
Nor moved to wrath, nor capable of shame;
And when I ceased, unalter'd was his mien,
His hard eye unabash'd, his front serene.

2.
Hard is it error from the mind to weed,
He answer'd, where it strikes so deep a root.
Let us to other argument proceed,
And if we may, discover what the fruit
Of this long strife,— what harvest of great good
The World shall reap for all this cost of blood!

3.
Assuming then a frown as thus he said,
He stretch'd his hand from that commanding height;
Behold, quoth he, where thrice ten thousand dead
Are laid, the victims of a single fight!
And thrice ten thousand more at Ligny lie,
Slain for the prelude to this tragedy!

4.
This but a page of the great book of war,—
A drop amid the sea of human woes:—
Thou canst remember when the Morning Star
Of Freedom on rejoicing France arose,
Over her vine-clad hills and regions gay,
Fair even as Phosphor, who foreruns the day.

5.
Such and so beautiful that Star's uprise;
But soon the glorious dawn was overcast:
A baseful track it held across the skies,
Till now, through all its fatal changes past,
Its course fulfill'd, its aspects understood,
On Waterloo it hath gone down in blood.

6.
Where now the hopes with which thine ardent youth
Rejoicingly to run its race began?
Where now the reign of Liberty and Truth,
The Rights Omnipotent of Equal Man,
The principles should make all discord cease,
And bid poor human-kind repose at length in peace?

7.
Behold the Bourbon to that throne by force
Restored, from whence by fury he was cast:
Thus to the point where it began its course,
The melancholy cycle comes at last;
And what are all the intermediate years?—
What, but a bootless waste of blood and tears?

8.
The peace which thus at Waterloo ye won,
Shall it endure with this exasperate foe?
In gratitude for all that ye have done,
Will France her ancient country forego?
Her wounded spirit, her enervated will
Ye know,—and ample means are left her still.

9.
What though the tresses of her strength be shorn;
The roots remain untouch'd; and as of old
The bondsman Samson felt his power return
To his knit sinews, so shall ye behold
France, like a giant fresh from sleep, arise
And rush upon her slumbering enemies.

10.
Woe then for Belgium! for this ill-doom'd land,
The theatre of strife through every age!
Look from this eminence, whereon we stand,—
What is the region round us but a stage
For the mad pastime of Ambition made,
Whereon War's dreadful drama may be play'd?

11.
Thus hath it been from history's earliest light,
When wonder by the Sabian Cesar stood,
And saw his legions, raging from the fight,
Root out the noble nation they subdued;
Even at this day the peasant findeth there
The relics of that ruthless massacre.

12.
Need I recall the long religious strife?
Or William's hard-fought fields? or Marlborough's fame,
Here purchased at such lavish price of life,—
Or Fontenoy, or Fleurus' later name?
Wherever here the foot of man may tread,
The blood of man hath on that spot been shed.

13.
Shall then Futurity a happier train
Unfold, than this dark picture of the past?
Dreamst thou again of some Saturnian reign,
Or that ill-compacted realm should last?
Its wealth and weakness to the foe are known,
And the first shock subverts its baseless throne.

14.
O wretched country, better should thy soil
Be laid again beneath the invading seas,
Thou goodliest masterpiece of human toil,
If still thou must be doom'd to scenes like these!
O Destiny inexorable and blind!
O miserable lot of poor mankind!

15.
Saying thus, he fix'd on me a searching eye
Of stern regard, as if my heart to reach;
Yet gave he now no leisure to reply;
For ere I might dispose my thoughts for speech,
The Old Man, as one who felt and understood
His strength, the theme of his discourse pursued.

16.
If we look farther, what shall we behold
But every where the swelling seeds of ill,
Half-smother'd fires, and causes manifold
Of strife to come; the powerful watching still
For fresh occasion to enlarge his power,
The weak and injured waiting for their hour?

17.
Will the rude Cossack with his spoils bear back
The love of peace and humanizing art?
Think ye the mighty Moscovite shall lack
Some specious business for the ambitious heart?
Or the black Eagle, when she moulds her plumage,
The form and temper of the Dove assume?

18.
From the old Germanic chaos hath there risen
A happier order of establish'd things?
And is the Italian Mind from papal prison
Set free to soar upon its native wings?
Or look to Spain, and let her Despot tell
If there thy high-raised hopes are answer'd well!

19.
At that appeal my spirit breathed a groan;
But he triumphantly pursued his speech:
O Child of Earth, he cried with loftier tone,
The present and the past one lesson teach;
Look where thou wilt, the history of man
Is but a thorny maze, without a plan!

20.
The winds which have in viewless heaven their birth,
The waves which in their fury meet the clouds,
The central storms which shake the solid earth,
And from volcnoes burst in fiery floods,
Are not more vague, and purportless, and blind,
Than is the course of things among mankind!

21.
Rash hands unravel what the wise have spun;
Realms which in story fill so large a part,
Rear'd by the strong, are by the weak undone;
Barbarians overthrow the works of art,
And what force spares is sapp'd by sure decay,—
So earthy things are changed and pass away.

22.
And think not thou thy England hath a spell,
That she this general fortune should elude;
Easier to crush the foreign foe, than quell
The malice which misleads the multitude,
And that dread malady of erring zeal,
Which like a cancer eats into the commonweal.

23.
The fabric of her power is undermined;
The earthquake underneath it will have way,
And all that glorious structure, as the wind
Scatters a summer cloud, be swept away;
For Destiny, on this terrestrial ball,
Drives on her iron car, and crushes all.

24.
Thus as he ended, his mysterious form
Enlarged, grew dim, and vanish'd from my view.
At once on all sides rush'd the gather'd storm;
The thunders roll'd around, the wild winds blew,
And as the tempest round the summit beat,
The whole frail fabric shook beneath my feet.

III.
THE SACRED MOUNTAIN.

1.
But then, methought, I heard a voice exclaim,
Hither, my Son, oh, hither take thy flight!
A heavenly voice which call'd me by my name,
And bade me hasten from that treacherous height:
The voice it was which I was wont to hear,
Sweet as a Mother's to her infant's ear.

2.
I hesitated or , but at the call
Sprung from the summit of that tottering tower.

There is a motion known in dreams to all,
When, buoyant by some self-sustaining power,
Through air we seem to glide, as if set free
From all encumbrance of mortality.

3.
Thus borne aloft, I reach'd the Sacred Hill,
And left the scene of tempests far behind;
But that old tempier's parting language still
Press'd like a painful burden on my mind;
The troubled soul had lost her inward light,
And all within was black as Erebus and Night.

4.
The thoughts which I had known in youth return'd,
But, oh, how changed! a sad and spectral train;
And while for all the miseries past I mourn'd,
And for the lives which had been given in vain,
In sorrow and in fear I turn'd mine eye
From the dark aspects of futurity.

5.
I sought the thickest woodlands' shade profound,
As suited best my melancholy mood,
And cast myself upon the gloomy ground.
When lo! a gradual radiance fill'd the wood;
A heavenly presence rose upon my view,
And in that form divine the awful Muse I knew.

6.
Hath then that Spirit false perplex'd thy heart,
O thou of little faith! severe she cried.
Bear with me, Goddess, heavenly as thou art,
Bear with my earthly nature! I replied,
And let me pour into thine ear my grief;
Thou canst enlighten, thou canst give relief.

7.
The ploughshare had gone deep, the sower's hand
Had scatter'd in the open soil the grain;
The harrow, too, had well prepared the land;
I look'd to see the fruit of all this pain!—
Alas! the thorns and old inveterate weed
Have sprung again, and stifled the good seed.

8.
I hoped that Italy should break her chains,
Foreign and papal, with the world's applause,
Knit, in firm union her divided reigns,
And rear a well-built pile of equal laws:
Then might the wrongs of Venice be forgiven,
And joy should reach Petræus's soul in Heaven.

9.
I hoped that that abhorr'd Idolatry
Had in the strife received its mortal wound:
The Souls which from beneath the altar cry,
At length, I thought, had their just vengeance found;—
In purple and in scarlet clad, behold
The Harlot sits, adorn'd with gems and gold!

10.
The golden cup she bears full to the brim
Of her abominations, as of yore;
Her eyeballs with inebriate triumph swim;
Though drunk with righteous blood, she thirsts for more,
Eager to reassert her influence fell,
And once again let loose the Dogs of Hell

11.
Woe for that people, too, who by their path
For these late triumphs first made plain the way;
Whom, in the Valley of the Shade of Death,
No fears nor fiery sufferings could dismay;
Art could not tempt, nor violence enthrall
Their firm devotion, faithful found through all.

12.
Strange race of haughty heart and stubborn will,
Slavery they love, and chains with pride they wear;
Inflexible alike in good or ill,
The inveterate stamp of servitude they bear.
Oh fate perverse, to see all change withstood,
There only where all change must needs be good!

13.
But them no foe can force, nor friend persuade;
Impassive souls in iron forms enclosed,
As though of human mould they were not made,
But of some sterner elements composed,
Against offending nations to be sent,
The ruthless ministers of punishment.

14.
Where are those Minas after that career
Wherewith all Europe rang from side to side?
In exile wandering! Where the Mountaineer,—
Late, like Pelayo, the Asturian's pride?
Had Ferdinand no mercy for that hile,
Exposed so long for him in daily, hourly strife!

15.
From her Athenian orator of old
Greece never listen'd to sublumer strain
Than that with which, for truth and freedom bold,
Quintana moved the inmost soul of Spain.
What need is his let Ferdinand declare—
Chains, and the silent dungeon, and despair!

16.
For this hath England borne so brave a part!
Spent with endurance, or in battle slain,
Is it for this so many an English heart
Lies mingled with the insensate soil of Spain?
Is this the issue, this the happy birth
In those long throes and that strong agony brought forth!

17.
And oh! if England's fatal hour draw nigh,—
If that most glorious edifice should fall
By the wild hands of bestial Anarchy,—
Then might it seem that He who ordreth all
Doth take for sublumer things no care;—
The burden of that thought is more than I can bear.

18.
Even as a mother listens to her child
My plaint the Muse divine benignant heard,
Then answer'd, in reproving accents mild,
What if thou seest the fruit of hope deferred?
Dost thou for this in disering faith repine?
A manlier, wiser virtue should be thine!

19.
Ere the good seed can give its fruit in Spain,
The light must shine on that bedarken'd land,
And Italy must break her papal chain,
Ere the soil answer to the sower's hand;
For, till the sons their fathers' fault repent,
The old error brings its direful punishment.

20.
Hath not experience bade the wise man see
Poor hope from innovations premature?
All sudden change is ill: slow grows the tree
Which in its strength through ages shall endure.
In that ungrateful earth it long may lie
Dormant, but fear not that the seed should die.

21.
Falsely that Tempter taught thee that the past
Was but a blind, inextricable maze;
Falsely he taught that evil overcast
With gathering tempests these propitious days,
That he in subtle snares thy soul might bind,
And rob thee of thy hopes for human-kind.

22.
He told thee the beginning and the end
Were indistinguishable, all, and dark;
And when from his vain Tower he bade thee bend
Thy curious eye, well knew he that no spark
Of heavenly light would reach the baffled sense;
The mists of earth lay round him all too dense.

23.
Must I, as thou hastad chosen the evil part,
Tell thee that Man is free and God is good?
These primal truths are rooted in thy heart:
But these, being rightly felt and understood,
Should bring with them a hope, calm, constant, sure,
Patient, and on the rock of faith secure.

24.
The Monitress Divine, as thus she spake,
Induced me gently on, ascending still,
And thus emerging from that mournful brake
We drew toward the summit of the hill,
And reach'd a green and sunny place, so fair
As well with long-lost Eden might compare.

25.
Broad cedars grew around that lovely glade,
Exempted from decay, and never sere,
Their wide-spread boughs diffused a fragrant shade;
The cypress incorruptible was here,
With finked stem and head aspiring high,
Nature's proud column, pointing to the sky.
26. There, too, the vigorous olive in its pride,
   As in its own Apulian soil uncheck'd,
Tower'd high, and spread its glaucescent foliage wide:
With liveliest hue the mead beneath was deck'd,
Gift of that grateful tree that with its root
Repays the earth, from whence it feeds its fruit.

27. There, too, the sacred bay, of brighter green,
   Exalted its rejoicing head on high;
And there the martyrs' holier palm was seen
   Waving its plumage as the breeze went by.
All fruits which ripen under genial skies
Grew there, as in another Paradise.

28. And over all that lovely glade there grew
   All wholesome roots and plants of healing power;
The herb of grace, the medicinal rue,
The poppy rich in worth as gay in flower;
The heart-ease that delighteth every eye,
   And sage divine, and virtuous euphrasy.

29. Unwounded here Judaea's balm distill'd
   Its precious juice; the snowy jasmine here
Spread its luxuriant tresses wide, and fil'd
   With fragrance the delicious atmosphere.
More piercing still did orange-flowers dispense
From golden groves the purest joy of sense.

30. As low it lurk'd the tufted moss between,
   The violet there its modest perfume shed,
Like humble virtue, rather felt than seen:
   And here the Rose of Sharon rear'd its head,
The glory of all flowers, to sense and sight
Yielding their full contentment of delight.

31. A gentle river wound its quiet way
   Through this sequester'd glade, meandering wide;
Smooth as a mirror here the surface lay,
   Where the pure lotus, floating in its pride,
Enjoy'd the breath of heaven, the sun's warm beam,
   And the cool freshness of its native stream.

32. Here, o'er green weeds, whose tresses wave out-spread,
   With silent lapse the glassy waters run;
Here, in fleet motion o'er a pebbly bed,
   Gliding they glance and ripple to the sun;
The stirring breeze that swept them in its flight,
   Raised on the stream a shower of sparkling light.

33. And all sweet birds sung there their lays of love;
The mellow thrush, the blackbird loud and shrill,
The rapturous nightingale that shook the grove,
   Made the ears vibrate, and the heart-strings thrill;
The ambitious lark, that, soaring in the sky,
   Pour'd forth her lyric strain of ecstasy.

34. Sometimes, when that wild chorus intermits,
The linnet's song was heard amid the trees,
   A low, sweet voice; and sweeter still, at fits
The ringdove's wooing came upon the breeze;
While with the wind which moved the leaves among,
The murmuring waters join'd in undersong.

35. The bare disported here, and fear'd no ill,
   For never evil thing that glade came nigh;
The sheep were free to wander at their will,
   As needing there no earthly shepherd's eye;
The bird sought no concealment for her nest,
   So perfect was the peace wherewith those bowers were best.

36. All blending thus with all in one delight,
The soul was soothed, and satisfied, and fill'd;
This mingled bliss of sense, and sound, and sight,
The flow of boisterous mirth might there have still'd;
And, sinking in the gentle spirit deep,
   Have touch'd those strings of joy which make us weep.

37. Even thus in earthly gardens had it been,
   If earthly gardens might with these compare;
But more than all such influences, I ween,
   There was a heavenly virtue in the air,
Which laid all vain, perplexing thoughts to rest,
   And heal'd, and calm'd, and purified the breast.

38. Then said I to that guide divine, My soul,
   When here we enter'd, was o'ercharged with grief;
For evil doubts, which I could not control,
   Beset my troubled spirit. This relief,—
This change,—whence are they? Almost it might seem
   I never lived till now:—all else had been a dream.

39. My heavenly teacher answer'd, Say not seem;—
   In this place all things are what they appear;
And they who feel the past a feverish dream,
   Wake to reality on entering here.
These waters are the Well of Life, and lo!
The Rock of Ages there, from whence they flow

40. Saying thus, we came upon an inner glade,
The holiest place that human eyes might see;
For all that vale was like a temple made
   By Nature's hand, and this the sanctuary;
Where, in its bed of living rock, the Rood
   Of Man's redemption firmly planted stood.

41. And at its foot the never-failing Well
Of Life profusely flow'd that all might drink.
Most blessed Water! Neither tongue can tell
The blessedness thereof, nor heart can think,
Save only those to whom it hath been given
To taste of that divinest gift of Heaven.

42. There grew a goodly Tree this Well beside; —
Behold a branch from Eden planted here,
Pluck'd from the Tree of Knowledge, said my guide.
O Child of Adam, put away thy fear, —
In thy first father's grave it hath its root;
Taste thou the bitter, but the wholesome fruit.

43. In awe I heard, and trembled, and obey'd:
The bitterness was even as of death;
I felt a cold and piercing thrill pervade
My loosen'd limbs, and losing sight and breath,
To earth I should have fallen in my despair,
Had I not clasp'd the Cross, and been supported there.

44. My heart, I thought, was bursting with the force
Of that most fatal fruit; soul-sick I felt,
And tears ran down in such continuous course,
As if the very eyes themselves should melt.
But then I heard my heavenly teacher say,
Drink, and this mortal stound will pass away.

45. I stoop'd and drank of that divinest Well,
Fresh from the Rock of Ages where it ran,
It had a heavenly quality to quell
My pain: — I rose a renovated man,
And would not now, when that relief was known,
For world's the needful suffering have foregone.

46. Even as the Eagle (ancient storyers say)
When, faint with years, she feels her flagging wing,
Soars up toward the mid sun's piercing ray,
Then, fill'd with fire, into some living spring
Plunges, and casting there her aged plumes,
The vigorous strength of primal youth resumes; —

47. Such change in me that blessed Water wrought;
The bitterness which, from its fatal root,
The Tree derived, with painful healing fraught,
Pass'd clean away; and in its place the fruit
Produced, by virtue of that wondrous wave,
The savor which in Paradise it gave.

48. Now, said the heavenly Muse, thou mayst advance,
Fittly prepared toward the mountain's height.
O Child of Man, this necessary trance
Hath purify'd from flaw thy mortal sight,
That, with scope unconfined of vision free,
Thou the beginning and the end mayst see.

49. She took me by the hand, and on we went;
Hope urged me forward, and my soul was strong,
With winged speed we scaled the steep ascent,
Nor seem'd the labor difficult or long,
Ere on the summit of the sacred hill
Upraised I stood, where I might gaze my fill.

50. Below me lay, unfolded like a scroll,
The boundless region where I wander'd late,
Where I might see realms spread and oceans roll,
And mountains from their cloud-surrmounting state
Dwarf'd like a map beneath the excursive sight,
So ample was the range from that commanding height.

51. Eastward with darkness round on every side,
An eye of light was in the farthest sky.
Lo, the beginning! — said my heavenly Guide;
The steady ray which there thou canst desery,
Comes from lost Eden, from the primal land
Of man "waved over by the fiery brand."

52. Look now toward the end! no mists obscure,
Nor clouds will there impede the strengthen'd sight;
Unblench'd thine eye the vision may endure.
I look'd, — surrounded with effulgent light
More glorious than all glorious lunes of even,
The Angel Death stood there in the open Gate of Heaven.

IV.

THE HOPES OF MAN.

1. Now, said my heavenly Teacher, all is clear! —
Bear the Beginning and the End in mind,
The course of human things will then appear
Beneath its proper laws; and thou wilt find,
Through all their seeming labyrinth, the plan
Which "vindicates the ways of God to Man."

2. Free choice doth Man possess of good or ill;
All were but mockery else. From Wisdom's way,
Too oft, perverted by the tainted will,
Is his rebellious nature drawn astray;
Therefore an inward monitor is given,
A voice that answers to the law of Heaven.

3. Frail as he is, and as an infant weak,
The knowledge of his weakness is his strength;
For succor is vouchsafed to those who seek
In humble faith sincere; and when at length
Death sets the disembodied spirit free,
According to their deeds their lot shall be.
Thus, should the chance of private fortune raise
A transient doubt, Death answers all.
And in the scale of nations, if the ways
Of Providence mysterious we may call,
Yet, rightly view'd, all history doth impact
Comfort, and hope, and strength to the believing heart.

For through the lapse of ages may the course
Of moral good progressive still be seen,
Though mournful dynasties of Fraud and Force,
Dark Vice and purblind Ignorance intervene;
Empires and Nations rise, decay and fall,
But still the Good survives and perseveres through all.

Yea, even in those most lamentable times,
When, every where to wars and woes a prey,
Earth seem'd but one wide theatre of crimes,
Good unperceived had work'd its silent way,
And all those dread convulsions did but clear
The obstructed path to give it free career.

But deem not thou some overruling Fate,
Directing all things with benign decree,
Through all the turmoil of this mortal state,
Appoints that what is best shall therefore be;
Even as from man his future doom proceeds,
So nations rise or fall according to their deeds.

Light at the first was given to human-kind,
And Law was written in the human heart.
If they forsake the Light, perverse of mind,
And wilfully prefer the evil part,
Then to their own devices are they left,
By their own choice of Heaven's support bereft.

The individual culprit may sometimes
Unpunish'd to his after-reckoning go:
Not thus collective man,—for public crimes
Draw on their proper punishment below;
When Nations go astray, from age to age
The effects remain, a fatal heritage.

Bear witness, Egypt, thy huge monuments
Of priestly fraud and tyranny austere!
Bear witness thou, whose only name presents
All holy feelings to religion dear,—
In Earth's dark circket once the precious gem
Of living light,—O fallen Jerusalem!

See barbarous Africa, on every side
To error, wretchedness, and crimes resign'd!
Behold the vicious Orient, far and wide
Enthrall'd in slavery! As the human mind
Corrupts and goes to wreck, Earth sickens there,
And the contagion taints the ambient air.

They had the Light, and from the Light they turn'd;
What marvel if they grope in darkness lost?
They had the Law;—God's natural Law they scorn'd,
And choosing error, thus they pay the cost!
Wherever Falsehood and Oppression reign,
There degradation follows in their train.

What, then, in these late days had Europe been,
This moral, intellectual heart of earth,—
From which the nations who lie dead in sin
Should one day yet receive their second birth,—
To what had she been sunk if brutal Force
Had taken unrestrain'd its impious course!

If among hateful Tyrants of all times
For endless excretion handed down,
One may be found surpassing all in crimes,
One that for infancy should bear the crown,
Napoleon is that man, in guilt the first,
Preeminently bad among the worst.

For not, like Scythian conquerors, did he tread
From his youth up the common path of blood;
Nor like some Eastern Tyrant was he bred
In sensual harems, ignorant of good;—
Their vices from the circumstance have grown;
His, by deliberate purpose, were his own.

Not led away by circumstance he err'd,
But from the wicked heart his error came.
By Fortune to the highest place prefer'd,
He sought through evil means an evil aim,
And all his ruthless measures were design'd
To enslave, degrade, and brutalize mankind.

Some barbarous dream of empire to fulfil,
Those iron ages he would have restored,
When Law was but the roffian soldier's will,
Might govern'd all, the sceptre was the sword,
And Peace, not elsewhere finding where to dwell,
Sought a sad refuge in the convent-cell.

Too far had he succeeded! In his mould
An evil generation had been framed,
By no religion temper'd or control'd,
By foul examples of all crimes inflamed,
Of faith, of honor, of compassion void;—
Such were the fitting agents he employ'd.
20. Believing as you lying Spirit taught,
    They to that vain philosophy held fast,
    And trusted that, as they began from nought,
    To nothing they should needs return at last;
    Hence no restraint of conscience, no remorse,
    But every baleful passion took its course.

21. And had they triumph'd, Earth had once again,
    To Violence subdued, and impious Pride,
    Verged to such state of wickedness, as when
    The Gianty of old their God defied,
    And Heaven, impatient of a world like this,
    Open'd its flood-gates, and broke up the abyss.

22. That danger is gone by. On Waterloo
    The Tyrant's fortune in the scale was weigh'd, —
    His fortune and the World's, — and England threw
    Her sword into the balance — down it sway'd:
    And when in battle first he met that foe,
    There he received his mortal overthrow.

23. O my brave Countrymen, with that I said,—
    For then my heart with transport overflow'd,—
    O Men of England! nobly have ye paid
    The debt which to your ancestors ye owed,
    And gather'd for your children's heritage
    A glory that shall last from age to age!

24. And we did well when on our Mountain's height
    For Waterloo we raised the festal flame,
    And in our triumph taught the startled night
    To ring with Wellington's victorious name,
    Making the far-off mariner admire
    To see the crest of Skiddaw plumed with fire.

25. The Moon who had in silence visited
    His lonely summit from the birth of time,
    That hour an unavailing splendor shed,
    Lost in the effulgence of the flame sublime,
    In whose broad blaze rejoicingly we stood,
    And all below a depth of blackest solitude.

26. Fit theatre for this great joy we chose;
    For never since above the abating Flood
    Emerging, first that pinnacle arose,
    Had cause been given for deeper gratitude,
    For prouder joy to every English heart,
    When England had so well perform'd her arduous part.

27. The Muse replied with gentle smile benign,—
    Well mayst thou praise the land that gave thee birth,
    And bless the Fate which made that country thine;
    For of all ages and all parts of earth,
    To choose thy time and place did Fate allow,
    Wise choice would be this England and this Now.

28. From bodily and mental bondage, there
    Hath Man his full emancipation gain'd;
    The viewless and illimitable air
    Is not more free than Thought; all unrestrain'd,
    Nor pined in want, nor sunk in sensual sloth,
    There may the immortal Mind attain its growth.

29. There, under Freedom's tutelary wing,
    Deliberate Courage fears no human foe;
    There, unoffe'd, as in their native spring,
    The living waters of Religion flow;
    There, like a beacon, the transmitted Light,
    Conspicuous to all nations, burneth bright.

30. The virtuous will she hath, which should aspire
    To spread the sphere of happiness and light;
    She hath the power to answer her desire,
    The wisdom to direct her power aright;
    The will, the power, the wisdom thus combined,
    What glorious prospects open on mankind!

31. Behold! she cried, and lifting up her hand,
    The shaping elements obey'd her will; —
    A vapor gather'd round our lofty stand,
    Roll'd in thick volumes o'er the Sacred Hill;
    Descending then, its surges far and near
    Fill'd all the wide subjacent atmosphere.

32. As I have seen from Skiddaw's stony height
    The fleecey clouds scud round me on their way,
    Condense beneath, and hide the vale from sight,
    Then, opening, just disclose where Derwent lay
    Burnish'd with sunshine like a silver shield,
    Or old Enchanter's glass, for magic forms fit field;—

33. So at her will, in that receding sheet
    Of mist wherewith the world was overlaid,
    A living picture moved beneath our feet,
    A spacious City first was there display'd,
    The seat where England from her ancient reign
    Doth rule the Ocean as her own domain.

34. In splendor with those famous cities old,
    Whose power it hath surpass'd, it now might vie;
    Through many a bridge the wealthy river roll'd;
    Aspiring columns rear'd their heads on high;
    Triumphant arches spann'd the roads, and gave
    Due gnarson to the memory of the brave.

35. A landscape follow'd, such as might compare
    With Frenish fields for well-requited toil:
    The wonder-working hand had every where
    Subdued all circumstance of stubborn soil;
    In ten and more reach'd, rich gardens smiled,
    And populous hamlets rose amid the wild.
36. There the old seaman, on his native shore,
Enjoy’d the competence deserved so well;
The soldier, his dread occupation o’er,
Of well-rewarded service loved to tell;
The gray-hair’d laborer there, whose work was done,
In comfort saw the day of life go down.

37. Such was the lot of old; for childhood there
The duties which belong to life was taught:
The good seed, early sown and nursed with care,
This bounteous harvest in its season brought;
Thus youth for manhood, manhood for old age
Prepared, and found their weal in every stage.

38. Enough of knowledge unto all was given
In wisdom’s way to guide their steps on earth,
And make the immortal spirit fit for heaven.
This needful learning was their right of birth;
Further might each, who chose it, persevere;
No mind was lost for lack of culture here.

39. And that whole happy region swarm’d with life,—
Village and town;—as busy bees in spring,
In sunny days, when sweetest flowers are rife,
Fill fields and gardens with their murmuring.
Oh joy to see the State in perfect health!
Her numbers were her pride, and power, and wealth.

40. Then saw I, as the magic picture moved,
Her shores enrich’d with many a port and pier;
No gift of liberal Nature unimproved.
The seas their never-failing harvest here
Supplied, as bounteous as the air which fed
Israel, when manna fell from heaven for bread.

41. Many a tall vessel in her harbors lay,
About to spread its canvas to the breeze,
Bound upon happy errand to convey
The adventurous colonist beyond the seas,
Foward those distant lands where Britain blest
With her redundant life the East and West.

42. The landscape changed;—a region next was seen,
Where sable swans on rivers yet unfound
Glided through broad savannahs ever green;
Innumerable flocks and herds were feeding round,
And scatter’d farms appear’d, and hamlets fair,
And rising towns, which made another Britain there.

43. Then, thick as stars which stud the moonless sky,
Green islands in a peaceful sea were seen;
Darken’d no more with blind idolatry,
Nor curst with hideous usages obscene,
But heel’d of leprous crimes, from butchering strife
Deliver’d, and reclaim’d to moral life.

44. Around the rude Morai, the temple now
Of truth, hosannas to the Holiest rung:
There, from the Christian’s equal marriage-vow,
In natural growth, the household virtues sprung;
Children were taught the paths of heavenly peace,
And age in hope look’d on to its release.

45. The light those happy Islanders enjoy’d,
Good messengers from Britain had convey’d;
(Where might such bounty wiser be employ’d?)
One people with their teachers were they made,
Their arts, their language, and their faith the same,
And, blest in all, for all they blest the British name.

46. Then rose a different land, where loftiest trees
High o’er the grove their fan-like foliage rear;
Where spicy bowers upon the passing breeze
Diffuse their precious fragrance far and near;
And yet untaught to bend his massive knee,
Wisest of brutes, the elephant roams free.

47. Ministrant there to health and public good,
The busy axe was heard on every side,
Opening new channels, that the noxious wood
With wind and sunshine might be purified,
And that wise Government, the general friend,
Might every where its eye and arm extend.

48. The half-brutal Bedah came from his retreat,
To human life by human kindness won;
The Chingalese beheld that work complete
Which Holland in her day had well begun;
The Candal, prospering under Britain’s reign,
Blest the redeeming hand which broke his chain.

49. Colors and castes were heeded there no more;
Laws which depraved, degraded, and oppress’d,
Were laid aside, for on that happy shore
All men with equal liberty were blest;
And through the land, the breeze upon its swells
Bore the sweet music of the Sabbath bells.

50. Again the picture changed; those Isles I saw
With every crime, through three long centuries curst,
While unrelenting Avarice gave the law;
Scene of the injured Indians’ sufferings first,
Then doom’d, for Europe’s lasting shame, to see
The wider-wasting guilt of Slavery.

51. That foulest blot had been at length effaced;
Slavery was gone, and all the power it gave,
Whereby so long our nature was debased,
Baleful alike to master and to slave.
O lovely Isles! ye were indeed a sight
To fill the spirit with intense delight.
For willing industry and cheerful toil
Perform'd their easy task, with Hope to aid;
And the free children of that happy soil
Dwelt each in peace beneath his cocoa's shade; —
A race who with the European mind
The adapted mould of Africa combined.

Anon, methought that in a spacious Square,
Of some great town the goodly ornament,
Three statues I beheld, of sculpture fair:
These, said the Muse, are they whom one consent
Shall there deem worthy of the purest fame; —
Knowest thou who best such gratitude may claim?

Clarkson, I answer'd, first; whom to have seen
And known in social hours may be my pride,
Such friendship being praise; and one, I ween,
Is Wilberforce, placed rightly at his side,
Whose eloquent voice in that great cause was heard
So oft and well. But who shall be the third?

Time, said my Teacher, will reveal the name
Of him who with these worthies shall enjoy
The equal honor of enduring fame; —
He who the root of evil shall destroy,
And from our Laws shall blot the accursed word Of Slave, shall rightly stand with them prefer'd.

Enough! the Goddess cried: with that the cloud Obey'd, and closed upon the magic scene:
Thus much, quoth she, is to thine hopes allow'd;
Ills may impede, delays may intervene,
But scenes like these the coming age will bless,
If England but pursue the course of righteousness.

On she must go progressively in good,
In wisdom and in weal, — or she must wane.
Like Ocean, she may have her ebb and flow,
But stagnates not. And now her path is plain:
Heaven's first command she may fulfil in peace,
Replenishing the earth with her increase.

Peace she hath won, — with her victorious hand
Hath won through rightful war auspicious peace;
Nor this alone, but that in every land
The withering rule of violence may cease.
Was ever War with such blest victory crown'd?
Did ever Victory with such fruits abound?

Rightly for this shall all good men rejoice,
They most who most abhor all deeds of blood;
Rightly for this with reverential voice
Exalt to Heaven their hymns of gratitude;
For ne'er till now did Heaven thy country bless
With such transcendent cause for joy and thankfulness.

If they in heart all tyranny abhor,
This was the fall of Freedom's direst foe;
If they detest the impious lust of war,
Here hath that passion had its overthrow; —
As the best prospects of mankind are dear,
Their joy should be complete, their prayers of praise sincere.

And thou to whom in spirit at this hour
The vision of thy Country's bliss is given,
Who feelest that she hola, her trusted power
To do the will and spread the word of Heaven,—
Hold fast the faith which animates thy mind,
And in thy songs proclaim the hopes of human-kind.

All which amount to 72131 persons; which number is not so great, considering the long siege, sickness, and the cold winters upon the sea coast, in so cold a climate, fighting against the elements. It is unknown what number died in the town, which is thought much less, for that there were not so many in the town, and they were better lodged, had more ease, and were better victualled. — Gilmont's Hist. of the Netherlands, p. 1337.

"The besieged in Ostend had certain adventuring soldiers whom they called Lopers, of the which, among other captains, were the young captain Gran, and captain Adam Van Loest. Their arms which they bore were a long and great pike, with a flat head at the mother end thereof, to the end that it should not sink too deep into the mud, but a large huzzam hang in a scar, as we have said of Frenetsus, a contus at his side, and his digger about his neck, who would usually leap over a ditch four and twenty foot broad, skirmishing often with his enemy so as no horseman could overtake them before they had leap over the ditches again." — Ibid. 1329.

"In remembrance of the long siege of Ostend, and the winning of Sluice, there were certain cartes made in the United Provinces, both of silver and copper, the one having on the one side the picture of Ostend, and on the other the town of Ghent, Grave, Sluice, Ardenbourg, and the forts of Regendyke and Cadzant, with this inscription round about. 1 Plus triunuo obsessa, hosti rudera, potrua quator ex me arbori dede. Anno 1004." Ostend being more than three years besieged, gave the enemy a heap of stones, and to her native country four towers.

"The town of Utrect did also make a triumphant piece of cayme both of gold and silver, where on the one side stood the siege of Ostend, and on the other the siege of Sluice, and all the forts and havens, and on both sides round about was graven, "Jechev prince deuderat plus quam perduratis." — Ibid. 1318.

Many a rich vessel, from the dangerous sea,
Enter the bason of thy quiet gale. — I. 10, p. 750.

These lines are borrowed from Quarles; — the passage in which they occur would be very pleasing if he had not disfigured it in a most extraordinary manner.

Saile gentle Pinnace! now the heavens are clear,
The winds blow fair; behold the harbors near.
Tridented Neptune hath forgot to frown,
The rocks are past; the storme is overthrown.
Up weather-footed voyagers and rauye ye.
Forake your loaden Cabbins; up and howse ye.
Upon the open decks, and smell the land;
Cheere up, the welcome shoire is nigh at hand.
Saile gentle Pinnace with a prosperous gale.
To the Isle of Pines: saile gentle Pinnace saile!
Fortune conduct thee; let thy keele divide
The silver streames, that thou maist safely slide
Into the bosom of thy quiet Key,
And quite thee fairly of the injurious Sea.
Quaile's Argalus & Parthena.

Bruges. — I. 14, p. 750.

Urbs est ad miraculum putrca, potenas, amara, says Luigi Guicciardini. Its power is gone by, but its beauty is perhaps more impressive now than in the days of its splendor and prosperity.

M. Paquet Xylophorien, and many writers after him, mention the preservation of the monuments of Charles the Bold, and his daughter Mary of Burgundy, wife to the Archduke Maximilian; but they do not mention the delivery of the Beadle who preserved them at the imminent risk of his own life. Pierre Dezitter in this person's name. During the revolutionary frenzy, when the mob seemed to take most pleasure in destroying whatever was most venerable, he took these splendid tombs to pieces and loaded them during the night, for which he was proscribed and a reward of 2000 francs set upon his head. Bonaparte, after his marriage into the Austrian family, rewarded him with 1000 francs, and gave 10,000 for ornamenting the chapel in which the tombs were replaced. This has been done with little taste.

.............., that sisterhood whom to their rule

The Beguines. Heliot is mistaken when he says (t. viii. p. 6) that the Beguines at Mechlin is the finest in all Flanders; it is not comparable to that at Ghent, which for extent and beauty may be called the Capital of the community.

.............., Abbot,
Where whilome treachery.stood the English name.
I. 41, p. 752.

In 1583, "the English garrison of Abbot being mutinied for their pay, the Gasteis did not only refuse to give it them, but did threaten to force them out, or else to finish them. In the mean time the Prince of Parma did not let slip this opportunity to make his profit thereby, but did solicit them by fair words and promises to pay them; and these English companies, not accustomd to endure hunger and want, began to give ear unto him, for that their Colonel Sir John Norris and the States were somewhat slow to provide for their pay, for the which they intended to give order, but it was too late. For after that the English had chased away the rest of the garrison which were of the country, then did Captain Pigot, Vincent, Tailor, and others, agree to deliver up the town unto the Spaniards, giving them for their pay, which they received, thirty thousand pistoles. . . . and so the said town was delivered unto the Spaniard in the beginning of December, and filled with Wallons. Most of these English went to serve the Prince of Parma in his camp before Ecklee, but finding that he trusted them not, they ran in a manner all away." — Gilmont's Hist. 635.

It is one proof of the improved state of general feeling in the more civilized states of Europe, that instances of this kind of treachery have long since ceased even to be suspected. During the long wars in the Netherlands, nothing was more common than for officers to change their party, — considering war as a mere profession, in which their survivors, like those of a lawyer, were for the best bidder.

Then saw we Alkmaen, by rain wet. — I. 42, p. 752.

This magnificent Abbey was destroyed during the Revolution, — an act of popular madness which the people in its vicinity now spoke of with unavailing regret. The library was at one time the richest in Brabant; "celebrisima," Luigi Guicciardini calls it, "arto quidem, et quod ad libros antiquos habuitur posse lectiones simul at et lectiones carminum carceris satra tractat." The destruction of books during the Revolution was deplorably great. A bookseller at Brussels told me he had himself at one time sent off five and twenty wagon loads for waste paper, and sold more than 100,000 lb. weight for the same purpose! In this manner were the convent-libraries destroyed.

The Flemish name of these said cakes has a marvellously uncouth appearance — aegiiler-koechins; — nevertheless they are good cakes, and are sold by Judocus de Bisschop, at the sign of the Moor, next door to the Auberge la Tête-de-Bœuf. This information is for those whom it may concern.

One of our coachmen, who had been employed (like all his fraternity) in removing the wounded, asked us what was the meaning of the English word O Lord! for thus, he said, the wounded were continually crying out.

Brezantium in all her cities felt the sound. — II. 15, p. 753.

The battle of the 18th was heard throughout the whole of Brezantium, and in some directions beyond it. It was distinctly heard at Herve; and I have been assured, incredible as it may seem, that it was perceived at Amiens. The firing on the 16th was heard at Antwerp, — not that of the 18th, though the scene of action was nearer.

Here Castiianae reared a notice fans. — III. 1, p. 753.

Hoc Sacellum

Ant. Agurto Marchio de Castiianae Belg. Gubernor.

The a in Gubernator has been left out, either by the mistake of the workmen, or for want of room. Catarh H. of Spain, one of the most wretched of men, married for his first wife Marie Louise, Lewis the Fourteenth's niece. A curious instance of the public anxiety that she should produce an heir to the throne is preserved by Fiores in his Memorias de las Regnas Catholicas. When she had been married two years without issue, this strange epigram, if so it may be called, was circulated.

Parid bella Flor de Lis

En officem tan extra

St paris, paris d Espana,

Si la paris, d Paris.

Fiores describes the dress of the bride at her espousals: it was a robe of maroon velvet embroidered with fleurs du lys of gold trimmed with ermine and jewels, and with a train of seven ells long; the princesses of the blood had all long trains, but not so long, the length being according to their proximity to the throne. The description of a Queen's dress accorded well with the antiquarian pursuits of Fiores; but it is amusing to observe some of the expressions of this laborious writer, a monk of the most rigid habits, whose life was spent in severe study, and in practices of mortification. In her head-dress, he says, she wore porcelain plumes which supported large diamonds, — y convection en cielo apart paso de tierra; and at the ball after the espousals, et Christianissima donor la Catholica. These appellations sound almost as oddly as Messrs. Bogue and Bennett's description of St. Paul in a minuet, and Timothy at a card-table.

This poor Queen lived eight years with a husband whose mind and body were equally debilitated. Never were the miseries of a mere state-marriage more lamentably exemplified. In her last illness, when she was advised to implore the prayers of a personage who was living in the odor of sanctity for her recovery, she replied, Certainly I will not — it would be folly to ask for a life which is worth so little. And when, toward the last, her Confessor inquired if any thing troubled her, her answer was that she was in perfect peace, and rejoiced that she was dying, — en pur je boutis, y vaing guentou de morir. She died on the 12th of February; and such was the solicitude for an heir to the monarchy, that on the 15th of May a second marriage was concluded for the King.

La belle alliance, call it Hougoumont, call it La Haye Sainte, call it Waterloo, — anything but Waterloo.

A man at Les Quatre Bras, who spoke with the usual enthusiasm of the Prince of Orange's conduct in the campaign, declared that he fought "like a devil on horseback." Looking at a portrait of the Queen of the Netherlands, a lady observed that there was a resemblance to the Prince; a young Fleming was quite angry at this, — he could not bear that his hero should not be thought beautiful as well as brave.

Genappe. — IV. 19, p. 757.

At the Roy d'Espagne, where we were lodged, Wellington had his head-quarters on the 17th, Bonaparte on the 18th, and Blucher on the 19th. The counsellors had told us that it was an ease; but when one of them in the morning asked how we had passed the night, he observed that no one ever slept at Genappe, — it was impossible, because of the continual passage of posts and coal-carts.

It is odd that the inscription upon the directing-post at Les Quatre Bras, (or rather boards, for they are fastened against a house,) should be given wrongly in the account of the campaign printed at Frankfort. The real directions are, 3 de pèr ver St. Donut 3 de pèr ver Genappe 3 de pèr ver Marbouin 3 de pèr ver France, spread in this manner, and ill cut. I happened to copy it in a mood of superfluous minuteness.

A fat and jolly Willoon, who inhabited this corner house, ate his dinner in peace of twelve o'clock on the 16th, and was driven out by the balls flying about his ears at four the same day. This man described that part of the action which took place in his sight, with great animadversion. He was particularly impressed by the rage, — the absolute fury which the French displayed; they cursed the English while they were fighting, and cursed the precision with which the English grape-shot was fired, which, said the man, was neither too high nor too low, but struck right in the middle. The last time that a British army had been in this place, the Duke of York slept in this man's bed, — an event which the Wallon remembered with gratitude as well as pride, the Duke having given him a Louis d'or.

O wherefore have ye spared his head accursed? — IV. 36, p. 759.

Among the peasantry with whom we conversed this feeling was universal. We met with many persons who disliked the union with Holland, and who hated the Prussians, but none who spoke in favor or even in palliation of Bonaparte. The manner in which this ferocious beast, as they call him, has been treated, has given a great shock to the moral feelings of mankind. The almost general mode of accounting for it on the Continent, is by a supposition that England purposely let him loose from Elba in order to have a pretext for again attacking her, and crippling a country which had left her too strong, and which would soon have outstripped her in prosperity. I found it impossible to dispossess even men of sound judgment and great ability of this belief, preposterous as it is; and when they read the account of the luxuries which have been sent to St. Helena for the accommodation of this great criminal, they will consider it as the fullest proof of their opinion.

And now they felt the Prussian’s heavy hand. — IV. 43, p. 739.

Wherever we went we heard one cry of complaint against the Prussians, — except at Ligny, where the people had witnessed only their courage and their sufferings. This is the effect of using the military spirit predominant in a nation. The conduct of our men was universally extolled; but it required years of exertion and severity before Lord Wellington brought the British army to its present state of discipline. The moral discipline of an army has never perhaps been under-told in any General, except the great Gustavus. Even in its best state, with all the alleviations of courtesy and honour, with all the correctives of morality and religion, war is so great an evil, that to engage in it without a clear necessity is a crime of the blackest dye. When the necessity is clear, (and such, assuredly, I held it to have been in our struggle with Bonaparte,) it then becomes a crime to shirk from it.

What I have said of the Prussians relates solely to their conduct in an allied country; and I must also say that the Prussian officers with whom I had the good fortune to associate, were men who in every respect did honor to their profession and to their country. But that the general conduct of their troops in Belgium had excited a strong feeling of disgust and indignation we had abundant and indisputable testimony. In France they had old wrongs to revenge, — and forgiveness of injuries is not among the virtues which are taught in camps. The annexed anecdotes are reprinted from one of our newspapers, and ought to be preserved.

A Prussian Officer, on his arrival at Paris, particularly requested to be billeted on the house of a lady inhabiting the Faubourg St. Germain. His request was complied with, and on his arriving at the lady’s hotel, he was shown into a small but comfortable sitting room, with a handsome bed-chamber adjoining it. With these rooms he appeared greatly dissatisfied, and desired that the lady should give up to him her apartment in front (first floor), which was very spacious, and very elegantly furnished. To this the lady made the strongest objections; but the Officer insisted, and she was under the necessity of retiring to the second floor. He afterwards sent a message to her by one of her servants, saying that he desired the second floor for his Ald-de-Camp, &c. &c. This occasioned more violent remonstrances from the lady, but they were totally unavailing, and unattended to by the Officer, whose only answer was, "obligez a mes ordres." He then called for the cook, and told him he must prepare a handsome dinner for the six persons, and desired the lady’s wife, to take care that the best wines the cellar contained should be forthcoming. After dinner he desired the hostess should be sent for; — she obeyed the summons. The Officer then addressed her, and said, "No doubt, Madam, but you consider my conduct as indecent and brutal in the extreme." — I must confess, replied she, "that I did not expect such treatment from an officer; as, in general, military men are ever disposed to show every degree of deference and respect to our sex." — You think me then a most perfect barbarian? answer me frankly." — If you really, then, desire my undisguised opinion of the subject, I must say, that I think your conduct truly barbarous. — Madam, I am entirely of your opinion; but I only wished to give you a specimen of the behavior and conduct of your son, during six months that he resided in my house, after the entrance of the French army into the Prussian capital. I do not, however, mean to follow a bad example. You will resume, therefore, your apartment to-morrow, and I will seek lodgings at some public hotel. The lady then retired, extolling the generous conduct of the Prussian officer, and deprecating that of her son.

Another Prussian officer was lodged at the house of Marshal Ney, in whose stables and coach-house he found a great number of horses and carriages. He immediately ordered some Prussian soldiers, who accompanied him, to take away nine of the horses and three of the carriages. Ney’s servants violently remonstrated against this proceeding, on which the Prussian officer observed, "They are my property, insomuch as your master took the same number of horses and carriages from me when he entered Berlin with the French army." I think you will agree with me, that thelett lance was never more properly nor more justly resorted to.

Sir Thomas Brown writes upon this subject with his usual feeling.

"We applaud not," says he, "the judgment of Machiavel, that Christianity makes men cowards, or that, with the confidence of not half dying, the desired virtues of patience and humility have abased the spirits of men, which pagan princes exalted; but rather regulated the wildness of audacities in the attempts, grounds and eternal sequels of death, wherein men of the boldest spirit are often prodigiously terminated. The honest but scriptural appllication by which our Fathers were wont to designate the Church of Rome has been delicately softened down by later writers. I have seen her somewhere called the Scarlet Woman, — and Helen Maria Williams names her the Dissolute of Babylon. Let me here offer a suggestion in defence of Voltaire. Is it not probable, or rather can any person doubt, that the érênes Pinoise, upon which so horrible a charge against him has been raised, refers to the Church of Rome, under this well-known designation? No man can hold the principles of Voltaire in stronger abhorrence than I do, but it is an act of justice to exculpate him from this monstrous accusation.

"Political chimeras," says Count Stolberg, "are innumerable; but the most chimerical is the project of imagining that a people deeply sunk in degeneracy may recover the ancient grandeur of freedom. Who tosses the bird into the air after his wings are clipped? So far from restoring it to the power of flight, it will but disable it more."

— Tragedia, lxxii. 129.

The epigraph lyric, as applied to the dark, is borrowed from one of Donne’s poems. I mention this more particularly for the purpose of repairing an accidental omission in the notes to Roderick; — it is the duty of every poet to acknowledge all his obligations of this kind to his predecessors.

I will insert here a passage from one of Lord Brooke’s poems. Few writers have ever given proofs of profounder thought than this friend of Sir Philip Sydney. Had his command of language been equal to his strength of intellect, I scarcely know the author whom he would not have surpassed
NOTES TO THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE.

XXI.

Some love no equals, some superiors scorn,
One seeks more worlds, and this will Helen have;
This covet gold, with dives fault burned,
These honors reign, and lead men to their grave;
Whereby for laws and little wages we
Ruin ourselves to raise up tyranny.

XXII.

And as when winds among themselves do jar,
Seas there are lost, and wave with wave must fight;
So when power's restless honors bring forth War,
There people bear the faults and wounds of Might;
The error and diseases of the head
Descending still until the limbs be dead.

XXIII.

Yet are not people's errors ever free
From guilt of wounds they suffer by the war;
Never did any public misery
Rise of itself: God's plagues still grounded are
On common stains of our humanity;
And to the flame which ruineth mankind
Man gives the matter, or at least gives wind.

The extract which follows, from the same author, bears directly upon the effects of the military system as if it had been written with a reference to Bonaparte's government. The thoughtful reader will perceive its intrinsic value, through its difficult language and uncoath version.

LIX.

Let us then thus conclude, that only they
Whose end in this world is the world to come,
Whose hearts' desire is that their desires may Measure themselves by Truth's eternal dooms,
Can in the War find nothing that they prize,
Who in the world would not be great or wise.

LX.

With these, I say, War, Coqurest, Honor, Fame,
Stand (as the world) neglected or forsaken,
Like Error's cowwebs, in whose curious frame
She only joys and mourning, takes and is taken;
In which these dying, that to God live thus,
Exceed our coquest, would not conquer us.

LXI.

Where all states else that stand on power, not grace,
And gage desire by no such spiritual measure,
Make it their end to reign in every place;
To war for honor, for revenge and pleasure;
Thinking the strong should keep the weak in awe,
And every inequality give law.

LXII.

These serve the world to rule her by her arts,
Raise mortal trophies upon mortal passion;
Their wealth, strength, glory, growing from those hearts
Which to their ends they reign and disfashion;
The more remote from God the less remorse;
Which still gives Honor power, Occasion force.

LXIII.

These make the Sword their judge of wrong and right,
Their story Fame, their laws but Power and Wit;
Their endless mine all vanities of Might,
Rewards and Pains the mystery of it;
And in this sphere, this wilderness of evils,
None prosper highly but the perfect Devils.

Napoléon. — IV. 15, p. 769.

It is amusing to look back upon the batterly which was offered to Bonaparte. Some poems of Mme. Fanny de Beauharains exhibit rich specimens of this kind; she praises him for la douce humanité

Que le devoir de sa flamme;

Of the battle of Austerlitz she says,

Dans ce jour mémorable on dut faire la guerre,
Et que nononrent maints auteurs

Subsequent events give some to these adulatory strains an interest which they would else have wanted.

In some stanzas, called Les Trois Bateaux, upon the vessels in which Alexander and Bonaparte held their conferences before the Peace of Tilsit, the following prophecy is introduced, with a felicity worthy of the Edinburgh Review:

Ces glorieux batteaux, exempts d'ambition,

Here follows part of an Arabic poem by Michael Sibbal, addressed to Bonaparte on his marriage with Marie Louise, and printed, with translations in French prose and German verse, in the first volume of the Fandgruben der Oriens:

August Prince, whom Heaven has given us for Sovereign, and who holdest among the greatest monarchs of thy age the same rank which the diadem holds upon the head of Kings,

Thou hast reached the summit of happiness, and by thine invincible courage hast attained a glory which the mind of man can scarcely comprehend;

Thou hast hasted upon the front of time the remembrance of thine innumerable exploits in characters of light, one of which alone suffices with its brilliant rays to enlighten the whole universe.

Who can resist him who is never abandoned by the assistance of Heaven, who has Victory for his guide, and whose course is directed by God himself?

In every age Fortune produces a hero who is the pearl of his time; amidst all these extraordinary men thou shinest like an inestimable diamond in a necklace of precious stones.

The least of thy subjects, in whatever country he may be, is the object of universal homage, and enjoys thy glory, the splendor of which is reflected upon him.

All virtues are united in thee, but the justice which regulates all thy actions would alone suffice to immortalize thy name.

1.
There was a time when all my youthful thought
Was of the Muse; and of the Poet's fame,
How fair it flourishest, and fadeth not,—
Alone enduring, when the Monarch's name
Is but an empty sound, the Conqueror's bust
Moulders and is forgotten in the dust.

2.
How best to build the imperishable lay
Was then my daily care, my dream by night;
And early in adventurous essay
My spirit imp'd her wings for stronger flight;

CARMEN NUPTIALE.

The Lay of the Laureate.

Fair regions Fancy open'd to my view,—
"There lies thy path," she said; "do thou that path pursue!"

3.
"For what hast thou to do with wealth or power,
Thou whom rich Nature at thy happy birth
Bless'd in her bounty with the largest dower
That Heaven indulges to a child of Earth,—
Then when the sacred Sisters for their own
Baptized thee in the springs of Helicon?"

4.
"They promised for thee that thou shouldst eschew
All low desires, all empty vanities;
That thou shouldst, still to Truth and Freedom true, The applause or censure of the herd despise; And, in obedience to their impulse given, Walk in the light of Nature and of Heaven.

5. "Along the World's highway let others crowd, Jostling and moling on through dust and heat; Far from the vain, the vicious, and the proud, Take thou, content in solitude, thy seat; To noble ends devote thy sacred art, And nurse for better worlds thine own immortal part!"

6. Praise to that Power who, from my earliest days, Thus taught me what to seek and what to shun, Who turn'd my footsteps from the crowded ways, Appointing me my better course to run In solitude, with studious l, sure bless'd, The mind unfetter'd, and the heart at rest.

7. For therefore have my days been days of joy, And all my paths are paths of pleasantness: And still my heart, as when I was a boy, Doth never know an ebb of cheerfulness; Time, which matures the intellectual part, Hath tinged my hairs with gray, but left untouch'd my heart.

8. Sometimes I soar where Fancy guides the rein, Beyond this visible diurnal sphere; But most, with long and self-approving pain, Patient pursue the historian's task severe; Thus in the ages which are past I live, And those which are to come my sure reward will give.

9. Yea, in this new, while Malice frets her hour, Is foretaste given me of that meed divine; Here, undisturb'd in this sequester'd bower, The friendship of the good and wise is mine; And that green wreath which decks the Bard when dead, That laureate garland, crowns my living head.

10. That wreath which, in Eliza's golden days, My Master dear, divinest Spenser, wore, That which rewarded Drayton's learned lays, Which thoughtful Ben and gentle Daniel bore, Grin, Env'y, through thy ragged mask of scorn! In honor it was given, with honor it is worn!

11. Proudly I offer'd to the royal ear My song of joy when War's dread work was done, And glorious Britain round her satiate spear The olive garland twined, by Victory won; Exulting as became me in such cause, I offer'd to the Prince his People's just applause.

12. And when, as if the tales of old Romance Were but to typify his splendid reign, Princes and Potentates from conquer'd France, And chiefs in arms approved, a peerless train, Assembled at his Court,—my duteous lays Preferr'd a welcome of enduring praise.

13. And when that last and most momentous hour Beheld the re-risen cause of evil yield To the Red Cross and England's arm of power, I sung of Waterloo's unequall'd field, Paying the tribute of a soul imbued With deepest joy devout and awful gratitude.

14. Such strains beseech'd me well. But how shall I To hymneal numbers tune the string, Who to the trumpet's martial symphony, And to the mountain gales am wont to sing? How may these uncustom'd accents suit To the sweet dulcimer and courtly lute?

15. Fitter for me the lofty strain severe, That calls for vengeance for mankind oppress'd; Fitter the songs that youth may love to hear, Which warm and elevate the throbbing breast; Fitter for me with need of solemn verse, In reverence, to adorn the hero's hearse.

16. But then my Master dear arose to mind, He on whose song, while yet I was a boy, My spirit fed, attracted to its kind, And still insatiate of the growing joy;— He on whose tomb these eyes were wont to dwell, With inward yearnings which I may not tell;—

17. He whose green bays shall bloom forever young, And whose dear name whenever I repeat, Reverence and love are trembling on my tongue; Sweet Spenser, sweetest Bard; yet not more sweet Than pure was he, and not more pure than wise, High Priest of all the Muses' mysteries.

18. I call'd to mind that mighty Master's song, When he brought home his beautifulst bride, And Mulla murmur'd her sweet undersong, And Mole with all his mountain woods replied Never to mortal lips a strain was given More rich with love, more redolent of Heaven.
20.
His cup of joy was mantling to the brim,
Yet solemn thoughts enhanced his deep delight;
A holy feeling fill'd his marriage-hymn,
And Love aspired with Faith a heavenward flight.
And hast not thou, my Soul, a solemn theme?
I said, and mused until I fell into a dream.

THE DREAM.
1.
Methought I heard a stir of hasty feet,
   And horses tramp'd and coaches roll'd along,
And there were busy voices in the street,
   As if a multitude were hurrying on;
A stir it was which only could befall
Upon some great and solemn festival.

2.
Such crowds I saw, and in such glad array,
   It seem'd some general joy had fill'd the land;
Age had a sunshine on its cheek that day,
   And children, tottering by the mother's hand,
Too young to ask why all this joy should be,
Partook it, and rejoiced for sympathy.

3.
The shops, that no dull care might intervene,
   Were closed; the doors within were lined with heads;
Glad faces were at every window seen,
   And from the cluster'd house-tops and the leads,
Others, who took their stand in patient row,
Look'd down upon the crowds that swarm'd below.

4.
And every one of all that numerous throng
   On head or breast a marriage symbol wore;
The war-horse proudly, as he paced along,
   Those joyous colors in his forelock wore,
And arch'd his stately neck as for delight,
To show his mane thus pompously bedight.

5.
From every church the merry bells rung round
   With gladdening harmony heard far and wide;
In many a mingled peal of swelling sound,
   The ringing music came on every side;
And banners from the steeples waved on high,
And streamers flutter'd in the sun and sky.

6.
Anon the cannon's voice in thunder spoke;
   Westward it came; the East returned the sound;
Burst after burst the innoxious thunders brake,
   And roll'd from side to side with quick rebound.
O happy land, where that terrible voice
Speaks but to bid all habitants rejoice!

7.
Thereat the crowd rush'd forward one and all,
   And I too in my dream was borne along.

Eftsoon, methought, I reach'd a festal hall,
   Where guards in order ranged repell'd the throng,
But I had entrance through that guarded door,
In honor to the laureate crown I wore.

8.
That spacious hall was hung with trophies round,
   Memorials proud of many a well-won day:
The flag of France there trail'd toward the ground;
   There in captivity her Eagles lay,
And under each, in eye-enduring gold,
One well-known word its fatal story told.

9.
There read I Nile, conspicuous from afar;
   Those Marmont left in that illustrious fight
By Salamanca, when too soon the sun
   Went down, and darkness hid the Frenchman's flight.
These from Vittoria were in triumph borne,
When from the Intruder's head Spain's stolen crown was torn.

11.
These on Pyrene's awful heights were gain'd,
   The trophies of that memorable day,
When deep with blood her mountain springs were stain'd.
   Above the clouds and lightnings of that fray,
Wheeling afar the affrighted eagles fled;
At eve the wolves came forth and prey'd upon the dead.

12.
And blood-stain'd flags were here from Orthies borne,
   Trampled by France beneath her flying feet;
And what before Thoulouse from Soult were torn,
   When the stern Marshal met his last defeat,
Yielding once more to Britain's arm of might,
And Wellington in mercy spared his flight.

13.
There hung the Eagles which, with victory flush'd,
   From Fleurus and from Ligny proudly flew,
To see the Usurper's high-swollen fortune crush'd
   Forever on the field of Waterloo,—
Day of all days, surpassing in its fame
All fields of elder or of later name!

14.
There, too, the painter's universal art
   Each story told to all beholders' eyes;
And Sculpture there had done her fitting part,
   Bidding the forms perdurable arise
Of those great Chiefs who in the field of fight
Had best upheld their country's sacred right.
15. There stood our peerless Edward, gentle-souled,
The Sable Prince, of chivalry the flower;
And that Plantagenet of stern mien,
He who the conquer'd crown of Gallia wore;
And Blake, and Nelson, Glory's favorite son,
And Marlborough there, and Wolfe, and Wellington.

16. But from the statues and the storied wall,
The living scene withdrew my wondering sense;
For with accordant pomp that gorgeous hall
Was fill'd; and I beheld the opulency
Of Britain's Court,—a proud assemblage there,
Her Statesmen, and her Warriors, and her Fair.

17. Amid that Hall of Victory, side by side,
Conspicuous o'er the splendid company,
There sat a royal Bridegroom and his Bride;
In her fair cheek, and in her bright blue eye,
Her flaxen locks, and her benignant mien,
The marks of Brunswick's Royal Line were seen.

18. Of princely lineage and of princely heart,
The Bridegroom seem'd,—a man approved in
Who in the great deliverance bore his part,
And had pursued the recreant Tyrant's flight,
When, driven from injured Germany, he fled,
Bearing the curse of God and Man upon his head.

19. Guardant before his feet a Lion lay,
The Saxon Lion, terrible of yore,
Who, in his wither'd limbs and lean decay,
The marks of long and cruel bondage bore;
But broken now beside him lay the chain,
Which gall'd and fretted late his neck and mane.

20. A Lion too was couch'd before the Bride;
That noble Beast had never felt the chain;
Strong were his sinewy limbs and smooth his hide,
And o'er his shoulders broad the affluent mane
Dishevell'd hung; beneath his feet were laid
Torn flags of France, whereon his head he made.

21. Full different were those Lions twin in plight,
Yet were they of one brood; and side by side
Of old, the Gallic Tiger in his might
They many a time had met, and quell'd his pride,
And made the treacherous spoiler from their ire,
Covering and crippled, to his den retire.

22. Two forms divine on either side the throne,
Its heavenly guardians, male and female stood;
His eye was bold, and on his brow there shone
Contempt of all base things, and pride subdued
To wisdom's will: a warrior's garb he wore,
And Hexion was the name the Genius bore.

23. That other form was in a snow-white vest,
As well her virgin loveliness became;
Erect her port, and on her spotless breast
A blood-red cross was hung: Faith was her name,
As by that sacred emblem might be seen,
And by her eagle eye, and by her dove-like mien.

24. Her likeness such to that robuster power,
That sure his sister she might have been deem'd,
Child of one womb at one auspicious hour.
Akin they were, yet not as thus it seem'd;
For he of Valor was the eldest son,
From Arcté in happy union sprang.

25. But her to Phrenis Eusebeia bore,
She whom her mother Dicé sent to earth;
What marvel then if thus their features were
Resemblant lineaments of kindred birth,
Dicé being child of Him who rules above,
Valor his earth-born son; so both derived from Jove.

26. While I stood gazing, suddenly the air
Was fill'd with solemn music breathing round;
And yet no mortal instruments were there,
Nor seem'd that melody an earthly sound,
So wondrously it came, so passing sweet,
For some strange pageant sure a prelude meet.

27. In every breast methought there seem'd to be
A hush of reverence mingled with dismay;
For now appear'd a heavenly company
Toward the royal seat who held their way;
A Female Form majestic led them on,—
With awful port she came, and stood before the Throne.

28. Gentle her mien, and void of all offence;
But if aught wrong'd her, she could strike such fear,
As when Minerva, in her Sire's defence,
Shook in Phlegraean fields her dreadful spear.
Yet her benignant aspect told that ne'er
Would she refuse to heed a suppliant's prayer.

29. The Trident of the Seas in her right hand,
The sceptre which that Bride was born to wield,
She bore, in symbol of her just command,
And in her left display'd the Red-Cross shield.
A plume of milk-white feathers overspread
The laurel'd helm which graced her lofty head.

30. Daughter of Brunswick's fated line, she said,
While joyful realms their gratulations pay,
And ask for blessings on thy bridal bed,
We, too, descend upon this happy day;—
Receive with willing ear what we impart,
And treasure up our counsels in thy heart!

31.

Long may it be ere thou art call’d to bear
The weight of empire in a day of woe!
Be it thy favor’d lot meantime to share
The joys which from domestic virtue flow,
And may the lessons which are now impress’d,
In years of leisure, sink into thy breast.

32.

Look to thy Sire, and in his steady way,
As in his Father’s he, learn thou to tread;
That thus, when comes the inevitable day,
No other change be felt than of the head
Which wears the crown; thy name will then be blest
Like theirs, when thou, too, shalt be call’d to rest.

33.

Love peace and cherish peace; but use it so
That War may find thee ready at all hours;
And ever when thou strik’st, let the blow
Be swift and sure: then put forth all the powers
Which God hath given thee to redress thy wrong,
And, powerful as thou art, the strife will not be long.

34.

Let not the sacred Trident from thy hand
Depart, nor lay the falchion from thy side!
Queen of the Seas, and mighty on the land,
Thy power shall then be dreaded far and wide:
And trusting still in God and in the Right,
Thou mayst again defy the World’s collected might.

35.

Thus as she ceased, a comely Sage came on,
His temples and capacious forehead spread
With locks of venerable eel, which shone
As when, in wintry morns, on Skiddaw’s head
The cloud, the sunshine, and the snow unite,
So silvery, so unsullied, and so white.

36.

Of Kronos and the Nymph Mnemosynè
He sprang, on either side a birth divine;
Thus to the Olympian Gods allied was he,
And brother to the sacred Sisters nine,
With whom he dwelt in interchange of love,
Each thus instructing each for evermore.

37.

They call’d him Praxis in the Olympian tongue; But here on earth Experience was his name.
Whatever things have pass’d to him were known,
And he could see the future ere it came;
Such foresight was his patient wisdom’s meed,—
Alas for those who his wise counsels will not heed!

38.

He bore a goodly volume, which he laid
Between that princely couple on the throne.

Lo, there my work for this great realm, he said,
My work, which with the kingdom’s growth has grown,
The rights, the usages, the laws wherein Blessed above all nations she hath been.

39.

Such as the sacred trust to thee is given,
So unimpair’d transmit it to thy line:
Preserve it as the choicest gift of Heaven,
Alway to make the bliss of thee and thine:
The talisman of England’s strength is there,—
With reverence guard it, and with jealous care!

40.

The next who stood before that royal pair
Came gliding like a vision o’er the ground;
A glory went before him through the air,
Ambrosial odors floated all around,
His purple wings a heavenly lustre shed
A silvery halo round his head

41.

The Angel of the English Church was this,
With whose divinest presence there appear’d
A glorious train, inheritors of bliss,
Saints in the memory of the good revered,
Who, having render’d back their vital breath
To Him from whom it came, were perfected by Death.

42.

Edward the spotless Tudor, there I knew,
In whose pure breast, with pious nurture fed,
All generous hopes and gentle virtues grew;
A heavenly diadem adorn’d his head,—
Most blessed Prince, whose saintly name might move
The understanding heart to tears of reverent love.

43.

Less radiant than King Edward, Cranmer came,
But purged from persecution’s sable spot;
For he had given his body to the flame,
And now in that right hand, which, flinching not,
He proffer’d to the fire’s stoning doom,
Bore he the unfading palm of martyrdom.

44.

There too came Latimer, in worth allied,
Who, to the stake when brought by Romish rage,
As if with prison weeds he cast aside
The infirmity of flesh and weight of age,
Bow-bent till then with weakness, in his shroud
Stood up erect and firm before the admiring crowd.

45.

With these, partakers in beatitude,
Bearing like them the palm, their emblem meet,
The Noble Army came, who had subdued
All frailty, putting death beneath their feet:
Their robes were like the mountain snow, and bright
As though they had been dipp’d in the fountain springs of light.
46. For these were they who valiantly endured
    The fierce extremity of mortal pain,
By no weak tenderness to life allured,
The victims of that hateful Henry's reign,
And of the bloody Queen, beneath whose sway
Rome lit her fires, and Fiends kept holyday.

47. O pardon me, thrice holy Spirits dear,
    That hastily I now must pass ye by!
No want of duteous reverence is there here;
None better knows nor deeper feels than I
What to your sufferings and your faith we owe,
Ye valiant champions for the truth below!

48. Hereafter, haly, with maturer care,
    (So Heaven permit,) that reverence shall be shown.
Now of my vision I must needs declare,
And how the Angel stood before the throne,
And, fixing on that Princess, as he spake,
His eye benign, the awful silence brake.

49. Thus said the Angel — Thou to whom one day
    There shall in earthy guardianship be given
The English Church, preserve it from decay!
Ere now for that most sacred charge hath Heaven
In perilous times provided female means,
Blessing it beneath the rule of pious Queens.

50. Bear thou that great Eliza in thy mind,
    Who from a wreck this fabric edifi'd;
And Her who, to a nation's voice resign'd,
When Rome in hope its wildest engines plied,
By her own heart and righteous Heaven approved,
Stood up against the Father whom she loved.

51. Laying all mean regards aside, fill Thou
    Her seats with wisdom and with learned worth;
That so, whene'er attack'd, with fearless brow
Her champions may defend her rights on earth;
Link'd is her welfare closely with thine own;
One fate attends the Altar and the Throne!

52. Think not that lapse of ages shall abate
    The inveterate malice of that Harlot old;
Fallen though thou deem'st her from her high estate,
She proffers still the envenom'd cup of gold,
And her fierce Beast, whose names are Blasphemy,
The same that was, is still, and still must be.

53. The stern Sectarian in unnatural league
    Joins her to war against their hated foe;
Error and Faction aid the bold intrigue,
And the dark Atheist seeks her overthrow,
While giant Zeal in arms against her stands,
Barks with a hundred mouths, and lifts a hundred hands.

54. Built on a rock, the fabric may repel
    Their utmost rage, if all within be sound;
But if within the gates Indulgence dwell,
Woe to her then! there needs no outward wound!
Through her whole frame benumb'd, a lethal sleep,
Like the cold poison of the asp, will creep.

55. In thee, as in a cresset set on high,
    The light of piety should shine far seen,
A guiding beacon fix'd for every eye:
Thus from the influence of an honor'd Queen,
As from its spring, should public good proceed,—
The peace of Heaven will be thy proper meed.

56. So should return that happy state of yore,
    When piety and joy went hand in hand;
The love which to his flock the shepherd bore,
The old observances which 's e r d the land,
The household prayers which, honoring God's high name,
Kept the lamp trimm'd and fed the sacred flame.

57. Thus having spoke, away the Angel pass'd
    With all his train, dissolving from the sight:
A transitory shadow overcast
The sudden void they left; all meancer light
Seeming like darkness to the eye which lost
The full effulgence of that heavenly host.

58. Eftsoon, in reappearing light confess'd,
    There stood another Minister of bliss,
With his own radiance clothed as with a vest.
One of the angelic company was this,
Who, guardians of the rising human race,
Alway in Heaven behold the Father's face.

59. Somewhat he fix'd upon the royal Bride
    A contemplative eye of thoughtful grief;
The trouble of that look benign implied
A sense of wrongs for which he sought relief,
And that Earth's evils which go unredress'd
May waken sorrow in an Angel's breast.

60. I plead for babes and sucklings, he began,
    Those who are now, and who are yet to be;
I plead for all the surest hopes of man,
The vital welfare of humanity:
Oh! let not bestial Ignorance maintain
Longer within the land her brutalizing reign.

61. O Lady, if some new-born babe should bless,
    In answer to a nation's prayers, thy love,
When thou, beholding it in tenderness,
The deepest, holiest joy of earth shalt prove,
In that the likeness of all infants see,
And call to mind that hour what now thou hear'st
from me.
Then seeing infant man, that Lord of Earth,
Most weak and helpless of all breathing things,
Remember that as Nature makes at birth
No different law for Peasants or for Kings,
And at the end no difference may befall,
The "short parenthesis of life" is all

But in that space, how wide may be their doom
Of honor or dishonor, good or ill!
From Nature's hand like plastic clay they come,
To take from circumstance their wise or weak;
And as the form and pressure may be given,
They wither upon earth, or ripen there for Heaven.

Is it then fitting that one soul should pine
For lack of culture in this favor'd land?
That spirits of capacity divine
Perish, like seeds upon the desert sand?
That needful knowledge in this age of light
Should not by birth be every Briton's right?

Little can private zeal effect alone;
The State must this state-malady redress;
For as, of all the ways of life, but one
The path of duty — leads to happiness,
So in their duty States must find at length
Their welfare, and their safety, and their strength.

This the first duty, carefully to train
The children in the way that they should go;
Then of the family of guilt and pain
How large a part were banish'd from below!
How would the people love with surest cause
Their country, and revere her venerable laws!

Is there, alas! within the human soul
An inbred taint disposing it for ill?
More need that early culture should control
And discipline by love the plant will!
The heart of man is rich in all good seeds;
Neglected, it is choked with tares and noxious weeds.

He ceased, and sudden from some unseen throng
A choral peal arose and shook the hall;
As when ten thousand children with their song
Fill the resounding temple of St. Paul;
Scarce can the heart their powerful tones sustain;
"Save, or we perish!" was the thrilling strain.

"Save, or we perish!" thrice the strain was sung
By unseen Souls innumerable hovering round;
And whilst the hall with their deep chorus rung,
The inmost heart was shaken with the sound;
I felt the refluent blood forsake my face,
And my knees trembled in that awful place.

Anon two female forms before our view
Came side by side, a beauteous complement;
The first a virgin clad in skyey blue;
Upward to Heaven her steadfast eyes were bent,
Her countenance an anxious meaning bore,
Yet such as might have made her loved the more.

This was that maiden, "sober, chaste, and wise,"
Who bringeth to all hearts their best delight:
"Though spoused, yet wanting wedlock's solemnize;"
"Daughter of Celia, and Speranza bright,
I knew her well as one whose portraiture
In my dear Master's verse forever will endure.

Her sister, too, the same divinest page
Taught me to know for that Charissa fair
"Of godly grace and comely personage,
Of wondrous beauty and of bounty rare,
Full of great love," in whose most gentle mien
The charms of perfect womanhood were seen.

This lovely pair unroll'd before the throne
"Earth's melancholy map," whereon to sight
Two broad divisions at a glance were shown,—
The empires these of Darkness and of Light.
Well might the thoughtful bosom sigh to mark
How wide a portion of the map was dark.

Behold, Charissa cried, how large a space
Of Earth lies unredeem'd! Oh, grief to think
That countless myriads of immortal race,
In error born, in ignorance must sink,
Train'd up in customs which corrupt the heart,
And following miserably the evil part!

Regard the expanded Orient, from the shores
Of scorch'd Arabia and the Persian sea,
To where the inhospitable Ocean roars
Against the rocks of frozen Tartary;
Look next at those Australian isles, which lie
Thick as the stars that stud the wintry sky;—

Then let thy mind contemplative survey
That spacious region, where, in elder time,
Earth's unremember'd conquerors held the sway;
And Science, trusting in her skill sublime,
With lore abstirce the sculptured walls o'erspread,
Its import now forgotten with the dead.

From Nile and Congo's undiscover'd springs
To the four seas which gird the unhappy land,
Behold it left a prey to barbarous Kings,
The Robber, or the Trader's ruthless hand:
Sinning and suffering, every where unbless'd,
Behold her wretched sons, oppressing and oppress'd."
The Lay of the Laureate.

To England is the Eastern empire given,
And hers the sceptre of the circling main;
Shall she not then diffuse the word of Heaven
Through all the regions of her trusted reign,—
Wage against evil things the hallow’d strife,
And sow with liberal hand the seeds of life!

By strenuous efforts in a rightful cause,
Gloriously hath she surpass’d her ancient fame,
And won in arms the astonish’d World’s applause.
Yet may she win in peace a nobler name,
And Nations, which now lie in error blind,
Hail her the Friend and Teacher of Mankind!

Oh! what a part were that, Speranza then
Exclaim’d, to act upon Earth’s ample stage!
Oh! what a name among the sons of men
To leave, which should endure from age to age!
And what a strength that ministry of good
Should find in love and human gratitude!

Speed thou the work, Redeemer of the World!
That the long miseries of mankind may cease!
Where’er the Red Cross banner is unfurl’d
There let it carry truth, and light, and peace!
Did not the Angels who announced thy birth
Proclaim it with the sound of Peace on Earth?

Bless thou this happy Island, that the stream
Of blessing far and wide from hence may flow!
Bless it that thus thy saving Mercy’s beam
Reflected hence may shine on all below!
Thy kingdom come! thy will be done, O Lord!
And be thy Holy Name through all the world adored!

Thus as Speranza cried, she clasp’d her hands,
And heavenward lifted them in ardent prayer.
Lo! at the act the vaulted roof expands,—
Heaven opens, — and in empyreal air
Pouring its splendors through the inferior sky
More bright than noon-day suns the Cross appears on high.

A strain of heavenly harmony ensued,
Such as but once to mortal ears was known,—
The voice of that Angelic Multitude,
Who, in their Orders, stand around the Throne;
Peace upon Earth, Good Will to Men! they sung,
And Heaven and Earth with that prophetic anthem rung.

In holy fear I fell upon the ground,
And hid my face, unable to endure
The glory, or sustain the piercing sound;
In fear and yet in trembling joy, for sure
My soul that hour yearns’d strongly to be free,
That it might spread its wings in immortality.

Gone was the glory when I raised my head;
But in the air appear’d a form half seen,
Below with shadows dimly garmented,
And indistinct and dreadful was his mien:
Yet, when I gazed intentlier, I could trace
Divinest beauty in that awful face.

Hear me, O Princess! said the shadowy form,
As, in administering this mighty land,
Thou with thy best endeavor shalt perform
The will of Heaven, so shall my faithful hand
Thy great and endless recompense supply; —
My name is DEATH: the last, best friend am I!

EPILOGUE.

1.
Is this the Nuptial Song? with brow severe
Perchance the votaries of the world will say:
Are these fit strains for Royal ears to hear?
What man is he who thus assorts his lay,
And dares pronounce with inauspicious breath,
In Hymeneal verse, the name of Death?

2.
Remote from cheerful intercourse of men,
Hath he indulged his melancholy mood,
And, like the hermit in some sullen den,
Fed his distemper’d mind in solitude?
Or have fanatic dreams distraught his sense,
That thus he should presume with bold irreverence?

3.
O Royal Lady, ill they judge the heart
That reverently approaches thee to-day,
And anxious to perform its fitting part,
Prefers the tribute of this devout lay!
Not with displeasure should his song be read
Who prays for Heaven’s best blessings on thy head.

4.
He prays that many a year may pass away
Ere the State call thee from a life of love:
Vex’d by no public cares, that day by day
Thy heart the dear domestic joys may prove,
And gracious Heaven thy chosen nuptials bless
With all a Wife’s and all a Mother’s happiness.

5.
He prays that, for thine own and England’s sake,
The Virtues and the Household Charities
Their favor’d seat beside thy hearth may take;
That when the Nation thither turn their eyes,
There the conspicuous model they may find
Of all which makes the bliss of human-kind.

6.
He prays that, when the sceptre to thy hand
In due succession shall descend at length,
Prosperity and Peace may bless the Land,
Truth be thy counsellor, and Heaven thy strength;
That every tongue thy praises may proclaim,
And every heart in secret bless thy name.

7.
He prays that thou mayst strenuously maintain
The wise laws handed down from sire to son;
He prays that, under thy auspicious reign,
All may be added, which is left undone,
To make the realm, its polity complete,
In all things happy, as in all things great; —

8.
That, through the will of thy enlighten'd mind,
Brute man may be to social life reclaim'd;
That, in compassion for forlorn mankind,
The saving Faith may widely be proclaim'd
Through erring lands, beneath thy fostering care; —
This is his ardent hope, his loyal prayer.

9.
In every cottage may thy power be blest
For blessings which should every where abound;
Thy will, beneficent, from East to West,
May bring forth good where'er the sun goes round,
And thus, through future times, should Charles
Surpass our great Elizabeth's golden name.

10.
Of awful subjects have I dared to sing;
Yet surely are they such, as, view'd aright,
Contentment to thy better mind may bring;
A strain which haply may thy heart invite
To ponder well how to thy choice is given
A glorious name on Earth, a high reward in Heaven.

11.
Light strains, though cheerful as the hues of spring,
Would wither like a wreath of vernal flowers;
The amaranthine garland which I bring
Shall keep its verdure through all after-hours; —
Yea, while the Poet's name is doom'd to live,
So long this garland shall its fragrance give.

12.
"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown :"
Thus said the Bard who spake of kingly cares;
But calmly may the Sovereign then lie down
When grateful Nations guard him with their prayers

How sweet a sleep awaits the Royal head
When these keep watch and ward around the bed

L'ENVOY.
Go, little Book; from this my solitude,
I cast thee on the waters: — go thy ways!
And if, as I believe, thy voice be good,
The World will find thee, after many days.
Be it with thee according to thy worth: —
Go, little Book! in faith I send thee forth

NOTES.

The "short parenthesis of life" is all. — 62, p. 783.
I have borrowed this striking expression from Storer.
All as my chrysan, so my winding sheet;
None joy'd my birth, none mourn'd my death to see;
The short parenthesis of life was sweet,
But short! — what was before, unknown to me,
And what must follow is the Lord's decree.

Storer's Life and Death of Wolsey.
Let me insert here a beautiful passage from this forgotten poet, whose work has been retrieved from oblivion in the Heliconia.
Wolsey is speaking.

More fit the dirge of a mournful quire
In dull and notes all sorrow to exceed,
For him in whom the Prince's love is dead.

I am the tomb where that affection lies,
That was the closet where it living kept:
Yet wise men say affection never dies; —
No, but it turns, and when it long hath slept,
Looks heavy, like the eye that long hath wept.
O could it die, — that were a restful state!
But living, it converts to deadly hate.

IV.
Dame Celia men did her call, as thought
From Heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters well up-brought
In goodly thews or godly exercise:
The eldest two, most sober, chaste and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza virgins were,
Though spoused yet wanting wedlock's solemnize;
But fair Charissa to a lovely fire
Was linked, and by him had many pledges dear.

Faery Queene, Book I. c. 10.

I know her well as one whose portraiture
In my dear Master's verse forever will endure. — 71, p. 782.

XII.
Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,
Lo! two most godly virgins came in place,
Winkled arm in arm in lovely wise,
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbered equal steps and even pace;
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beams threw from her chrysal face,

99
Funeral Song,

For the Princess Charlotte of Wales.

Is its summer pride array'd,
Low our Tree of Hope is laid!
Low it lies:—in evil hour,
Visiting the bridal bower,
Death hath level'd root and flower.
Windsor, in thy sacred shade,
(This the end of pomp and power!)
Have the riles of death been paid:
Windsor, in thy sacred shade
Is the Flower of Brunswick laid!

Ye whose relics rest around,
Tenants of this funeral ground!
Know ye, Spirits, who is come,
By immitigable doom
Summon'd to the untimely tomb?
Late with youth and splendor crown'd,
Late in beauty'sernal bloom,
Late with love and joyance blest;
Never more lamented guest
Was in Windsor laid to rest.

Henry, thou of saintly worth,
Thou, to whom thy Windsor gave
Nativity, and name, and grave;
Thou art in this hallowed earth
Cradled for the immortal birth!
Heavily upon his head
Ancestral crimes were visited:

He, in spirit like a child,
Meek of heart and undefiled,
Patiently his crown resign'd,
And fix'd on heaven his heavenly mind,
Blessing, while he kiss'd the rod,
His Redeemer and his God.
Now may he in realms of bliss
Greet a soul as pure as his.

Passive as that humble spirit
Lies his bold dethroner too;
A dreadful debt did he inherit
To his injured lineage due;
Ill-star'd prince, whose martial merit
His own England long might rue!
Mournful was that Edward's fame,
Won in fields contested well,
While he sought his rightful claim:
Witness Air's unhappy water,
Where the ruthless Clifford fell;
And when Wharfe ran red with slaughter,
On the day of Towton's field,
Gathering, in its guilty flood,
The carnage and the ill-spilt blood
That forty thousand lives could yield.
Cressy was to this but sport,
Poitiers but a pageant vain;
And the victory of Spain
Seem'd a strife for pastime mean.
And the work of Agincourt
Only like a tournament;
Half the blood which there was spent,
Had sufficed again to gain
Anjou and ill-yielded Maine,
Normandy and Aquitaine,
And Our Lady's Ancient towers,
Maugre all the Valois' powers,
Had a second time been ours.—
A gentle daughter of thy line,
Edward, lays her dust with thine.

Thou, Elizabeth, art here;
Thou to whom all griefs were known;
Who wert placed upon the bier
In happier hour than on the throne.
Fatal daughter, fatal mother,
Raised to that ill-omen'd station,
Father, uncle, sons, and brother,
Mourn'd in blood her elevation!
Woodville, in the realms of bliss,
To thine offspring thou mayst say,
Early death is happiness;
And favor'd in their lot are they
Who are not left to learn below
That length of life is length of woe.
Lightly let this ground be press'd;
A broken heart is here at rest.

But thou, Seymour, with a greeting
Such as sisters use at meeting,
Joy, and sympathy, and love,
Wilt hail her in the seats above.
Like in loveliness were ye;
By a like lamented doom,
Hurried to an early tomb.
While together, spirits blest,
Here your earthly relics rest;
Fellow angels shall ye be
In the angelic company.

Henry, too, hath here his part;
At the gentle Seymour's side,
With his best beloved bride,
Cold and quiet, here are laid
The ashes of that fiery heart.
Not with his tyrannic spirit,
Shall our Charlotte's soul inherit;
No, by Fisher's hoary head,—
By More, the learned and the good,—
By Katharine's wrongs and Boleyn's blood,
By the life so basely shed
Of the pride of Norfolk's line,
By the axe so often red,
By the fire with martyrs fed,
Hateful Henry, not with thee
May her happy spirit be!

And here lies one whose tragic name
A reverential thought may claim;
That murder'd Monarch, whom the grave,
Revealing its long secret, gave
Again to sight, that we might spy
His comely face and waking eye!
There, thrice fifty years, it lay,
Exempt from natural decay,
Unclosed and bright, as if to say,
A plague, of bloodier, baser birth,
Than that beneath whose rage he bled,
Was loose upon our guilty earth;—
Such awful warning from the dead
Was given by that portentous eye;
Then it closed eternally.

Ye whose relics rest around,
Tenants of this funeral ground;
Even in your immortal spheres,
What fresh yearnings will ye feel,
When this earthly guest appears!
Us she leaves in grief and tears;
But to you will she reveal
Tidings of old England's weal;
Of a righteous war pursued,
Long, through evil and through good,
With unshaken fortitude;
Of peace, in battle twice achieved;
Of her fiercest foe subdued,
And Europe from the yoke releiv'd,
Upon that Brabantine plain!
Such the proud, the virtuous story,
Such the great, the endless glory
Of her father's splendid reign!
He who wore the sable mail
Might, at this splendid tale,
Wish himself on earth again.

One who reverently, for thee,
Raised the strain of bridal verse,
Flower of Brunswick! mournfully
Lays a garland on thy hearse.
A Vision of Judgment.

TO THE KING.

Sir,

Only to Your Majesty can the present publication with propriety be addressed. As a tribute to the sacred memory of our late revered Sovereign, it is my duty to present it to Your Majesty’s notice; and to whom could an experiment, which, perhaps, may be considered hereafter as of some importance in English Poetry, be so fitly inscribed, as to the Royal and munificent Patron of science, art, and literature?

We owe much to the House of Brunswick; but to none of that illustrious House more than to Your Majesty, under whose government the military renown of Great Britain has been carried to the highest point of glory. From that pure glory there has been nothing to detract; the success was not more splendid than the cause was good; and the event was desired by the generosity, the justice, the wisdom, and the magnanimity of the counsels which prepared it. The same perfect integrity has been manifested in the whole administration of public affairs. More has been done than was ever before attempted, for mitigating the evils incident to our stage of society; for imbuing the rising race with those sound principles of religion on which the welfare of states has its only secure foundation; and for opening new regions to the redundant enterprise and industry of the people. Under Your Majesty’s government, the Metropolis is rivalling in beauty those cities which it has long surpassed in greatness: sciences, arts, and letters are flourishing beyond all former example; and the last triumph of nautical discovery and of the British flag, which had so often been essayed in vain, has been accomplished. The brightest portion of British history will be that which records the improvements, the works, and the achievements of the Georgian Age.

That Your Majesty may long continue to reign over a free and prosperous people, and that the blessings of the happiest form of government which has ever been raised by human wisdom under the favor of Divine Providence, may, under Your Majesty’s protection, be transmitted unimpaired to posterity, is the prayer of

YOUR MAJESTY’S

Most dutiful Subject and Servant,

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE

THE PRESENT EDITION

THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

Soon after the publication of this poem, the Reverend S. Tillbrook, B. D., at that time Fellow of Peterhouse, and an old acquaintance of mine, published a pamphlet entitled,

"HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL REMARKS

UPON

THE MODERN HEXAMETERS,

AND UPON

MR. SOUTHEY’S VISION OF JUDGMENT.

'The Hexameter Verse I grant to be a gentleman of an ancient house, (so is many an English beggar;) yet this clime of ours he cannot thrive in; our speech is too creaky for him to set his plough in; he goes twitching and hopping, like a man running upon quagmires, up the hill in one syllable, and down the dale in another, retaining no part of that strictly smooth gait which he vaunts himself with among the Greeks and Latins."—THOMAS NAISH.

CAMBRIDGE.
1822.

The following extracts comprise the most important of Mr. Tillbrook’s animadversions:

"The Laureate says that ‘if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new pronunciation.’ But why not attempt to teach this tune on new principles? why leave the public without a guide to the accents and divisions of the Georgian hexameter? This should have been done either by—borrowing from the Latin rules—adopting those of the early prosodians—or by inventing a new metronome. It is difficult to recommend, much more to establish, any theoretical attempt upon individual authority, because practical experience is the best and ultimate test of success. After repeated trials, the enterprise in question has uniformly failed, and experience has shown that all modern imitations of the epic are unworthy of becoming denizens among our English metres. The system attempted by the Laureate is professedly an imitation of the ancient systems; but every copy is good or bad as it resembles or differs from its original. In defence of his enterprise, Mr. Southey should not have contented himself with a bare exposition of the measures of his verse, but should have actually noted the casurias, accent the syllables, and divided the feet. In matters of rhythm and sound, the untried ear cannot always catch the precise meaning of the musician or poet, especially where an original air is turned into a variation; and this seems precisely the case between the modernized and original epic, the difference acknowledged by the Laureate being the variation alluded to.

"A table, exhibiting the varieties which Mr. S. has adopted, and their agreement or disagreement with the legitimate hexameter, should have been drawn out. Critical experience has long ago selected and established certain canons for the iambic, sapphic, alcaic, and other metres; and Greek or Latin verses constructed according to these laws invariably excel both in rhythm and melody.—There are in the Vision of Judgment parts which may charm and delight, but they do so from no metrical effect. The reader (notwithstanding the Laureate's caution) soon finds himself in a tangled path, and gets bewildered for want of those guides which lead him smoothly through the Siege of Troy. But if he travel far with the Muse of modern epic, he will have little running, frequent halts, some stumbling and jostling, and now and then find the good lady gaping, or sitting cross-legged in the midst of a barbarous rabble of monosyllabic particles.

"But it will be easier to show the comparative and probable sources of excellence or failure in the composition of the modern hexameter, by an analysis of the Greek and Latin languages, compared as to their literal and syllabic relations. To effect this, four separate tables have been drawn, containing the component parts and totals of eight verses of hexametrical dimensions, taken severally from the Iliad, Aeneid, Vision of Judgment, and from a poem by Schiller. The divisions are calculated to show the totals of words, syllables, consonants, vowels, diphthongs, letters, and variety of final syllables. It will be seen from this tabular exposition that the Greek and Latin are nearly analogous, except that the balance of polysyllables inclines to the former. The diphthongs are more and the consonants /c/nt, and the total of letters and words is less with the Greek. The conclusion therefore is, that the euphony, and syllabic power of speech, must likewise be on the side of the Greeks.

"In the English scale, the number of monosyllables is /fes/ times as great as in either of the two ancient languages, and more than twice as great as in the German. The English consonants are very nearly double those of the Greek or Latin, and the total number of words bears nearly the same ratio both to the Greek and Latin, viz. /tw/ to one. By necessity of grammar, a large proportion of these words consists of monosyllables and explications. Neither the consonants in the German, nor the total of letters, is so numerous as in the English, and the same relation holds between the final varieties of these two languages.

"It has been before remarked that the Teston hexameter may be rendered somewhat superior to the English. This superiority is in a great measure to be attributed to the smaller aggregate of consonants and monosyllables which distinguish the German vocabulary. But the unprejudiced reader will draw what inferences he pleases from the comparative powers of each language, and regulate his decision according to the apparent truth or falsehood of the whole of the argument and evidence.

"Excludat jargia Finis.'

"In taking leave of this question, the Writer again assures Mr. Southey of his high regard both for the private and literary life of the Laureate of the present age. The pen which has traced these Remarks, if it be not that of a ready writer, would fain be considered as that of a humble critic, actuated by no other motives than those of friendly discussions, and a desire to preserve the Epic Muse of Greece and Latium free from the barbarities of modern imitation.

"It is against the metre—the metrical association and arrangement—against the innovation, not the innovator, that the writer protests; the merits or demerits therefore of the Vision of Judgment, as a poem, he leaves to able reviewers and to posterity. It will be read and admired by a few persons, just as the attempts of other Hexametrists have been. The experiments of Trissino, Sydney, and Spenser, produced a short-lived sensation, which perished with the sympathetic caprice of the times. The reputation of Mr. Southey may, even in the Georgan age, produce a parallel effect; but, independent of the probable causes of the failure already stated, the poem itself, being an occasional one, is on that account, also, more liable to forgetfulness.

"Via trita, via tuta, is therefore as good a password for the aspirant who would climb Parnassus, as for the humble pilgrim who plods along the beaten path of Prose. There is no necessity, indeed no apology, for attempting to revive those misspelled forms of Poetry, —those 'immundula poenula,' which have long ago been laid to rest, shrouded in cobwebs and buried in the dust. Ennions may be pardoned his imaginary metempsychosis, his Suania Pythagorica, and assumption of the title 'Alter Homerus,' but the world would be both now-a-days to allow the same privileges to an English poet.

"Had there been any good chance of imitating the classic hexameter, surely he (who by distinction among our Poets was called 'divine') must have succeeded in the enterprise. Spenser, however, relinquished the hopeless task; and it is to be regretted that his example, in this respect at least, has not acted preventively upon his worthy successor.
"In the farrago of metrical trash which has been extracted from the modern hexametrists of different countries, what is there worthy of example or reminiscence, either in the subjects or execution of their performances? Human nature is indeed so fickle in her intellectual operations, that the most absurd and impracticable speculations have ever found partisans ready to advocate their truth, and embark in the execution of them. But the career of such preposterous enterprises can neither be prosperous nor long. To wage war against the opinions of the wise and experienced, is to challenge the fate of poor Dick Tinto, who after all his ill-spent time and labor, found himself patronized by one or two of those judicious persons who make a virtue of being singular, and of pitching their own opinions against those of the world in matters of taste and criticism. Ever since the Republic of Letters was established, innovators of one kind or other have endeavored to supplant the stereo writers, not only of Greece and Rome, but of every civilized country. But when ingenuity or imitation can be foisted upon true scholarship, as the representative of original genius, the taste of the public must either be sadly perverted to relish what is bad, or be already satiated with that which is good.

There can now be little, or rather no honor conferred upon our own legitimate Muse, by an attempt to naturalize a bastard race of metre, which has been banished from the most enlightened countries of Europe. Within the last two centuries, literature, arms, and commerce have extended our vernacular tongue over a vast portion of the globe, and it is spreading still further. On this, if on no other account, it behoves the guardians of our native quarry to see that it maintains its proper excellence, and to recommend, as worthy of imitation, only such standard works of art or science, as may have received the repeated sanction of the scholar and critic. The arts are naturally imitative; they will, however, sometimes, from mistaken judgment or self-confidence, undertake to copy that which is inimitable. We cannot, under any coloring or disguise, mistake the Muse of modern hexameter for the original Calliope of Homer or Virgil.

In the preface to the Vision of Judgment, Mr. Southey assures us that a desire to realize one of the hopes of his youth was one among the leading causes of his enterprise: to this motive there have been superadded the conscientious discharge of an official duty, and the public expression of his loyalty and attachment to the reigning sovereign. With these, or such like considerations, the imaginary apotheosis of our late revered monarch seems to have cooperated in the plan and execution of a poem, which cannot fail of giving offence to many serious and well-meaning persons. To dive into the mysteries of heaven, and to pronounce upon the eternal condition of departed kings or others, is unquestionably a bold, if not a presumptuous undertaking. But when this is carried on under the bias of political feelings, there is greater danger of its becoming erroneous, or degressing into what some might call impiety. It must, however, be remembered, that the 'Vision of Judgment' is neither more nor less than a poet's dream. Objections of a similar kind might apply to Dante or Milton, and to the subjects of their great labors, and in short to all scriptural themes. It would be difficult, perhaps, to determine in what manner the scenes of the Vision of Judgment could have been unobjectionably portrayed. But there is no reason why a gentleman and scholar, like Mr. Southey, (who cannot, any more than the rest of the world, be deemed infallible,) should be loaded with abuse which would have been hardly justifiable had he published a series of poems as licentious as many of recent notoriety. No wonder, therefore, that the offended pride of the Laureate turns in disgust from the counsel of such unworthy rivals. When the civilities of learning cease to be cherished, adulation will become nauseous, and criticism will lose half its usefulness. It is, however, to be hoped, that no dispassionate inquirer will be ranked, even by the Laureate, among the Dunces of the Georgian age. At all events, the Writer of the present remarks had rather accept an humble place among those whom King James has styled 'the doleful barnes of knowledge.' The Writer's stock in trade as a critic is poor and homely; a little recollection of the rules of prosody, accent, and rhythm, imprinted upon early memory by rod or ferula; an Etonian master and grammar—remnants of scanning and proving—an ordinary pair of ears, and lungs no better than those of other folks. These scanty materials have been exercised in the examination of the 'Vision of Judgment,' and conclusions very different from those of its author have been deduced. And when the reader has perused the following elegy by the Laureate upon the excellence of our blank verse, he will surely ask himself why that gentleman did not apply it in the composition of a poem, which, from the nature of its argument, embraced the terrible and sublime as well as the tender and pathetic.

'Take our blank verse for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or any other language, for might, and majesty, and flexibility, and compass.' A host of authors might be brought in support of this panegyric upon English blank verse; but as it is against the modern hexametrists that the Writer has waged a somewhat long (though, as he trusts, a friendly) warfare, he will now draw his last shaft from the quiver of honest old Puttenham, and when he has shot it, will hang up his bow and shake hands with the Laureate.

Now, peradventure, with us Englishmen, it be somewhat too late to admit a new invention of feete and times, that our forefathers never used, nor ever observed till this day, either in their measures or in their pronunciation, and perchance will seem to us a presumptuous part to attempt; considering also it would be hard to find many men to like one man's choice, in the limitation of times and quantities of words, with which not one, but After thanking Mr. Tillbrook for sending me his pamphlet, and for explaining what I should else have been sorry to notice, that it contained no intimation of the personal acquaintance and mutual goodwill which had so long subsisted between us, I addressed him the following cursory remarks in reply to his observations:

"The greater part of your Treatise is employed in very ably and pleasantly supplying the deficiencies of my Preface, in points wherein it was necessarily deficient, because I was out of reach of materials. The remarks which are directed against my own hexameters appear to me altogether ill founded. You try the measure by Greek and Latin prosody: you might as well try me by the Laws of Solon, or the Twelve Tables. I have distinctly stated that the English hexameter is not constructed upon those canons, but bears the same relation to the ancient, that our heroic line does to the iambic verse. I have explained the principle of adaptation which I had chosen, and by that principle the measure ought to be judged.

"You bring forward arguments which are derived from music. But it by no means follows that a principle which holds good in music, should therefore be applicable to metre. The arts of music and poetry are essentially distinct; and I have had opportunities of observing that very skilful musicians may be as utterly without ear for metre, as I am myself without ear for music. If these arguments were valid, they would apply to the German hexameter as well as to the English; but the measure is as firmly established among the Germans as blank verse is with us, and, having been sanctioned by the practice of their best poets, can never become obsolete so long as the works of Voss, and Goethe, and Schiller are remembered, that is, as long as the language lasts.

"Twice you have remarked upon the length of the verse as occasioning a difficulty in reading it aloud. Surely you have taken up this argument with little consideration, because it lay upon the surface. It is doubly fallacious: first, upon your own principle; for if the English verse is not isochronous with the Latin, it must be shorter; and, secondly, because the breath is regulated in reading by the length of the sentence, not by that of the verse.

"Why did you bring against my trochee in the fifth place an argument just as applicable to the spondaic verse, and which, indeed, is only saying that a versifier who writes without any regard to effect, may produce very bad verses? You might as well object to the Alexandrine that it admits of twelve monosyllables. And how is it that you, who know Garamara so well, should have made me answerable for a vowel dropped at the press?

"You have dealt fairly in not selecting single lines, which, taken singly, would be unfavorable specimens; but methinks you should have exhibited one extract of sufficient length to show the effect of the measure. I certainly think that any paragraph of the poem containing from ten lines upward would confute all the reasoning which you have advanced, or which any one could adduce against the experiment.

"But I have done. It is a question de gustibus, and therefore interminable. The proof of the pudding must be in the eating; and not all the reasoning in the world will ever persuade any one that the pudding which he dislikes is a good pudding, or that the pudding which pleases his palate and agrees with his stomach can be a bad one. I am glad that I have made the experiment, and quite satisfied with the result. The critics who write and who talk are with you; so, I dare say, are the whole posse of schoolmasters. The women, the young poets, and the docile bairns are with me.

"I thank you for speaking kindly and considerately concerning the subject of the Vision, and remain,

"My dear Sir,

"Yours very truly,

"Robert Southey

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

1.

Having long been of opinion that an English metre might be constructed in imitation of the ancient hexameter, which would be perfectly consistent with the character of our language, and capable of great richness, variety, and strength, I have now made the experiment. It will have some disadvantages to contend with, both among learned and unlearned readers; among the former especially, because, though they may divest themselves of all prejudice against an innovation, which has generally been thought impracticable, and might even be disposed to regard the attempt favorably, nevertheless they will, from inveterate association, be continually reminded of rules which are inapplicable to our tongue; and looking for quantity where emphasis only ought to be expected, will perhaps less easily be reconciled to the measure, than those persons who consider it simply as it is. To the one class it is necessary that I should explain the nature of the verse; to the other, the principle of adaption which has been followed.

First, then, to the former, who, in glancing over these long lines, will perceive that they have none of the customary characteristics of English versification, being neither marked by rhyme, nor by any certain number of syllables, nor by any regular recurrence of emphasis throughout the verse. Upon closer observation, they will find that (with a very few exceptions) there is a regular recurrence of emphasis in the last five syllables of every line, the first and the fourth of those syllables being accented, the others not. These five syllables form two of the feet by which the verse is measured, and which are called dactyls and trochees, the dactyl consisting of one long syllable and two short ones, as exemplified in the name of Wellington; the trochee, of one long and one short, as exemplified in the name of Nelson. Of such feet, there are six in every verse. The four first are disposed according to the judgment and convenience of the writer; that is, they may be all dactyls or all trochees, or any mixture of both in any arrangement; but the fifth is always a dactyl, and the sixth always a trochee, except in some rare instances, when, for the sake of variety, or of some particular effect, a trochee is admitted in the fifth place. One more remark will suffice for this preliminary explanation. These feet are not constituted each by a separate word, but are made up of one or more, or of parts of words, the end of one and the beginning of another, as may happen. A verse of the Psalms, originally pointed out by Harris of Salisbury, as a natural and perfect hexameter, will exemplify what has been said:—

Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?

This, I think, will make the general construction of the metre perfectly intelligible to persons who may be unacquainted with the rules of Latin versification; those, especially, who are still to be called gentle readers, in this uncouth age. But it is not necessary to understand the principle upon which the verse is constructed, in order to feel the harmony and power of a metrical composition;—if it were, how few would be capable of enjoying poetry! In the present ease, any one who reads a page of these hexameters aloud, with just that natural regard to emphasis which the sense of the passage indicates, and the usual pronunciation of the words requires, will perceive the rhythm, and find no more difficulty in giving it its proper effect, than in reading blank verse. This has often been tried, and with invariable success. If, indeed, it were not so, the fault would be in the composition, not in the measure.

The learned reader will have perceived, by what has already been said, that in forming this English measure in imitation, rather than upon the model of the ancient hexameter, the trochee has been substituted for the spondee, as by the Germans. This substitution is rendered necessary by the nature of our pronunciation, which is so rapid, that I believe the whole vocabulary of the language does not afford a single instance of a genuine native spondee. The spondee, of course, is not excluded from the verse; and where it occurs, the effect, in general, is good. This alteration was necessary; but it is not the only one which, upon mature consideration and fair trial, it has been deemed expedient to make. If every line were to begin with a long syllable, the measure would presently appear exotic and forced, as being directly opposite to the general character of all our dignified metres, and indeed to the genius of the English language. Therefore the license has been taken of using any foot of two or three syllables at the beginning of a line; and sometimes, though less frequently, in the second, third, or fourth place. The metre, thus constructed, bears the same analogy to the ancient hexameter that our ten-syllable or heroic line does to iambic verse; iambic it is called, and it is so in its general movement; but it admits of many other feet, and would, in fact, soon become insupportably monotonous without their frequent intermixture.

II.

Twenty years ago, when the rhythmical romance of Thalaba was sent from Portugal to the press, I requested, in the preface to that poem, that the author might not be supposed to prefer the rhythm in which it was written, abstractedly considered, to the regular blank verse, the noblest measure, in his judgment, of which our admirable language is capable: it was added, that the measure which was there used, bad, in that instance, been preferred, because it suited the character of the poem, being, as it were, the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale. Notwithstanding this explicit declaration, the duncery of that day attacked me as if I had considered the measure of Thalaba to be in itself essentially and absolutely better than blank verse. The duncery of this day may probably pursue the same course on the present occasion. With that body I wage no war, and enter into no explanations. But to the great majority of my readers, who will take up the book without malevolence, and, having a proper sense of honor in themselves, will believe the declarations of a writer whose veracity they have no reason to doubt, I will state what are the defects, and what the advantages, of the metre which is here submitted to their judgment, as they appear to me after this fair experiment of its powers.

It is not a legitimate inference, that because the hexameter has been successfully introduced in the German language, it can be naturalized as well in English. The English is not so well adapted for it, because it does not abound in like manner with polysyllabic words. The feet, therefore, must too frequently be made up of monosyllables, and of distinct words, whereby the verse is resolved and decomposed into its component feet, and the feet into their component syllables, instead of being composition in their own language, may perhaps doubt this, and suppose that such words as twilight and evening are spondaic; but they only appear so when they are pronounced singly, the last syllable then hanging upon the tongue, and dwelling on the ear, like the last stroke of the clock. Used in combination, they become pure trochees. articulated and insculpted throughout, as in the German, still more in the Greek, and most in the Latin measure. This is certainly a great defect.* From the same cause the accent generally coincides with a pause in the sentence; but, though this breaks the continuity of the verse, it ought, perhaps, rather to be considered as an advantage; for the measure, like blank verse, thus acquires a greater variety. It may possibly be objected, that the four first feet are not metrical enough in their effect, and the two last too much so. I do not feel the objection; but it has been advanced by one, whose opinion upon any question, and especially upon a question of poetry, would make me distrust my own, where it happened to be different. Lastly, the double-ending may be censured as double rhymes used to be; but that objection belongs to the dunciery.

On the other hand, the range of the verse being from thirteen syllables to seventeen, it derives from that range an advantage in the union of variety with regularity, which is peculiar to itself. The capability which is thus gained, may perhaps be better appreciated by a few readers from their own sense of power, than it is exemplified in this experiment.

I do not, however, present the English hexameter as something better than our established metres, but as something different, and which therefore, for that reason, may sometimes advantageously be used. Take our blank verse, for all in all, in all its gradations, from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or in any other language, for might and majesty, and flexibility and compass. And this is affirmed, not as the predilection of a young writer, or the preference of one inexperienced in the difficulties of composition, but as an opinion formed and confirmed during the long and diligent study, and the long and laborious practice of the art. But I am satisfied also that the English hexameter is a legitimate and good measure, with which our literature ought to be enriched.

"I first adventure; follow me who list!"

III.

I am well aware that the public are peculiarly intolerant of such innovations; not less so than the populace used to be of any foreign fashion, whether of foppery or convenience. Would that this literary intolerance were under the influence of a saner judgment, and regarded the morals more than the manner of a composition; the spirit rather than the form! Would that it were directed against those monstrous combinations of horrors and mockery, lewdness and impiety, with which English poetry has, in our days, first been polluted! For more than half a century English literature had been distinguished by its moral purity, the effect, and, in its turn, the cause of an improvement in national manners. A father might, without apprehension of evil, have put into the hands of his children any book which issued from the press, if it did not bear, either in its title-page or frontispiece, manifest signs that it was intended as furniture for the brothel. There was no danger in any work which bore the name of a respectable publisher, or was to be procured at any respectable bookseller's. This was particularly the case with regard to our poetry. It is now no longer so; and woe to those by whom the offence cometh! The greater the talents of the offender, the greater is his guilt, and the more enduring will be his shame. Whether it be that the laws are in themselves unable to abate an evil of this magnitude, or whether it be that they are remissly administered, and with such injustice that the celebrity of an offender serves as a privilege whereby he obtains impunity, individuals are bound to consider that such pernicious works would neither be published nor written, if they were discouraged as they might, and ought to be, by public feeling; every person, therefore, who purchases such books, or admits them into his house, promotes the mischief, and thereby, as far as in him lies, becomes an aider and abetter of the crime.

The publication of a lascivious book is one of the worst offences that can be committed against the well-being of society. It is a sin, to the consequences of which no limits can be assigned, and those consequences no after-repentance in the writer can counteract. Whatever remorse of conscience he may feel when his hour comes (and come it must!) will be of no avail. The poignancy of a death-bed repentance cannot cancel one copy of the thousands which are sent abroad; and as long as it continues to be read, so long is he the pander of posterity, and so long is he heaping up guilt upon his soul in perpetual accumulation.

These remarks are not more severe than the offence deserves, even when applied to those immoral writers who have not been conscious of any evil intention in their writings, who would acknowledge a little levity, a little warmth of coloring, and so forth, in that sort of language with which men gloss over their favorite vices, and deceive themselves. What, then, should be said of those for whom the thoughtlessness and indecency of wanton youth can no longer be pleaded, but who have written in sober manhood and with deliberate purpose? — Men of diseased*
Preface to the Vision of Judgment.

Returning to the point from whence I digressed, I am aware not only that any meritorious innovation which meets the eye of the reader generally provokes his displeasure, but that there prevails a particular prejudice against the introduction of hexameters in our language. The experiment, it is alleged, was tried in the Elizabethan age, and failed, though made under the greatest possible advantages of favor, being encouraged by the great patron of literature, Sir Philip Sydney, (in letters, as well as in all other accomplishments and all virtues, the most illustrious ornament of that illustrious court,) and by the Queen herself.

That attempt failed, because it was made upon a scheme which inevitably prevented its success. No principle of adaption was tried. Sydney, and his followers wished to subject the English pronunciation to the rules of Latin prosody; but if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new pronunciation. There was the further obstacle of unusual and violent elisions; and moreover, the easy and natural order of our speech was distorted by the frequent use of forced inversions, which are utterly improper in an uninflected language. Even if the subjects for the experiment had been judiciously chosen, and well composed in all other respects, these errors must have been fatal; but Sydney, whose prose is so full of imagery and felicities, that he is one of our greatest poets in prose, and whose other poems contain beauties of a high order, seems to have lost all ear for rhythm, and all feeling of poetry, when he was engaged in metrical experiments.

What in Sydney's hands was unearthly and difficult was made ridiculous by Stanihurst, whose translation of the four first books of the Aeneid into hexameters is one of the most portentious compositions in any language. No satire could so effectually have exposed the measure to derision. The specimens which Abraham Francce produced were free from Stanihurst's eccentricities, and were much less awkward and constrained than Sydney's. But the mistaken principle upon which the metre was constructed was fatal, and would have proved so even if Francce had possessed greater powers of thought and of diction. The failure therefore was complete, and for some generations it seems

* For example:

Neither he bears reverence to a prince, nor pity to a beggar. That to my advancement their wisdoms have me abused. Well may a pastor plain; but alas! his plains he not esteem'd, oppress'd with rudest conceits by the help of an outcry Dispair most tragical clause to a deadly request. Hard like a rich marble; hard but a fair diamond.

† That the reader may not suppose I have depredated Sydney and his followers, by imputing to the faults of their execution a failure which the nature of the metre itself might explain, I have added a few fair samples at the end of the poem.

‡ A writer in the Censura Literaria (vol. iv. 388) has said, that hexameters were 'much in vogue, owing to the pernicious example of Spencer and Gabriel Harvey.' They were never in vogue. There is no reason to believe, that Spencer ever wrote an English hexameter. Gabriel Harvey's to have prevented any thought of repeating the experiment.

Goldsmith, in later days, delivered "an opinion in its favor, observing, that all the feet of the ancient poetry are still found in the versification of living languages, and that it is impossible the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. He had seen, he says, several late specimens of English hexameters and sapphies, so happily composed, that they were, in all respects, as melodious and agreeable to the ear as the works of Virgil and Horace. What these specimens were I have not discovered;—the sapphies may possibly have been those by Dr. Watts. Proofs of the practicability of the hexameter were given, about twenty years ago, by some translations from the Messiah of Klopopstock, which appeared in example only incurred ridicule; and as for Spenser, the only specimen which he is known to have produced is the following:

Trovata:—

See ye the blind-fancked pretie God, that feathered aneshe,
Of lovers miseries which maketh his bloodie game?
Wote ye why his mother with a veile hath covered his face?
Trust me, leaste he my love haply chance to behold.

With so little knowledge of, and so little regard to accuracy, are confident assertions sometimes made!

Gabriel Harvey was one of the great promoters of the attempt; and Spenser, who was his intimate friend, is believed to have sanctioned it by his opinion,—certainly not by his example. That great master of versification has left only one piece which is not written in rhyme. It was printed in Davison's Poetical Rhapsodie, and is inserted in Warton's Observations on the Faccy Queen, vol. ii. p. 245. The author has called it an Arabick Eligy, but neither by any rule of quantity, or violence of accentuation, can it be reduced to iambics.

It is generally supposed," says Goldsmith, "that the genius of the English language will not admit of Greek or Latin measure; but this, we apprehend, is a mistake derived to the prejudice of education. It is impossible that the same measure, composed of the same times, should have a good effect upon the ear in one language, and a bad effect in another. The truth is, we have been accustomed from our infancy to the numbers of English poetry, and the very sound and signification of the words disposed the ear to receive them in a certain manner; so that its disappointment must be attended with a disagreeable sensation. In imbibing the first rudiments of education, we acquire, as it were, another ear for the numbers of Greek and Latin poetry; and this being reserved entirely for the sounds and significations of the words that constitute those dead languages, will not easily accommodate itself to the sounds of our vernacular tongue, though conveyed in the same time and measure. In a word, Latin and Greek have annexed to them the ideas of the ancient measure from which they are not easily disjoined. But we will venture to say, this difficulty might be surmounted by an effort of attention and a little practice; and in that case we should in time be as well pleased with English, as with Latin hexameters."—Goldsmith's Essays, vol. ii. p. 265.

Mr. Park (Census Literaria, vol. iv. 225) mentions an attempt to revive what he calls "this obsolete whimsy by an anonymous writer in 1737, who translated the first and fourth Eclogues of Virgil, &c. into hexametrical verse, and prefixed a vindication of his attempt, with directions for the reader's pronunciation."

I venture to hope that this excellent English scholar will no longer think the scheme of writing English hexameters a mere whimsy. Glad indeed should I be, if my old acquaintance were to be as well pleased with the present attempt as I have been with some of his Morning Thoughts and Midnight Musings.
II.

THE VAULT.

So by the Unseen comforted, raised I my head in obedience, And in a vault I found myself placed, arch’d over on all sides. Narrow and low was that house of the dead. Around it were coffins, Each in its niche, and palms, and urns, and funeral hatchments; Velvets of Tyrian dye, retaining their hues unfaded; Blazonry vivid still, as if fresh from the touch of the limner; Nor was the golden fringe, nor the golden broidery tarnish’d.

Whence came the light whereby that place of death was discover’d? For there was there no lamp, whose wondrous flame inextinguish’d, As with a vital power endued, renewing its substance, Age after age unchanged, endureth in self-subsistence; Nor did the cheerful beam of day, direct or reflected, Penetrate there. That low and subterranean chamber Saw not the living ray, nor felt the breeze; but forever, Closely immured, was seal’d in perpetual silence and darkness. Whence then this lovely light, calm, pure, and soft, and cerulean, Such as the sapphire sheds? And whence this air that infuses Strength while I breathe it in, and a sense of life, and a stillness, Filling the heart with peace, and giving a joy that contents it? Not of the Earth that light; and these paradisiacal breathings, Not of the Earth are they! These thoughts were passing within me, When there arose around a strain of heavenly music, Such as the hermit hears when Angels visit his slumbers. Faunily it first began, scarce heard; and gentle its rising, Low as the softest breath that passes in summer at evening O'er the Eolian strings, felt there when nothing is moving, Save the thistle-down, lighter than air, and the leaf of the aspen. Then, as it swell’d and rose, the thrilling melody deepen’d; Such, methought, should the music be, which is heard in the cloister,
By the sisterhood standing around the beatified
Virgins, [open,
When with her dying eyes she sees the firmament
Lifts from the bed of dust her arms towards her beloved,
Utters the adorable name, and breathes out her soul in a rapture.

Well could I then believe such legends, and well could I credit
All that the poets old relate of Amphiion and Orphenus;
How melodious sounds wild beasts their strength
have surrender’d,
Men were reclaim’d from the woods, and stones in harmonious order
Moved, as their atoms obey’d the mysterious attraction of concord.
This was a higher strain; a mightier, holier virtue Came with its powerful tones. O’ercome by the piercing emotion,
Dizzy I grew, and it seem’d as though my soul
were dissolving.
How might I hear unmoved such sounds? For,
like as the vapors
Melt on the mountain side, when the sun comes forth in his splendor,
Even so the vaulted roof and whatever was earthy
Faded away; the Grave was gone, and the Dead was awaken’d.

III.

THE AWAKENING.

Then I beheld the King. From a cloud which cover’d the pavement
His reverend form uprose: heavenward his face was directed,
Heavenward his eyes were raised, and heaven-
ward his arms were extended.
Lord, it is past! he cried; the mist, and the weight,
and the darkness; —
That long and weary night, that long, drear dream of desertion.
Father, to Thee I come! My days have been many and evil;
Heavy my burden of care, and grievous hath been my affliction.
Thou hast releas’d me at length. O Lord, in Thee have I trusted;
Thou art my hope and my strength! — And then,
in profound adoration,
Crossing his arms on his breast, he bent and worshipp’d in silence.

Presently one approach’d to greet him with joyful obedience;
He of whom, in an hour of woe, the assassin bereaved us,
When his counsels most, and his resolute virtue were needed.

Thou, said the Monarch, here? Thou, Perceval, summon’d before me? —
Then, as his waken’d mind to the weal of his country reverted,
What of his son, he ask’d, what course by the Prince had been follow’d.
Right in his Father’s steps hath the Regent trod,
was the answer:
Firm hath he proved and wise, at a time when weakness or error
Would have sunk us in shame, and to ruin have hurried us headlong;
True to himself hath he been, and Heaven has rewarded his counsels.

Peace is obtain’d then at last, with safety and honor! the Monarch
Cried, and he clasp’d his hands; — I thank Thee,
O merciful Father!
Now is my heart’s desire fulfill’d.

With honor surpassing
All that in elder time had adorn’d the annals of England,
Peace hath been won by the sword, the faithful minister answer’d.
Paris hath seen once more the banners of England in triumph
Wave within her walls, and the ancient line is establish’d.
While that man of blood, the tyrant, faithless and godless,
Render’d at length the sport, as long the minion
of Fortune,
Far away, confined in a rocky isle of the ocean,
Fights his battles again, and pleased to win in the chamber
What he lost in the field, in fancy conquers his conqueror.
There he reviles his foes, and there the ungrateful accuses,
For his own defaults, the men who too faithfully
served him;
Frets, and complains, and intrigues, and abuses the mercy that spared him.
Oh that my King could have known these things!
could have witness’d how England
Check’d in its full career the force of her enemy’s empire,
Singly decif’d his arms and his arts, and baffled them singly,
Roused from their lethargic sleep, with the stirring example, the nations,
And the refluent tide swept him and his fortune
before it.
Oh that my King, ere he died, might have seen the fruit of his counsels!

Nay, it is better thus, the Monarch piously answer’d;
Here I can bear the joy; it comes as an earnest of Heaven.
Righteous art Thou, O Lord! long-suffering, but sure are thy judgments.
Then having paused awhile, like one in devotion abstracted,
Earthward his thoughts recurr'd, so deeply the care of his country
Lay in that royal soul reposed; and he said, Is the spirit
Quell'd which hath troubled the land? and the multitude freed from delusion,
Know they their blessings at last, and are they contented and thankful?

Still is that fierce and restless spirit at work, was the answer;
Still it deceiveth the weak, and inflameth the rash
and the desperate.
Even now, I ween, some dreadful deed is preparing;
For the Souls of the Wicked are loose, and the Powers of Evil Move on the wing alert. Some nascent horror they look for,
Be sure! some accursed conception of filth and of darkness
Ripe for its monstrous birth. Whether France or Britain be threaten'd,
Soon will the issue show; or if both at once are endanger'd,
For with the ghosts obscene of Robespierre, Danton, and Hebert,
Faux and Despard I saw, and the band of rabid fanatics,
They whom Venner led, who, rising in frantic rebellion,
Made the Redeemer's name their cry of slaughter and treason.

IV.

THE GATE OF HEAVEN.

Thus as he spake, methought the surrounding space dilated,
Overhead I beheld the infinite ether; beneath us
Lay the solid expanse of the firmament spread like a pavement,
Whereover I look'd, there was light and glory around me.
Brightest it seem'd in the East, where the New Jerusalem glitter'd.
Eminent on a hill, there stood the Celestial City;
Beaming afar it shone; its towers and cupolas rising
High in the air serene, with the brightness of gold in the furnace,
Where on their breadth the splendor lay intense and quiescent:
Part with a fierier glow, and a short, quick, tumultuous motion,
Like the burning pyropus; and turrets and pinnacles sparked,
Playing in jets of light, with a diamond-like glory coruscant,
Groves of all hues of green their foliage intermingled,
Envy, and hate, and blasphemous rage, and remorse
unavailing,
Carried a Hell within, to which all outer affliction
So it abstracted the sense — might be deem'd a remission of torment.
At the edge of the cloud, the Princes of Darkness
were marshalled:
Dimly descried within were wings and truculent faces;
And in the thick obscure there struggled a mutinous
uproot,
Raving, and fury, and strife, that the whole deep body of darkness
Roll'd like a troubled sea, with a wide and a man-ifold motion.

V.

THE ACCUSERS.

On the cerulean floor, by that dread circle surrounded,
Stood the soul of the King alone. In front was the Presence
Veil'd with excess of light; and behind was the blackness of darkness
Then might be seen the strength of holiness, then was its triumph;
Calm in his faith he stood, and his own clear conscience upheld him.

When the trumpet was blown, and the Angel made proclamation —
Lo, where the King appears! Come forward, ye who arraign him!
Forth from the lurid cloud a Demon came at the summons.
It was the Spirit by whose righteous reign had been troubled;
Likest in form uncouth to the hideous Idols whom India don'd
(Long by guilty neglect to hellish delusions aban-
Ded; Worship with horrible rites of self-immolation and torture.
Many-headed and monstrous the Fiend; with numberless faces,
Numberless bestial ears erect to all rumors, and restless,
And with numberless mouths which were fill'd
with lies as with arrows.
Clamors arose as he came, a confusion of turbulent voices,
Maledictions, and blatant tongues, and viperous
hisses;
And in the hubbub of senseless sounds the watch-
words of faction,
Freedom, Invaded Rights, Corruption, and War,
and Oppression,
Loudly enounced, were heard.

But when he stood in the Presence,
Then was the Fiend dismay'd, though with impu-
dence clothed as a garment;
And the lying tongues were mute, and the lips
which had scatter'd
Accusation and slander, were still. No time for evasion
This, in the Presence he stood; no place for flight;
for dissembling
No possibility there. From the souls on the edge of the darkness,
Two he produced, prime movers and agents of mischief, and bade them
Show themselves faithful now to the cause for which they had labor'd.
Wretched and guilty souls, where now their audacity? Where now
Are the insolent tongues so ready of old at re-joiner?
Where the lofty pretences of public virtue and freedom?
Where the gibe, and the jeer, and the threat, the envemon'd invective,
Calumny, falsehood, fraud, and the whole ammunition of malice?
Wretched and guilty souls, they stood in the face
of their Sovereign,
Conscious and self-condemn'd; confronted with him they had injured,
At the Judgment seat they stood.

Beholding the foremost,
Him by the cast of his eye oblique, I knew as the firebrand
Whom the unthinking populace held for their idol
and hero,
Lord of Misanthropy in his day. But how was that countenance alter'd?
Where emotion of fear or of shame had never been witness'd;
That invincible forehead abash'd; and those eyes
wherein malice
Once had been wont to shine, with wit and hilarity
temper'd,
Into how deep a gloom their mournful expression
had settled!
Little avail'd it now that not from a purpose malignant,
With evil intent he had chosen the service of
But of his own desires the slave, with profligate impulse,
Solely by selfishness moved, and reckless of aught
that might follow.
Could he plead in only excuse a confession of baseness?
Could he hide the extent of his guilt; or hope to alone for
Faction excited at home, when all old feuds were abated,
Insurrection abroad, and the train of woes that had follow'd!
Discontent and disloyalty, like the teeth of the dragon,
He had sown on the winds; they had ripen'd beyond the Atlantic;
Thence in natural birth, sedition, revolt, revolution;
France had received the seeds, and reap'd the harvest of horrors; —
Where — where should the plague be stay’d? Oh, most to be pitied
They of all souls in bale, who see no term to the evil
They by their guilt have raised, no end to their inner upbraiding!

Him I could not choose but know, nor knowing but grieve for.
Who might the other be, his comrade in guilt and in suffering,
Brought to the proof like him, and shrinking like him from the trial?
Nameless the libeller lived, and shot his arrows in darkness;
Undetected he pass’d to the grave, and leaving behind him
Noxious works on earth, and the pest of an evil example,
Went to the world beyond, where no offences are hidden.
Mask’d had he been in his life, and now a visor of iron,
Rivet’d round his head, had abolish’d his features forever.
Speechless the slanderer stood, and turn’d his face
From the Monarch. Iron-bound as it was, — so insupportably dreadful,
Soon or late, to conscious guilt is the eye of the injured.

Caitiffs, are ye dumb? cried the multifaced Demon in anger;
Think ye then by shame to shorten the term of your penance?
Back to your penal dens! — And with horrible grasp gigantic
Seizing the guilty pair, he swung them aloft, and in vengeance
Hurl’d them all abroad, far into the sulphurous darkness.

Sons of Faction, be warn’d! And ye, ye Slanderers! learn ye
Justice, and bear in mind that after death there is judgment.

Whirling, away they flew. Nor long himself did he tarry,
Ere from the ground where he stood, caught up by a vehement whirlwind,
He, too, was hurried away; and the blast with lightening and thunder
Volleying aright and aleft amid the accumulate blackness,
Scatter’d its inmates accruss’d, and beyond the limits of ether
Drove the hircine host obscene: they, howling and groaning,
Fell, precipitate, down to their dolorous place of endurance.

Then was the region clear; the arrowy flashes which redden’d
Through the foul, thick throng, like sheeted argenty floating
Now o’er the blue serene, diffused an innocuous splendor,

In the infinite dying away. The roll of the thunder
Ceased, and all sounds were hush’d, till again from the gate adamantine
Was the voice of the Angel heard through the silence of Heaven.

VI.

THE ABSOLVERS.

Ho! he exclaim’d, King George of England standeth in judgment!
Hell hath been dumb in his presence. Ye who on earth arraign’d him,
Come ye before him now, and here accuse or absolve him!
For injustice hath here no place.

From the Souls of the Blessed
Some were there then who advanced; and more from the skirts of the meeting —
Spirits who had not yet accomplish’d their purification,
Yet, being cleansed from pride, from faction and error deliver’d,
Purged of the film wherewith the eye of the mind is clouded,
They, in their better state, saw all things clear; and discerning
Now, in the light of truth, what tortuous views had deceived them,
They acknowledged their fault, and own’d the wrong they had offer’d;
Not without ingenuous shame, and a sense of compunction,
More or less, as each had more or less to atone for.
One alone remain’d, when the rest had retired to their station;
Silently he had stood, and still unmoved and in silence,
With a steady mien, regarded the face of the Monarch.

Thoughtful awhile he gazed; severe, but serene, was his aspect;
Calm, but stern; like one whom no compassion could weaken;
Neither could doubt deter, nor violent impulses alter;
Lord of his own resolves, — of his own heart absolute master.

Awful Spirit! his place was with ancient sages and heroes;
Fabius, Aristides, and Solon, and Epaminondas.

Here then at the Gate of Heaven we are met! said the Spirit;
King of England! albeit in life opposed to each other,
Here we meet at last. Not unprepared for the meeting
Ween I; for we had both outlived all enmity, rendering
Each to each that justice which each from each had withholden.
In the course of events, to the I seem'd as a Rebel,
Thou a Tyrant to me; — so strongly doth circumstance rule men
During evil days, when right and wrong are confounded.
Left to our hearts we were just. For me, my actions have been spoken,
That not for lawless desires, nor goaded by desperate fortunes,
Nor for ambition, I chose my part; but observant of duty,
Self-approved. And here, this witness I willingly bear thee, —
Here, before Angels and Men, in the awful hour of judgment, —
Thou too didst act with upright heart, as befitted a Sovereign
True to his sacred trust, to his crown, his kingdom,
and people.
Heaven in these things fulfill'd its wise, though
inscrutable purpose,
While we work'd its will, doing each in his place
as became him.
Washington! said the Monarch, well hast thou spoken and truly,
Just to thyself and to me. On them is the guilt of the contest,
Who for wicked ends, with foul arts of fiction and falsehood,
Kindled and fed the flame; but verily they have t heir guerdon.
Thou and I are free from offence. And would that the nations,
Learning of us, would lay aside all wrongful resentment,
All injurious thought, and, honoring each in the other
Kindred courage and virtue, and cognate
knowledge and freedom,
Live in brotherhood wisely conjoin'd. We set the example.
They who stir up strife, and would break that natural concord,
Evil they sow, and sorrow will they reap for their harvest.

VII.
THE BEATIFICATION.

When that Spirit withdrew, the Monarch around the assembly
Look'd, but none else came forth; and he heard the voice of the Angel,—
King of England, speak for thyself! here is none to arraign thee.
Father, he replied, from whom no secrets are hidden,
What should I say? Thou knowest that mine was an arduous station,
Full of care, and with perils beset. How heavy the burden
Thou alone canst tell! Short-sighted and frail hast
Thou made us,
And Thy judgments who can abide? But as surely Thou knowest
The desire of my heart hath been alway the good of my people,
Pardon my errors, O Lord, and in mercy accept the intention!
As in Thee I have trusted, so let me not now be confounded.

Bending forward, he spake with earnest humility.
Well done,
Good and faithful servant! then said a Voice from theBrightness,
Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. — The ministering Spirits
Clapp'd their pennons therewith, and from that whole army of Angels
Songs of thanksgiving and joy resounded, and loud hallelujahs;
While, on the wings of Winds upraised, the pavilion of splendor,
Where inscrutable light enveloped the Holy of Holies,
Moved, and was borne away, through the empyrean ascending.

Beautiful then on its hill appear'd the Celestial City,
Soft'n'd, like evening suns, to a mild and bearable
lustre.
Beautiful was the ether above; and the sapphire beneath us,
Beautiful was its tone, to the dazzled sight as refreshing
As the fields with their loveliest green at the coming of summer,
When the mind is at ease, and the eye and the heart are contented.

Then methought we approach'd the gate. In front of the portal,
From a rock where the standard of man's
Redemption was planted,
Issued the Well of Life, where whosoever would enter,—
So it was written, — must drink, and put away all that is earthly.
Earth among its gems, its creations of art and of nature,
Offers not aught whereto that marvellous Cross
may be liken'd
Even in dim similitude; such was its wonderful substance.
Pure it was and diaphanous. It had no visible
lustre;
Yet from it alone whole Heaven was illuminate away;
Day and Night being none in the upper firmament, neither
Sun, nor Moon, nor Stars; but from that Cross, as a fountain,

101
Flow'd the Light uncreated; light all-sufficing, eternal,
Light which was, and which is, and which will be, forever and ever;
Light of light, which, if daringly gazed on, would blind an Archangel,
Yet the eye of weak man may behold, and beholding is strengthen'd;
Yea, while we wander below, oppress'd with our bodily burden,
And in the shadow of death, this Light is in mercy vouchsafed us,
So we seek it with humble heart; and the soul that receives it
Hath with it healing and strength, peace, love, and life everlasting.

Thither the King drew nigh, and kneeling he drank of the water.
Oh, what a change was wrought! In the semblance of age he had risen,
Such as at last he appear'd, with the traces of time and affliction
Deep on his faded form, when the burden of years was upon him.
Oh, what a change was wrought! For now the corruptible put on Incorruption; the mortal put off mortality. Rising
Rejuvenescent he stood in a glorified body, obnoxious
Never again to change, nor to evil, and trouble, and sorrow,
But for eternity form'd, and to bliss everlasting appointed.

VIII.

THE SOVEREIGNS.

Lift up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting
Portals,
Be ye lift up! For lo! a glorified Monarch approacheth,
One who in righteousness reign'd, and religiously govern'd his people.
Who are these that await him within? Nassau the Deliverer,
Him I know: and the Stuart, he who, serene in his meekness,
Bow'd his anointed head beneath the axe of rebellion,
Calm in that insolent hour, and over his fortune triumphant.

Queen of the eagle eye, thou too, O matchless Eliza,
Excellent Queen, wert there! and thy brother's beautiful spirit;
O'er whose innocent head there hover'd a silvery halo,
Such as crowns the Saint when his earthly warfare is ended.

There too was he of the sable mail, the hero of Cressy,
Flower of chivalry, he in arms and in courtesy peerless.
There too his royal sire I saw, magnificent Edward,
He who made the English renown, and the fame of his Windsor
In the Orient and Occident known, from Tagus to Tigris.

Lion-hearted Richard was there, redoubtable warrior,
At whose irresistible presence the Saracen trembled;
At whose name the Caliph exclaim'd in dismay on Mahommed,
Syrian mothers grew pale, and their children were scared into silence.

Born in a bloody age, did he, in his prowess exulting,
Run like a meteor his course, and fulfil the service assign'd him,
Checking the Mussulman power in the height of its prosperous fortune;
But that lionine heart was with virtues humane ennobled;
(Otherwhere else, be sure, his doom had now been appointed;
Friendship, disdain of wrong, and generous feeling redeem'd it;
Magnanimity there had its seat, and the love of the Muses.

There, with the Saxon Kings who founded our laws and our temples, (Gratefully still to be named while these endure in remembrance,
They, for the pious work!) I saw the spirit of Alfred;
Alfred, than whom no Prince with loftier intellect gifted,
Nor with a finer soul, nor in virtue more absolute, ever
Made a throne twice-hallow'd, and reign'd in the hearts of his people.
With him the Worthies were seen who in life partook of his labors.
Shared his thoughts, and with him for the weal of posterity travail'd:
Some who in cloisters immured, and to painful study devoted
Day and night, their patient and innocent lives exhausted,
And in meekness possess'd their souls; and some who in battle
Put the Raven to flight; and some who, intrepid in duty,
Reach'd the remotest East, or invading the kingdom of Winter,
Plough'd with audacious keel the Hyperborean Ocean.
I could perceive the joy which fill'd their beatified spirits
IX.

THE ELDER WORTHIES.

Lift up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting Portals,
Be ye lift up! Behold, the Worthies are there to receive him,
They who, in later days, or in elderages, ennobled,
Britain’s dear name. Bede I beheld, who, humble and holy,
Shone like a single star, serene in a night of darkness.
Bacon also was there, the marvellous Friar; and he who Struck the spark from which the Bohemian kindled his taper;
Thence the flame, long and hardly preserved, was to Luther transmitted,
Mighty soul, and he lifted his torch, and enlight’ned the nations.

Thee, too, Father Chaucer, I saw, and delighted to see thee,
At whose well undefiled I drank in my youth, and was strengthen’d;
With whose mind immortal so oft I have communed, partaking
All its manifold moods, and willingly moved at its pleasure.
Bearing the palm of martyrdom, Cranmer was there in his meekness,
Holy name, to be ever revered! And Cecil, whose wisdom
Establish’d the Church and State, Eliza’s pillar of council.
And Shakspeare, who in our hearts for himself hath erected an empire
Not to be shaken by Time, nor e’er by another divided.
But with what love did I then behold the face of my master,—
Spenser, my master dear! with whom in boyhood I wander’d
Through the regions of Faery land, in forest or garden
Spending delicious hours, or at tilt and tourney rejoicing;
Yea, by the magic of verse enlarged, and translated in spirit,
In the World of Romance free denizen I;—till awakening,
When the spell was dissolved, this real earth and its uses
Seem’d to me weary, and stale, and flat.

With other emotion
Milton’s severer shade I saw, and in reverence humbled
Gazed on that soul sublime: of passion now as of blindness
Heal’d, and no longer here to Kings and to Hierarchies hostile,
He was assoil’d from taint of the fatal fruit; and in Eden
Not again to be lost, consort an equal with Angels.
Taylor too was there, from whose mind of its treasures redundant
Streams of eloquence flow’d, like an inexhaustible fountain
And the victor of Blenheim, alike in all virtues accomplish’d,
Public or private, he; the perfect soldier and statesman,
England’s reproach and her pride; her pride for his noble achievements,
Her reproach for the wrongs he endured. And Newton, exalted
There above those orbs whose motions from earth he had measured,
Through infinity ranging in thought. And Berkeley, angelic
Now in substance as soul, that kingdom enjoying where all things
Are what they seem, and the good and the beautiful there are eternal.

THE WORTHIES OF THE GEORGIAN AGE.

These with a kindred host of great and illustrious spirits
Stood apart, while a train, whom nearer duty attracted,
Through the Gate of Bliss came forth to welcome their Sovereign.
Many were they and glorious all. Conspicuous among them
 Wolfe was seen. And the seaman who fell on the shores of Owyhee,
Leaving a lasting name, to humanity dear as to science.
And the mighty musician of Germany, ours by adoption,
Who beheld in the King his munificent pupil and patron.
Reynolds, with whom began that school of art which hath equal’d
Richest Italy’s works, and the masterly labors of Belgium,
Came in that famous array. And Hogarth, who follow’d no master,
Nor by pupil shall e’er be approach’d, alone in his greatness.
Reverend in comely mien, of aspect mild and benignant,
There, too, Wesley I saw and knew, whose zeal apostolic,
Though with error alloy’d, hath on earth its merited honor,
As in heaven its reward. And Mansfield, the just and intrepid;
Wise Judge, by the craft of the Law ne’er seduced from its purpose;
And when the misled multitude raged like the winds in their madness,
Not to be moved from his rightful resolves. And Burke I beheld there,
Eloquent statesman and sage, who, though late, broke loose from his trammels,
Giving then to mankind what party too long had diverted.
Here, where wrongs are forgiven, was the injured Hastings beside him;
Strong in his high deserts, and in innocence happy, though injured,
He, in his good old age, outlived persecution and malice.
Even where he had stood a mark for the arrows of slander,
He had his triumph at last, when, moved with one feeling, the Senate
Rose in respect at his sight, and atoned for the sin of their fathers.

Cowper, thy lovely spirit was there, by death disenchanted
From that heavy spell which had bound it in sorrow and darkness;
Thou wert there, in the kingdom of peace and of light everlasting.
Nelson also was there in the kingdom of peace, though his calling,
While upon earth he dwelt, was to war and the work of destruction.
Not in him had that awful ministry deaden’d or weaken’d
Quick compassion, and feelings that raise while they soften our nature.
Wise in counsel, and steady in purpose, and rapid in action,
Never thought of self from the course of his duty seduced him,
Never doubt of the issue unworthily warp’d his intention.
Long shall his memory live, and while his example is cherish’d,
From the Queen of the Seas the sceptre shall never be wrested.

XI.

THE YOUNG SPIRITS.

Ye whom I leave unnamed, ye other Worthies of Britain,
Lights of the Georgian age,—for ye are many and noble,—
How might I name ye all, whom I saw in this glorious vision?
Pardon ye the imperfect tale! Yet some I beheld there,
Whom should I pretermit, my heart might rightly upbraid me,
That its tribute of honor, poor though it be, was withholden.

Somewhat apart they came, in fellowship gather’d together,
As in goody array they follow’d the train of the Worthies.

Chosen spirits were these, of the finest elements temper’d,
And embodied on earth in mortality’s purest texture;
But in the morning of hope, in the blossom of virtue and genius,
They were cut down by Death. What then?—were it wise to lament them,
Seeing the mind bears with it its wealth, and the soul its affections?
What we sow we shall reap; and the seeds whereof earth is not worthy
Strike their roots in a kindlier soil, and ripen to harvest.

Here where the gallant youths of high, heroic aspiring,
Who, so fate had allow’d, with the martial renown of their country
Would have wedded their names, for perpetua honor united;
Strong of heart and of mind, but in undistinguish’d battle,
Or by pestilence stricken, they fell, unknown and confounded
With the common dead. Oh! many are they who were worthy,
Under the Red Cross flag, to have wielded the thunders of Britain,
Making her justice felt, and her proper power upholding
Upon all seas and shores, wheresoever her rights were offended,
Followers of Nelson’s path, and the glorious career of the Wellesley.
Many are they, whose bones beneath the billows have whiten’d,
Or in foreign earth they have moulder’d, hastily cover’d,
In some wide and general grave.

Here also were spirits
To have guided, like Cecil of old, the councils of England;
Or, like Canning, have silenced and charm’d a tumultuous Senate,
When to the height of his theme the consummate Orator rising
Makes our Catilines pale, and rejoices the friends of their country.

Others came in that goodly band whom benigner fortune
Led into pleasanter ways on earth: the children of Science
Some, whose unerring pursuit would, but for death, have extended
O’er the unknown and material, Man’s intellectual empire,
Such their intuitive power; like Davy, disarming destruction
When it moves on the vapor; or him, who, discovering the secret
Of the dark and ebullient abyss, with the fire of Vesuvius
Arm'd the chemist's hand: well then might Eleusinian Ceres
Yield to him, from whom the seas and the mountains conceal'd not Nature's mystery, hid in their depths.

Here, lost in their promise:
And prime, were the children of Art, who should else have deliver'd
Works and undying names to grateful posterity's keeping,
Such as Haydon will leave on earth; and he who, returning
Rich in praise to his native shores, hath left a remembrance
Long to be honor'd and loved on the banks of Thames and of Tiber:
So may America, prizing in time the worth she possesses,
Give to that hand free scope, and boast hereafter of Allston.

Here too, early lost and deplored, were the youths whom the Muses
Mark'd for themselves at birth, and with dews from Castalia sprinkled:
Chatterton first, (for not to his affectionate spirit
Could the act of madness innate for guilt be accounted,)
Marvellous boy, whose antique songs and unhappy story
Shall, by gentle hearts, be in mournful memory cherished
Long as thy ancient towers endure, and the rocks of St. Vincent,
Bristol! my birth-place dear. What though I have chosen a dwelling
Far away, and my grave shall not be found by the stranger
Under thy sacred care, nathless in love and in duty
Still am I bound to thee, and by many a deep recollection!
City of elder days, I know how largely I owe thee;
Nor least for the hope and the strength that I gather'd in boyhood,
While on Chatterton musing, I fancied his spirit was with me
In the haunts which he loved upon earth. 'Twas a joy in my vision
When I beheld his face. — And here was the youth of Loch Leven,
Nipp'd, like an April flower, that opens its leaves to the sunshine,
While the breath of the East prevails. And Russell and Bampfylde,
Bright emanations they! And the Poet, whose songs of childhood
Trent and the groves of Clifton heard; not alone
But by the Virtues loved, his soul, in its youthful aspiring,
Sought the Holy Hill, and his thirst was for Siloa's waters.
Was I deceived by desire, or, Henry, indeed did thy spirit
Know me, and meet my look, and smile like a friend at the meeting?

XII.

Lift up your heads, ye Gates; and, ye everlasting Portals,
Be ye lift up! Behold the splendid train of the Worthies
Halt; and with quicker pace a happy company issues
Forth from the Gate of Bliss: the Parents, the Children, and Consort,
Come to welcome in Heaven the Son, the Father, and Husband!
Hour of perfect joy that o'er pays all earthly affliction;
Yea, and the thought whereof supporteth the soul
in its anguish!

There came England's blossom of hope,—the beautiful Princess;
She in whose wedded bliss all hearts rejoiced, and whose death-bell,
Heard from tower to tower through the island, carried a sorrow,
Felt by all like a private grief, which, sleeping or waking,
Will not be shaken away; but possesses the soul
And disturbs it. There was our late-lost Queen, the nation's example of virtue;
In whose presence vice was not seen, nor the face
Of dishonor, Pure in heart, and spotless in life, and secret in bounty,
Queen, and Mother, and Wife unreprieved.—The gentle Amelia
Stretch'd her arms to her father there, in tenderness shedding
Tears, such as Angels weep. That hand was toward him extended
Whose last pressure he could not bear, when merciful Nature,
As o'er her dying bed he bent in severest anguish,
Laid on his senses a weight, and suspended the sorrow forever.
He hath recover'd her now: all, all that was lost is restored him;—
Hour of perfect bliss that o'er pays all earthly affliction!
They are met where Change is not known, nor Sorrow, nor Parting.
Death is subdued, and the Grave, which conquers all, hath been conquer'd.
NOTES TO THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

When I beheld them meet, the desire of my soul overcome me;
And when with harp and voice the holy sound
Fell'd the rejoicing sky, as the happy company entered
Through the everlasting Gates, I, too, press'd forward to enter:
But the weight of the body withheld me. I stoop'd to the fountain,
Eager to drink thereof, and to put away all that was earthly.

Darkness came over me then, at the chilling touch of the water,
And my feet, methought, sunk, and I fell precipitate.
Starting,
Then I awoke, and beheld the mountains in twilight before me,
Dark and distinct; and instead of the rapturous sound of sounnahs,
Heard the bell from the tower, toll! toll! through the silence of evening.

—From surrounding things the hues wherein day has abdum them
Fades, like the hopes of youth. — I. col. 2, p. 755.

This effect of twilight, and in the very scene described, has been lately represented by Mr. William Westall, in one of his Views of the Lakes, with the true feeling and power of genius. The range of mountains which is described in these introductory lines, may also be seen in his View of the Vale of Keswick from the Penrith road.

The last pale tint of the twilight:
Green as a stream in the glen whose pure and cheerful waters
Flow o'er a schistous bed. — I. col. 5, p. 755.

St. Pierre, who is often a fanciful, generally a delightful, but always an animated and ingenious writer, has some characteristic speculations concerning this green light of evening.
He says, Je suis porté à attribuer à la couleur verte des végétalités qui couvrent en été une grande partie de notre hémisphère, cette belle teinture d'encre que l'on apperçoit quelquefois dans cette saison au firmament, vers le coucher du soleil. Elle est rare dans nos climats; mais elle est fréquente entre les tropiques, où l'été dure toute l'année. Je suis bien que l'on peut rendre raison de ce phénomène par la simple refraction des rayons du soleil dans l'atmosphère, ce prisme sphérique de notre globe. Mais, outre qu'on peut objecter que la couleur verte se voit tout petit en hiver dans notre ciel, c'est en effet qu'on peut prouver à l'appui de cette opinion des faits qui semblent nous le donner. In fact, it is possible that the color we name自动化 the atmosphere is but an expression of that of the ocean. In effect, the glances flattening that descend upon us all the pole polar, as we approach it, are not so much due to the motion of the sun in the horizont as to its position in the firmament, towards the setting of the sun. It is rare in our climates, but is frequent between the tropics, where summer continues throughout the year. I know that this phenomenon may be explained by the simple refraction of the rays of the sun in the atmosphere, that spherical prism of our globe. But to this it may be objected, that the green color is not seen during the winter in our sky; and moreover, I can support my opinion by other facts, which appear to prove that the atmospheric color of the atmosphere is only a reflection of that of the ocean.

When the floating ice which descends every year from the North Pole, is announced before it appears upon the horizon, by a white light which enlightens the heaven day and night, and which is only a reflection of the crystallized snows, of which those masses are composed. This blue resemblance the tint of the aurora borealis, the centre of which is in the middle of the ice of our pole, but the white color of which is mixed with yellow, with red, and with green, because it partakes of the color of a ferruginous soil, and of the verdure of the pine forests which are in the vicinity zone. The variations of the aurora borealis, is so much the more probable, because of that of the aurora australis, as Captain Cook has observed, differs in that its white color is mixed with blue, which alone, which can only be, according to my opinion, because of the ice of the austral pole (where there is no continuous and no vegetation) is surrounded on all parts by the ocean.
The mural of the Duke of Berry, and the Cato-street conspiracy, were both planned at the time of the King’s death.

This is the Gate of Bliss.

The reader will so surely think of the admirable passage of Dante, which was in the writer’s mind when these lines were composed, that I should not think it necessary to notice the imitation, were it not that we live in an age of plagiarism; when not our plaudits only, but some of our swords also, trick.them lives in borrowed plumes. I have never contracted an obligation of this kind, either to contemporary or predecessor, without acknowledging it.

Dr. Franklin describes the state of things during the reign of Wilkes and Liberty. He says, “There have been amazing contests all over the kingdom, twenty or thirty thousand pounds a side spent in several places, and inconceivable mischief done, by drunken, mad mobs, to houses, windows, &c. The scenes have been horrible. A day and a night illuminating the streets, and agitating the whole of the mob, for the success of Wilkes in the Middlesex election; the second night exceeded any thing of the kind ever seen here on the greatest occasions of rejoicing, as even the small streets, lanes, courts, and other out-of-the-way places, were all in a blaze of light, and in a great lighted street, as the mob went round again after two o’clock, and obliged people who had extinguished their candles, to light them again. Those who refused had all their windows destroyed. The damage done, and the expense of candles, has been computed at fifty thousand pounds. It must have been great, though probably not so much. The ferment is not yet over, for he has promised to surrender to the court next Wednesday, and another tumult is then expected; and what the mob will be, no one can yet foresee. It is really an extraordinary event, to see an outlaw exiled, to see the same man who has just been a great hero, after a stormy journey from France, set himself up as a candidate for the capital of the kingdom, miss his election only by being too late in his application, and immediately carrying it for the principal county. The mobs, (spurred up by numbers of different balls, sung out by people in every street,) requiring gentlemen and bulks of all ranks, as they passed in their carriages, to shout for Wilkes and Liberty, marking the same words on all their coaches with chalk, and No 45 on ever door, which extends a vast way along the roads in the country. I went last week to Winchester, and observed that for fifteen miles out of town there was scarce a door or window-shutter next the road unmarked; and this continued here and there quite to Winchester, which is sixty-four miles.

Even this capital, the residence of the king, is now a daily scene of lawless riot and confusion. Mall patrolling the street at midnight, some among those all that will not roar for Wilkes and Liberty; courts of justice afraid to give judgment against him; coal-heavers and porters pulling down the houses of coal merchants that refuse to give them more wages; sawyers destroying saw-mills; sailors unrigging all the outward-bound ships, and suffering none to sail till merchants agree to raise their pay: watermen destroying private boats, and threatening bridges; soldiers firing among the mobs, and killing men, women, and children, by which seems to have produced a universal uneasiness, that looks like a great black cloud coming on, ready to burst in a general tempest. What will the event be God only knows. But some punishment seems preparing for a people who are ungratefully throwing the best constitution, and the best king, any nation was ever blessed with; intent on nothing but luxury, licentiousness, power, places, pensions and plunder, while the ministry, divided in their councils, with little regard for each other, wearied by perpetual oppositions, in continual apprehension of changes, intent on securing popularity, in case they should lose favor, have, for some years past, had little time or inclination to attend to our small affairs, whose remoteness makes them appear still smaller.

All respect to law and government seems to be lost among the common people, who are moreover continually inflamed by seditious scribblers to trample on authority, and every thing that used to keep them in order.

*Soulos of Fiction, be warn'd! and ye, ye Shandcrers, learn ye Justice, and bear in mind, that after death there is judgment.

Then too did she act with upright heart, as befitted a Sovereign,
True to his sacred trust, to his crown, his kingdom, and people.

VI. col. 1, p. 801.

I am pleased to find (since the first publication of this poem) the same opinion forcibly expressed by Cowper. "It appears to me," he says, (writing in 1782,) "that the king is bound, both by the duty he owes to himself and to his people, to consider himself, with respect to every inch of his territories, as a trustee deriving his interest in them from God, and invested with them by divine authority, for the benefit of his subjects. As he may not sell them or waste them, so he may not resign them to an enemy, or transfer his right to govern them to any, not even to themselves, so long as it is possible for him to keep it. If he does, he betrays at once his own interest, and that of his other dominions. It may be said, suppose Providence has ordained that they shall be wrested from him, how then? I answer, that cannot appear to be the case, till God's purpose is actually accomplished; and in the mean time the most probable prospect of such an event does not release him from his obligation to hold to them the last moment, forasmuch as adverse appearances are no infallible indications of God's designs, but may give place to more comfortable symptoms when we least expect it. Viewing the thing in this light, if I sat on his Majesty's throne, I should be as obstinate as him, because, if I quitted the contest while I had any means left of carrying it on, I should never know that I had not relinquished what I might have retained, or be able to render a satisfactory answer to the doubts and inquiries of my own conscience."

Wou'd that the nations,
Learning of us, would lay aside all wrongful resentment,
All injurious thoughts, and honoring each in the other,
Kindred courage and virtue, and cognate knowledge and freedom,
Lifc in brotherhood wisely confabul'd. We set the example.

VI. col. 1, p. 801.

The wise and dignified manner in which the late King received the first minister from the United States of America is well known. It is not so generally known that anxiety and sleeplessness, during the American war, are believed by those persons who had the best opportunity for forming an opinion upon the subject, to have had the foundation of that melancholy which the King was afflicted during the latter years of his life.

Upon the publication of Captain Cook's Voyages, a copy of this national work was sent to Dr. Franklin, by the King's desire, because he had given orders for the protection of that illustrious navigator, in case he should fall in with any American cruisers on his way home.

Calm in that insalent hour, and over his fortunate triumphs.

VIII. col. 1, p. 892.

The behavior of Charles in that insalient hour extorted admiration even from the better part of the Commonwealth's men. It is thus finely described by Andrew Marvel:

While round the armed bands
Did clap their bloody hands,
He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene;
But with his keen eye
The axe's edge did try:
Nor call'd the Gods with vulgar spight
To vindicate his helpless right;
But bow'd his clever head
Downs, as upon a bed.

Magnificent Edward,
He who made the English renown,
And the fame of his Windsor
In the Orient and Occident known from Tigris to Tagus.

VIII. col. 2, p. 802.

The celebrity which Windsor had obtained, as being the most splendid court in Christendom, and the seat of chivalry, may be plainly seen in the romance of Amadis, which was written in Portugal, towards the latter end of Edward the Third's reign. The Portuguese in that age took their military terms from the English, and St. George came into fashion among them at the same time, as being the English Santiago. A dispute arose between two knights, the one a Cypriot, the other a Frenchman, who were serving the King of Armenia against the Solder of Babylon. The other Christian captains in the army determined that they should decide it by single combat before King Edward of England, as the most worthy and honourable prince in all Christendom; and the quarrel, which began in Armenia, was actually thus decided within the lists, at the palace of Westminster. It was won, not very honorably, by the Frenchman.

He, who discovering the secret
Of the dark and chalilant abyss, with the fire of Venusius
Armed the chemist's hand. — XI. col. 1, p. 805.

Though chemistry is one of the subjects of which I am contented to be ignorant, I can nevertheless perceive and appreciate the real genius indicated by Dr. Clarke's discovery in the art of fusion. See his Treatise upon the Gas Blown, &c. or the account of it in the Quarterly Review, Nov. xliii. p. 496.

In referring to the Safety Lamp of Sir Humphry Davy, I must not be understood as representing that to be the most important of his many and great discoveries. No praise can add to his deserved celebrity.

Not to his affectionate spirit
Could the act of madness innate for guilt be accounted.

XI. col. 1, p. 892.

The act of suicide is very far from being so certain an indication of insanity as it is usually considered by our inquests. But in the case of Chatterton, it was the manifestation of an hereditary disease. There was a madness in his family. His only sister, during one part of her life, was under confinement. The law respecting suicide is a most barbarous one; and of late years has never been carried into effect without exciting horror and disgust. It might be a salutary enactment that all suicides should be given up for dissection. This would certainly prevent many women from committing self-murder, and possibly might be in time be useful to physiology. But a sufficient objection to it is, that it would aggravate the distress of afflicted families.

The gentle Austin. — XII. col. 2, p. 805.

In one of his few intervals of sanity, after the death of this beloved daughter, the late King gave orders that a monument should be erected to the memory of one of her attendants, in St. George's Chapel, with the following inscription:
SPEcIMENS, & c.

The annexed Specimens of Sir Philip Sydney's hexameters will sufficiently evince that the failure of the attempt to naturalize this fine measure in his days, was owing to the manner which the attempt was made, not the measure itself.

First shall fertile grounds not yield increase of a good seed, First the rivers shall cease to reap their floods to the ocean; First may a trusty greyhound transform himself to a tyger. First shall vertue be vise, and beauty be counted a blemish; Ere that I leave with song of praise her praiseworthy, her praise, whence to the world all prais hath only be beginning; But yet well I do find each man most wise in his own case. None can speak of a wound with skill, if he have not a wound felt: Great to thee my state seems, thy state is blest by my judge; And yet neither of us great or blest demean our own self, For yet (weight this, alas!) great is not great to the greater.

What judg you doth a hillock show, by the lofty Olympus? Such my minute greatness dost seem compar'd to the greatest. When Cedars to the ground fall down by the weight of an Emment, Or when a rich Rubin's price be the worth of a Walnut, Or to the Sun for wonders seem small sparks of a candle; Then by my high Cedar, rich Rubin, and only shining Sun, Vertues, riches, beauties of mine shall great be repeated. Oh, no, no, worthy Shepherd, worth can never enter a title, Where proofs truly do justify, thus matcheth, such worth to be sought with; Let not a Puppet abuse thy sprite, Lords of Crowns do not help From the cruel headarch, nor shoes of gold do the gout heal; And precious Couches full oft are shockt with a feaver. If then a bodily evil in a bodily glose be not hidden, Shall such morning dew be so easy to the heat of a love's fire?

Sydney's pentameters appear even more uncount than his hexameters, as more unlike their model; for, in our pronunciation, the Latin pentameter reads as if it ended with two trochees.

Nature shalst went back: Fortune blustred: yet she replied thus:

And even in that love shall I reserve him a spite.

Thus, thus, alas! woulf by Nature, unhappily by Fortune; But most wretched I am, now love wakes my desire.

Sydney has also given examples in his Arcadia of Amarements, Phalaeonics, Sapphics, and Aeslopeid verse, all written upon the same erroneous principle. Those persons who consider it ridiculous to write English verses upon any scheme of Latin versification, may perhaps be surprised to learn that they have read, as blank verse, many lines which are perfect Sapphics or Phalaeonics. Rowe's tragedies are full of such lines.

The Censura Literaria supplies me with two choice samples of Stanbourn's Virgil.

"Neere joyntely brayeth with rufflye & rumbol'd Aetna: Soothes and lightles she is, as if holclathe from bucke cloudes grislye dimm'd.

Like fyer pitch skorches, or flash flame sulpharous burning: Floence to the stars towing the fire like a pellet is hurled, Rugd rocks, up raking, and gouts of mounten yrented.

From route up he juths a stout hound sleag: melten he rowecla, With route snout grumbling in bottom flash furie kindling.

Men say that Encolphas, with bolt unblasted, here hur'd.

Ding'd & with this squissing && and massive barthen of Aetna, Which pres on him unble, from brochen chimney still heurth: As oft as the great his bold & syd cromepled altareth, So oft Stiel al shivereth, therewith flakes smookeye be spark'd."
SPECMENS, &c.

wherein I have now followed him. I should not forgive my- self were I ever to mention Sydney without an expression of reverence and love.

44 "Of verifying," he says, "there are two sorts; the one ancient, the other modern; the ancient marked the quantity of each syllable, and, according to that, framed its verse; the modern, observeth only number, with some regard of the accent; the chief life of it standeth in that sounding of the words which we call Rhyme. Whether of these be the more excellent, would bear many speeches, the ancient, no doubt, more fit for music, both words and time observing quantity, and more fit lively to express divers passions by the low or lofty sound of the well-weighed syllable. The latter like- wise with his Rhyme striketh a certain quirk to the ear, and, in fine, since it doth delight, though by another way, it obtaineth the same purpose, there being in either sweetness, and wanting in neither majesty. Truly the English, before any vulgar language I know, is fit for both sorts; for, for the ancient, the Italian is so full of vowels, that it must ever be cumbered with elisions: the Dutch so, of the other side, with consonants, that they cannot yield the sweet sliding fit for a verse. The French, in his whole language, hath not one word that hath his accent in the last syllable, saving two, called Autonomenesia; and little more hath the Spanish, and therefore very great number may they use, which the English is subject to none of these defects. Now for Rhyme, though we do not observe quantity, yet we observe the accent very precisely, which other languages either cannot do, or will not do so absolutely."

"That Cesura, or breathing place, in the midst of the verse, neither Italian nor Spanish have; the French and we never almost fail of. Lastly, the very Rhyme itself the Italian cannot put in the last syllable, by the French named the Mus- culine Rhyme, but still in the next to the last, which the French call the Female, or the next before that, which the Italian call Sdrucciola: the example of the former is Buono Suono: of the Sdrucciola, is Femina Seminio. The French, on the other side, hath both the male, as Bon Sou; and the Female, as Plais, Tuistine, but the Sdrucciola he hath not, where the English hath all three, as Duo, True, Father, Rather, Motion, Poitoin, with much more, which might be said, but that already I find the trifling of this discourse is too much enlarged."

The French attempted to introduce the ancient metres some years before the trial was made in England. Pasquier says, that Estienne Jodelle led the way in the year 1553, by this distich upon the poems of Olivier de Malguy, "Je ne, it adds, "est vrayement une petite chie d'acare.""

Phobus, Anceur, Cyriss, veut a cuer, nourrir et orer
You veu et cheff, d'ambre, de flamme, de fleurs.

Pasquier himself, three years afterwards, at the solicitation of a friend, produced the following "easy de plus langue halina:"—

Rien ne me plait sinon de te chanter, et m'oréer et orier
Rien ne te plaist non bien, rien ne te plaist que ma mort.
Plus je requiers, ce plus je me bien sear d'etre refuse.
Et c'est par qui voulant point ne me semble refus.
O tromperets atrecho, dest/cc ordre, prouyce volenté.
Esper, mon esper, ainsi miserable pieyre.
Dissours aminross ons, troitshsart ostt, aspre cruauté,
Oui me rauine le corps, qui me rauine le cuer.
Pourquoy tant de furieux dont les Caus mis à d'Aobandon,
Ou pourquoi dans moy si violentes furaire?
Si rauine cet ma furuir, si vain est tout ce dont cuez
Tu bien, s'en tay gist ceste cruelle rigueur:
Dieux patron ne fair amours belles q/i la beauté,
Ou bien l'accomplissement l'asmes de la beauté.
Ou si dans le nuit vous meuls un rassomens fee,
Fauciers Doine que l'amour paut a Dieu delas la beauté,
Commandez que le froid, l'eau, l'Est, Pâhum, Perdue:
Brief que ce tant par tant toute t'aboume de lous,
Pour fuir ma damour, pour fuir cette cruauté,
Oui me rauine le corps, qui me rauine le cuer.

Non hésis ce que ce rond soit tout un sans se resbnergie,
Mais que ma Sourde se change, ou de face, ou de fagon:
Mais que ma Sourde se change, et plus bien descrite les vois,

Et que le froid du froid devenns puisse triompher,
Et que le froid au froid perde sa toute viguer:
Ains d'assopisse mon tourment, et la cruelité
Qui me rauine le corps, qui me rauine le cue.

"Je ne do pas," says the author, "que ces vers soient de quelque valeur, aussi, nous mette je ley sur la moins une intention qu'on les trouve tels; mais bien estimez-y que s'ils sont aussi fluides que les latins, et à tant versez que l'on puisse votre vulgaire estre autant amable que de ce sujet." Pasquier's verses were not published many years after they were written; and in the mean time Jean Antoine de Baif made the attempt upon a larger scale,—"Toutefois, says Pasquier, "en ce sujet si aucuns poëte que nous seulement en fit naistre d'eux, mais un contraire destourage a chaux de s'y endroiter. D'autant que tout ce qu'il en est fait esoit tant despouvoy de cette suspecte qui doit accompagner nos œuvres, qu'ausi tout que cette ancien poëse voit la lanterne, elle murmure comme un aboncet." The Abbé Goujet, therefore, had no reason to rep- resent this attempt as a proof of the bad taste of the age: the bad taste of the age has not altered; and the English compositions are appaluted, not when they are unsuccessful. Jean Antoine de Baif is the writer of whom Cardinal du Perron said, "qu'il était bon homme, mais qu'il était méchant poëte François."

I subjoin a specimen of Spanish Hexameters, from an En- lague by D. Esteban de Villegas, a poet of great and deserved estimation in his own country.

Lleidos y Coridos, Coridon el amante de Filis,
Pastor el uno de Cubrons, el otro de blancas Orjas,
Ambos a dos toros, muchos amores,
Viejo que los regos del Salzabriego el Orbe,
Y que sabiendo larga febrada la Cordoba
Al pur cristal, que cria la facente sobera,
Levidos del sol alegre de su blandu sonoro,
Las plantas velozes ucecos, los pasos anima,
Y al tronco de un verde encoro se sienian amigos.

Tu, que los regidos sobrepujaz del bando Timavo Pesantes, generosos Donques, con tu inédita frente,
Si allora tu crez el eco de un rutico maccza
Tus sienes, si alcanzas a tu fiel abono,
Francisco, del acuto mi la soñor Tuila,
Que pio, responde groto, cesvara severo:
Non menos al caro hermano generosos retratas,
Que al trono prudente signor, generosos mettes,
Al que el Orbe dudaba las aves:
Lleidos y Coridos, Coridon el amante de Filis,
Pastores, las Musas ananas, recreante deseas:
Tu, curdo, perdona entretanto la barbara Musa,
Que preto, inspirando Pian con amigo Cobiuro,
En trampo, que al Olimpo llegaste por el árbol suelta,
Ya sumo llenaste los eres del Glases al Istro,
Y luego, torcedo el vuelo, el aguila al Amstro.

It is admitted by the Spaniards, that the fitness of their lan- guage for the hexameter has been established by Villegas' his success, however, did not induce other poets to follow the example. I know not whom it was that he followed, for he was not the first to make the attempt. Neither do I know whether it was ever made in Portuguese, except in some verses upon St. Ursula and the Eleven Thousand Virgins, which are Latin as well as Portuguese, and were written as a wimidical proof of the affinity of the two languages. I have met with no specimens in Italian. The complete suc- cess of the metre in Germany is well known. The Bohemianans have learnt the tune, and have, like their neighbors, a translation of the Idiath in the measure of the original. This I learn accidentally from a Bohemian grammar; which shows me also, that the Bohemians make a dactyl of Achilles, probably because they pronounce the y with a strong aspirate
OLIVER NEWMAN:
A New England Tale, with other Poetical Remains.

TO WILLIAM AND MARY WORDSWORTH,
THE OLD AND DEAR FRIENDS OF ROBERT SOUTHEY,

THESE LAST PRODUCTIONS,
THE IMPERFECT "AUTUMNAL FLOWERS," OF HIS POETICAL GENIUS, ARE INSCRIBED, WITH FILIAL REVERENCE AND AFFECTION,

BY THE EDITOR.

PREFACE.

The principal Poem of this volume, Oliver Newman, was well known to many friends of the late Poet Laureate: and it is presumed that those persons at least, who have heard him read portions of it, with his peculiar and highly expressive intonation, will welcome with pleasure, not however unmingled with melancholy, this last poetical work, imperfect as it is. Oliver Newman was not a rapid production: the first idea of it seems to have arisen in his mind in 1811; it was commenced in January, 1815; and having been continued at different intervals, amid the pressure of more urgent business, received its last additions in September, 1829. Although this is not the place to speak critically, one observation perhaps may be pardoned—that this poem seems to possess in a considerable degree a quality which some of the Author’s other poems were judged by several critics to be deficient in, viz., a human interest: we feel that we are among persons of a like nature with ourselves, and their sufferings touch the heart. A general account of the story upon which it is based, and the intended plan, has been drawn up from the Author’s notes, and printed as an Appendix. It was thought better to do this, than to leave the reader entirely without information: yet the sketch is presented with considerable misgivings; because it is likely, that to some persons, notwithstanding that the Author’s own words are used wherever it is possible, the dry bones of a poem may seem not only uninteresting, but even repulsive. Neither can such a sketch be certainly a true representation of the mere story of the perfect work; because, even of the few particulars there noted, several might, in the working out of the poem, be altered or expunged.

Of the other pieces here collected, the "Fragmentary Thoughts occasioned by his Son’s Death," and the "Short Passages of Scripture," are printed as much for the purpose of giving fresh proof of the purity and elevation of his character, as for their own intrinsic beauty. His son Herbert—o, whom he wrote thus in the Colloquies, "I called to mind my hopeful H—— too, so often the sweet companion of my morning walks to this very spot, in whom I had fondly thought my better part should have survived me, and

"With whom it seemed my very life Went half away"— died 17th April, 1816, being about ten years old, a boy of remarkable genius and sweetness of disposition. These Fragments bear a date at their commencement, 3d May, 1816, but do not seem all written at the same time. The Author at one time contemplated founding upon them a considerable work, of a meditative and deeply serious cast. But, although he, like Schiller, after the vanishing of his Ideals, always found "Employment," the never-tiring," one of his truest friends,—yet this particular form of employment, which seemed at first attractive to him, had not, when tried, the soothing effect upon his feelings which was needful; and in March, 1817, he writes, that he "had not recovered heart enough to proceed with it."

The "Passages of Scripture" are found in one of his latest note-books: they were evidently not written with any view to publication, but arose simply from the pure pleasure which he took in marking down, after his own fashion, verses that attracted his poetical taste, either by the force of some peculiar idea, or by the musical harmony of the words in our English version. Moreover, these passages seem illustrative of the structure and choice of language in some of his poems; for they lead us to observe in them also the effects of habitual study of the Holy Scriptures, evidenced not only by the references, which are frequently given, but also, which is more important, by the apparently unconscious use of a diction borrowed from the poetical and imaginative portions of the Bible.

It was natural that a writer of so energetic a mind as the late Poet Laureate, would leave many unfinished projects. Besides the Fragments here published, he had commenced a poem on "Robin Hood," the manuscript of which is not among his other poetical papers. He had also thought of a series of "Inscriptions in honour of English Poets, the notice of which, as it is short, may be here inserted, for the use of those who may take pleasure in cultivating that style, of which Akenside is the prototype.

"Tuesday, 6th Sept., 1814.

"Inscriptions for the Poetical Ground of these Kingdoms; i. e., a tribute of respect to all those poets who deserve it. This, I think, would be a worthy task.

Chaucer—at Woodstock? Blenheim will become an empty name, and that palace a pile of ruins, while he remains.

Malvern—Piers Ploughman.

Lydgate—at Bury.

Spenser—by the Mole.

Surrey—this a place of burial, if that be known; otherwise, at the chief seat of the Howards.

Amwell—Warner and Walton and Scott.

T. Warton—by the Cherwell.

Rokeby—Mason and Scott and Morritt himself.

Davenant—Cowes Castle.

Sylvester—Donnington; buried at Middleburg."

Lastly, it may be not unfitly recorded, that some notes exist, preparatory to a poem in honour of her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the first years of this reign, severe reflections were from time to time made upon the Poet Laureate, for his silence. Now, the solemn events which have happened since that time, allow us to suppose that the Spirit of Poetry was then too dead within him, to permit him to undertake this new labour.

It only remains to be said, that these poems are printed as he left them; and that, as none of them had received his final corrections for the press, there may be defects of language which he himself would have removed. At the same time it is honestly avowed that, deservedly high as his reputation, both as a poet and a man, has stood among the writers of his generation—now, alas! fast departing from us,—a strong confidence is felt that this small volume will in no way derogate from it; and in this hope it is committed to the world.

FUNERAL AT SEA.

The summer sun is riding high
Amid a bright and cloudless sky;
Beneath whose deep o'er-arching blue
The circle of the Atlantic sea,
Reflecting back a deeper hue,
Is heaving peacefully.

The winds are still, the ship with idle motion
Rocks gently on the gentle ocean;
Loose hang her sails, awaiting when the breeze
Again shall wake to waft her on her way.
Glancing beside, the dolphins, as they play,
Their gorgeous tints suffused with gold display;
And gay bonitos in their beauty glide:
With arrowy speed, in close pursuit,
They through the azure waters shoot;
A feebler shoal before them in affright
Spring from the wave, and in short flight,
On wet and plumless wing essay
The aerial element:
The greedy followers, on the chase intent,
Dart forward still with keen and upturn'd sight,
And, to their proper danger blind the while,
Held not the sharks, which have for many a day
Hover'd behind the ship, presentient of their prey.

So far a season might persuade
You crowd to try the fisher's trade; yet
From the stern no line is hung,
Nor bait by eager sea-boy flung;
Nor doth the watchful sailor stand
Alert to strike, harpoon in hand.
Upon the deck assembled, old and young,
Boreheaded all in reverence, see them there;
Behold where, hoisted half-mast high,
The English flag hangs mournfully;
And hark! what solemn sounds are these
Heard in the silence of the seas!

"Man that is born of woman, short is his time,
And full of woe! he springeth like a flower,
Or like the grass, that, green at morning prime,
Is cut and withereth ere the evening hour;

Never doth he continue in one stay,
But like a shadow doth he pass away."

It was that awful strain, which saith
How in the midst of life we are in death:
"Yet not for ever, O Lord God most high!
Saviour! yet not for ever shall we die!"

Ne'er from a voice more eloquent did prayer
Arise, with fervent pious sincere.
To every heart, of all the listening crew,
It made its way, and drew
Even from the hardy seaman's eyes a tear.
"God," he pursued, "I hath taken to himself
The soul of our departed sister dear;
We then commit her body to the deep;"

He paused, and, at the word,
The coffin's plunge was heard.

A female voice of anguish then brake forth
With sobs convulsive of a heart opprest.
It was a daughter's agonizing cry:
But soon hath she repress
The fit of passionate grief,
And listening patiently,
In that religious effort gained relief.
Beside the gray-hair'd captain doth she stand;
One arm is linked in his; the other hand
Hid with the handkerchief her face, and prest
Her eyes, whence burning tears continuous flow.
Down hung her head upon her breast,
And thus the maiden stood in silent woe.

Again was heard the preacher's earnest voice:
It bade the righteous in their faith rejoice,
Their sure and certain hope in Christ; for blest
In Him are they, who from their labours rest.
It rose into a high thanksgiving strain,
And praised the Lord, who from a world of pain
Had now been pleased to set his servant free;
Hasten thy kingdom, Lord, that all may rest in thee!

In manhood's fairest prime was he who pray'd,
Even in the flower and beauty of his youth.
These holy words and fervent tones portray'd
The feelings of his inmost soul sincere;
For scarce two months had fill'd their short career
Since from the grave of her who gave him birth
That sound had struck upon his ear;
When to the doleful words of "Earth to earth"
Its dead response the senseless coffin gave:—
Oh! who can e'er forget that echo of the grave!

Now in the grace of God dismiss'd,
They separate as they may,

To narrow limits of the ship confined:
Nor did the impression lightly pass away,
Even from the unreflecting sailor's mind.
They pitied that sweet maiden, all bereft,
Alone on shipboard among strangers left.
They spake of that young preacher, day by day
How while the fever held its fatal course,
He minister'd at the patient sufferer's side,
Holding of faith and hope his high discourse;
And how, when all had join'd in humble prayer,
She solemnly confided to his care,
Till to her father's hands she could be given,
Her child forlorn,—and blest him ere she died.
They call'd to mind, how peaceful, how serene,
Like one who seem'd already half in heaven,
After that act she yielded up her breath;
And sure they wish'd their end like hers, I ween,
And for a comforter like him in death.

II.

THE VOYAGE.

The maiden on her narrow bed
To needful solitude hath fled;
He who perform'd the funeral prayer
Leans o'er the vessel's head, and there
Contemplating the sea and sky,
He muses of eternity.

The captain paces to and fro
The deck with steady step and slow,
And at his side a passenger,
Conversing as they go.
Their talk was of that maid forlorn,
The mournful service of the mourn,
And the young man, whose voice of heartfelt faith
Breath'd hope and comfort o'er the bed of death.
"Captain," quoth Randolph, "you have borne,
Ere this, I ween, to Boston's shore,
Saints by the dozen, and the score:
But if he preach as he can pray,
The Boston men will bless the day
On which you brought this treasure o'er:
A youth like him they well may call
A son of thunder, or a second Paul."
Threat the captain smiled, and said,
"Oh hang the broad face and round head,
Hard as iron, and heavy as lead!
I have whistled for a wind ere now,
And thought it cheap to crack a sail,
If it sent the cantiing breed below.
Jonah was three days in the whale,
But I have had fellows here, I trow,
With lungs of brazen power,
Who would not fail to preach a whale
Dead sick in half an hour.
One Sunday, when on the banks we lay,
These Roundheads, think ye, what did they!
Because, they said, 'twas the sabbath day,
And hallow'd by the Lord,
They took the fish, which their servants caught,
And threw them overboard.

Newman is made of different clay;
He walks in his own quiet way;
And yet beneath that sober mien
Gleams of a spirit may be seen,
Which show what temper lies suppress'd
Within his meek and unambitious breast:
He seemeth surely one of gentle seed,
Whose sires for many an age were wont to lead
In courts and councils, and in camps to bleed."

Randolph replied, "He rules his tongue too well
Ever of those from whom he sprung to tell:
Whatever rank they once possess'd
In camps and councils, is, I veen, suppress'd
In prudent silence. Little love that pair
Could to the royal Martyr bear,
Be sure, who named their offspring Oliver.
You have mark'd that volume, over which he seems
To pore and meditate, like one who dreams,
Pondering upon the page with thought intense,
That nought, which passes round him, can from thence.

His fix'd attention move:
He carries it about his person still,
Nor lays it from him for a moment's time.
At my request, one day, with no good will,
He lent it me: what, think ye, did it prove?
A rigmarole of verses without rhyme,
About the apple, and the cause of sin,
By the blind old traitor Milton! and within,
Upon the cover, he had written thus,
As if some saintly relic it had been,
Which the fond owner gloried in possessing:
"Given me by my most venerable friend;
The author, with his blessing!"

CAPTAIN.

Sits the wind there!

RANDOLPH.

Returning him the book,
I told him I was sorry he could find
None who deserved his veneration more
Than one who, in the blackest deed of guilt
That blots our annals, stands participant,
A volunteer in that worst inhuman,
Stain'd to the core with blessed Charles his blood,
Although by some capricious mercy spared,
Strangely, as if by miracle, he still
Lived to disparage justice.

CAPTAIN.

And how brook'd he
Your reprehension?
The way it should not go. One of that herd,
Rather than rend the service, would have seen
The dead thrown overboard without a prayer.

RANDOLPH.
Yet he hath freaks and follies of opinion;
The bubbles of a yeasty mind, that works
As it would crack its vessel.

captain.
They are ever
The sweetest nuts in which the maggot breeds.

RANDOLPH.
But, once fly-striken, what avails their sweetness?
Only to feed a pamper’d grub, that leaves
Nothing but dirt and hollowness behind it.
Tainted the young man is, and deeply too,
I fear, by birth and breeding: I perceive it
With sorrow, seeing on how fair a stock
The unlucky graft is set.

captain.
Why then, alas
For that poor Anabel, if she must have
This farther cause to rue our baneful factions.
The wretched strife already hath entail’d
Upon her luckless family the loss
Of fair possessions, friends, and native land!
And now a chance hath offer’d, which to her,
I trow, might largely make amends for all:
It would be hard indeed, when all things seem
To square so well—youth, opportunity.
Their fortunes once, the natural dower of each
So equal, and so bountifully given,
A dying mother’s blessing to crown all—
It would be hard indeed, should loyalty
Forbid the banes.

RANDOLPH.
I know her father’s temper,
True as his own Toledo to the cause;
Wherein they both were tried. Nor will neglect,
Ingratitude of courts, and banishment,
(For a grant in the American wilderness
Only calls exile by a fairer name,)
Subdue his high-wrought virtue. Satisfied
At last, by years of painful proof,
That loyalty must find in its own proud sense
Its own reward, that pride he will bequeath
His children as their best inheritance,
A single heir-loom rescued from the wreck,
And worth whate’er was lost.

captain.
’Tis well the youth
Thinks less of earth than heaven, and hath his heart
More with the angels than on human love:
But if such thoughts and hopes have entered it,
As would some forty years ago have found
Quick entrance, and warm welcome too, in mine,
His ugly baptism may mar all, and make him
Breathe maledictions on his godfathers,
Though old Ned himself were one.

RANDOLPH.
Howbeit ’twill win him
Worship and friends in the city of the saints;
And, to the ears of sober Boston men,
Oliver will be a name more savoury
Than Tribulation, or Stand-fast-in-the-Lord,
Increase or Nathan, Gershom, Ichabod,
Praise-God, or any of the Barebones breed.
They rise upon the oak-holyday with faces
A full inch longer than they took to bed:
Experienced nurses feed their babes that day
With spoons, because the mother’s milk is soars;
And when they mourn upon the Martyrdom,
’Tis for the expiation, not the crime.
Oh they love dearly one of the precious seed!
Tyburn, since Sixty, in their secret hearts
Holds place of Calvary. For saints and martyrs,
None like their own Hugh Peters, and the heads
On the Hall your only relics! Fifteen years
They have hid among them the two regicides,
Shifting from den to cover, as we found
Where the scant lay. But earth them as they will,
I shall unkenel them, and from their holes
Drag them to light and justice.

captain.
There hath been
Much wholesome sickness thrown away, Sir Randolphe
On your strong stomach! Two sea voyages
Have not sufficed to clear the bile wherewith
You left New England!

RANDOLPH.
Nay, it rises in me
As I draw near their shores.

captain.
Why then, look shortly
For a sharp fit; for, if the sky tell true,
Anon we shall have wind, and to our wish.

So spake the Captain, for his eye,
Versed in all signs and weathers,
Discerned faint traces in the eastern sky,
Such as a lion’s paw might leave
Upon the desert, when the sands are dry.
The dog-vane now blows out with its light feathers;
And lo! the ship, which like a log hath lain,
Heavily rolling on the long slow swell,
Stirs with her proper impulse now, and gathers
A power like life beneath the helmsman’s will.
A NEW ENGLAND TALE

Her head lies right; the rising breeze
A stern comes rippling o'er the seas;
A tramp of feet! a sound of busy voices!
The cordage rattles, and the topsails fill;
All hands are active, every heart rejoices.

Blest with fair seas, and favourable skies,
Right for her promised land
The gallant vessel flies;
Far, far behind her now
The foamy furrow lies;
Like dust around her prow
The ocean spray is driven.

O thou fair creature of the human hand!
Thou, who wert palesied late,
When the dead calm lay heavy on the deep,
Again hast thou received the breath of heaven,
And, waking from thy sleep,
As strength again to those broad wings is given,
Thou puttest forth thy beauty and thy state!
Hold on with happy winds thy prosperous way,
And may no storm that goodly pride abate,
Nor baffling airs thy destined course delay,
Nor the sea-rover seize thee for his prey;
But ministering angels wait
To watch for thee, against all ill event
From man, or from the reckless element.
Thou hast a richer freight
Than ever vessel bore from Ophir old,
Or spicey India sent,
Or Lisbon welcomed to her joyful quay
From her Brazilian land of gems and gold;
Thou carriest pious hope, and pure desires,
Such as approving angels might behold;
A heart of finest mould,
A spirit that aspires
To heaven, and draws its flame from heavenly fires;
Genius, Devotion, Faith,
Stronger than time or Death,
A temper of the high heroic mood,
By that strong faith exalted, and subdued
To a magnanimous fortitude.
The blossom of all virtues dost thou bear,
The seed of noble actions! Go thy way
Rejoicingly, from fear and evil free:
These shall be thy defence,
Beneath the all-present arm of Providence,
Against all perils of the treacherous sea.

Where the long sandy Cape
Bends and embraces round,
As with a lover's arm, the shelter'd sea,
A haven she hath found
From adverse gales and boisterous billows free.

Now strike your sails,
Ye toil-worn mariners, and take your rest
Long as the fierce north-west
In that wild fit prevails,
Tossing the waves upturn'd with frantic sway.
Keep ye within the bay,
Contented to delay
Your course till the elemental madness cease,
And heaven and ocean are again at peace.

How gladly there,
Sick of the uncomfortable ocean,
The impatient passengers approach the shore;
Escaping from the sense of endless motion,
To feel firm earth beneath their feet once more,
To breathe again the air
With taint of bilge and cordage undeciled.
And drink of living springs, if there they may,
And with fresh fruits and wholesome food repair
Their spirits, weary of the watery way.

And oh! how beautiful
The things of earth appear
To eyes that far and near
For many a week have seen
Only the circle of the restless sea!
With what a fresh delight
They gaze again on fields and forests green,
Hovel, or whatsoever
May bear the trace of man's industrious hand;
How grateful to their sight
The shore of shelving sand,
As the light boat moves joyfully to land!

Woods they beheld, and huts, and piles of wood,
And many a trace of toil,
But not green fields or pastures. 'Twas a land
Of pines and sand;
Dark pines, that from the loose and sparkling soil
Rose in their strength aspiring: far and wide
They sent their searching roots on every side,
And thus, by depth and long extension, found
Firm hold and grasp within that treacherous ground:
So had they risen and flourish'd; till the earth,
Unstable as its neighbouring ocean there,
Like an unnatural mother, heaped around
Their trunks its weary furrows white and high;
And still'd thus the living things it bore.
Half buried thus they stand,
Their summits sere and dry,
Marking, like monuments, the funeral mound;
As when the masts of some tall vessel show
Where, on the fatal shoals, the wreck lies whelm'd below.

III.

CAPE COD.

Days pass, winds veer, and favouring skies
Change like the face of fortune; storms arise;
Safely, but not within her port desired,
The good ship lies.
Such was the genial earth; nor was the air
Fresh and delightful there:
A noisome taint upon the breath it bore;
For they who dwelt upon that sandy shore,
Of meadows and of gardens took no care;
They sow'd not, neither did they reap:
The ocean was their field, their flocks and herds
The myriad-moving armies of the deep;
The whale their mighty chase, whose bones bestrew'd
The sandy margin of that ample bay,
And all about, in many a loophly heap,
The offal and the reeking refuse lay,
Left there for dogs obscene and carrion birds a prey.

Oliver, as they approach'd, said thoughtfully:
"It was within this bay
That they, into the wilderness who bore
The seeds of English faith and liberty,
First set their feet upon the shore.
Here they put in, escaping from the rage
Of tempests, and by treacherous pilage
Led, as it seem'd to fallible men, astray:
But God was with them; and the Providence
Which err's not, had design'd his people's way."

"A blessed day for England had it been," Randolph exclaim'd, "had Providence thought good,
If the whole stern round-headed brotherhood
Had follow'd, man and woman, great and small;
New England might have prosper'd with the brood,
Or seas and sharks been welcome to them all."

"Alas, how many a broken family
Hath felt that bitter wish!" the youth replied;
And, as he spake, he breathed a silent sigh.
"The wounded heart is prone to entertain
Presumptuous thoughts and feelings, which arraign
The appointed course of things. But what are we,
Short-sighted creatures of an hour,
That we should judge? In part alone we see,
And this but dimly. He, who ordereth all,
Beholdeth all, at once, and to the end:
Upon His wisdom and His power,
His mercy and His boundless love, we rest;
And resting thus in humble faith, we know,
Whether the present be for weal or woe,
For us whatever is must needs be best."

Thus, while he spake, the boat had reach'd the land;
And, grating gently, rested on the sand.
They step ashore; the dwellers gather nigh:
"Whence comes the vessel? whither is she bound?"
Then for Old England's welfare they inquire;—
Eager alike for question and reply,
With open lips and ears attending round;—
What news of war, and plague, and plots, and fire?
Till satisfied of these, with cheerful care
The board and bowl they hasten to prepare;
Each active in his way,
Glad of some lawful business, that may break
The tedious of an idle Sabbath-day.

But, from the stir of that loquacious crew,
Oliver meantime apart from all withdrew.
Beyond the bare and sapless pines, which stood
Half-overwhelm'd with sand,
He pass'd, and entering in the wood,
Indulged his turneth'd heart in solitude.
"Thou Earth, receive me, from my native land
An unoffending exile! Hear my claim!
In search of wealth I have not sought thy shore,
Nor covetous of fame,
Nor treading in the ambitious steps of power;
But hiding from the world a hapless name,
And sacrificing all
At holiest duty's call,
Thou barbarous Land, of thee I only crave—
For those I love—concealment and a grave."

Thus he relieved his breast; yet did not dare
Allow himself full utterance, even there:
To part he gave a voice; and then, in fear,
Shaped with his lips, inaudibly, the rest:
With that the very air
Might not be trusted; and he look'd around,
Alarm'd, lest human ear
Had caught the unfinished sound.
Some tears stole down his cheek, now not repress'd,
And, kneeling on the earth, he kiss'd the ground.

Unbidden thoughts then took their course, and drew
The future and the past before his view:
The haunts, the friendships, and the hopes of youth—
All, all forsaken—no dear voice,
Ever again to bid his heart rejoice!
Familiar scenes and faces
Only in dreams should he behold again;
But, in their places,
The wilderness, wild beasts, and savage men!

Soon from that paimptous thought
His soul upon the wings of hope took flight;
And strong imagination brought
Visions of joy before his inward sight.
Of regions yet by Englishmen unsought,
And ancient woods, was that delightful dream,—
The broad savannah, and the silver stream.
Fair bowers were there, and gardens smiling,
And harvests flourish'd in the wild;
And, while he made Redeeming Love his theme,— Savage no longer now—
The Indians stood around,
And drank salvation with the sound.
One Christian grave was there,
Turf'd well, and weed'd by his pious care,
And redolent of many a fragrant flower
And herb profusely planted all about.

Within his bower
An old man sate, in patience and in peace,
While the low sands of life ran out,
Awaiting his release.
That old man laid his hand upon his head,
And blest him daily, when the day was done;
And Heaven was open to him, and he saw
His mother's spirit smile, and bless her son.

Thus to the voluntary dream resign'd
He lay, while blended sounds of air and sea
Lulled his unconscious mind
With their wild symphony.
The wind was in the pines, awakening there
A sea-like sound continuous, and a swell
At fitful intervals, that mingled well
With ocean's louder roar,
When the long curling waves,
Reach after reach in regular rising, fell
Upon the sandy shore.
Long might he there have lain, but that, in tones
Which seem'd of haste to tell,
Once, twice, and thrice pronounced he heard his name:
Too sweetly to his ears the accents came,
Breathed from the gentle lips of Annabel.

With hurried pace she comes, and flush'd in face,
And with a look, half-pity, half-affright,
Which, while she spake, enlarged her timid eyes:
"O, sir! I have seen a piteous sight!"
The shuddering maiden cries;
"A poor wild woman. Woe is me! among
What worse than heathen people are we thrown?
Beasts, in our England, are not treated thus,—
Our very stones would rise
Against such cruelties!
But you, perhaps, can reach the stoney heart,—
Oh come, then, and perform your Christian part."

She led him hastily toward a shed,
Where, fetter'd to the door post, on the ground
An Indian woman sate. Her hands were bound,
Her shoulders and her back were wailed and scored
With recent stripes. A boy stood by,
Some seven years old, who with a piteous eye
Beheld his suffering mother, and deplored
Her injuries with a cry,
Deep, but not loud,—an utterance that express'd
The mingled feelings swelling in his breast,—
Instinctive love intense, the burning sense
Of wrong, intolerable grief of heart,
And rage, to think his arm could not fulfil
The pious vengeance of his passionate will.
His sister by the door
Lay basking in the sun: too young was she
To feel the burthen of their misery;
Reckless of all that pass'd, her little hand
Play'd idly with the soft and glittering sand.

At this abhorred sight,
Had there been place for aught
But pity, half relieved by indignation,
They would have seen that Indian woman's face
Not with surprise alone, but admiration:
With such severe composure, such an air
Of stern endurance, did she bear
Her lot of absolute despair.
You rather might have deem'd,
So fix'd and hard the strong bronze features seem'd,
That they were of some molten statue part,
Than the live sentient index of a heart
Suffering and struggling with extremest wrong:
But that the coarse jet hair upon her back
Hung loose, and lank, and long,
And that sometimes she moved her large black eye,
And look'd upon the boy who there stood weeping by.

Oliver in vain attempted to assuage,
With gentle tones and looks compassionate,
The bitterness of that young Indian's rage.
The boy drew back abhorrent from his hand,
Eyed him with fierce disdain, and breathed
In inarticulate sounds his deadly hate.
Not so the mother; she could understand
His thoughtful pity, and the tears which fell
Copiously down the cheeks of Annabel.
Touch'd by that unaccustomed sympathy
Her countenance relax'd: she moved her head
As if to thank them both
Then frowning, as she raised her mournful eye,—
"Bad Christian-man! bad English-man!" she said:
And Oliver a sudden sense of shame
Felt for the English and the Christian name.

IV

THE CAPTIVES RANSOMED.

OLIVER.
I pray you, sir, who owns the Indian woman
That is chain'd in yonder hut?

CAPE'S-MAN.
What! you have seen them,
The she-wolf and her whelps?

OLIVER.
She hath indeed
A strange wild aspect, and the boy appears
Of a fierce nature. I should think her owner
Would find her an unprofitable slave.

CAPE'S-MAN.
Why, sir, you reckon rightly; and, methinks,
Without a conjurer's skill you well may think so:
Those fetters, and the marks upon her skin,
Speak her deserts. On week-days with the whip
We keep her tightly to her work; but thus
Her Sabbath must be spent, or she would put
The wilderness between her and her owner.
An honest dealer never paid good money
For a worse piece: and for that boy of hers,
He is a true-bred savage, blood and bone,
To the marrow and heart's core.

RANDOLPH.

I warrant him!
No mother like your squaw to train a child
In the way she would have him go; she makes him
subter
Than the sly snake, untameable as bear
Or buffalo, fierce as a famish'd wolf,
And crueler than French judges, Spanish friars,
Or Dutchmen in the East. His earliest plaything
Is a green scalp, and then, for lollipop,
The toasted finger of an Englishman!
Young as he is, I dare be sworn he knows
Where is the liveliest part to stick a skewer
Into a prisoner's flesh, and where to scoop
The tenderest mouthful. If the Devil himself
Would learn devices to afflict the damn'd
With sharper torments, he might go to school
To a New England savage.

CAPE'S-MAN.

I perceive, sir,
You know them well. Perhaps you may have heard
Of this young devilling's father:—he was noted
For a most bloody savage in his day:
They call'd him Kawnacom.

RANDOLPH.

What! Kawnacom,
The Narhaganset Sagamo?

CAPE'S-MAN.

The same;
A sort of captain, or of prince, among them.

RANDOLPH.

A most notorious villain! But I left him
At peace with the English?

CAPE'S-MAN.

And you find him so,—
Under the only bail he would not break;
A bullet through the heart is surety for him.
You have not learnt, I guess, what dreadful work
There is in the back country!—Families
Burnt in their houses; stragglers tomahawk'd
And scalp'd, or dragg'd away that they may die
By piecemeal murder, to make mockery
For these incarnate devils at the stake.
Farms are forsaken; towns are insecure;
Men sleep with one eye open, and the gun
By their bed-side. And, what is worst, they know
How far the league extends, nor whom to trust
Among these treacherous tribes. Old people say
That things were not so bad in the Pequod war.

RANDOLPH.

What then, have we been idle?

CAPE'S-MAN.

Hitherto
But little has been done. The evil found us
Lapp'd in security, and unprepared:
Nor know we where to strike, nor whom, so darkly
The mischief hath been laid.

RANDOLPH.

Strike where we will,
So we strike hard, we cannot err. The blow
That rids us of an Indian does good service.

OLIVER.

That were a better service which should win
The savage to your friendship.

CAPE'S-MAN.

You are young, sir,
And, I perceive, a stranger in the land;
Or you would know how bootless is the attempt
To tame and civilize these enemies,
Man-beasts, or man-fiends,—call them which you will,—
Their monstrous nature being half brute, half devil,
Nothing about them human but their form.
He, who expends his kindness on a savage
Thinking to win his friendship, might as wisely
Plant thorns and hope to gather grapes at vintage.

OLIVER.

Look but to Martha's Vineyard, and behold
On your own shores the impossibility
Achieved—the standing miracle display'd
In public view, apparent to all eyes,
And famous through all countries wheresoe'er
The Gospel truth is known. Many are the hearts
In distant England which have overflow'd
With pious joy to read of Hinacom's,
Whose prayerful house the pestilence past by;
And blind Waunoppeck,—he, within whose doors
The glad thanksgiving strain of choral praise
Fails not, at morn and eve, from year to year;
And the Sachem, who rejoiced because the time
Of light was come, and now his countrymen,
Erring and lost, no longer should go down
In ignorance and darkness to the grave;
And poor old Lazarus, that rich poor man,
The child of poverty, but rich in faith,
And his assured inheritance in heaven.

RANDOLPH.

Young sir, it is with stories as with men;
That credit oftentimes they gain abroad,
Which, either for misluck or misdesert,
They fail to find at home.

OLIVER.

Are these things false, then?
Is there no truth in Mayhew's life of love?
Hath not the impatient Welshman's zeal, that blazed
Even like a burning and consuming fire,
Refined itself into a steady light
Among the Indians?—and the name of Williams,
The signal once for strife where'er he went,
Become a passport and a word of peace
Through savage nations? Or is this a tale
Set forth to mock our weak credulity;
And all that holy Eliot hath perform'd
Only a fable cunningly devised?

CAPE'S-MAN.

He comes out qualified to lecture us
Upon our own affairs!

RANDOLPH.

The things you talk of
Serve but with us to comfort our old women,
Furnish an elder with some choice discourse
For a dull synod, and sometimes help out
Sir Spinetax at a pinch, when he would think it
A sin did he dismiss his hungry flock
Before the second glass be fairly spent.
Much have you read, and have believed as largely;
And yet one week's abode in the colony
Will teach you more than all your English reading.

OLIVER.

Sir, I am easy of belief, for that way
My temper leads me,—liable to err;
And yet, I hope, not obstinate in error;
But ready still to thank the riper judgment
That may correct my inexperienced years.
You paint the Indians to the life, I doubt not:
Children of sin, and therefore heirs of wrath,
The likeness of their Heavenly Sire in them
Seems utterly defaced; and in its stead,
Almost, it might be thought, the Evil Power
Hath set his stamp and image. This should move us
The more to deep compassion; men ourselves,
In whom the accident of birth alone
Makes all this awful difference! And remembering,
That from our common parent we derive
Our nature's common malady innate,
For which our common Saviour offers us
The only cure,—oh! ought we not to feel
How good and merciful a deed it were
To bring these poor lost sheep within his fold!

RANDOLPH.

Sheep call you them, forsooth! When you can Gather
Bears, wolves, and tigers in a fold, hope then
To tame such sheep as these.

OLIVER.

What is there, sir,
That may not by assiduous care be won
To do our will? Give me a lion's cub,
Torn from the teat, and I will so train up
The noble beast, that he shall fondle me,
And lay his placid head upon my knees,
And lick my hand, and couch my bed-side,
And guard me with a dog's fidelity.

RANDOLPH.

Behold a litter ready to your wish!
Our friend, if I mistake not, will afford
An easy purchase, dam and cubs. What say you,
My lion-tamer?

CAPE'S-MAN.

You shall have them cheap, sir!
A bargain that may tempt you; come, for half
That they would fetch in the Barbadoes market.
I meant to ship them thither, but would rather
Sell at a less than keep that woman longer.

Thus had the jeer grown serious, and it drew
Into the young man's cheek a deeper hue.
Moments there are in life,—alas,—how few!—
When, casting cold prudential doubts aside,
We take a generous impulse for our guide,
And, following promptly what the heart thinks best,
Commit to Providence the rest,
Sure that no after-reckoning will arise,
Of shame, or sorrow, for the heart is wise.
And happy they who thus in faith obey
Their better nature: err sometimes they may,
And some sad thoughts lie heavy in the breast,
Such as by hope deceived are left behind;
But, like a shadow, these will pass away
From the pure sunshine of a peaceful mind.

Thus feeling, Oliver obey'd
His uncorrupted heart; nor paused, nor weigh'd
What hindrance, what displeasure might ensue;
But from his little store of worldly wealth,
Poor as it was, the ready ransom drew.
Half-earnest, half-sarcastic, Randolph now
Sought him from that rash purpose to dissuade;
While the hard Cape's-man, nothing nice,
Counted the money, glad to get his price.
THE PORTRAIT.

At length the adverse gales have ceased;
The breath of morn is from the east,
Where, burnishing with gold the restless sea,
Uprose the sun in radiant majesty.
Unfelt that breath upon the seas,
Unheard amid the silent trees,
It breathes so quietly:
Yet have the seamen, on their way intent,
Perceived the auspicious sign. The sails are bent,
The anchor raised; the swelling canvas now
Fills with the refreshing breeze; the Cape recedes,
Its sandhills and its pines
In distance fade away.
Steady she holds her course; and still the day
Is young, when lo! the haven is in sight;
And ere from his meridian height the sun
Declines, within that haven's gentle breast,
From the long labours of her weary way,
The vessel comes to rest.

Scatter'd within the peaceful bay
Many a fair isle and islet lay,
And rocks and banks which threaten'd there
No peril to the mariner.
The stores which bent around were gay
With maize, and with pastures green,
And rails and hedge-row trees between,
And fields for harvest white,
And dwellings sprinkled up and down;
And round about the cluster'd town,
Which rose in sunshine bright,
Was many a shelter'd garden spot,
And many a sunny orchard plot,
And bowers which might invite
The studious man to take his seat
Within their quiet, cool retreat,
When noon was at its height.
No heart that was at ease, I ween,
Could gaze on that surrounding scene
Without a calm delight.

Behold upon the quay a press
Of business and of idleness,
Where these new-comers land.
Kinsfolk with anxious questions meet;
And friends and light acquaintance greet
With jovial shake of hand.
The idlers ask the crew of what
Upon their way befell;
And all, and more than all they know,
The wondering sailors tell.
From tongue to tongue the tidings ran;
The lady's death,—the strange young man;
His moody ways, his gift of prayer,
The maid committed to his care,
His destined bride, they nothing doubting deem'd;
And how, by sudden fit of pity moved,
From slavery he redeem'd
The children and the wife of Kawnacon,
(An act that all admired, but none approved.)
And to their savage tribe, they fear'd,
Reckless of counsel, would conduct them home.
All marvel'd at the tale; the many jeer'd:
"Mad as the Quakers!" some exclaimed; and some Pray'd that his rash and unenlighten'd will
Might cause no after-troubles in a state
Pester'd with errors and new fancies still.
Some shook their heads; the more compassionate
Observed, that where so kind a heart was found,
Pity it was the wits should not be sound.

"It is a madness which the world will cure,"
Leverett, the Governor, said, "too soon, be sure."
Randolph had risen to leave him, when the youth
Enter'd the Governor's door. "Come, let me play,"
Quoth he, "the usher!" in his wonted way,
Mingling with sportive speech sarcastic truth.
"Your Excellency here beholds the Man!
The Quaker-Church of England-Puritan,
Knight-errant, preacher, and we know not what,
So many things he is, and he is not;
A hero, certes, if he would but fight;
A Solomon, if his notions were but right.
Should he into a lion's den be thrown,—
Look at those arms and eyes, and you might swear
That he would act the London Prentice there;
But trusting to the mind, forsooth, alone
He'd take the cubes, like lambkins, to his breast,
And, Daniel-like, by faith subdued the rest.
Then for the harder task of savage-quelling
He hath a talent which exceeds all telling.
Two full-bred devilings he has taught to greet him,
And kiss as lovingly as they would eat him;
And he hath bought their mother squaw, to teach
That pleasant lingo the Six-nation speech;
Words, which would choke a Dutchman or a Jew,
Dawn'd old Nick, and which from me or you
Could not be forced by ipecacuanha,
Drop from his oratoric lips like manna.
So fine withal his temper proves, that it
Hath borne unurt the file of my rough wit;
This to his honour I am bound to tell;
Would that he took true counsel half as well!
And now, sir, as your favour may befriend him,
To that in right good earnest I commend him!"

"A man of caustic speech!" the Governor said,
Following him with his eye, as forth he went:
"Yet hath this humour no unkind intent;
His commendation, sir, shall have its weight,
The rest we take as it is meant."

The youth
To that urbane accoi, with grateful eye,
And gentle motion of the bending head,
Return'd a mute reply.
There was a troubled meaning in his look,
And o'er his brow an ashy paleness spread,
As forth he took
A little casket, and, with trembling hand
Presenting it to Leverett, said:
"Thus I discharge my mother's last command;
On her death-bed she told me I should need
No other friend with you in my behalf to plead."

The Governor's countenance changed, as he received
That message from the dead;
And when he open'd and contemplated
The sad bequest,
Tears fill'd his eyes, which could not be repressed.
It was a woman's picture, in her youth
And bloom portrayed by Cooper's perfect skill.
The eyes, which death had quench'd,
Kept there their life and living lustre still;
The auburn locks, which sorrow's withering hand,
Forsaketh time, had changed to early grey,
Disparting from the ivory forehead, fell
In ringlets which might tempt the breath of May;
The lips, now cold as clay,
Sear'd to breathe warmth and vernal fragrance there;
The cheeks were in their maiden freshness fair,
Thus had the limner's art divine preserved
A beauty which from earth had pass'd away;
And it had caught the mind which gave that face
Its surest charm, its own peculiar grace.
A modest mien,
A meek, submissive gentleness serene,
A heart on duty stay'd,
Simple, sincere, affectionate, sedate,
Were in that virgin countenance portrayed:
She was an angel now; and yet,
More beautiful than this fair counterfeit,
Even in heaven, her spirit scarce could be,
Nor seem from stain of ill, and evil thoughts, more free.

Time was, when Leverett had worn
That picture like a relic in his breast;
And duly, morn and night,
With Love's idolatry
Fix'd on its beauties his adoring sight,
And to his lips the precious crystal prest.
Time was, when, in the visions of his rest,
That image of delight
Came with sweet smiles, and musical voice, to bless
His sleep, and all his dreams were happiness.
And still, though course of time, and fatal force
Of circumstance, grave thoughts, and worldly cares
(Alas! how unlike the blissful hopes of youth,
From which it had been worse than death to part!)
Had fortified as well as heal'd his heart,
That vision, in her beauty and her truth,
Sometimes would visit him; and he,
With a confused but conscious faculty,
Knowing full well
That this, which seem'd, too surely could not be,
Struggled against the spell.
Unchanged and unimpar'd by thirty years,
Her image came, but only to distress
The heart she wont to bless,
Till from the painful unreality
He woke, disturb'd in spirit, and in tears.
But he was master of his waking soul,
And could control
All unbecoming passion, and all feeling
That needs repressing or concealing.
Howbeit he sought not to restrain
His deep emotion now, nor turn'd aside
His natural tears to hide, which freely fell;
But wiping them away a moment, eyed
Oliver's pale countenance and anxious brow,
Perusing there his mother's lineaments:
Then took his hand, and said, "Thou need'st not tell
Thy hapless name and perilous secret now,
I know them but too well."

VI.

FUTURE PROSPECTS.

LEVERETT.

Why hast thou ventured hither? With what hope
Or end hath natural piety betray'd thee
To this forlorn attempt? If to escape
Had offer'd chance enough to tempt despair,
The desperate effort had ere this been tried.
Besse, it had been meditated oft,
And bravely; and, had life been all the stake,
Life had been cheaply set upon the die,
To lose it being gain.

OLIVER.

They must forego,
The dear desire of e'er revisiting
Their native land,—and in my mother's grave
That hope, I ween, will now be laid at rest:
Nor could they safely seek a resting-place
In Europe, even if we reach'd a ship,
And left these shores behind us. Oft and well
Have I persevered this, devising ways
For flight, and schemes of plausible disguise,
Such thoughts in disappointment ending alway;
Till having offer'd up in fervent faith
A disciplined and humbled heart to Heaven,
A better hope arose. The wilderness
Is open to us! Thither will we go,
Far in the wilds, where foot of Englishman
Hath never trod. The equal elements
Will not deny our portion: Mother Earth
In unappropriated freedom, there
Holds forth her liberal lap; her springs, her fruits,
Her creatures of the land and air and stream,
To her free children freely offering.
Hid from the world, a double duty there
May I perform, to God and man discharged,
Serving my human and my Heavenly Sire;
There, treading in your saintly Eliot's path,
Guide the poor Indian in the way to Heaven!
And, in the forecast of its joys assured,
Receive mine own exceeding great reward.

LEVERETT.
Oh pitiable lot
Oh poor humanity,
When virtue thus can wrong the heroic heart,
And blind the noble intellect! Thou dreamest
Of peopling some Arcadian solitude
With human angels,—ignorant, alas!
Of time, place, circumstance, and men, and things,—
The Indians, and thy father, and thyself!

OLIVER.
Myself at least I know, prepared to act
Or suffer, with a soul for all events
Resign'd.

LEVERETT.
To suffer, rightly thou may'st say;
Easily we screw our courage to that point,
The issue being remote, and hope and chance
Between us and the event.
But how prepared to act? Ere thou couldst hold
With these Red tribes the commonest discourse
Of needful things and every-day concerns,
Years of laborious pupillage must pass,
Unless the claven flame upon thy head
Should light, and loose thy speech by miracle.
But wherefore with the show of difficulties
Should I dissuade thee from an enterprise
Impossible to attempt?

OLIVER.
A poet, sir,
In whose dark sayings deeper wisdom lies
Than ancient oracles enounced, or statesmen
Appear to reach in these ignoble times,
Hath taught me to believe, "impossible
Is but the faith of fear."

LEVERETT.
Are poets, then,
Thy teachers? O, young man, their flattering lore
But ill prepares the spirit for the uses
Of ordinary life!

OLIVER.
They best prepare it,
Who warn the heart against its own illusions;
And, strengthening it with patient hope and faith,
Arm it against all issues. To such teachers
My inexperienced youth by Providence
Was mercifully led. Penn hath allow'd me
To call him friend, in no sectarian use
Of words; and I have sate at Milton's feet
A reverential listener.

LEVERETT.
Milton's friendship
Will neither hurt nor help thee in a land,
Where they, who stilllest hold his errors, lift not
Their thoughts above the earth to follow him,
When his strong spirit mounts upon the wing,
Beyond their grovelling vision. But well is it
Thou hast not from Pen's dangerous fellowship
Learned his sectarian speech, and other follies
Wherewith that formal informality
Provokes the law. New England writes her statutes
In blood against the Quakers. Thou hast 'scaped
Their clownish and uncivil usages;
But if there be an inner taint, take heed
To keep it hidden: openly I must not Allow the violation of our laws.

OLIVER.
Oh we have trespass'd largely on your goodness;
Generous beyond example, as thou art.
Too largely have we tax'd it; and the cause,
The dreadful cause alone can palliate
Conduct like ours towards thee. Not for worlds
Would I do aught that might displeasure thee,
Best earthly friend! whom my dear mother never
Named without tears, and holiest gratitude,
Such as will surely bring upon thy head
The blessing that it pray'd for. I come here,
Not wilfully and madly to provoke
Intolerant laws, nor farther to presume
Upon thy noble nature; but to thank thee,
In her dear name, for all which thou hast done;
To tell thee, as she charged me, that in death
She bless'd thee for thy goodness; and, performing
Her latest wish and will, to take the barren
Of our unhappy fortunes on myself.

LEVERETT.
Her latest wish and will!

OLIVER.
It was a thought
Which added to her griefs, that you should stand
In jeopardy for us; howbeit, she said,
She hoped and felt and trusted that you knew
Her inmost mind, and Heaven would recompense
A true affection, too severely tried.

LEVERETT.
Thus it was ever with her gentle heart,
By some strange fortune fated still to prove
That in her strength alone the root
Of her sole weakness lay.
Poor heart! a victim always at the call
A NEW ENGLAND TALE.

Of fancied duty; only then unjust,
Only then obstinate, when offering up
Itself a bleeding sacrifice! I know,
And understand, in what devoted mood
Her acquiescence to thy dreams was given;
Such as aspiring saints desire, and martyrs
Reach in their triumph, when they clasp the stake.

OLIVER.

"Twas in no height of feverish exaltation,
In no delusion of the heated mind,
That her consent was given: but mutually
Our hearts received, as I believe, from Heaven
The impulse. By the test of prayer we tried,
And in the balance of the sanctuary
Weighed it; and having taken our resolve,
Partook that inward peace, wherewith the Spirit
Doth set the seal to its authentic acts.
Shake not thy head thus mournfully, nor thus
In disapproval knit the incredulous brow!
The purpose, which at first was entertain'd
With doubtfulness and fear, increased in strength,
While long infancy and wasting pain
Consumed her mortal mould; and at that hour,
When it is no illusion to believe
That the departing soul hath sight of heaven
Opening before its happy flight, and feels
The expansion of diviner faculties
Than this gross earth unfolds, her looks and tokens
Confirm'd the injunction of her latest voice,
And bless'd, and for obedience strengthen'd me,
Betide what may.

LEVERETT.

For me, then, it remains
Only to show what obstacles impede
The perilous course from which I must not farther
Essay to turn thee. Thou, who art not less
In mind than lineaments thy mother's image,
Judge for thyself if they be superable.
Thy grandsire lives, indeed,—if it be life,
When the poor flesh, surviving, doth entomb
The reasonable soul defunct. Below
The reach of grief and danger he hath sunk.
The tale of his dear daughter's death to him
Will be like baptism to a chrysome babe,
Something that means he knows and recks not what.
Safely in court might he hold up the band,
Now trembling and unconscious, which subscribed
The fatal warrant: even the sword of law
Would, in his pitiable estate, acknowledge
The visitation of a higher Power,
And turn away its edge. But as thou canst not,
Encumber'd with a twichild man, pursue
Thy purpose, it must of necessity
Be laid aside, at least till death remove
The impediment not else removable.

OLIVER.

So be it. We must patiently await
The hour of his release. With time and death
Sure reckoning may be made.

LEVERETT.

That hour in truth
Cannot be long delay'd. But what shall make
Thy father to thy dreams defer his own?
If in his corporal uses man becomes
The slave of habit, stronger are the chains
In which the mind is bound, a willing thrall.

OLIVER.

I understand you not!

LEVERETT.

You do not know
Your father.

OLIVER.

Only by report, alas!
As England in his years of fortune knew him;
Religious, faithful, excellently skill'd
In war, and in his single person brave
To all men's admiration.

LEVERETT.

Yet I think
Enthusiastic as thou art, thou needest not
Learn with how much alloy the richest vein
Of virtues is too often found combined.
'Tis the condition of humanity,
Frail and infirm at best; and they who boast
Sinless perfection for their privilege,
By the proud folly of the claim, confute
Their own insane pretension.

OLIVER.

Surely, sir,
My father hath not in the school of Christ
So poorly profited, nor lived so long
A stranger to himself and his own heart,
That he should hold this error.

LEVERETT.

Glad I am
Thou seest it erroneous. Other notions
He holds too near akin to it, the breed
Of those pestiferous and portentous times
Wherein his lot had fallen. Even yet he thinks
The kingdom of the saints shall be in strength
Establish'd; finds in whatsoever occurs
The accomplishment of some dark prophecy;
Interprets, and expounds, and calculates
That soon he shall be call'd to bear his part
In setting up again the broken work.
A NEW ENGLAND TALE.

Left incomplete by chosen Oliver.
Thus he in one continuous dream of hope
Beguiles the tedious years.

OLIVER.
Herein I see not
What should impede my purpose. In the forest,
The sense of freedom and security,
Healing a wounded spirit, may restore
To health his mind diseased.

LEVERETT.
But if the patient
Reject the means of cure? He will not leave
A place of refuge which the Lord prepared
For him in his distress; and where full surely
He trusts the call will reach him, to come forth
And fight the battles of the good old cause.
For which he doth endure contentedly
This living martyrdom. Thy father thus
Would answer thee; the malady is rooted
In him so deeply now. It is become Essential in his being: long success,
Beyond the most audacious of his thoughts,
Fed and inflamed it first; long suffering since
Hath as it were annealed it in his soul.
With stubborn fortitude, bewild’rd faith,
Love, hatred, indignation, all strong passions,
The bitterest feelings, and the tenderest thoughts,
Yea, all his earthly, all his heavenly hopes.
And Russel—for such sympathy alone
Could influence him to harbour long such guests—
Fosters the old delusion which he shares,
And ministers to it, even in his prayers.

OLIVER.
My father will not be persuaded then,
You think?

LEVERETT.
I know he will not. There are minds,
The course of which, as of some slow disease,
Known by its fatal frequency too well,
We see with helpless foresight, hopelessly.
But, if he listen’d to thy moving words,
What would it now avail? The wilderness
Affords no shelter while the Indians,
Fiercer than beasts, and wilier, are in arms.

OLIVER.
I have a passport for the wilderness
Safer than statesmen could accord, or states
Enforce with all their strength. The Indian woman,
Of whom Sir Randolph in his mockery told thee;
She and her children will be my protection
Among the wildest tribes.

LEVERETT.
And was this thought, then,
Thy motive for the act?

OLIVER.
I will not say
It had so much of forethought: but the ways
Of Providence open before me now.
The impulse, which appear’d like foolishness
To worldly censure, and which tremblingly
I follow’d, for this issue was design’d:
Oh doubt it not! And had I disobey’d
The inward and unwrinking monitor
That hour, infirm of faith, how had I then
Dishel’d myself of this fair hope!

LEVERETT.
A Naraganset woman, is she not?
The widow of a Sagamore, who fell
In the outbreak of these troubles?

OLIVER.
So they told me;
A noted savage, Kawnacom his name.

LEVERETT.
Something, methinks, I see in this, wherein
Our purposes may square, and my straight path
Of policy with thy eccentric course
Fall in and meet at the end. But, understand me,
Rather would I for thine own sake dissuade thee,
And for the sake of that dear Saint in heaven,
From an adventure of remotest hope
And imminent peril: but if thy resolve
Be obstinate against all reason, blameless
Then may I, both in her sight and in thine,
Decide the issue how it will, promote
The purpose which in vain I disapprove.
One trust we have; all-able Providence
Will overrule our ways, and haply too,
Knowing the upright intention, rectify
Our erring judgments. Let the matter sleep
Till I have taken counsel with my pillow
And this night’s waking thoughts. See me tomorrow
As early as you will, before the stir
Of business hath begun: and now farewell.

VII.

THE INDIAN WAR.

Writ many an anxious thought opprest,
From busy sleep more wearying than unrest,
Hath Oliver arisen;
And from his bed of feverish care,
Glad to respire the cool fresh morning air,
Gone forth as from a prison.

The wakeful governor received his guest;
And ere the morning board was placed,
They to and fro the garden paced
In earnest talk, while Leverett told
How mutual injuries of old,
And mutual fears, the evanom'd will,
Suspicious still conceal'd but festering still,
And policy that shrunk from nothing ill,
(Savage or civilized—oh shame
To man's perverted power!—in this the same,)
Youth's fiery courage, and eld's rooted hate
Had brought the danger on, which now assailed the state.

The times were fearful; whereasoe'er around
Among the Indian tribes he turn'd his view,
False friends, or open enemies, were found.

How wide their league he rather fear'd than knew.
But this was understood,
That feuds deliver'd down for many an age,
From sire to son in sacred heritage,
Wherewith their very nature seem'd imbued,
Had been with dread solemnities forewarned
And secret rites accurst, in fell intent
That they should root the English from the land,
And the last white man's blood
Be of their bond the seal and sacrament.

In truth they were a formidable foe;
Compared with ours, their numbers made them so;
Crafty, deceitful, murderous, merciless:
Yet with heroic qualities endued:
Contempt of death, surpassing fortitude,
Patience through all privations, self-control
Even such as saints and sages scarce attain,
And a sustain'd serenity of soul,
Which Fortune might assault or tempt in vain,
Not to be moved by pleasure or by pain.

OLIVER.

Alas to think they have not long ere this
Been link'd with you in Christian fellowship!

LEVERETT.

Look at divided Christendom!—at England;
Her wounds, inflicted by sectarian rage,
Open and festering,—never to be heal'd!
Look at thy father's house; a threefold cord
Of brotherhood trebly disparted there;
Then tell me, where may Christian fellowship
In this wide world be found? Alas, my friend,
I see it only in the Promised Land.
From Pisgah's summit, through the glass of Faith,
Far in the regions of futurity.
Yet something we have done, which—though I own it
Far short of what true policy requires,

And in the scale of national duty weighing Lighter than dust—may show we are not wholly
The slaves of Mammon. Fretted as we have been
By schisms, by rampant heresies disturb'd,
And by that spiritual pride possess'd, whose touch,
With influence lethal as Asp's tooth,
Numbs the life-blood of charity, this England
Hath sons, whose names, if there be any praise,
Shall have their place with saints of primitive times
Enroll'd, true heroes of humanity.

OLIVER.

Oh doubt not that their virtue and their prayers
Will in this time of trial speed you more
Than all your carnal strength!

LEVERETT.

That faith might better
Beseech thine uncle of the seminary,
The Oratorian, than thy father's son.
A monk may put his trust in beads and sackcloth;
But Oliver's saints wore buff, and their right hands
Wrought for themselves the miracles they ask'd for.
Think not, young man, that I disparage prayer,
Because I hold that he, who calls on Heaven
For help against his temporal enemies,
Then with most cause and surest hope prefers
His supplication, when he best exerts
The prudence and the strength which God hath Given him.

OLIVER.

There is a strength in patience which exceedeth
All other power; a prudence in the Gospel
Passing, as needs it must, all human wisdom.
That Gospel teaches passiveness and peace.

LEVERETT.

Patience he needs, Heaven knows! who hath to deal
With one enamour'd of a young opinion,
And like a giddy amoret pursuing
The passionate folly, reckless where it leads him.
Remember that you come not here to teach;
Remember too, that something like respect
Is due to years, and something to experience;
Some deference to our station; some attention—
And this at least will be allow'd—to one
Who at all hazards has approved himself
Thy mother's friend, and would no less be thine.

Abash'd at that reproof severe
Stood Oliver, unable to abate
The rising glow of shame that fired his cheek,
Or check the starting tear.
But then the Governor's eye compassionate
Even in reproof,—the pause he interposed,—
The low relenting tone wherein he closed
His stern though fit authoritative strain,
Temper'd the needful pain.

"O best and kindest friend,
O friend revered, I feel and own,
Whether I spake in error or in truth,
That thy rebuke is just," replied the youth:
"Forgive me! and no more will I offend;
But listen, and in all things, that I may,
Humbly and zealously obey."

LEVERETT.

Hear then, and patiently, while I instruct thee
Of things as yet unchronicled in books,
But bearing on this crisis, and the knowledge
Whereof in thine adventure will be found
Specially needful. When the English laid
The poor foundations of our colony,
(For poor indeed they seem'd; and yet I ween
In happy hour a corner-stone was placed
That ne'er shall be removed;) they found the land
Contested sometimes, and sometimes possess'd
In captive peace, between three powerful nations,
Or rather families of tribes. Omitting
The minor distributions (which are many
And barbarous all), suffice it to name these
In order of their strength; the Pequods first;
The Narragansets, unto whom belong
Thy ransom'd captives; lastly, the Moheagans,
Who occupied the immediate territory
Whereon our sad adventurers set foot.
With Massasoit, chief Sachem of the latter,
A league was made, of mutual benefit;
For, under Providence, his only friendship,
In the first hardships of the settlement,
Saved them alive; and their alliance proved
A shield against his enemies. This being
The end to which he look'd, who was a man
Advanced in years, far-sighted, honourable,
And of a spirit, which, if he had sway'd
An European sceptre, might have bless'd
The people over whom its rule extended,
The league was faithfully on both sides observed;
And ere his death the old man solemnly
Renew'd it for his sons, who for themselves
In their own persons ratified the engagement.

But men and times were changed, when the elder youth
Succeeded to his sire; for the Colonists,
Now well acquainted with these Indian neighbours,
Leath'd their unseeny usages, abhor'd
Their most incredible cruelty, despised
Their easy ignorance,—and practised on it.
I seek not to conceal our own offences:
 Compared with other nations,—even with England,
Such as corrupted England long hath been,—
We are a sober, yea, a righteous people:
But Trade, which in the mother-land is one
Of many wheels, bearing a part alone,
And that too but subordinate, in the movements
Of a complicated and wonderful machine,
Is in our simple order the main-spring
That governs all. And where Trade rules, alas!
Whatever name be worship'd in the temples,
Mammon receives the heart's idolatry,
And is the god of the land.

Our Indian friends
Too soon had reason to abate their friendship:
And politic interests, which had held them to us,
Were loosen'd, when they saw their ancient foes,
The dreaded Pequods, by our arms pursued
In vigorous war, and rooted from the land,
Till the name alone remain'd, with none to own it.
This Alexander, so the youth was called,
Finding that check removed, and being also
By his father's death set free from all control,
Plotted against the English, in resentment
Partly, no doubt, because strict pains in teaching
(Less wise than well intended) had been spent
On his indolent and unwilling spirit;
But having injuries also to provoke
A haughty courage. Ere his schemes were ripe
He was, on sure intelligence, arrested;
And disappointed malice, joined with anger,
Raising a fever in his heart and brain,
Deliver'd him from our restraint by death.
He left a brother, who inherited
His rights and wrongs,—that Philip who is now
The scourge and terror of the colony.

Think not that these were names imposed in baptism:
Upon that point the heart of Massasoit
Was harden'd; and his sons, like him, regarded
With mingled hatred and contempt a faith
They failed to understand. But it is held
A mark of honour to bestow, a pledge
Of friendship to receive, new appellations;
Which here too, among savages, import
Something of peerage, of deserved esteem,
Or of imputed worth, the commonalty
(Strange as such custom may appear) being name-
less.

My predecessor, with too true presage,
Fix'd on these names, less for the Christian sound
Which use hath given them, than because he saw
In the one youth an enterprising temper,
Ambitious of command; and in the other,
More to be fear'd, a deep dissembling spirit,
Which, if the time required, could brook its wrongs,
And in all outward patience chew the while
The cud of bitter thoughts. He being yet young
The station, which his sire had filled, devolved
Upon a chief, who was alike approved
In council and in war; the right remaining
For Philip to succeed in course of years,
If years should validate the acknowledged claim
Of birthright; for that claim, among the Indians,
Is held defeasible by ill-desert.
During this lapse of time, old rivalries
Revived between the two remaining tribes;
Whom ere the Pequods' power was crush'd, the sense
Of danger from that common enemy
Restrain'd in peace. Not to prolong my tale
With details not required for thy instruction,
The sun was this, that, as by treaty pledged
And justice bound, (for the right cause was theirs,
And interest also led us to uphold
The weaker side,) we aided the Mohegans,
Our first allies; and, when they took in battle
The hostile leader Miantonomimo,
He suffer'd death, by our advice and sanction;
Being however, at our instance, spared
From all those customary cruelties,
Which make the Indians odious in the sight
Of God and man. Seem I to speak severely,
Beyond what truth or Christian charity
May warrant? Soon, my friend, thou wilt have cause
To give that sentence thy convinced assent;
God in his mercy grant thou may'st not buy
The sad conviction dearly!

For awhile
The hatred which this left between those nations
Was our security; albeit we knew
That, in the offended party, the desire
Of vengeance would outlive the gratitude
Due for our help, from those whom we had succour'd.
The sense of injury in the human mind
Is like a drag upon the offended palate,
Clinging when bitterest most abidingly:
The benefits, which men receive, they take
Like wholesome food, that leaves no tang behind it.

We found it thus: for now these Tribes, foregoing
Their mutual hatred, as of lesser moment,
Have leagues against us. Philip is the head
Of the confederacy: his crafty brain
Combines, provides, prepares and plans the mischiefs.
And yet his venomous will and strong desire
Draw him to this, against his better judgment,
Possess'd not more with wise prudential fear
Than with a strange religious awe, so weighty
That, politic as he is, he hath not sought
Even from his own people to conceal
Its dark forebodings. What he wants in hope
His new ally the Narraganset Sachem
Supplies but all too well: for this Canonchet,
Son of that Miantonomimo whose death
He charges on our counsels, is the heart
Of the league. Insidious, resolute, inhuman;
Brave, both in passive and in active courage,
Almost beyond belief; implacable
In malice; wily as a snake to wind
His silent way unseen, when time requires
Concealment; furious as a hungry wolf,

When opportunity allows the indulgence
Of his fierce hatred,—this man is accomplish'd
To the height of savage virtue.

Need I tell thee,
That, as in civil, so in barbarous states,
The course of action takes its bias less
From meditation, and the calm resolve
Of wisdom, than from accident and temper,
Private advantage at all costs pursued,
Private resentments recklessly indulged,
The humour, will, and pleasure, of the leaders,
The passions and the madness of the people.
Under all climes, and in all forms of rule,
Alike the one, the many, or the few,
Among all nations of whatever tint,
All languages, these govern every where;
The difference only is of less or more,
As chance, to use the common speech, may sway;
In wiser words, as Providence directs.
The bond wherein these hostile tribes are knit
Against us, policy cannot untie,
Nor the sword cut. No easy conquest ours,
Such as the Spaniards found in Mexico,
Or Eldorado's priestly monarchies,
Or the well-order'd Incas' rich domains;
They could cope there with multitudinous hosts
Drawn forth in open field, and kings whose will,
Even in captivity, was through the realm
Religiously obey'd. But we must wage
Wars that will yield the soldier neither gold
Nor glory. In the forest and the swamp
Have we to seek our foes; and if the shield
Of the good Angel be not over us,
On all sides from safe cover with sure aim
The death-shots whiz. Would we then clear the land,
It is not to be done by victories;
But head by head must they be hunted down,
Like wolves; a work of danger and of time;
And in this region wild of endless woods,
Possible only to the invertebrate hatred
Of tribe for tribe. We tried the extremity—
Inhuman as it is—against the Pequods;
And, with the ferine help of such allies,
Pursued it to the end. All whom the sword
Spared, or our mercy interpolated to save
From torments, to the Sugar Isles were sold;
And in the daily death of bondage there
The race hath been consumed. But what hath been
The issue? Why, the tribes which aided us
To root them out, stand on the hostile part
Against us now the more audaciously,
Because they feel themselves in union strong,
And see us in the land without allies.
The hope thy hazardous adventure offers
Is this, that, if the die, whereon thy fate
For life or death is set, fall favourably,
And thou shouldst gain access among the elders,
The exasperate mood, which would too surely else
Repel our offer'd terms of amnesty,
May toward thee be soften'd. For these people
Act sometimes upon impulse, like thyself;
A generous action win's them, whom no fear
Can touch, nor pity move; and they will trust,
Like dogs and children, to a countenance,
Wherein, as if instinctively, they read
Fair testimonials from the unerring hand
Of Nature, patent there. And if one tribe,
One chief, unto thy words of peace incline
A willing ear, the league in all its parts
Will feel its ill-compacted strength relax:
Once loosen'd, it dissolves.

The Governor
Paused then; and fixing on the youth a look
Benign though mournful, "Mark me, Oliver,"
He said; "I call upon thy mother's soul
To witness—if the spirits of the dead
Are cognizant of what is done below—
That I have sought in all sincerity
To turn thee from thy purpose! If the event
Be fatal, before thee, and her, and Heaven,
Shall I stand unreproved; and with my sorrow
No self-reproach will mingle. But if still Thy purpose holdeth firm, God speed thee! Go
In hope! I would not that my words should prove
A load to weigh thy buoyant spirit down.
It may be thou may'st render to the state
Some eminent service in this time of need.
And thus—O son of an unhappy house,
Born to a sad inheritance! it may be,
That in this other England, this new world,
Thou may'st reconstrue thy fortunes; may'st acquire
Such honour as consists with peace of mind
In the end; and for thy children's children gain
In this good land a goodwill heritage."

VIII.

PARTING WORDS.

Soo of a hapless house!
What were the thoughts which then within thy breast,
At thy true friend's concluding words, arose?
Dost that quick flush disclose
A feeling thou hast labour'd to control,
And hitherto represt
In singleness of heart and strength of soul?
A light, which like a sudden hope might seem,
Kindled his cheek, and brighten'd in his eye:
But it departed like a gleam,
That for a moment in the heavy sky
Is open'd when the storm is hurrying by;
And then his countenance resumed
Its meek serenity.

Nor did that sad composure change,
When of the gentle maiden Leverett spake,
Who in to his charge her mother's dying prayer
In Christian confidence consign'd.
And yet it was a theme which well might wake
Oppugnant feelings in his inmost mind;
For with a hope upon that mother's heart,
Impled, though not express'd, the solemn care
Was given; and therefore in the young man's heart
Uneasily it lay,
As if he were unjust,
And had received a trust
He could not, must not, did not dare—
And yet would fain—repay.

"That trust I could not choose but take," he said;
"And all that I stand pledged for to the dead
Is soon discharged; it will not from my way
Detain me long, nor lead me far astray."

"Tis but the easy distance of a day
From Hadley," quoth the Governor; and he spread
A map before them, rudely drawn, wherein
Wild forests stretching far and wide were seen,
Rivers whose inland course was unexplored,
And infant settlements, as yet ill-stored,
Few, and with dreamy intervals between
"Here in the vale of the Connecticut,"
Said Leverett, "Williboy's allotment lies:
A part from our immediate enemies
Remote, and, if reliance might be put
On distance, safe. From hence it bears due west
Some five day's travel through the woods; and now
The least frequented path will be the best,
That thou may'st leave behind thee on the left
The troubled country. Here thou see'st it south,
About these creeks and inlets and the mouth
Of Providence river, and the region wide
Of lakes and swamps in woodland interspersed,
That darkens o'er the land on every side.
This then will be thy course, to render first
The damsel to her father's hands; then seek
Thy fortune with thine Indian company
In the Narhaganaset lands. If it fall fair,
Thou wilt among their people leave them there,
And to that painful interview proceed,
Which of thy dearest hope, full well I know,
Must undeceive thee. It shall be my care
To the Connecticut thy way to speed;
From thence, alas! I can but follow thee
With anxious thoughts in spirit and in prayer.
But I will suffer no ill bodings now:
The Lord is merciful, and thy intent
Is righteous, and to him we leave the event."

Thus having ended, to the board he led
His guest: too full of care were they
For appetite or easy talk that day.
"This caution let me give thee," Leverett said,
"That Williboy is a high old Cavalier!"
"Fear not lest I should jar upon his ear
With ill-attuned discourse," the Youth replied.

"He bore a part, a brave one too, I hear,
In those unhappy times, and may look back
Upon the strife with passion and with pride:
My soul abhors the ill deeds on either side,
Even if it had not cost me all too dear.
Likelihood it is that in my Father's sight
I may appear degenerate, and excite
Sorrow or sterner notions in a heart,
The which, albeit with piety imbued,
Is to a Christian temper unsubdued:
But this too I can bear. Oh what a strength
For sufferance to the patient soul is given
When, wholly humbled, it hath placed at length
Its only hope in Heaven."

"Nay," answer'd Leverett, "earth, I trust, hath yet
Good hope for thee in store,
One day with fair performance to be crown'd:
For one who doth so well discharge the debt
Of filial duty, will not Heaven fulfill
The eternal promise which it made of yore?
Happy, and long, I trust, thy days shall be,
Here, in the land which the Lord giveth thee."
And then, as if with such discursive speech
To draw his mind from gloomy thoughts away,
Did Leverett reach
His lifted hand towards the town and bay,
Bright in the morning sunshine as they lay
Before them: "Is it not a goodly land,"
He cried, "where nought is wanting that may bless
The heart of man with wholesome happiness?
Summer subdues not here
To sloth the dissolute mind;
Nor doth the rigorous year
In long inaction bind
His ice-lock'd arm and torpid faculties.
But changeful skies
And varying seasons, in their due career,
Bring forth his powers; and in the vigorous frame
The human spirit thrives and ripens here!
Where might the sober mind,
Which Heaven with temperate desires hath blest,
A land of happier promise find?
Where might a good man fitter fix his rest?
Where better might he choose a burial-place
For him and for his race?
Where wiselier plant the tree
Of his posterity?"

The smile wherewith the youth received his speech
Was cold and feeble,—one in which the heart
Too plainly had no part;
Constrain'd it came, and slowly past away.
"Truly thou say'st, O friend!"
He said; "and well are they
Who, far from plagues and plots, and from the rage
Of faction, for their children may prepare
A peaceful heritage.
For me, if other end

Awhit me, fell my fortune as it may,
A comfort and a strength it is to know
That whence'er I go,
There is the same Heaven over me on high,
Whereon in faith to fix the steady eye;
The same access for prayer;
The same God, always present, every where;
And if no home, yet every where the bed
Which Earth makes ready for the weary head.

"But wherefore should I talk of weariness
Thus early in the day,
And when the morning calls me on my way?
In brightness and in beauty hath it risen,
As if the eternal skies
Approved and smiled upon our enterprise!
Now then farewell! That we shall meet again,
True friend! we know; but whether among men
Or angels who can tell? It is not ours
To choose, or to foresee;
Such choice or foresight would but ill agree
With man's imperfect powers,
Enough for him, that what is best will be."

IX.

JOURNEY THROUGH THE FOREST.

They are on their way, and they have enter'd now
The forest that from earliest time hath stood,
By human culture unsubdued.
Strangelier assorted company
Than this, which through that ancient wood
Their solitary course pursued,
No errant knight might chance to see,
Wandering, in good King Arthur's days,
Through Faery or Loegria land,
Where most adventures were at hand.
Lik'en'd the gentle Annabel might be
To sweet Serena, ere the blatant mouth
And cankerous tooth
Had with their venom stain'd her harmless youth.
And he who paced beside her steed
Might seem, in form, and strength, and manly grace,
Like Calidore, when he had laid aside
His glorious thoughts and martial pride,
And, as a shepherd, in the sylvan shade,
Woo'd Pastorella for his bride,
Contented to forgo for her the meed
Of high desert; and with true love
How largely for ambition overpaid!
Such Oliver might seem, and such the maid.
A NEW ENGLAND TALE.

But lighter hearts, I ween, of yore
The errant knights and damsels bore,
In ages when the shield and lance
Gave law through all the realms of Old Romance;
Who roam'd at hap, or on adventure bent,
Searching the seas, the isles, and continent;
When they, inbower, in hermitage, and hall,
Were welcomed every where by all,
Or underneath the Greenwood tree
Took up their urn contentedly.

For in that pensive maiden's mien
Had recent sorrow left its trace,
And plainly too might there be seen
A present trouble in her face;
She fear'd the melancholy meeting
When grief would mar her father's greeting;
And hardly less, I ween, the pain
With which she soon must part
From one whose image would remain
The inmate of her heart.

For wishes, from herself till now conceal'd
Conceal'd, if not repent—
And thoughts, to which the will had not consented,
Forlornly as she felt them now reveng'd,
Her secret soul unwillingly confess'd,
Unwillingly repented:
And hopes, that had arisen she scarce knew how,
Were first acknowledged when they fail'd her now.

Think not that Oliver was free
The while from painful sympathy:
What more had he required his lot to bless,
Than in the depth of those clear eyes was seen—
The modest, meek, confiding gentleness,
That soften'd while it sanctified her mien;
Those looks, devoid of art,
Whose mild intelligence he loved to meet;
The voice, that, varying still, but always sweet,
Still found a chord responsive in his heart?
If ever at his fate he half repin'd,
If ever o'er his calm and constant mind
The doubt, the trouble, and the cloud, were brought,
'Twas at the thought,
That cruel circumstance two souls must sever,
Whom God, he surely felt, would else have join'd for ever.

Uneasy now became perforce
The inevitable intercourse,
Too grateful hitherto:
Each in the other could descry
The tone constrain'd, the alter'd eye.
They knew that each to each could seem
No longer as of yore;
And yet, while thus estranged, I deem,
Each loved the other more.
Hers was perhaps the saddest heart;
His the more forced and painful part;
A sense of proper maiden pride
To her the needful strength supplied.

Then first perhaps the Virgin thought
How large a dower of love and faithfulness
Her gentle spirit could have brought
A kindred heart to bless;
Herself then first she understood
With what capacities endowed;
Then first, by undeserved neglect
Roused to a consciousness of self-respect,
Felt she was not more willing to be won
Than worthy to be woo'd.

Had they from such disturbant thoughts been free,
It had been sure for them
A gladsome sight to see
The Indian children, with what glee
They breathed their native air of liberty.
Food to the weary man with toil forespent,
Not more refreshment brings,
Than did the forest breeze upon its wings
To these true younglings of the wilderness:
A happy sight, a sight of hearts content!
For blithe were they
As swallows, wheeling in the summer sky
At close of day;
As insects, when on high
Their mazy dance they thread
In myriads overhead,
Where sunbeams through the thinner foliage gleam,
Or spin in rapid circles as they play,
Where winds are still,
Upon the surface of the unrippled stream:
Yea, gamesome in their innocence were they
As lambs in fragrant pasture, at their will
The udder when to press
They run, for hunger less
Than joy, and very love and wantonness.
Nor less contentment had it brought
To see what change benevolence had wrought
In the wild Indian mother, whom they first
Had seen, her spirit strong
Madden'd by violence of wrong,
For vengeance in her utmost soul,
With natural but with ferine rage, a thirst.
That soul unhooped—for kindness had subdued:
Her looks, and words, and actions, now combined,
Express'd, in that composure of the mind
Which unapproachable sorrow had left behind,
A lively ever-watchful gratitude.
Oliver seem'd to her a creature
Less of this earth than of celestial nature,
And Annabel as well
Had won from her a love like veneration;
(So goodness on the grateful heart can gain)
Though charms of European tint and feature
No beauty to an Indian eye convey,
Regarded with disdain,
As if they were the original stamp and stain
Of an inferior clay,
Proved in some earlier, inexpert creation,
And then, for degradation,
When the red man was fashion'd, put away.
Pamya was troubled now, for she had seen
Their alter'd mien:
Some change there was, she knew not what, nor why,
Some inidelity;
Which yet she might desery
Rose not from wrath nor alienated will;
For in their converse still
The tones were such as meet
The car of love, and still
The smiles they interchanged, though sad, were sweet:
Yet plainly she could tell, all was not well.
They too could read in her observant eye
Its apprehension and its sympathy:
And surely she, had but her speech been free,
Had prest, how earnestly! for explanation,
And sought to bring about
The full and perfect reconciliation
Dearly desired by both, she did not doubt.
Their hearts were merciful and meek she knew,
And could not to each other but be true:
But on her tongue the curse of Babel hung,
And when the eager wish her breast was swelling,
Eye-speaking thoughts were all she could impart,
Intelligibly telling
The deep indwelling yearnings of the heart.

Four days they travell'd through the endless wood,
Measuring their journey still to reach at eve
Some settler's home, and sure of their receiving
Such hospitality, sincere though rude,
As men who felt no want, and had no vice
Of chilling avarice,
In their plain kindness found a joy in giving.
The fifth morn rose, and with the morn rose they,
That they might reach that day
Their journey's end; and through the forest wide
Did they their weary way
Hold on from early dawn till eventide;
But cre the light of eve
Began to fade, their guide,
Accustomed to descry
With instananeous eye
The slightest trace of man, a smoke espied,
Staining a little space of open sky:
"Yon is the place we seek!" he said; nor knew
What a cold feeling, at the words, ran through
The veins of Annabel, and Newman too.

X.

Oh, what a happy meeting had been here,
Willoby thought, in anguish, when he prest
His daughter to his widow'd breast;

If that dear hope which served so long to cheer
His patient labours in the wilderness
Had wholly been fulfill'd, as now in part;
After so many storms and troubles past,
Here had the faithful partner of his heart
Rejoiced to reach the quiet port at last.

APPENDIX

TO

OLIVER NEWMAN.

The following sketch of the story intended to be worked out in this poem is, with the exception of those passages otherwise appropriated by references, drawn from very brief and sometimes contradictory
notes in Mr. Southey's handwriting.

In the published letters from Mr. Southey to Mr.
W. Taylor of Norwich, there is a passage, written in Jan. 1811, which records the earliest germ of this poem in his mind. "In reviewing Holmes's American Annals, I pointed out Philip's war as the proper subject for an Anglo-American Iliad. I have now fallen in love with it myself, and am brooding over it with the full intention of falling to work as soon as Pelayo is completed. The main interest will fix upon Gofle, the regicide, for whom I invent a Quaker son, a new character you will allow for heroic poetry. This Oliver Gofle, however, is to be the hero." The poem itself is in the first draught called Oliver Gofle.

The facts relating to those regicides whose fate is alluded to in the poem are as follow: "When the restitution appeared inevitable, Colonel Gofle, with his father-in-law, Colonel Whalley, seeing that their life was in danger, left the kingdom, and arrived in America on the 27th of July, 1660. For some time they resided at Cambridge, four miles from Boston, attending public service, and being received with respect and hospitality by the inhabitants. But when the Act of Idemnity, out of which they were expressly excepted, arrived at Boston, in November, the magistrates withdrew their protection, and Whalley and Gofle retired to New Haven. Here they were forced to conceal themselves, and eventually to fly to a retirement, called Hatchet's Harbour, in the woods, where they remained two nights, till a cave in the side of a hill was prepared to conceal them.
To this hill they gave the name of Providence, and remaining some weeks in their hiding-place, sleeping,

Family Library.
when the weather was tempestuous, in a house near it. They behaved with great honour to their friends; and when Mr. Davenport, the minister of New Haven, was suspected by the magistrates of concealing them, they went publicly to the deputy-governor of New Haven to offer themselves up; but he refused to take any notice of them, suffering them to return again to the woods. The pursuit of them afterwards relaxing, they remained two years in a house near Milford, where they frequently prayed and preached at private meetings in their chamber; till the king's commissioners coming to Boston, they were again driven to their cave in the woods. Here some Indians discovered their beds, which obliged them to seek a fresh refuge: and they went to Hadley, 100 miles distant, where they were received by Mr. Russell, the minister, and remained as long as they lived, very few persons knowing who they were. Whalley's death took place about 1679. They confessed that their lives were "miserable, and constant burdens to them; especially when their fanatical hopes of some divine vengeance on Charles II. and his advisers were perpetually disappointed. The facility and allusion of Goffe's wives to his husband were remarkably displayed in her letters."

While they were at Hadley the Indian war broke out, which was particularly disastrous in that part of the colony.*  "The following story has been traditionally conveyed down among the inhabitants of Hadley. In the course of Philip's war, which involved almost all the Indian tribes in New England, and amongst them those in the neighbourhood of this town, the inhabitants thought it proper to observe the 1st of September, 1675, as a day of fasting and prayer. While they were in the church, and employed in their worship, they were surprised by a band of savages. The people instantly betook themselves to their arms, which, according to the custom of the times, they had carried with them to the church, and, rushing out of the house, attacked their invaders. The panic under which they began the conflict was, however, so great, and their number was so disproportioned to that of their enemies, that they fought dauntlessly at first, and in a short time began evidently to give way. At this time an ancient man, with hoary locks, of a most venerable and dignified aspect, and in a dress widely differing from that of the inhabitants, appeared suddenly at their head, and with a firm voice, and an example of undaunted resolution, reanimated their spirits—led them again to the conflict—and totally routed the savages. When the battle was ended, the stranger suddenly disappeared; and no person knew whence he had come, or whether he had gone. The relief was so timely, so sudden, so unexpected, and so providential; the appearance and the retreat of him who furnished it, were so unaccountable, his person was so dignified and commanding, his resolution so superior, and his interference so decisive, that the inhabitants, without any uncommon exertion of credulity, readily believed him to be an angel sent by Heaven for their preservation. Nor was this opinion seriously controverted until it was discovered, several years afterwards, that Goffe and Whalley had been lodged in the house of Mr. Russell. Then it was known that their deliverer was Goffe, Whalley having become superannuated some time before the event took place." The latter part of Goffe's life seems not to be known with certainty. Dwight says, immediately before the passage above quoted, "After Whalley's death, Goffe quitted Hadley, went into Connecticut, and afterwards, according to tradition, to the neighbourhood of New York. Here he is said to have lived some time, and, the better to disguise himself, to have carried vegetables at times to market. It is said that having been discovered here, he retired secretly to the colony of Rhode Island, and there lived with a son of Whalley during the remainder of his life."

Goffe's was a divided family—one of his brothers being a clergyman of the Church of England, while another was become a Roman Catholic priest. To this division allusion is made in Leverett's conversation with Oliver. Of the other persons introduced, the following are historical: Leverett the governor, who succeeded Bellingham, in 1673; he had been a Cromwellian, and is sobered into a rational conformist; his known to where they were, and connived at their concealment, as he is represented doing in the poem; and Randolph, of whom the people of New England said "that he went up and down to devour them." Also the names of the Indian chieftains, and the general account of the war, are matter of history.

The hero Oliver himself is therefore a purely imaginary character: he was originally intended to be a Quaker; but it would appear that the author afterwards considered that the noble points of character and of principle intended to be exhibited—viz., zeal for the Christian faith, inflexible truth, peacefulness, and endurance—were not exclusively belonging to that sect whose operations and whose sufferings in New England he had been contemplating; and at the same time, that some features of their character were both unmanageable in poetry and distasteful to his own mind. There was also another reason for the alteration, namely, that he found it necessary for his plot, that, at least in one instance, Oliver's usual mode of conduct should bend to circumstances; and such a compliance would be morally, and therefore poetically, probable in a person swayed only by a reasonable principle, but not so in one governed by an absolute rule of life. The following notes will explain the intended bearing of this character upon the story.

1811. "A son of Goffe, a Quaker, gone after his mother's death to seek his father. He, by converting one of the principal Sachems, weakens Metacom's party so materially as to decide the contest; and with that Sachem he retires into the interior. He and his father are discovered, and he will not lift his hand in defence. A party of Indians take them all, he still passive; hence his influence begins with their astonishment." The points on which Oliver's Quakerism is put to the test are, in not denying his father's name, and in not lifting a hand to defend him;"

1814. "Oliver must be so far instrumental in terminating the war as to obtain security for his father; and this instrumentality must be effected wholly by means conformable to his peculiar opinions. But those opinions must yield where they are wrong."

Imperfectly as the latter part of the story can be ascertained, it has been thought better to sketch it out, however rurally, from the author's hints, than to leave an entire blank.

X. Oliver at Willoby's House.

They remain awhile at Willoby's, that Pamya may be their protection. When some Indians appear, she goes out, and finds among a party of Indians one of her own tribe. After her story, the calumet is smoked, and the door of Willoby's house painted with marks indicating that it was under their protection. Then they venture to depart. A sort of half-confidence has first been made to Willoby in consequence of his wife's letter, and a sort of half-engagement formed. Willoby had known one of the Goffes. His moral reasons for leaving England,—on account of his sons, seeing the character of the times, and that all that we pray in the Litany to be delivered from, was come upon the country—blindness of heart, pride, vain-glory and hypocrisy, envy, hatred and malice, false doctrine, heresy and schism, sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion, &c.

XI. The Wounded Indian.

Oliver journeying with Pamya and her children through the forest, finds a wounded Indian, by whom they stay till a party of his countrymen see them. This is the Mohawk, whom Philip had meant to kill, and not scalped, to create a belief that he had been killed by the English. (An historical fact, and represented as not of unfrequent occurrence.) Many hints for forest scenery, which are noted down, would probably belong to this canto. At night Oliver is seen reading by firelight in the wood.

XII. Whalley's body.

The Indians conduct the party to their Sachem; on the way they meet with Whalley's body being conveyed somewhere for interment. Oliver knows it by a mutilated hand. Likeness of Whalley to his daughter [Oliver's mother]; that family character of face which the infant brings into the world, and into which the countenance settles in old age, when the character which individual pursuits and passions have induced fades away, and the natural lineaments recover their primary cast. The death of Whalley sets Goffe at liberty. They reach the encampment of Indians, and Pamya is restored to her own friends, the Narragansets.

XIII. The Affair of Hadley.

A renegade (in one place named Joshua Tift, the English savage and traitor,) being among the Indians, calls Oliver a spy, insults and strikes him. This Oliver endures patiently, making no retaliation. This fellow relates the affair of Hadley, "the most disastrous day that ever befell New England," and especially the marvellous apperition of one during the conflict, who was really Goffe, Oliver's father.

XIV. Reasoning with the Sachems.

The interest of this scene is to turn chiefly upon two points: the effect for good which Oliver's words have upon an old Indian chief, who has formerly been impressed by Elliot or R. Williams, and who now puts himself under Oliver's guidance. This man belongs to the tribe of Sakunets, who are probably connected with the Narraganset stock. It would have been contrary to history to make the Narraganset chief join himself influenced at this time by Oliver. The other point is, the peculiar character of Philip, composed of hatred and vindictiveness against the English, united with gloomy forebodings about the issue of the war.

These may be some of his words, or rather the more hopeful Canonchet's:—

The forest and the swamp are our allies;
Have we not with these giants of the wood
A sacred immemorial brotherhood?
The land itself will aid her proper children.

XV. Oliver reaches his Father.

When Oliver mentions the wilderness, Goffe replies, it is not there that he must prepare the way of the Lord, but in the streets of London.

XVI. The Arrest.

A party sent by Randolph, with Willoby the cavalier at their head, surprise them.—Willoby offers to let them go, if Oliver will declare that this person is not Goffe. Meeting with Randolph.

XVII. Rescue.

The whole party are surprised by the Sakonets.—Goffe and Willoby escape.—Randolph and Oliver are taken, and carried to the encampment of the Sachems. Oliver is recognized and welcomed,—Randolph is to be burnt, but Oliver obtains his life and safe discharge: they separate.

XVIII. Defeat of the Indians.

Goffe meanwhile has rallied some stragglers, who attack and defeat the Sakonet party, and take some of whom Oliver intercedes, engaging for them that they shall commit no more hostilities.—He then goes with these Indians to negotiate with their tribe.

XIX. Annabel a Prisoner.

While this discussion is going on, Annabel is brought in a prisoner by the renegade: in the dispute which ensues, Oliver kills him. This is the point in which Oliver's passiveness is to give way to a just wrath. Before he knocks out the fellow's brains he stands "trembling, but not with fear."

XX. Peace.

The Sakonet tribe make peace with the English; Oliver going with the chiefs to the English headquarters to sign it.—The Mohawk, whom he had saved in the forest, meets him there, at the head of his party.

XXI. Death of Philip.

Oliver's services are now clearly seen.—Randolph solicits for him a grant of land.—Willoby gives him his daughter, and Russell marries them.—Pamya's children baptized.

FRAGMENTARY THOUGHTS

occasioned by his son's death.*

Thy life was a day, and sum it well, life is but a week of such days,—with how much storm, and cold, and darkness! Thine was a sweet spring holiday,—a vernal Sabbath, all sunshine, hope, and promise.

and that name
In sacred silence buried, which was still
At morn and eve the never-wearying theme
Of dear discourse.

playful thoughts
Turn'd now to gall and eisel.

He to whom Heaven in mercy hath assign'd
Life's wholesome wormwood, fears no bitterness when
From th' hand of Death he drinks the Amreea cup.

Beauty of nature,—the passion of my youth,
Nursed up and ripen'd to a settled love,
Whereeto my heart is wedded.

Feeling at Westminster, when summer evening
sent a sadness to my heart, and I sate pining for green fields, and banks of flowers, and running streams,—or dreaming of Avon and her rocks and woods.

No more great attempts, only a few autumnal flowers, like second primroses, &c.

They who look for me in our Father's kingdom
Will look for Him also; inseparably
Shall we be so remembered.

* Letter to Mr. W. Taylor, March, 1817. "I have begun a desultory poem in blank verse, pitched in a higher key than Cowper's, and in a wiser strain of philosophy than Young's; but as yet I have not recovered heart enough to proceed with it; nor is it likely that it will be published during my life."

The Grave the house of Hope:
It is the haven whither we are bound
On the rough sea of life, and thence she lands
In her own country, on the immortal shore.

Come, then,
Pain and infirmity—appointed guests,
My heart is ready.

My soul
Needed perhaps a longer discipline,
Or sorer penance, here.

A respite something like repose is gain'd
While I invoke them, and the troubled tide
Of feeling, for a while allay'd, obeys
A tranquillizing influence, that might seem
By some benign intelligence dispensed,
Who lends an ear to man.

They are not, though,
Mere unrealties: rather, I ween,
The ancient Poets, in the graceful garb
Of fiction, have transmitted earliest truths,
Ill understood; adorning, as they deem'd,
With mythic tales things erringly received,
And mingling with primeval verities
Their own devices vain. For what to us
Scripture assures, by searching proof confirm'd,
And inward certainty of sober Faith,
Tradition unto them deliver'd down
Changed and corrupted in the course of time,
And imply also by delusive art
Of Evil Powers.

SHORT PASSAGES OF SCRIPTURE,
RHYTHMICALLY ARRANGED OR PARAPHRASED.

Jer. vi. 4.
Woe unto us!
For the day goeth down,
For the shadows of evening
Are lengthen'd out.

Jer. ix. 23—4.
Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom,
Let not the rich man glory in his riches,
Let not the mighty glory in his might,
But in only this let him that glorieth, glory,
That he knoweth the Lord, the Lord of infinite mercy,
Who exerciseth on the earth
His loving-kindness and his righteousness.

Jer. xiii. 16.
Give glory to the Lord your God!
Lest, while ye look for light,
He bring the darkness on,
And the feet that advanced
With haughty step,
Marching astray in their pride,
Stumble and fall
In the shadow of death.

Jer. xlvi. 6, 7.
Sword of the Lord! how long
Ere thou be quiet? O thou sword, how long?
Put up thyself
Into thy scabbard,
Rest and be still.

Jer. xlix. 7.
From the prudent hath counsel departed?
Is wisdom no more in the land?
Hath it utterly perish'd?
Is it vanish'd and gone?

Jer. l. 25.
... the Lord
Open'd his armoury, and brought forth
The weapons of his wrath.

Jer. l. 15.
Ye nations, shout against her round about;
Take vengeance upon her.
It is the vengeance of the Lord,
As she hath done, do unto her.

Luke, iii. 5.
When every valley shall be filled,
And every mountain be brought low;
The crooked be made straight,
The rough ways smooth.

Lamentations, iii. 44.
The Lord
Covered himself with a cloud,
That the prayer should not pass through.

Hosea, x. 12, 13.
Break up your fallow-ground,
Sow to yourselves in righteousness, and reap
In mercy; it is time to seek the Lord.
Ye have plough'd wickedness, and ye have reap'd
Iniquity: the fruit of lies hath been
Your harvest and your food.

Daniel, ix. 7, 8, 9, 18.
To Thee belongeth righteousness, O Lord!
Confusion and shame to us;
To our kings and our princes,
Our priests and our rulers,
Ourselves and our children,
Because we have sinned against Thee.

But mercies and forgivenesses belong
To Thee, O Lord our God,
Rebellious though we be.

Incline thine ear, and hear;
Open thine eyes, and pitifully see
Our sins, our miseries,
The impending punishment,
Too long, too much deserved.

Amos, v. 8.
Who calleth for the waters of the sea,
And poureth them in seasonable rain
Upon the face of earth.

Nahum, i. 3—8.
The Lord hath his way in the whirlwind,
The Lord hath his way in the storm,
The clouds are the dust of his feet,
And darkness shall pursue his enemies.

Nahum, iii. 15, 17.
There shall the fire devour thees,
The sword shall cut thee off.
Make thyself many as the canker-worm,
As the locusts make thyself many.
Thou hast multiplied thy merchants
Above the stars of heaven!
But the canker-worm spoileth,
Then fleeth away,
And his place is not found.

1 Kings, viii. 23. 27. 30.
Lord God of Israel!
There is no God like Thee,
In heaven above, or on the earth beneath,
Who keepest covenant
And mercy with thy servants, when with all
Their heart they walk before Thee.

.... will God indeed
Dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven, and heaven
Of heavens, cannot contain Thee; how much less
This house that man hath builded!

.... hear Thou in heaven, thy dwelling place;
And when Thou hearest, O Lord God, forgive!

Isaiah, xxv. 1. 4. 7.
Thy counsels, Lord, of old,
Are faithfulness and truth.
A strength to the weak hast thou been,
A help to the poor in his need,
A refuge from the storm,
A shadow from the heat.

The covering that is cast
Over all people shall be then removed,
And the veil that is spread
Over all nations be taken away.

Isaiah, xxvi. 3. 5. 8.
Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace
Whose mind is staid on Thee.
He bringeth down them that dwell on high;
The lofty city he layeth it low,

He layeth it low to the ground,
He bringeth it down to the dust:
The foot shall tread it down,
The feet of the poor and the needy.

In the way of thy judgments,
O Lord, have we waited for thee.

Isaiah, xxviii. 15. 17. 18.
They have made lies their refuge,
And under falsehood have they hid themselves;
Their covenant is with death, with hell
The agreement wherein they trust.
O fools! O miserable!
The covenant shall be annul'd,
The agreement shall not stand.
By the storm shall their refuge be swept away,
Their hiding-place
By the flood be overflown.

Isaiah, xxviii. 16.
In Zion the foundation hath been laid,
A precious corner-stone, a sure foundation.

Isaiah, xxxi. 3.
When the Lord shall put forth his anger,
Then both he that helpeth shall fall, and he that is holpen.

Isaiah, lvii. 1.
The righteous perisheth,
And none layeth it to heart!
The merciful man
Is taken away
From the evil to come.

Ezekiel, vii. 5, 6, 7. 12.
An evil, an only evil,
Behold, is come! an end
Is come,—the end is come!
It watcheth for thee, behold it is come.
The time of trouble is near,
The morning is gone forth;
Behold the day is come.
Let not the buyer rejoice,
Nor let the seller mourn,
For wrath, the wrath of God,
Is upon all the multitudes thereof.
LITTLE BOOK, IN GREEN AND GOLD.

Little Book, in green and gold,
Thou art thus bedight to hold
ROBERT SOUTHEY’s Album rhymes,
Wrong from him in busy times:
Not a few to his vexation,
By importune application;
Some in half-sarcastic strain,
More against than with the grain;
Other some, he must confess,
Bubbles blown in idleness;
Some in earnest, some in jest,
Good for little at the best:
Yet because his daughter dear
Would collect them fondly here,
Little Book, in gold and green,
Thou art not un pity seen
Thus apparet’d for her pleasure,
Like the casket of a treasure.
Other owner, well I know,
Never more can prize thee so.

Little Book, when thou art old,
Time will dim thy green and gold.
Little Book, thou wilt outlive
The pleasure thou wert made to give:
Dear domestic recollections,
Home-born loves, and old affections,
Incommunicable they:
And when these have passed away,
As perforce they must, from earth,
Where is then thy former worth?
Other value, then, I ween,
Little Book, may supervene,
Happily if unto some
Thou in due descent shouldst come,
Who would something find in thee
Like a relic’s sanctity,
And in whom thou may’st awake,
For thy former owner’s sake,
A pious thought, a natural sigh,
A feeling of mortality.

When those feelings, and that race,
Have in course of time given place,
Little worth, and little prized,
Disregarded or despised,
Thou wilt then be bought and sold,
In thy faded green and gold.
Then, unless some curious eye
Thee upon the shelf should spy,
Dust will gather on thee there,
And the worms, that never spare,
Feed their fill within, and hide,
Burrowing safely in thy side,
Till transfigured out they come
From that emblem of the tomb:
Or, by mould and damp consumed,
Thou to perish may’st be doom’d.

But if some collector find thee,
He will, as a prize, re-bind thee;
And thou may’st again be seen
Gayly drest in gold and green.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE ALBUM OF ROTHA Q.

ROTHA, after long delays,
Since thy book must cross the Raise,
Down I sit to turn a stave,
Be it gay or be it grave.

Wiser wish than what thy name
Prompts for thee I cannot frame;
Nowhere find a better theme
Than thy native namesake stream.
Lovelier river is their none
Underneath an English sun;
From its source it issues bright
Upon hoar Helvellyn’s height,
Flowing where its summer voice
Makes the mountain herds rejoice;
Down the dale it issues then;
Not polluted there by men;
While its lucid waters take
Their pastoral course from lake to lake,
Please the eye in every part,
Lull the ear and soothe the heart,
Till into Windermere sedate
They flow and uncontaminate.

Rotha, such from youth to age
Be thy mortal pilgrimage;
Thrice in childhood blithe and free,
Thrice in thy maturity,
Blest and blessing, may it be;
And a course in welfare past,
Thus serenely close at last.

IMAGINATION AND REALITY.

The hill was in the sunshine gay and green,
The vale below could not be seen;
A cloud hung over it,
A thin white cloud, that scarce was seen to fly,
Yet cloud methinks I err in calling it,
It spread so evenly along the sky.
That I stood loitering for the view:
Loitering and musing thoughtfully stood I,
For well those hills I knew,
And many a time had travel’d them all o’er;
Yet now such change the hazy air had wrought,
That I could well have thought
I never had beheld the scene before.
But while I gazed the cloud was passing by;
On the slow air it slowly travel’d on,
Eftsoon and that deceitful haze was gone,
And all things seem’d again the things they were.
Alas! but then they were not half so fair
As I had shaped them in the hazy air!

MADRIGAL,

TRANSLATED FROM LUIS MARTIN.

[This poem is selected for publication from a small volume of translations, because, having been printed before in a newspaper, it attracted the attention of Mr. D’Israeli, who has inserted it in the "Commentaries of Literature," as a beautiful specimen of a kind of extravagance characteristic of Spanish poetry. It seemed, therefore, worth while to place it among the poems of the Translator.]

On the green margin of the land,
Where Guadalhorce winds his way,
My Lady lay.
With golden key Sleep’s gentle hand
Had closed her eyes so bright,
Her eyes—two suns of light,
And bade his balmy dews
Her rosy cheeks suffuse.

The River God in slumber saw her laid,
He raised his dripping head
With weeds o’erspread.
Clad in his watery robes approach’d the maid,
And with cold kiss, like Death,
Drank the rich perfume of the maiden’s breath.
The maiden felt that icy kiss;
Her suns unclosed, their flame
Full and unclouded on the intruder came.
Amazed, the bold intruder felt
His frothy body melt,
And heard the radiance on his bosom hiss;
And forced in blind confusion to retire,
Leapt in the water to escape the fire.

MOHAMMED;

A FRAGMENT, WRITTEN IN 1799.

Cloak’d in the garment of green, who lies on the bed of Mohammed,
Restless and full of fear, yet semblant of one that is sleeping?
Every sound of the feet at his door he hears, and the breathing
Low of inaudible words: he knows their meaning of murder,
Knows what manner of men await his outgoing,
and listens
All their tread, and their whispering, till even the play of his pulses
Disturbs him, so deep his attention. The men of the Koreish
Fix on the green-robed youth their eyes; impatiently watchful
Wait they the steps of his rising, the coming of him whom they hated.
He rises and makes himself pure, and turning towards the Caaba,
Loud he repeats his prayer: they hear, and, in ca-
gerness trembling,
Grasp the hilts of their swords—their swords that are sworn to the slaughter.
But when the youth went forth, they saw, and behold! it was Ali!
Steady the hero’s face: it was pale, for his life was a blessing;
It was calm, for in death he look’d on to the crown of the martyr.
Dark as they were of soul, and goaded by rage disappointed,
MISCELLANEOUS POETICAL REMAINS.

They shed not the blood of the youth, but remember'd their chieftain his father,
Abu Taleb the good, and respected the virtue of friendship.

Baffled, and full of wrath, through Mecca they scatter the tidings:
"He has fled, has discovered our plans, has eluded our vengeance.
Saw ye the steps of his flight? Where lurks he, the lying blasphemer?
Now to the chase, to the chase; seize now the bow and the quiver;
Now with the sword and the spear, ye stubborn of Mecca! pursue him;
Seek him now to the north and the south, to the sunset and sunrise;
Follow, follow the chosen one's flight!" They rush from the city:
Over the plain they pursue him, pursue him with cries and with curses—
Sounds that rang over the plain, and rung in the echoing mountains;
And Mecca received in her streets the din of their clamorous uproar.
But the voice of the Moslem, the silent prayer of the faithful,
Rose to the throne of God; and tears of the heart overflowing
Interceded for him whom they loved and believed his apostle.

"Where is the blasphemous fled?—the lying disturber of Mecca?
Has he journey'd to Tayef? Under the shield of his uncle
Lurks he for safety there?—or to Yathreb, the credulous city?
Or seeks he the Ethiop's court, where the earlier runaways shelter?"
Lashing their steeds, they pursue; to the east and the dwelling of Abbas
Hasten the thirsty for blood; to the north they hurry, to Yathreb;
Some to the shore of the sea, lest haply a bark might await him,
And the waves should become his protectors: impulsively rushing,
Drive they in fury along; beneath the hoofs of their horses
Sparkles the rock of the valley, and rises the dust of the desert.
Othert the while, more cool in wrath, and thoughtful in fury,
Over the town search sedulous; they in the Hashemites' dwellings
Seek for the man proscribed; in the dwellings of Hamza and Omar,
Ali, Abubeker, and Saad, and Abu Obeidah;
All whom the Prophet loved, who believed in the son of Abdallah.
Every house they search in the populous city, whose threshold
Ever his feet had trod: thus vainly through Mecca they seek him;
Then, unassuaged of hate, of ranccour and wrath unabated,
They to the mountains turn, to seek in their dens and retirings.
If from the death he lurks: they enter the cavern of Hira,
Place of his fasting and prayer; the cavern of Hir'a is lonely.
Not in the depth of the cave, and not in the mountain retirings,
Not in their hollows and glens, can they track the steps of his going.
So through the day they sought; and still, when the sun was descending,
They were among the hills: then faint, disappointed, and weary,
Turning their faces homeward, they journey'd slowly and sullen
Down their rough mountain path; but often paused, and around them
Linger'd with prowling eyes: a little wide of their pathway,
Thus as they paused, they saw in the side of the stony mountain
A cave-mouth, narrow and high: the hill had the hue of the evening
Rich on its rugged sides, and the chasm was distinct in its blackness.
Thither turning, they sped; and one who foremost his companions
Came to the cavern's mouth: disturb'd by the noise of his footsteps,
From her nest, in the side of the chasm, a pigeon affrighted
Fled. The advancing pursuers heard the whirr of her pinions,
And he who was first exclaim'd, "There is none in the hole of the mountain;
For lo! a pigeon fled from her nest at the sound of my coming,
And the spider hath spread his network over the entrance."
Then from the cave he turn'd.
Was thy spirit shaken, Mohammed,
When in the depth of the rock thou hearest the voice of the Koreish?
He who was with thee trembled; the sweat on his forehead was chilly,
And his eyes in alarm were turn'd towards thee in the darkness.
Silent they sat in the rock; nor moved they, nor breathed they; but listen'd
Long to the tread of the feet, that, fainter and fainter sounding,
Died in the distance now: yet still they were silent, and listen'd.

Abubeker first, as his fear gave faith to the echo,
Fresh in his sense alarm'd—"Hark! hark! I hear them returning;
They are many, and we but two!" he whisper'd,
in terror.

"There is a third!" aloud replied the son of Abdallah—"God!"

So the night came on, and they in the place of their refuge
Silently sat. And now in hope they listen'd, awaiting Sound of approaching feet—of trusted friend or disciple,
Bringing them food and tidings, now that the darkness had settled.

Slow past the expectant hours: nearer the mouth of the cavern
Eagerly now they drew. The sound of the wind that was passing
Took from their hope its tone; and now in its distant murmur's
They heard the tread of feet; and now despairingly argued Danger was yet abroad, and none could venture towards them.

Midnight came; and a step was heard—distinctly they heard it:

Heavier it comes,—and now in the rock—and a voice—it is Ali.

He in the cave laid down the water-skin that he carried,

And the figs wrapt under his robe: then told he his tidings.
Low was his voice, for he spake in fear: "The peril is pressing,
Prophet of God, I saw thy foes return in the twilight:
Sullen they came from their toil, and talk'd of the search on the morrow.
The Idolaters joy in thy flight, and grieve at thy safety:
God shall remember their joy, and that grief, in the day of his judgment.

They shall feel in their evil load! A price is appointed
His who shall shed thy blood: but keep thou close in the mountain;
God will confound their plots."

He paused; so suddenly checking
Words on their way, as one who tells but half of his errand,
Loth to utter the worse remainder, that yet must be utter'd.

Sure if Mohammed had seen his eye, he had read in its trouble
Tidings of evil to come. At length to the son of Abdallah,

Telling his tale of woe, spake Ali the first of believers:
"Prophet, there is grief in thy dwelling: Cadijah, in sickness Lies on her bed of pain: for death she is stricken, I fear me."

Mohammed heard; and he bow'd his head, and groan'd for his exile.
